And in Badger State Lumber Co. v. G. W. Jones Lumber Co. 140 Wis. 73, 121 N. W. 933, the doctrine is stated that the rule is well settled that in executory contracts, where a specific performance cannot be enforced, either party has the power to stop performance on the other side by an explicit order to that effect, by subjecting himself to such damages as will compensate the other party for being stopped in the performance on his part at that point or stage in the execution of the contract. In such case an action cannot be maintained to recover the contract price, but may be maintained to recover damages for a breach of the contract. But in this case the contract involved was a sale of lumber, and it contained a provision for the inspection of the lumber by inspectors of both parties, with a further provision that if the purchaser failed to furnish an inspector, inspection made by the seller should be final, and there was also a provision for the estimate of the lumber by joint action of the parties. Hence, the contract of sale was not of a character which could be entirely performed by the seller without affirmative action upon the part of the purchaser.

The broad statement of the rule denying the right of the executory seller to maintain an action for the purchase price is considerably qualified in Haueter v. Marty, 156 Wis. 208, 145 N. W. 775, involving an action for damages for breach of contract, where the court refers to the question under consideration and reviews the cases passing thereon. In this review the doctrine is declared that "in case of a person offering, for a stipulated price, to sell and deliver to another at a particular place and at a time, depending upon circumstances determinable by such other, any specific article of personal property, and such other accepts the offer, and thereafter such person names the time when delivery will be made, but such other either notifies such person that he will not accept the property under the contract, except upon a material condition not named therein, or neglects to make any provision for duly accepting, thus manifesting a refusal to comply with the contract, a remediable wrong thereby accrues to the executory vendor, for which the law affords him a choice of three courses of action.

The three courses of action mentioned are these: (a) Hold the property in personam or by some appropriate agency for the executory vendee, and sue upon the contract for the purchase price and reasonable expenses incurred in caring for the same." This principle, however, is said to apply only "to sales of specific articles which are in possession of the seller, and can be, or articles which are before the breach, set aside for the executory vendee so title can actually or constructively vest in him. Where that is not the case, but the contract is for articles to be manufactured in the ordinary course of producing goods for the trade, and there is a notification before anything shall have been done to pass title, then the choice of options mentioned does not exist. That is, a party to an executory contract for the sale of personal property may, of right so to speak, commit the wrong of breaching it and become liable for damages actually suffered. . . . In such a case—where the contract does not relate to specific articles which can be treated as the property of the executory vendee before or at the time of the breach—he has but the one remedy, to recover the difference between the contract price and the fair market value at the time and place for delivery, . . . in case of such difference indicating a loss. If it does not so indicate, because of such fair market value being at least equal to the contract price, he has no remedy because of not suffering any damage."

b. Articles to be manufactured.

By the clear weight of authority it is held, at least as to goods to be manufactured by special order, which are out of the usual order and have not a readily ascertainable market value, that the purchaser, by repudiating the contract to purchase after the article has been completed, but before delivery, cannot relieve himself of liability for the purchase money, if the seller elects to treat the property as that of the purchaser and holds it for him. And although not making the foregoing conditions the test as to the right of the seller in this regard, it is held in many jurisdictions that the purchaser of an article by executory contract, by repudiating the contract before the seller has appropriated the article to the contract or tendered a delivery thereof, cannot escape liability for the purchase price, if the seller treats the property as his and holds it for him, and this rule is applied to articles manufactured for a purchaser. The two classes of cases are included under this subdivision, but the particular holding of each case is indicated:

—Kinkead v. Lynch, 132 Fed. 692, holding that where articles are manufactured for a certain price upon order of the purchaser, and, under ordinary circumstances, they are of a character precluding their having a market value, although before the articles are shipped the purchaser notifies the seller that he will not receive them, the former without delivery may sue for the value of the articles;

—Bond v. Bourk, 54 Colo. 51, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 97, 129 Pac. 223, holding that where a purchaser refuses without legal justification, to accept, when tendered to him, an article manufactured on his order after a special and particular design, the seller at his election may hold the article for the purchaser and recover the purchase price, since the tender of delivery and election to sue for the contract price vest the title in the purchaser, at least to the extent of supporting the action;

—Illustrated Postal Card & Novelty Co. v. Holt, 85 Conn. 140, 81 Atl. 1061, holding that where a purchaser of goods to be manufactured countermanded his order before an attempt had been made to deliver the same, but after the goods were manufactured, and the seller thereafter tendered the goods to him, the former was entitled to maintain an action for the purchase price, although the latter refused to receive the goods. The court said that upon the seller's delivery to the carrier and notice to the purchaser that the carrier held the goods subject to his order, the property passed to the purchaser, and the fact that the seller shipped the goods to the purchaser after notice from the latter of his cancellation of the contract, instead of retaining them, did not change the character of the bailment, since the carrier's possession was the seller's possession, it holding the goods for the purchaser. This decision is based upon the sale of goods act. And see to same effect, Home Pattern Co. W. W. Mertz Co. 86 Conn. 494, 86 Atl. 19. Where the purchaser of articles to be manufactured revokes the contract before delivery or tender, but after the articles are completed, the seller, for his measure of damages, may recover the contract price of the articles. Allen v. Jarvis, 20 Conn. 38;

—Neal v. Shewalter, 5 Ind. App. 147, 31 N. E. 848, holding that where a purchaser of barrels to be manufactured, upon receiving notice from the seller of the completion of the barrels, notified him that he would not receive them, the seller is not entitled to recover the purchase price where the barrels still remain his property, and he does not place himself in the position of bailee for the purchaser. It is recognized, however, that the seller, by appropriating the articles to the purchaser and retaining them as his agent, may entitle himself to recover the purchase price;

—Bauman v. McManus, 75 Kan. 106, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1138, 89 Pac. 15, sustaining the right of the seller of goods to be manufactured, to recover the purchase price, although the purchaser refused to receive the goods, and gave notice to the seller before the goods were shipped, but after they were completed, that he would refuse to receive them;

—Mass. See supra, "Repudiation of contract by buyer before tender or appropriation," V. a. And also Bristol Mfg. Corp. v. Arkwright Mills, 213 Mass. 172, 100 N. E. 55, holding that the purchaser was entitled to recover the purchase price of goods sold to be manufactured, which were of the usual manufacture, and not manufactured especially for the buyer, although the buyer canceled the contract, where, however, the seller separated and apportioned the goods to the particular contract so that it constituted a constructive delivery thereof. It does not appear whether or not this appropriation was made before or after the contract was canceled by the buyer. It is, however, pointed out that, as between immediate parties, nothing was necessary in order to pass title to the buyer beyond setting apart the goods for him, and it is said that it may have been found that the seller was impliedly authorized to make such appropriation by the buyer. For title may pass although the goods may remain in the actual possession of the seller;

—St. Louis Range Co. v. Kline-Drummond Mercantile Co. 120 Mo. App. 438, 96 S. W. 1040, holding that where a contract to manufacture articles has so far been performed before the seller receives notice from the purchaser of his repudiation thereof, that the property is ready for delivery, the seller may treat the contract as completed, hold the property subject to the purchaser's order, and recover the purchase price. To the same effect, see Koenig v. Truscott Boat Mfg. Co. 155 Mo. App. 685, 135 S. W. 514;

—Funke v. Allen, 54 Neb. 407, 69 Am. St. Rep. 716, 74 N. W. 832, wherein it is said that there are many cases where the particular facts and circumstances will warrant a departure from the general rule as to damages for breach of contracts of sale, in which the seller may be entitled to recover the purchase price;

—Atkinson v. Truesdell, 127 N. Y. 230, 27 N. E. 844, holding the seller of bottles to be manufactured entitled to recover the purchase price, although after the goods were manufactured, but before delivery, the purchaser gave notice to the seller that he would not take any of the property, where, upon such refusal, the seller held the goods in storage for him;

—Levy v. Glassburg, 92 N. Y. Supp. 50, holding that where an executory contract for the sale of an article to be manufactured is repudiated by the purchaser after the article has been manufactured, but before it is delivered or tender of delivery has been made, the seller may nevertheless offer to perform, and thereby entitle himself to recover the purchase price;

—Wis. See supra, "Repudiation of contract by buyer before tender or appropriation," V. a.

But it has been asserted that where goods have been ordered from the manufacturer, and during the process of manufacture or before the order has been made up, it is canceled, or where goods have been ordered from a wholesaler, and before the goods are delivered, either to the carrier or the purchaser, the latter countermands the order and notifies the seller that he will not comply with the contract or accept the goods, he renders himself liable only to respond in damages to the seller for whatever loss the latter has suffered thereby; but in such case no action can be maintained for the purchase price, although the seller thereafter completes the goods and tenders them to the purchaser. Trinidad Asphalt Mfg. Co. v. Buckstaff Bros. Mfg. Co. 86 Neb. 623, 136 Am. St. Rep. 710, 126 N. W. 293. The article, the purchase price of which it was sought to recover in this case, was roofing to be manufactured, and it is pointed out that there were no special conditions or requirements in the order; it was for an article a sample of which had been shown to the buyer, and as to which it was a matter of indifference to him whether it was on hand or had to be manufactured. In this case the article was made up before the countermand, but was not delivered.

And see Unexcelled Fire-Works Co. v. Polites, 130 Pa. 536, 17 Am. St. Rep. 788, 18 Atl. 1058, holding that a contract for the sale of fireworks to be manufactured or procured by the seller might be countermanded by the purchaser at any time before the goods were separated from the bulk and set apart for him, although the goods were actually made up before the order was countermanded.

And see also Acme Food Co. v. Older, 64 W. Va. 255, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 807, 61 S. E. 235, holding the sellers of animal food not entitled to deliver the food and maintain an action for the purchase price, where, before delivery, the purchaser repudiated the contract, and although subsequently to the repudiation the sellers tendered a delivery. In this case the court treated the contract as executory, although the order was for a certain quantity of food specifically described, and the purchaser executed his note in payment thereof, and before notice of repudiation was given, the sellers wrote the purchaser that they were in receipt of his order for the food, and advised him that they had manufactured, marked, and set it aside for him in their warehouse, and that it would be shipped him on the day specified, and further advised him that they had accepted his note for the purchase price.

c. Other articles.

The cases are quite evenly divided upon the question as to the right of the purchaser of personal property by executory contract to escape liability for the purchase price by giving to the seller notice of his repudiation of the contract before the seller has appropriated the property to the contract or tendered a delivery thereof to the purchaser.

The following cases sustain the right of the seller to recover the purchase price under such circumstances, if he continues to hold the property for and as the property of the buyer:

—Habeler v. Rogers, 65 C. C. A. 281, 131 Fed. 43, asserting, in an action for a breach of contract, that upon refusal of the purchaser to perform an executory contract of purchase before delivery or tender, the seller may wholly perform on his part, and when he has done all that is necessary to effect a delivery of the goods so as to pass title to the purchaser, he may store or retain them for him, or give him notice and resell them;

—Oklahoma Vinegar Co. v. Carter, 116 Ga. 140, 59 L.R.A. 122, 84 Am. St. Rep. 112, 42 S. E. 378, holding that where, before delivery of goods purchased under an executory contract, the purchaser repudiates the contract and gives notice thereof to the seller, the latter cannot complete the contract by delivering or offering to deliver the goods, and maintain an action for the purchase price. Under the Georgia Code, however, he can retain the goods and sue for the purchase price. To the same effect are Mountain City Mill Co. v. Butler, 109 Ga. 469, 34 S. E. 565; Rounsaville v. Leonard Mfg. Co. 127 Ga. 735, 56 S. E. 1030; Maddox v. Washburn-Crosby Mill. Co. 135 Ga. 539, 69 S. E. 821; Georgia Agri. Works v. Price, 11 Ga. App. 80, 74 S. E. 718; Robson v. Hale, 139 Ga. 753, 78 S. E. 177; Dilman Bros. v. Patterson Produce & Commission Co. 2 Ga. App. 213, 58 S. E. 365; Linder v. Cole Bros. Lightning Rod Co. 10 Ga. App. 102, 72 S. E. 719; American Mfg. Co. v. Champion Mfg. Co. 13 Ga. App. 551, 79 S. E. 485;

—Osgood v. Skinner, 211 Ill. 229, 71 N. E. 869, sustaining the right of the seller of shares of stock to maintain an action for the purchase price without making a delivery of the stock or a tender of delivery, where, before delivery, the purchaser repudiated the contract. The rule is asserted that if there is no delivery of personal property, the seller who has offered performance on his part may consider the property as the purchaser's, and may either sell it and sue for the unpaid balance of the purchase price, or hold it subject to the call or order of the purchaser and recover the purchase price;

—John A. Roebling's Sons' Co. v. Lock Stitch Fence Co. 130 Ill. 660, 22 N. E. 518, holding that, notwithstanding the fact that a purchaser of goods gives notice to the seller before the time for shipment that he will not accept the goods tendered to him, the seller may nevertheless disregard this notice, ship the goods and tender them to the purchaser, thereby keeping the contract alive for the benefit of both parties;

—Morris v. Wibaux, 159 Ill. 627, 43 N. E. 837, stating the rule in sustaining the right of the seller to resell as the property of the purchaser cattle purchased by the latter, after he had given the seller notice of his intention to refuse to receive them; Ridgley v. Mooney, 16 Ind. App. 362, 45 N. E. 348, holding that where the purchaser of bark by executory contract notified the seller that he would not receive, accept, or pay for any of the bark, the seller was not entitled to recover the difference between the amount received for the bark upon a resale and the purchase price, where he did not sell as agent of the purchaser. The court recognizes, however, the right of the seller under such circumstances to tender the goods and then sue for the purchase price;

—McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Markert, 107 Iowa, 340, 78 N. W. 33, holding that the seller, who is also the manufacturer of harvesting machinery to be delivered at a certain place, may recover the purchase price without making a delivery or tender, where, prior to the time fixed for delivery, the purchaser refused to recognize the contract or receive any machines under it. The court said that a judgment for the purchase price had the effect of vesting title in the purchaser;

—PATE v. RALSTON, holding that the purchaser of fruit trees cannot relieve himself from liability to take the trees and pay the purchase price therefor, by repudiating the contract before shipment, but after the seller had accepted the order which constituted the contract;

—Dudley A. Tyng & Co. v. Woodward, 121 Md. 422, 88 Atl. 243, holding that where the purchaser of shares of stock refused to receive them, and gave notice of such refusal to the seller before the stock was tendered to him, but after it had been purchased upon his account by the seller, the latter might resell for the account of the buyer; and the general rule is stated that the seller in such case is also entitled to store the goods for the buyer and sue for the contract price;

—Mass. See supra, "Repudiation of contract by buyer before tender or appropriation," V. a; —Oehler v. Conrad Schopp Fruit Co. 162 Mo. App. 446, 142 S. W. 811, holding that the rule that where a purchaser refuses to accept the goods purchased by executory contract, the seller, after tender and refusal, may store and retain the property for the purchaser and recover the purchase price, applies where the purchaser repudiates the contract of sale before the property is tendered to him, and that in such case no actual tender need be made (sale of apples to be picked);

—Dehner v. Miller, 166 Mo. App. 504, 148 S. W. 953, sustaining the right of the seller to recover the purchase price of bailed straw, although no delivery thereof was made, where, before a delivery was attempted, the purchaser gave the seller notice that he would not accept the property if tendered;

—Gourd v. Healy, 206 N. Y. 423, 99 N. E. 1099, holding the rule that when the purchaser of personal property under an executory contract of sale refuses to complete his purchase at the time fixed, the seller may keep the property for the purchaser and sue for the purchase price, to apply to a quantity of wine sold, the delivery of most of which never was tendered to the purchaser, the latter having repudiated the contract when requested by the seller to fix the time for delivery, or at least to make a settlement for the wine. The court said that the dealings of the parties in this case were such as to relieve the seller from the duty of segregating the purchaser's wine, even if it was considered that such segregation was necessary in order to pass title thereto. It is, however, added that the property in question was a species of which there may be a transfer of title even where it remains an integral part of a larger bulk;

—Mills v. Knickerbocker Hat Co. 76 Misc. 446, 135 N. Y. Supp. 5, holding that where the buyer notifies the seller of groundless objections to articles already delivered under a contract of sale, and orders the cancellation of the contract, his action in this regard constitutes a repudiation thereof, and the seller need not tender the remaining articles to him in order to entitle himself to maintain an action for the purchase price thereof (sale of a large quantity of pollution);

—Livesley v. Krebs Hop Co. 57 Or. 352, 97 Pac. 718, 107 Pac. 460, 112 Pac. 1, sustaining the right of the seller of hops to be raised and delivered in instalments, to recover the purchase price of instalments when the same was due, where the hops had been duly tendered to the purchaser, although before the tender the latter had repudiated the contract;

—Dowagiac Mfg. Co. v. Higinbotham, 15 S. D. 547, 9 N. W. 330, holding that, by the statutes of South Dakota, title is transferred by an executory agreement for the sale of personal property when the buyer has accepted the property, or when the seller has appropriated it for delivery and offered it to the buyer with the intent to transfer the title; and that this rule applies to the sale of a number of grain drills to be shipped from another state by the seller to the buyer, and that a notice by the purchaser to the seller of his repudiation of the contract and of his intention to refuse to receive the drills if tendered him, although given before delivery, does not preclude the seller from performing by shipping the drills to the purchaser, thereby vesting the latter with the title thereto, with the liability to pay the contract price; tract by buyer before tender or appropriation," V. a.

—Wis. See supra, "Repudiation of contract by buyer before tender or appropriation," V. a.

In Roswell Nursery Co. v. Mielenz, — N. M. —, 137 Pac. 579, it is held the rule that in case of a breach of an executory contract for the sale of goods before delivery, the seller cannot recover the contract price, does not apply to an executory sale of nursery stock which has been secured and prepared for shipment to the extent that stock was in the heeling ground ready for shipment when the order was repudiated by the purchaser, and which, if not taken by him, would result in a total loss to the seller. Under these circumstances the court holds the contract price may be recovered. Compare with Mayo v. Latham, infra.

The following cases, however, deny the right of the seller to appropriate or tender a delivery of the property to the purchaser, and thereby entitle himself to recover the purchase price, where, prior to such appropriation or tender, the purchaser has given to the seller notice that he cancels or repudiates the contract:

—Mayo v. Latham, 159 Mich. 136, 123 N. W. 561, holding that where the purchaser of shrubbery cancels the order therefor after the shrubbery has been dug and set aside for him by the seller, but before delivery or tender, the seller cannot recover the purchase price, although he thereafter ships the articles to the purchaser. Compare with Roswell Nursery Co. v. Mielenz, supra;

—McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Balfany, 78 Minn. 370, 79 Am. St. Rep. 393, 81 N. W. 10, holding that where there is no actual delivery of the article sold, the seller cannot recover the purchase price unless he shows a contract having the effect of passing title to the article. If the possession and title remain in the seller, and the purchaser repudiates his contract, the seller must treat the property as his own;

—Sherman Nursery Co. v. Aughenbaugh, 93 Minn. 201, 100 N. W. 1101, holding that where the purchase price of goods is to be paid upon delivery, and before delivery the purchaser repudiates the contract, and prevents the seller from making delivery, the latter cannot, by tendering the goods, entitle himself to recover the purchase price, and his only remedy in such case is an action for damages for a breach of the contract;

—Funke v. Allen, 54 Neb. 407, 69 Am. St. Rep. 716, 74 N. W. 832, denying the right to recover the purchase price where the purchaser of goods countermanded the order before the goods were shipped. It is said that on the breach of the contract by the purchaser by refusing to receive the property, the seller's damage in general is the extent of his actual injury, which ordinarily is the difference between the contract price and market value at the time and place of the breach. And the court disapproves the rule stated in Lincoln Shoe Mfg. Co. v. Sheldon, that the seller may tender the property to the purchaser, and on his refusal to accept it may recover the purchase price, and it is said that the statement of this rule was not necessary to that decision, since the action was upon a stock subscription, which the court said was not a sale and purchase;

—Massman v. Steiger, 79 N. J. L. 442, 75 Atl. 746, containing language indicating the position of the court to be that the purchaser of property by executory contract can defeat the right of the seller to recover the purchase price where the title has not passed, by refusing to accept the property when tendered to him. Such a holding, however, was not necessary to the decision. In this case the attempt was to recover the purchase price of shares of stock sold under a contract executory in character, by the terms of which the title was not to pass until a time in the future, the purchase price to be represented by promissory notes with satisfactory indorsers. In an action based upon a refusal of the purchaser to accept the stock and execute notes, the declaration was framed in covenant for a breach of the contract, and was not in form a suit for the purchase price of the stock, treating the property as having passed, and the pleadings contained no allegation of any election by the seller to recover the purchase price and hold the property for the benefit of the purchaser. Under these circumstances it was held that the measure of the seller's recovery was the difference between the agreed price of the property and its market value at the time and place of delivery. Moreover, as pointed out by the court, the price was to be paid in notes, which, as to form and sufficiency of indorsement, were to be passed upon by the seller. Considering the contract and the pleadings, the court said that at its inception title did not pass thereunder, and that since then title had not passed as evinced by the intention of the parties;

—Hooper, S. & Co. v. Bromley Bros. Carpet Co. 11 Pa. Super. Ct. 634, denying the right of the seller of bales of cotton by executory contract to recover the purchase price of cotton not delivered, where, before a tender of all the cotton, but after a delivery of a portion thereof, the purchaser repudiated the contract;

—McCall Co. v. Jennings, 20 Utah, 459, 73 Pac. 639, involving an executory contract for the sale of a quantity of dress patterns, and stating the rule that a party to an executory contract may by his own act break and terminate it, rendering himself liable to the other party to the contract for all damages recoverable for the breach, and the measure of damages in such case is the difference between the price agreed upon and the market value of the goods contracted for.

VI. Repudiation by buyer before article is completed.

The cases are in harmony in denying to the seller of articles to be manufactured the right to complete the article, and, by ap- 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

propriating it to the contract, entitle himself to the purchase price, when, before the article is substantially completed, the buyer repudiates it and gives notice thereof to the seller:

—Thorn v. Danzinger, 50 Ill. App. 306, holding that where shoes were ordered to be manufactured according to sample, and shortly thereafter the purchaser countermanded the order, but the seller made the shoes and shipped them to the purchaser, and the latter sent them back, and, the seller refusing to receive them, the carrier stored them in his own warehouse, there had been no delivery sufficient to entitle the seller to sue for the purchase price. The court remarked that contracts cannot be specifically enforced vis et armis;

—Wigent v. Marrs, 130 Mich. 609, 90 N. W. 423, holding that where a purchaser of a monument rescinded the contract of purchase before the monument was completed, the seller could not complete it and erect it at the place designated in the contract, and thereby entitle himself to recover the purchase price, since the rule is that a party to an executory contract may always stop performance by the other party by an explicit direction;

—Bacassetti v. Shenango Furnace Co. 122 Minn. 335, 142 N. W. 322, holding that where an executory contract for the purchase of an article to be manufactured is repudiated before the article is completed, the seller cannot complete the article and thereby increase the purchaser's liability;

—Gibbons v. Bente, 51 Minn. 499, 22 L.R.A. 80, 53 N. W. 756, holding that where a contract to erect a factory was repudiated before any steps had been taken for the erection thereof, the seller cannot proceed in the erection, and upon completion hold the purchaser for the purchase price;

—Heiser v. Mears, 120 N. C. 443, 27 S. E. 117, holding that where an order for goods to be manufactured is countermanded by the purchaser before completion, the seller cannot, by completing the article and tendering it to the purchaser, entitle himself to recover the purchase price;

—Woolf v. Hamburger, 129 App. Div. 883, 114 N. Y. Supp. 186, holding that where a purchaser cancels a contract for the purchase of articles to be manufactured before the articles have been manufactured, the seller is not entitled to complete the articles, tender them to the purchaser, and recover the purchase price. Where an executory contract for the purchase of an article to be manufactured is repudiated before the seller has manufactured the article, he is not entitled to complete the same, and by tendering the article hold the purchaser for the purchase price. Isaacs v. Terry & T. Co. 125 App. Div. 532, 109 N. Y. Supp. 792;

—Davis v. Bronson, 2 N. D. 300, 16 L.R.A. 655, 33 Am. St. Rep. 783, 50 N. W. 836, holding that where a contract to erect a creamery was repudiated by the buyer before any steps had been taken toward the erection of the plant, the seller could not perform the contract on his part and hold the purchaser for the contract price;

—Sonka v. Chatham, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 312, 21 S. W. 948, holding that on repudiation of a contract for the purchase of machines, the seller is not entitled to complete the machines, although at the time of receiving notice they were nearly completed. In such case the seller's only remedy is an action for the breach of the contract. He is, however, entitled to have the contract price taken as a standard by which to determine his loss; —Tufts v. Weinfeld, 88 Wis. 647, 60 N. W. 992, holding that where the buyer of a soda water fountain to be specially manufactured for him countermanded the order before any steps to manufacture the fountain had been taken, the seller could not thereafter manufacture the article and recover the purchase price.

Compare with Bookwalter v. Clark, 11 Biss. 126, 10 Fed. 793, holding that where an article is ordered to be manufactured according to a certain measure, pattern, or style, after the manufacturer has completed the article and tendered it, he is entitled to recover the contract price, although before tendering the article or entirely completing it, the purchaser undertakes to repudiate the contract and gives notice thereof to the manufacturer.

VII. Where title is expressly reserved by seller until purchase price is paid.

Although the purchaser refuses to receive goods sold on conditional sale when tendered, if they are appropriated to the contract by the seller, the great weight of authority sustains the right of the latter to recover the purchase price, where the contract contemplates possession by the purchaser before payment, since, by a contract of this character, the purchaser agrees that the payment of the purchase price shall precede the vesting of the title to the property in him. It is worthy of note that some of the cases which sustain the right of the seller to recover the purchase price where the purchaser refuses to receive the goods sold under a contract of this character deny the right under the ordinary contract of sale:

—Commercial Register Co. v. Drew, 168 Ill. App. 347, holding that where an order for a cash register to be manufactured was canceled before shipment, but after it was about ready for shipment, and the machine was shipped to the purchaser and he refused to receive it, an action might be maintained on a note given for the purchase price, although the title was reserved in the seller until payment. The court said that an actual delivery or acceptance was unnecessary to a recovery of the purchase price, for if the contract was executory when repudiated, upon the shipment of the machine it became executed so far as concerned the seller's rights;

—Gaar, S. & Co. v. Fleshman, 38 Ind. App. 490, 77 N. E. 744, 78 N. E. 348, holding the seller entitled to recover the purchase price where the purchaser refuses to perform a contract for the purchase of articles to which the seller retains title until full payment, since a suit for the purchase price constitutes a waiver of this provision, the title by the suit vesting in the purchaser;

—Port Huron Machinery Co. v. Hurto, 154 Iowa, 435, 135 N. W. 31, holding that a sale of a secondhand machine to be delivered at a designated place, and settled for by the notes of the purchaser, the seller retaining title until payment, cannot be rescinded by the purchaser giving notice of his repudiation to the seller before the machine is shipped, and in such case the seller may ship the machine to the place designated, tender the same to the purchaser, and upon his refusal to receive it recover the purchase price;

—White v. Solomon, 164 Mass. 516, 30 L.R.A. 537, 42 N. E. 104, holding that where an article is purchased, delivery to be made at a designated express office, and payment to be made in instalments in the future, the seller reserving the title until full payment, delivery at the express office is sufficient to entitle the seller to maintain an action for the purchase price, although the purchaser refused to accept the property. Compare with other Massachusetts cases, supra, under heading, "Repudiation of contract by buyer before tender or appropriation," V. a;

—National Cash Register Co. v. Dehn, 139 Mich. 406, 102 N. W. 965, wherein it is said that whether title passes or not is not material as affecting the seller's right to recover the purchase price, where, by the terms of the contract of sale, it is provided that title shall not pass to the subject-matter thereof until the article is paid for, and there is a provision that if the purchaser makes default in paying the purchase price, the full amount thereof shall be at once due and payable. Compare with Mayo v. Latham, 159 Mich. 136, 123 N. W. 561, referred to supra, V. c;

—Cambridge Soc. v. Elliot, 50 Misc. 159, 98 N. Y. Supp. 232, holding that where a purchaser after executing an order for the purchase of an article, title to which was to remain in the seller until payment, canceled the order and refused to receive the article when tendered, the seller might nevertheless recover the purchase price. To the same effect, see Gray v. Booth, 64 App. Div. 231, 71 N. Y. Supp. 1015;

—Ideal Cash Register Co. v. Zunino, 39 Misc. 311, 79 N. Y. Supp. 504, holding that a contract to purchase a cash register, the title to remain in the seller until payment of the purchase price, cannot be repudiated by the purchaser before delivery, and upon a subsequent tender by the seller and refusal to accept by the purchaser, the former is entitled to recover the purchase price. And it is said that the seller holds the property for the purchaser, and the latter is entitled to the same immediately upon paying the purchase price. But compare with National Cash Register Co. v. Smith, 48 App. Div. 472, 62 N. Y. Supp. 952, holding that where, by the terms of the contract of sale, the title is reserved in the seller until payment of the purchase price, if the purchaser countermands the order and refuses to accept the article, the seller cannot maintain an action for the purchase price, but his remedy is an action for damages for the breach; and this is true although the contract of sale provides that upon breach by the purchaser, the seller may declare the entire purchase price due and payable;

—National Cash Register Co. v. Hill, 136 N. C. 272, 68 L.R.A. 100, 48 S. E. 637, approving and applying the rule of White v. Solomon, supra, under a very similar state of facts;

—Tufts v. Poness, 32 Ont. Rep. 51, holding that under a contract for the sale of a soda water apparatus with title reserved in the seller until payment, although the purchaser repudiates the contract before delivery by the seller to a common carrier for transportation to the purchaser, the seller may nevertheless continue to perform by making shipment to the purchaser, thereby transferring to him the right of possession, and he may thereupon recover the purchase price.

In the foregoing case it is asserted that a stipulation in the contract by which the property in the goods was to remain in the seller during the term of credit stipulated for, notwithstanding the delivery of possession to the purchaser, and the fact that the seller has given possession to the purchaser as far as he can, take the case out of the general rule preventing the seller from recovering the purchase price where he has not parted with the property in the goods.

But John Deere Plow Co. v. Gorman, 9 Kan. App. 675, 59 Pac. 177, holds that under a contract of sale with a reservation of title in the seller until payment of the purchase price, where the purchaser refuses to receive and pay for the goods, the seller cannot maintain an action for the purchase price, since the contract is executory.

VIII. Pleadings.

As a rule it is not intended to include in this note, or pay particular attention to, cases denying the right of the seller of personal property to recover the purchase price upon the ground that his pleadings are not in such form as to entitle him to maintain the action. Nor are the early cases taken which drew distinctions between counts for goods sold and delivered, and counts for goods bargained and sold, or special counts. It is not believed that these distinctions have much if any more than a mere historical interest at the present time, at least so far as concerns the question under consideration.

Tender of articles manufactured under a contract of sale, and leaving the same upon the premises of the purchaser without his consent, have been held not to entitle the seller to maintain an action for goods sold and delivered, but the action should have been upon a special count. Hague v. Porter, 3 Hill, 141.

And see Perdicaris v. Trenton City Bridge Co. 29 N. J. L. 367, holding that a count for goods sold and delivered, or bargained and sold, cannot be maintained unless there has been a complete sale, and the title to the goods has become vested in the purchaser by the sale, and an actual acceptance of the goods.

In Brand v. Henderson, 107 Ill. 141, it is said that if there has been no delivery of the goods, a count for goods bargained and sold cannot be maintained unless it appears that there has been a completed sale, and the title to the goods has become vested in the purchaser. Under other circumstances tender of the goods or offer to deliver the same is not sufficient.

In Butler Bros. v. Hirzel, 87 App. Div. 462, 84 N. Y. Supp. 693, affirmed in 181 N. Y. 520, 73 N. E. 1120, the distinction between an action for goods sold and delivered, and a count for goods bargained and sold, is said to no more exist, and under the present practice the seller, upon tender of performance upon his part and demand for payment, and a refusal of the purchaser to perform, may treat the property as belonging to the latter, and sue for the recovery of the purchase price.

Where the question is raised and relied upon, the recovery of the purchase price cannot be had upon a count averring a sale and delivery, where the fact of delivery is not established. Gross v. Ajello, 132 App. Div. 25, 116 N. Y. Supp. 380. A. G. S.

Upon respondent's motion to dismiss an appeal on the ground of appellant's failure to serve the statement and specifications with his notice of appeal, as required by § 4, chap. 131, Laws 1913, the court will, upon good cause shown and in furtherance of justice, enlarge the time for the service thereof pursuant to the provisions of § 7224, Rev. Codes 1905, following the rule announced in Burger v. Sinclair, 24 N. D. 315, and also pursuant to the express provisions of § 7 of such new practice act.

Applying such a rule of construction, § 14, chap. 131, Laws 1913, is held to apply only to those judgments entered, or notice of entry of which was served, less than six months prior to July 1, 1913. From such judgments appeals must be taken within six months after the taking effect of the new act, July 1, 1913; as to all other judgments the old statute governs.

1. Where time under former statute had not expired when new statute took effect, 767.
2. Where time under former statute had expired before new statute took effect, 768.

I. Determination complained of rendered after statute took effect.

While there is little authority as to the applicability to pending actions of statutes changing the time allowed for proceedings for appellate review, where the judgment, decree, or order complained of was rendered after the statute in question took effect, it seems to be generally well recognized that appellate proceedings, including the question as to the time allowed therefor, are governed primarily by the law applicable thereto in force at the time when the determination sought to have reviewed was rendered (Lewis v. Kidd, 33 Okla. 628, 127 Pac. 257); and accordingly, that a statute changing the time within which appellate proceedings must be taken governs such proceedings taken to review a determination rendered after the statute took effect, whether the action was commenced before or after that time. New York v. Schermerhorn, 1 N. Y. 423 (obiter; statute extending time).

So, it has been held that a statute shortening the time within which proceedings in error may be taken applies to an action commenced before, and pending at, the time when the statute took effect, but in which judgment has been rendered since that time. Lewis v. Sittel, 91 C. C. A. 191, 165 Fed. 157; Wade v. Kimberley, 5 Ohio C. C. 33, 3 Ohio C. D. 18; Lewis v. Kidd, supra.

And in Saunders v. Moore, 14 Bush, 97, involving a statute regulating "further proceedings in civil cases now pending," and reducing the time within which appeals may be taken, it is said that the cases to which the statute applies are only such as were pending and in which no final judgment had 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

been rendered when the statute took effect: as, "if there was a final judgment in the lower court in a case, and no appeal prayed to this court, then there was no 'civil case now pending' anywhere; and if the case had been tried, judgment rendered, and an appeal taken to this court, no limitation would have been effectual."

And so, in Moss v. Hall, 1 Ky. L. Rep. 280, it was held that "the provisions of the present Code as to the time in which to prosecute an appeal apply to cases pending [apparently in the sense above defined in the Saunders Case; i. e., commenced, but in which final judgment had not yet been rendered] at the time such Code went into effect."

II. Determination complained of rendered before statute took effect.

a. Statute shortening time.

1. In general.

It is a general rule of construction that statutes shortening the time within which appeals or proceedings in error can be taken do not, in the absence of language showing clearly a legislative intention to the contrary, apply to judgments, decrees, or orders rendered or entered before such statutes took effect. Rankin v. Schofield, 70 Ark. 83, 100 Am. St. Rep. 59, 66 S. W. 197, on final hearing, 71 Ark. 168, 100 Am. St. Rep. 59, 70 S. W. 306; State v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 92 Ark. 74, 122 S. W. 627; Pignaz v. Burnett, 119 Cal. 157, 51 Pac. 28; Melde v. Reynolds, 120 Cal. 234, 52 Pac. 491; Sammis v. Bennett, 32 Fla. 458, 22 L.R.A. 48, 14 So. 90; George v. George, 250 Ill. 251, 95 N. E. 167; Karolinsky v. Chicago, 163 Ill. App. 33; Schwartz v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 166 Ill. App. 536; Kerlinger v. Barnes, 14 Minn. 526, Gil. 398 (obiter); Rolater v. Strain, 31 Okla. 58, 119 Pac. 992; Sipes v. Dickinson, — Okla. —, 122 Pac. 216; Bell v. Bearman, 37 Okla. 645, 133 Pac. 188.

And a statute regulating "further pro-

Messrs. Newton, Dullam, & Young, with Mr. Henry Kryger, opposed:

The service of specifications of error with the notice of appeal is not necessary to confer jurisdiction on appeal.

Revised Codes of 1905, § 7205.

If the specifications of error must be served before the appeal can be determined, the court may permit the appellant to amend its appeal by making service of the specifications.

Revised Codes of 1905, § 7224.

The act, chapter 131, Laws of 1913, is prospective, and not retroactive, in its operation. It does not cut off the right to appeal from judgments rendered prior to the taking effect of the act. At any rate, where the period in which an appeal might be taken under the former law is less than six months.

The only effect which the new law can have upon the right to appeal under the former law is to limit the time of appeal to the period prescribed by the new act where otherwise it would be greater.

ceedings in civil cases now pending," and reducing the time within which appeals may be taken, does not apply to a case in which final judgment had been rendered before the statute took effect, as, "if there was a final judgment in the lower court, in a case, and no appeal prayed to this court, then there was no 'civil case now pending' anywhere." Saunders v. Moore, 14 Bush, 97.

And a new Code shortening the time after the rendition of a judgment within which an appeal may be taken therefrom does not apply to a judgment rendered before the Code took effect, where one section thereof expressly provides that it shall not affect any existing right or remedy, but that, as to all such cases, the laws in force at the adoption of the Code shall continue in force. Theo. Poull & Co. v. Foy-Hays Constr. Co. 159 Ala. 453, 48 So. 785; Montgomery-Moore Mfg. Co. v. Leith, 162 Ala. 246, 50 So. 210; Gray v. Strickland, 163 Ala. 344, 50 So. 152.

In Pignaz v. Burnett, 119 Cal. 157, 51 Pac. 28, and Kerlinger v. Barnes, 14 Minn. 526, Gil. 398, the statute, if applied retrospectively, would have cut off the right of appeal at once upon going into effect. That fact, however, is mentioned by the court as illustrating the injustice of giving the statute a retrospective effect, rather than as a limitation of the rule denying it such effect.

But in O'Bannon v. Ragan, 30 Ark. 181, the fact that, if the statute had been given a retrospective effect, the time for appeal in the instant case would have been unreasonably abridged; and in Robinson v. Kraft, 154 Ill. App. 213; Robinson v. Kraft, 154 Ill. App. 221; and Ryan v. Supreme Council, C. K. A. 146 Ill. App. 384, the fact that it would have been immediately cut off upon the statute going into effect,—was apparently regarded as a limitation of the decisions denying a retrospective effect. This limitation, however, has been abrogated in those jurisdictions by subsequent decisions previously cited.

Thus, in George v. George, 250 Ill. 251, 95 N. E. 167, the Illinois statute reducing from five years to three years the time within which a writ of error may be sued out has been held not to apply to writs of error sued out to review judgments or decrees rendered prior to the passage of the statute, although a reasonable time (in this case about two years and nine months) remained after the statute became effective within which to sue out a writ of error thereunder. The court said: "This act must be applied generally to all causes of action accruing before the act of 1907 became effective. It cannot be said that the act will apply in one case and not in another. . . . Applying the rule of uniformity, the question whether a reasonable time was left plaintiffs in error within which to sue out their writ of error is not open for our decision."

For cases holding that the statute shortening the period should be applied retrospectively if a reasonable time remains, and cases holding that the new period governs, but that it should be computed from the time the statute took effect, and not from the time of the determination sought to be reviewed, see infra, II. a, 2.

The general rule of construction previously stated is, however, obviously inapplicable if the statute by its express terms purports to apply retrospectively. In that event, the only question open is the constitutionality of the statute; and upon that question, the fact as to whether the right to appeal or sue out a writ of error in the instant case would be cut off or unreasonably abridged may be important.

Thus, a statute providing that "the time for taking an appeal or suing out a writ of error on all judgments, final orders, and decrees rendered more than two years prior to the passage of this act shall be three years from the date of the judgment or decree," has been held to be unconstitutional and void as applied to a judgment against an infant, rendered three years or more prior to the passage of the act, from which no time is given in which to appeal. While under the previous law, he still had one year after he should have attained his majority, within which to exercise that right. Rankin v. Schofield, 70 Ark. 83, 100 Am. St.

Fisk, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Respondent moves for a dismissal of this appeal upon the following grounds: "First. That no statement of the errors of law complained of or specification of insufficient evidence was served with the notice of appeal, as required by ¶ 4, chapter 131, Session Laws of 1913. Second. There has been inexcusable delay on the part of appellant in causing a statement of the case to be settled, and in taking said appeal; more than two terms of this court having passed since the entry of judgment in the district court on July 9, 1912, and no statement having been proposed or submitted. Third. The said appeal was not taken within the time as required by statute."

Appellant resists such motion, and as to the first ground he makes a counter motion for leave at this time to supply the omission to serve the required statement of errors and specifications as required by § 4, chapter 131, Laws of 1913, being the new practice act which took effect on July 1st. Counsel for appellant bases such application upon § 7224, Rev. Codes 1905, which provides: "When a party shall in good faith give notice of appeal, and shall omit through mistake or accident to do any other act necessary to perfect the appeal to make it effectual or to stay proceedings, the court from which the appeal is taken, or the presiding judge thereof, or the supreme court, or any one of the justices thereof, may permit an amendment or the proper

Rep. 59, 66 S. W. 197, on final hearing 71 Ark. 168, 100 Am. St. Rep. 59, 70 S. W. 306. (As to constitutionality of retrospective statute allowing a reasonable time, see infra, II. a. 2.)

The position taken in the case last cited on the constitutional question is opposed by The Marinda v. Dowlin, 4 Ohio St. 500, where it was held that, under a Code expressly abolishing writs of error in civil cases, which previously could be sued out to review a judgment within five years after its rendition, and giving instead a petition in error, which must be filed within three years after the rendition of the judgment complained of, and declaring that the provisions of this Code shall apply after a judgment, order, or decree "heretofore" or hereafter rendered, to the proceedings to enforce, vacate, modify, or reverse it,—a petition in error cannot be sustained unless filed within three years after the judgment sought to be reversed, whether it was rendered before or after the Code took effect, and notwithstanding it was rendered more than three years before that time, and the petition in error was thereafter filed within five years after the judgment was rendered. The court said: "A right to institute a proceeding in error is rather a right of appeal than a right of action, and it was perfectly competent for the legislature to curtail it as they have done."

While the court, in The Marinda v. Dowlin, supra, thus sustained the constitutional power of the legislature, by a statute explicitly retrospective, to cut off the right to sue out a writ of error, it does not touch the question of statutory construction, since, as the opinion observed, the language of the statute was too explicit to leave room for doubt, and the court could not do otherwise than follow its natural import.

In Ewell v. American L. Ins. Co. 6 Ohio L. J. 339, holding that a statute reducing the period limited for filing a petition in error from three years to two years from date of judgment applied to judgments rendered before the statute took effect, as well as to those rendered afterwards; and that "the petition in error must be filed 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

within two years from the rendition of the judgment,"—it does not appear whether or not the statute purported to be retrospective.

In Lafferty v. Shinn, 38 Ohio St. 46, involving the same statute reducing from three years to two years the limitation period for proceedings in error, it was held that, by virtue of another statute (act of 1866) providing that "whenever a statute is repealed or amended, such repeal or amendment shall in no manner affect pending . . . proceedings, . . . nor causes of such . . . proceeding, existing at the time of such amendment or repeal, unless otherwise expressly provided, . . ." the case was governed by the earlier statute providing the three-year limitation period for such proceedings. The court, however, said that, but for the statutory provision above quoted, it would have had no hesitation in holding that the statute reducing the limitation period applied to and barred this proceeding in error, although the judgment complained of was rendered more than two years before the statute took effect, and this proceeding was begun two days after the statute took effect, and within the former limitation period of three years from the time when the judgment was rendered. The court said that, while the legislature had no power so to abridge the period within which an existing right may be asserted as that there shall not remain a reasonable time within which an action may be commenced, yet, the right so to appeal to the courts does not involve a further right to appeal from the judgment of the court to which such application for redress is made; but, on the contrary, a right of appeal from such judgment exists only when given by statute, and such right to appeal, when so given, may be taken away by statute, even as to cases pending on appeal. And the same thing is true in Ohio as to proceedings in error.

If, as seems probable, the statute reducing the period did not expressly and explicitly purport to be retrospective, the remarks of the court in this case would apparently favor the view that, both as a matter of con-act to be done on such terms as may be just." We are satisfied of appellant's good faith in serving the notice of appeal, and that the omission to serve such statement of errors and specifications was purely an oversight, due to the fact that the provision of the new statute aforesaid was overlooked; the notice of appeal having been served but a few days after the taking effect of the new statute.

The court clearly has the power and should permit such omissions to be supplied, unless the provisions of § 4, chapter 131, supra, are construed as mandatory and a compliance therewith jurisdictional. The section reads: "A party desiring to make a motion for new trial, or to appeal from a judgment or other determination of a district court or county court with increased jurisdiction, shall serve with the notice of motion or notice of appeal, a concise statement of the errors of law he complains of; and if he claims the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict, or that the evidence is of that character that the verdict should be set aside as a matter of discretion, he shall so specify." If a compliance with such statute is essential to confer jurisdiction upon this court sufficient to enable it to permit amendments or other necessary acts to be done in order to make the appeal effectual, then it follows that respondent's motion should be granted; otherwise it should be denied, provided such amendment or other necessary act is made or taken by leave of court. The new prac-stitutional law and statutory construction, such a statute should be applied retrospectively, in the absence of any other statute to the contrary. But, in any event, the remarks were obiter, and, as already indicated, they seem to have no support from the Marinda Case—upon the supposed authority of which they were made—so far as the question of statutory construction is concerned, when the statute does not expressly purport to be retrospective; although they would be supported by that case so far as the constitutional question is concerned.

Apparently under the statute of 1866 (§ 79, Rev. Stat.) above quoted, and which controlled the decision in the Lafferty Case, supra, it was held, in Canaan Twp. v. Infirmary Directors, 46 Ohio St. 694, 23 N. E. 492, that a statute reducing from two years to six months the time within which proceedings may be commenced "to reverse, vacate, or modify a judgment or final order," which statute contains no provision making it applicable to "causes of . . . proceeding" existing at the time of its taking effect,—does not affect the right of a party, under the previously existing law, to prosecute proceedings in error at any time within two years from the time judgment was rendered against him, if that was prior to the taking effect of the statute.

In Kansas City v. Dore, 75 Kan. 23, 88 Pac. 539, in which it does not appear whether or not the statute expressly purported to be retrospective, it was held that a statute changing the time within which an appeal can be taken to reverse a judgment, from one year after the rendition of final judgment, to thirty days from the settlement of the case-made, or ninety days from the entry of the judgment, applied to a case in which judgment had been rendered and the defeated party had had his case-made settled more than thirty days before the statute became effective. The court said: "The right to an appeal is neither a vested nor a constitutional right. It is purely statutory, and may be limited by the legislature to any class of cases, or in any manner, or may be entirely withdrawn. The 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) repeal of § 5042 left the plaintiff in error without any right of appeal except that provided in the amendment."

2. As affected by reasonableness of time.

In some jurisdictions, the courts seem to have taken the view that statutes shortening the time allowed for commencing proceedings for the review of judgments or decrees should be applied to prior determinations, from the date thereof, provided only the injured party has a reasonable time after the passage of the statute in question within which to take such proceedings. Stephen v. Lewis, 62 Md. 229 (obiter).

And accordingly, it has been held that a statute reducing from four years to two years the time within which writs of error in "any case" may be brought applies to a case in which nine months remained, after the passage of the act, before the expiration of the two years from the date of the judgment. Smith v. Packard, 12 Wis. 371. The court said: "The authorities seem fully to establish the rule that where mere inchoate rights are concerned, depending for their original existence on the law itself, they are subject to be abridged or modified by law, and that statutes of this character apply to such rights existing at the time of their passage, provided a reasonable time is left after the passage of the act, and before it would operate as a bar, for the party to exercise the right. . . . There can be no doubt that this [nine months] must be considered as a reasonable time within which the writ of error might have been sued out, and that the statute therefore operated as a bar to its being issued afterwards."

And a statute reducing from three years to one year the time after removal of disability within which any party to a judgment, who was under legal disability, may file a complaint for a review of the judgment, applies to a case in which an infant party attained his majority after the statute went into effect, although the judgment tice act aforesaid does not purport to amend or change the existing statute prescribing the steps necessary to be taken to perfect an appeal, and we do not think a fair construction of § 4 of such new act evinces any legislative intent to require such statement of errors and specifications as a prerequisite to this court acquiring jurisdiction of the appeal, to the extent, at least, of authorizing it to permit amendments or other necessary acts to be done to make the appeal effectual. The statute is, no doubt, mandatory in the sense that this court, without such statement of errors and specifications (when necessary), will be unable to dispose of the appeal on the merits; but we are agreed that the service of the notice of appeal and undertaking for costs, pursuant to §§ 7205 and 7208, Rev. Codes, 1905, confers jurisdiction sufficient to authorize the court to permit appellants to supply the omissions above referred to. The recent case of Burger v. Sinclair, 24 N. D. 315, 140 N. W. 233, is authority for our conclusions as above announced.

A still more conclusive answer to respondent's contention in support of the first ground of the motion is found in § 7 of the new act. This section provides: "The court or judge may, upon good cause shown, in furtherance of justice, extend the time within which any of the acts mentioned in §§ 1-5 and 6 of this act may be done, or may, after the time limited therefor has expired, fix another time within which any of such acts may be done." As the only act was rendered against him ten years before. Rupert v. Martz, 116 Ind. 72, 18 N. E. 381. In this case, the new act was held to repeal by implication the old act, so that if the new act were to be held not applicable to the case, there would be no remedy at all for the review of the decree.

A statute reducing from three years to one year the time for taking appeals from final decrees in chancery, which applies to such decrees made prior to the time it took effect, but provides that it shall not affect the right of appeal therefrom, provided appeal be made within six months after that time,—is not unconstitutional or invalid. "Since the legislature may prescribe the time within which an appeal may be taken, it may well fix any time after the passage of the act, provided it is not so short as to amount substantially to a denial of the right of appeal. That six months is a reasonable time cannot be denied." State Council, J. O. U. A. M. v. National Council, J. O. U. A. M. 79 N. J. Eq. 193, 69 Atl. 975.

And a statute limiting the time for writs of error is valid, which, as applied to judgments recovered before its passage, expressly allows six months from the time it took effect for issuing such writs. Rogers v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 81 N. J. L. 40, 78 Atl. 664.

In Texas, also, the general rule has been held to be that the legislature may shorten the time allowed for appeals or proceedings in error, and that a statute shortening such time will apply to pending actions, provided only that a reasonable time is allowed, after the statute takes effect, within which to take appeals or proceedings in error in actions in which such appeals or proceedings are not then barred under the old law. Odum v. Garner, 86 Tex. 374, 25 S. W. 18; Wright v. Hardie, 88 Tex. 653, 32 S. W. 885.

But, in the application of such statutes, a peculiar rule has been laid down. Thus, in Odum v. Garner, supra, it is held that a statute which reduces from two years to twelve months the time within which writs of error may be sued out, and postpones for more than four months the time after its 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

approval when it shall take effect, so that a reasonable time is given within which to sue out writs from judgments already rendered, applies, upon its taking effect, to judgments rendered before it took effect; and in computing the time remaining under the new law, the time which elapsed under the old law is counted in the ratio which it bears to the whole of the former limitation period, and the remaining time under the new law is computed upon the basis of the ratio that the unexpired time under the old law bears to the whole time. That is, if three fourths of the former period of two years had elapsed when the statute took effect, one fourth of the new period of one year would be allowed after the taking effect of the statute.

This decision was followed by the court of civil appeals, in Compton v. Ashley, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 28 S. W. 924, where that court, on the authority of the Odum Case, set aside, on rehearing, its previously made order in 4 Tex. Civ. App. 406, 23 S. W. 487, which overruled a motion to dismiss a writ of error on the ground that the twelve months statute permitted a party, otherwise entitled, to sue out a writ of error at any time within twelve months from the time the statute took effect, provided it was done within two years from the rendition of the judgment.

These rules were also reaffirmed in Wright v. Hardie, supra, a case involving a statute limiting to thirty days the time within which applications for writs of error might be filed, with the result that, there having been no limitation under the former law, it was held that the full period should be allowed after the new law took effect, in view of the fact that this thirty-day period was in itself no more than reasonably sufficient to prepare and prosecute an application for a writ of error.

And in Perry v. Warner, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 40 S. W. 170, it was held, citing the Odum Case, that the statute reducing the time within which writs of error might be sued out by infants, married women, and persons of unsound mind, from two years after the removal of their disabilities to required to be done by § 4 is the service of such statement of errors of law and specification of the insufficiency of the evidence, it necessarily follows that the legislature, by the enactment of § 7, clearly evinced an intent not to make the service of such statement and specifications, with the notice of appeal, a jurisdictional prerequisite.

Leave is hereby granted the appellant to supply such omissions within thirty days from the date of the filing of this opinion. Should he fail so to do, the appeal may be dismissed upon proper showing of such neglect.

The second ground of the motion is manifestly untenable, conceding that appellant had the full period of one year in which to appeal from the date of notice of the entry of the judgment, which we will hereafter consider. It is no ground for moving to dismiss the appeal because not taken earlier, and it is perfectly plain that a delay, or even an entire failure to cause a statement of the case to be settled, is no ground for such a motion, as the appellant may desire merely to have a review of errors appearing upon the judgment roll proper.

The third ground of motion presents a more complex question. The new practice act, which took effect on July 1st, reduces the time in which appeals may be taken from judgments from one year to six months after the entry thereof by default, or after written notice of the entry thereof where there was an appearance in the action. Section 14, chapter 131, supra.

twelve months after the rendition of judgments against them, and not thereafter, notwithstanding they were laboring under such disabilities when the judgments were rendered,—barred the right of such person to writs at the end of twelve months after the statute went into effect.

In some cases statutes shortening the time allowed for appeals have been applied, from the date of their taking effect, to judgments theretofore rendered, to appeal from which a longer period of time remained under the former law than was given by the statute in question, thus limiting the remaining time to the shorter period allowed by the statute. Thus, in Bailey v. Kincaid, 57 Hun, 510, 19 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 232, 11 N. Y. Supp. 294, it was held that a statute reducing from sixty days to thirty days the time within which an appeal may be taken, while not so operating retrospectively that the thirty-day limitation would begin to run before the statute was passed, does apply to cases in which appealable determinations have been made before that time, the thirty-day period beginning, in such cases, with the date of the passage of the statute, and the right of appeal becoming barred not later than thirty days after that date.

And an act limiting the time (theretofore unlimited) within which an appeal may be taken bars the right of appeal from a judgment rendered before the passage of the act, upon the expiration of the new limitation period after the act took effect. Lewis v. Lindsay, 33 Ala. 304.

So, it has been held that a statute limiting the time within which an appeal can be taken applies to a decree passed before it went into effect, at least to the extent of cutting down the time for an appeal to a period extending not beyond the expiration of the new limitation period, after the date when the statute went into effect. Stephen v. Lewis, 62 Md. 229.

And in Rogers v. Trumbull, 32 Wash. 211, 73 Pac. 381, it was held that a statute reducing from six months to thirty days the time within which appeals may be taken, and not purporting to be retroactive, does 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

not apply to judgments rendered prior to the time it took effect, except that (obiter) in the case of judgments the right of appeal from which, under the old law, extended more than thirty days from the time the act took effect, the statute limits the remaining time to thirty days after its taking effect.

And see also WILSON v. KRYGER.

A statute creating a new intermediate appellate court, and providing that appeals thereto must be taken within three months from the date of the entry of the judgment or decree appealed from, whereas, under the previously existing law, such appeals might be taken at any time within two years, directly to the supreme court of the state, as applied to cases in which judgments or decrees had been entered before the statute took effect, gives to the defeated parties therein three months from and after the date the statute took effect, unless less time remained to them under the old law. Shelly v. Dampman, 174 Pa. 495, 34 Atl. 124, affirming 1 Pa. Super. Ct. 115.

And a statute limiting all appeals to six months from the entry of the judgment or decree appealed from, which statute provides in effect that it shall apply to pending cases, but that the limitation of time therein provided for, as against any party entitled to appeal from a judgment or decree theretofore entered, shall not begin to run until the date when the statute takes effect, if, but for it, the right of appeal would have extended beyond six months after that date,—gives an appellant six months from the date of the taking effect of the statute, in any case in which, under the old law, he would have had that length of time or more remaining at the date when the new law took effect, within which to take his appeal. Barlott v. Forney, 187 Pa. 301, 41 Atl. 47.

And a statute reducing from six months to sixty days the time allowed for taking an appeal, which expressly provides that in all cases where the right to an appeal exists at the time when the statute takes effect, the time for taking such appeal is thereby extended for the period of sixty days thereafter,—has the effect to enlarge the six

Such new act is general, and applies to appeals from all judgments, whether entered before or after it became effective; and, as we understand respondent's contention, it is that such statute, relating as it does merely to the remedy, should be given not only a prospective but a retrospective operation, and as thus construed, it operated eo instanti to cut off appellant's right of appeal from the judgment in question on July 1st. We cannot, however, agree with the conclusion thus drawn by respondent's counsel. While the act deals only with the remedy, and on its face applies to all judgments, whether rendered before or after its enactment, we think it is entirely clear that the legislature did not intend to give it a retroactive operation so as to cut off a right of appeal which existed at the time it took effect. While manifestly the legislative purpose was to shorten the time for appeal to six months as to all judgments, it no doubt intended to have such period computed from the date the new act should take effect; and where, under the old statute, more than six months would be left in which to take an appeal from an existing judgment, the new act would cut off the right of appeal at the expiration of six months from July 1st. But in cases of existing judgments where, on July 1st, a period of but six months or less remained in which to take an appeal under the old statute, the new act does not apply, and the time prescribed under the old act governs. In other words, the new act will not be months' period originally allowed, in cases where less than sixty days of that period remained at the time the new statute went into effect. Columbia City Land Co. v. Ruhl, — Or. —, 134 Pac. 1035; Walling v. LaFollette, — Or. —, 134 Pac. 1192.

It may be observed that, while the cases cited in this subdivision held that the new statute, reducing the period, applied to judgments previously rendered, upon the condition that a reasonable time remained, or upon the assumption that the period prescribed by the new statute should be computed from the time the new statute became effective, yet they are not all opposed to the rule of construction stated supra, II. a, 1, to the effect that the statute reducing the period does not apply to all judgments previously rendered, for the reason that, in some of them (e. g., the New Jersey cases), the new statute, in express terms, applied to previous judgments, so that no question of statutory construction was involved, but merely a question of constitutional law. In other cases, however (e. g., Bailey v. Kincaid and Rogers v. Trumbull, supra), the new statute was not in terms retrospective; and the result in these cases is therefore opposed to the rule of construction referred to, so far as it holds that judgments previously rendered do not come at all within the operation of a statute reducing the time, and not explicitly retrospective. As to some of the cases, it is not clear whether the decision is to be regarded as covering the question of constitutional law only, or both that question and the question of statutory construction.

b. Statute extending time.

1. Where time under former statute had not expired when new statute took effect.

"The legislature has control of remedies so far as they affect existing actions," and "this control includes power to extend the time to appeal, . . . provided some time yet remained, according to the law in 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

force when the legislature acted, 'within which an appeal might have been taken.' Germania Sav. Bank v. Suspension Bridge, 159 N. Y. 362, 54 N. E. 33.

So, a statute extending the right of appeal during the pendency of a motion for additional findings of fact and conclusions of law in an action in which judgment has been entered applies to cases in which judgments have been entered before the statute took effect, where the time for appealing from such judgments has not then expired, and another statute declares all suits to be pending until determined on appeal, or until the time for appeal has passed; the mere extension of the time for appealing in such a case not affecting any constitutional or vested rights of the successful party. Boucowski v. Jacobsen, 36 Utah, 165, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 898, 104 Pac. 117.

And a statute increasing the time allowed for settling cases in chancery, upon appeal, applies to a pending case in which the time had not expired when the statute took effect. Beebe v. Birkett, 108 Mich. 234, 65 N. W. 970.

In this case, the court also said, generally: "Our conclusion is that the act, being one affecting procedure merely, is of general application to pending as well as prospective cases. Ibid."

But in Davis v. Pender, Minor (Ala.) 57, the court said that the statute in question, extending from twelve months to three years the time from the rendition of judgment within which a writ of error might issue, could apply only to judgments rendered since its enactment; and it was accordingly held not to apply to a judgment rendered before its enactment, although, at the time of the enactment, the period within which a writ might issue under the former law had not yet expired.

And in New York v. Schermerhorn, 1 N. Y. 423, the court stated broadly that a statute extending from fifteen days to two years the time allowed for taking appeals did not apply to cases in which the judgment, decree, or order had been made before the statute took effect, such cases being governed by the old law.

given an interpretation which would result in thwarting the legislative will, which was to shorten—not lengthen—the time for prosecuting appeals.

In order to give effect to the evident legislative intent we are required to hold that the new act applies only to those judgments the time for appealing from which under the old statute would extend more than six months after the taking effect of the new statute. In other words, the new statute is prospective in its operation, but applies to all judgments, whether entered prior or subsequent to July 1st, which, but for such act, the period in which appeals might have been prosecuted therefrom would exceed six months from such date. As to other judgments, the period for appealing is governed by the old statute, and the new does not apply, for otherwise the new act would have the effect of enlarging rather than shortening the period for appealing therefrom, or else it would cut off all right to appeal on the date of the taking effect of such act, neither of which results was intended. The question is somewhat analogous to that presented by statutes shortening the limitation of time in which actions may be commenced after the cause of action accrues. Such statutes are generally held to apply to causes of action existing at the time of their taking effect, provided the new act affords a reasonable time after it takes effect in which suits may be commenced thereon. If a reasonable time is not thus afforded, the new act, for reasons which are palpably sound, is held not to apply to such causes of action. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Braithwaite, 7 N. D. 358, 66 Am. St. Rep. 653, 75 N. W. 244; Osborne v. Lindstrom, 9 N. D. 1, 46 L.R.A. 715, 81 Am. St. Rep. 516, 81 N. W. 72; State Finance Co. v. Mather, 15 N. D. 386, 109 N. W. 350, 11 Ann. Cas. 1112; Adams & F. Co. v. Kenoyer, 17 N. D. 302, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 681, 116 N. W. 98.

Of course there is a marked distinction which should be noted between causes of action and the privilege of appealing. The former is a property right which is protected by the Constitution from confiscation, while the latter is a mere privilege

2. Where time under former statute had expired before new statute took effect.

Generally, as to vested right in defense of statute of limitations, see note to McEldowney v. Wyatt, 45 L.R.A. 609.

According to the great weight of authority, an attempt to revive a right of appeal or a right to a writ of error after it has been barred by the existing statute is unconstitutional. Thus, it has been said: "If, . . . according to the law existing when the statute extending the time to appeal . . . was passed, the judgment had become final and unalterable, because no further right of appeal existed, then the judgment conferred a vested right and was property of which the owner could not be deprived by an act of the legislature, or otherwise than through due process of law. An appeal brought pursuant to a statute which authorizes an appeal after the time provided by law had expired, . . . although it might result in the reversal of the judgment and be in form a judicial proceeding, would not be what is known as due process of law, which is not satisfied by a judgment based upon an unconstitutional statute. A judgment is a contract which is subject to interference by the courts so long as the right of appeal therefrom exists; but when the time within which an appeal may be brought has expired, it ripens into an unchangeable contract and becomes property, which can be disposed of or affected only by the act of the owner, or through the power of eminent domain. It is then beyond the reach of legislation affecting the remedy, because it has become an absolute right which cannot be impaired by statute. Remedies may be modified even as to pending actions, but no action can be regarded as pending when it has expanded into a judgment and the time to appeal has expired." Germania Sav. Bank v. Suspension Bridge, 159 N. Y. 362, 54 N. E. 33.

So, a statute extending the time allowed for taking appeals does not apply to a case in which the right of appeal was barred by lapse of time when the statute took effect. New York v. Schermerhorn, 1 N. Y. 423.

And a statute extending from six months to one year the time within which an appeal may be taken "from a judgment heretofore or hereafter rendered," although retrospective in its terms, cannot apply to a judgment rendered more than six months before its passage, from which an appeal was already barred, under the existing law, at the time the statute took effect, as such an application would infringe the Constitution by taking away vested property rights. Beaupre v. Hoerr, 13 Minn. 366, Gil. 339.

Nor does a statute providing that petitions for review, commenced within six months after its passage, may be maintained in certain cases, apply to such a case, in which the time for a review under the existing law had expired at the time of the passage of the statute. Atkinson v. Dunlap, 50 Me. 111.

And an act authorizing, in cases which had been decided in special courts of equity, the filing of bills of review within ninety days after the passage of the act, under the same rules and regulations governing bills of review in cases regularly commenced and decided in courts of equity in the state, is unconstitutional and void in its application to a case in which, under the previously existing law, the right to file a bill of review was barred by the statute of limitations. Woodman v. Fulton, 47 Miss. 682.

which may be taken away at any time by the legislature. The question here is one of legislative intent rather than of legislative power. Did the legislature intend, by the act in question, to cut off the privilege of appeals from certain existing judgments, or did it intend by such new act to enlarge the period previously allowed for appealing therefrom? Clearly neither result was intended. There is no sound reason why such new statute may not be held to apply to certain judgments existing on July 1st, and not to all. Manifestly it should be held to apply to those judgments where otherwise an appeal might be taken after six months have elapsed from July 1st; and it is equally manifest that it should not apply to any other existing judgments, because it fixes no time applicable to them. As before stated, the six-months period, which is the only time fixed in such act, if given a retroactive operation as to the latter class of judgments, would cut off all right of appeal on July 1st, and when given a prospective operation only, it would enlarge the time for appealing therefrom.

Likewise, a statute providing that no writ of error shall be refused or barred in any suit decided prior to a certain previous date, by reason of lapse of time, is invalid as an invasion of vested rights, in its application to a case in which a writ of error was completely barred by lapse of time, under the existing law, at the time of the passage of the statute. Trim v. McPherson, 7 Coldw. 15.

And a statute providing that the time between certain past dates shall not be computed in the application of any statute of limitations is unconstitutional and void, in so far as it revives a right already barred, by authorizing a writ of error in an action in which the right thereto was barred by lapse of time before the passage of the statute. Story v. Runkle, 32 Tex. 398.

And a statute authorizing writs of error, and expressly providing that it shall be deemed to apply to all judgments or decrees which have been rendered since a certain date, in so far as it allows writs of error to judgments from which appeals were barred, prior to its passage, is unconstitutional and void, as retrospective in its operation, and taking away the vested right to plead lapse of time as a bar to appeals. Willoughby v. George, 5 Colo. 80; Bond v. First Nat. Bank, 5 Colo. 83; Hewitt v. Colorado Springs Co. 5 Colo. 184.

A statute purporting to validate certain appeals which have already been attempted to be taken after the expiration of the time allowed by the statute in force for the taking thereof is unconstitutional and void as an interference with vested rights and an invasion of the judicial power by the legislative assembly. Macartney v. Shipherd, 60 Or. 133, 117 Pac. 814, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1257.

This identical question has frequently been before the courts, and there is some conflict in the holdings. We will notice only a few of such decisions.

Beebe v. Birkett, 108 Mich. 234, 65 N. W. 970, involved a statute extending the time for settling cases in chancery. It was there held that as the new statute dealt with procedure only, it applied to both pending and future cases. The court there, among other things, said: "The new act does not in express terms repeal the old, but it seems to cover the same ground as the old, with the exception mentioned. In our opinion, it was intended to supplant the other; and the only question here is whether it extends to pending cases, or whether they shall be governed by the former practice. It is certain that this act of 1895 should not be given retroactive effect, if vested rights were to be thereby affected; but a particular remedy is not necessarily a vested right. . . . It is a general rule that an act dealing with procedure, only, applies, unless the contrary intention is expressed, to all actions falling within its terms,

And a special act of the legislature, passed after the expiration of the time allowed by law to claim an appeal from a certain decree of a judge of probate, granting the right of appeal from such decree, is unconstitutional and void as being an exercise of judicial power by the legislature, and a retrospective act affecting, disturbing, and destroying vested rights. Lewis v. Webb, 3 Me. 326.

But a statute extending from ten days to thirty days the time within which appeals can be taken, and expressly providing that it shall apply to certain cases in which judgment has already been entered, is not unconstitutional or invalid, even as applied to a case in which the right to an appeal was barred by lapse of time before the passage of the statute, where the defeated party also had the right, under the previously existing law, to have the judgment reviewed by suing out a writ of error at any time within two years. Alvord v. Little, 16 Fla. 158. The court said: "Now the time for suing out a writ of error in the case at bar is two years under the existing law. The writ of error is a means of bringing before the appellate court the proceedings of the inferior court. The time, therefore, within which the parties in the present case might bring their case up for review, is two years. Can it be questioned that the legislature might extend the time for review by means of an appeal to the full term of two years, even without repealing or taking away the writ of error, but leaving both remedies to stand, and leaving parties to pursue either of these methods as might be convenient? In the light of past legislation and the practice of the courts, we cannot permit a doubt to prevail. The act in question scarcely comes whether commenced before or after the enactment. . . . An act giving appeals from certain enumerated judgments and orders applies to such judgments and orders made prior to its passage [citing numerous cases]."

In Odum v. Garner, 86 Tex. 374, 25 S. W. 18, this precise question was involved, and the court treats the question as analogous to cases involving statutes shortening the limitation period for the commencement of actions, and adheres to a rule announced in Gautier v. Franklin, 1 Tex. 732, holding that "upon the substitution of a new term of limitation the time which elapsed under the former law will be counted in the ratio that it bears to the old period, and the time of the new law will be computed upon the basis of the ratio that the unexpired time under the old law bears to the whole time. That is, that if under the old law two thirds of the time had expired, then one third of the new law would be allowed in which to sue." No other court seems to have adopted such a rule, and it seems to us that the holding is unsound and constitutes judicial legislation rather than judicial construction.

In Ryan v. Waule, 63 N. Y. 57, it was held that a statute passed after an entry of a judgment, but before an appeal there-within the definition of retroactive legislation. It merely permits a party to bring up a cause for review, within the time already provided, by a process different from that already allowed, but not infringing any rights of property already established."

And a statute authorizing, within six months after the passage thereof, appeals from decrees of the probate court rendered during the time of the Civil War, has been held not to be unconstitutional, as taking away vested rights, in its application to cases in which, before the passage of the law, appeals were barred by lapse of time under the prior law,—the bar of the statute of limitations not being a vested right. Page v. Matthews, 40 Ala. 547; Noles v. Noles, 40 Ala. 576.

So, in Davis v. Ballard, 1 J. J. Marsh. 563, it was held that a statute providing that, whenever the statute of limitation of writs of error is relied on, the period between two certain dates is to be deducted from, and not to compose any part of, the time allowed by law for suing out such a writ, and which is relied on as a bar to the writ, is not invalid on any constitutional ground, even as applied to a case in which the time for suing out a writ of error had fully expired before the statute was passed.

And in Wheeler's Appeal, 45 Conn. 306, it was held that a special act, passed after the expiration of the time allowed by law for the taking of appeals from the doings of the commissioners upon a certain estate, which 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

from was taken, limiting appeals to cases involving an amount, exclusive of interest, less than $500, applied to such former judgment, the court saying: "The fact that this cause was pending, or the recovery had before the enactment of the law of 1874, does not take the case out of the operation of the statute. The right of appeal is not a vested right, but is one of the remedies at all times within the discretion of the legislature, and to be dealt with as that body shall deem wise. Retroactive effect is not given to the act in applying it to all appeals brought after it became a law. It did not affect appeals already brought, but was only operative as to future appeals, and the fact that it may have taken away the right to appeal in some cases in which it existed before does not render it any the less an act prospective in its operation."

The Constitution of Arkansas guarantees the right of appeal, and in Rankin v. Schofield, 70 Ark. 83, 66 S. W. 197, it was held that a statute shortening the time for appeal is unconstitutional in so far as it cuts off at once the right to appeal from judgments previously entered, following the prior decision of O'Bannon v. Ragan, 30 Ark. 181. The latter case presents a state of facts quite parallel to those provided that such appeals might be taken at any time within twenty-one days from the rising of the general assembly, was not unconstitutional, as the general assembly of Connecticut had a reserved power to authorize the probate courts to allow an appeal from their doings, and the alleged vested right affected and impaired by the act was not vested absolutely, but was subject to the contingency of further action by the legislature. The court, however, said: "We must concede that if the act in question should be tested by the decisions of the courts of the other New England states, and the states of New York and Pennsylvania, cited by the counsel for the appellee, it must be declared void. And such a weight of legal authority we should at once accept as conclusive were it not obvious, from the past history of our own jurisprudence and long continued legislative practice, that we have reserved a much larger field for legislative action than has ever been recognized in the states referred to." And further: "In regard to the decisions of the courts of other states that are adverse to our view of the present case, we have previously intimated that many of them were rendered in view of special constitutional provisions much more explicit than our own in limiting legislative action. . . . If such explicit provisions were in our state Constitution, we might, perhaps, be led to the same result that has been reached in other states."

in the case at bar, and the court held the new statute inoperative as to existing judgments, where, under the new statute, the remedy by appeal would be cut off entirely.

This precise question arose in California, and was decided in Pignaz v. Burnett, 119 Cal. 157, 51 Pac. 48, and we quote from the opinion as follows: "At the time the judgment was entered an appeal could be taken from a final judgment at any time within one year after its entry. March 3, 1897 [Stat. 1897, p. 55], § 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure was so amended as to give only six months after the entry of judgment within which an appeal can be taken. At the time of the amendment the period of six months had already elapsed since the entry of the judgment; there remained, however, five months of the time allowed for taking an appeal under the Code before the amendment. The act took effect sixty days after its passage, at which time nine months had elapsed since the entry of judgment. The appeal was taken after that time, but within the period of twelve months from the entry of judgment. If the amendment operated retrospectively, it cut off the right of appeal immediately upon the taking effect of the act, affording no opportunity whatever thereafter for the exercise of this privilege, and depriving this court, so far as the legislature can, of its jurisdiction in the cases upon which it would so operate. To make this statute applicable to judgments entered before it went into effect is to give it a retroactive effect. But it is no objection to the validity of a statute to say that it is retrospective in its operation. The question is, Is the amendment an ex post facto law, or does it impair the obligation of contracts? and also, perhaps, whether it deprives anyone of vested rights. If it does none of these things, it is no objection to it that it applies to pending cases or past transactions. . . . It is quite obvious that great hardship is likely to result if a retroactive effect is given to this statute. One may be presumed to know the laws of the land, but the very instant this amendment took effect, if it be retroactive, the right of appeal was cut off at once. No time whatever was given to appeal in those cases in which judgments had been entered six months or more previously. Unless it is absolutely necessary, we should not impute such an intention to the legislature. In view of the construction which has almost invariably been given to statutes of this character, I feel sure that the legislature intended that its operation

Bailey v. Kincaid, 57 Hun, 516, 11 N. Y. Supp. 294, is authority for holding the new statute to apply to cut off appeals from prior judgments after the expiration of the new period prescribed. The syllabus is as follows: "Where, subsequent to the time that the right to appeal from a judgment accrued, and before the expiration of the time limited for such appeal, § 1341 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended by striking out sixty days and inserting thirty days, and thereafter the notice of appeal was served more than thirty days from the time that the right to appeal accrued, but less than sixty days thereafter, and also more than thirty days after the date at which the amendment took effect, the service of the notice is too late."

The Washington court in the recent case of Rogers v. Trumbull, 32 Wash. 211, 73 Pac. 381, announced a rule in harmony with our views as above expressed. The reasoning and conclusion of the court meets with our full approval, as we think it announces a sound rule of construction consistent with the evident intent of the legislature in enacting the new statute. At the time the judgment appealed from in that case was rendered § 1757 of their Code gave the appellant six months within which to take his appeal, which it was held would expire on March 9, 1903, on which date the appeal was taken. On that day an act took effect, amending the prior statute, limiting the time for appeal to thirty days after the rendition of the judgment. The appeal was taken after the new act took effect, and it was contended that the amendatory act was retrospective, and since more than thirty days had elapsed after the judgment was rendered, the appeal was too late. After quoting from Sutherland on Statutory Construction, § 482, the court briefly sums up its conclusions in the following language: "There is no indication in the act of 1903 that it applied to judgments rendered prior to the time the act took effect, so that judgments rendered more than thirty days prior thereto were barred of the right of appeal. It, therefore, under the rule above announced, applied only to judgments rendered subsequently, or to those where the right of appeal under the old law extended more than thirty days from the time the act took effect."

We conclude that the motion of respondent is untenable, and the same is accordingly denied.

A. CALLISTER, App't.

(— Cal. —, 139 Pac. 819.)

Master and servant — injury by automobile in possession of repairer — liability of owner.

One who turns his automobile over to the keeper of a garage to put it in repair for selling, the owner to pay for labor and storage and the garage keeper to have a commission if he sells the machine for a satisfactory price, is not liable for injury inflicted by the latter while running the machine on the road to test it.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County denying his motion for new trial after verdict in plaintiff's favor, in an action brought to recover damages for an

Note. — Automobiles: liability of owner for injury inflicted by car while being run by one to whom it has been entrusted for storage or repairs.

As to liability of owner for injuries by automobile while being used by a servant or third person for his own business or pleasure, see notes to Christy v. Elliott, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 215; Hayes v. Wilkins, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1035; Jones v. Hoge, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 216; Danforth v. Fisher, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 93; Steffen v. McNaughton, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 382; *Fleischner v. As to validity of statute making owner liable for injuries by automobile being used by another, see note to Daugherty v. Thomas, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 699.

It seems clear that where the owner of an automobile turns his machine over to another for repairs, and surrenders the entire control of it to the latter, he should not be held liable for an injury inflicted by the car while it is being tested by the repairer or his servants.

This was the result reached in SEGLER v. CALLISTER, and in harmony with that decision it was held in Woodcock v. Sattle, 84 Misc. 488, 146 N. Y. Supp. 540, that a mechanic engaged by the owner of an automobile to overhaul his car on his premises, and put it in running order, at a specified sum per week, was an independent contractor, it appearing that the repairs were left entirely to his judgment; and it was 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

therefore held that the owner was not liable for an injury to a third person which occurred through the negligent operation of the car while the mechanic was testing it. The court said: "Sattle, in fact, reserved no right to control or direct Smith in repairing the car to be overhauled. He neither had the knowledge or experience necessary to do so. He, in fact, did not assume to direct what should be done, or how it should be done. He was only interested in the result to be accomplished. He relied upon, and trusted entirely to, the mechanical skill and experience of Smith, who undertook the job. The fact that the work was done on Sattle's premises does not change the legal relations between the parties. Had Smith had a shop of his own, and had he taken the automobile there to do the work, his duties would have been precisely the same. Nor does the fact that he was to be paid at an agreed compensation of $20 per week, or at the rate of $20 per week, alter the relations. It is a circumstance to be considered, but cannot control. If the 'auto' had been sent to a factory, the cost of the necessary repairs might have been either for a lump sum, or if the time and extent of the repairs could not be definitely foreseen, the parties could agree that the cost be ascertained on the basis of the time necessarily expended, plus the cost of the required new parts. This was, in substance, just what the arrangement was between Sattle and Smith; all necessary parts to be charged to Sattle, and the time expended to be paid for at the rate of so much per week."

In Patterson v. Kates, 152 Fed. 481,

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for damages. An automobile, admittedly owned by defendant, came into collision with a motor bicycle ridden by plaintiff. Plaintiff was injured, brought his action, was awarded a verdict by a jury, judgment followed, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial defendant appeals.

The principal point urged on appeal, and the only one here necessary to consider, is that defendant was in no way legally responsible for the injuries sustained by plaintiff. Herein the facts are the following: The automobile had been bought by defendant, who himself could not drive the car, for the purpose of sale. It was an old car, and he had turned it over to one McAlbin who conducted a small garage. McAlbin was to put it in order, "tune it up," so that it might be sold, was to receive some small compensation for his services in this regard, and if thereafter McAlbin was able to sell it for more than the price Callister put upon it, he was to receive a commission accordingly. McAlbin had had the car in his possession for about a month, working on it at odd times in his efforts to put it in order. The value of his services, together with the garage charges on the car, it was estimated amounted to about $8, which defendant had paid to him, not in money, but in gasoline and oil. Upon a few occasions McAlbin had driven defendant in the car, but without charge for services. He was not employed by defendant as chauffeur or driver, but solely for the indicated purposes. McAlbin worked upon the car only at odd times. Upon Sunday, the day of the injury, McAlbin testifies that he had taken the car out to test it. The water pump was leaking, and he sought to locate the trouble. He took the car out upon his own initiative, without instruction or suggestion from the defendant,—indeed without the defendant's knowledge. While he was thus alone in the car the collision occurred from which plaintiff's injuries resulted. McAlbin's testimony is corroborated in all essential respects by that of the defendant, and there is in the record no direct contradictory evidence. All the evidence upon which it is sought to hold the defendant responsible comes from the testimony of plaintiff touching statements made to him where the owner of an automobile which had broken down instructed his driver to repair the machine and bring it to his destination, and after having repaired it and proceeded part of the way, while waiting for a ferry, he met a third person and drove back some distance to carry the latter to a certain place, it was held that the owner was not liable for an injury resulting from the negligent handling of the machine while the driver was proceeding back to the ferry after having carried the person to his destination, since he was not at the time acting for the owner of the car.

In Lane v. Roth, 115 C. C. A. 227, 195 Fed. 255, the question whether the one who usually drove an automobile truck for the owner was, at the time of the accident in question, acting as the servant of the owner or of the repair company, was held to be for the jury, it appearing that the truck, which was owned by a resident of Camden, New Jersey, had been sent to Philadelphia, to the company from which it was purchased, for repairs, and that the owner, upon receiving word from the company that the truck would be delivered at the ferry opposite Camden, sent the one who was accustomed to it to the ferry, and that the latter, not finding it there, went to the repair shop of the company, and not having a license to drive a car in Philadelphia, took one of the repair company's men who had its dealer's license with him; that on the way to the ferry the truck broke down, and the company's employee telephoned the repair shop and a mechanic was sent with no definite instructions; that the latter patched it up, but was unable to properly repair it, and "advised," "told," or "ordered" the owner's driver to take the car back to the shop; that while so doing, and while the latter was accompanied by the two representatives of the company, he negligently operated the car and injured the plaintiff.

And in Colley v. Lewis, 7 Ala. App. 593, 61 So. 37, where the defendant, whose automobile had become disabled, left it in charge of an electrician employed by him in his theater, telling him that when he got through with it to leave it in front of the theatre, and there was evidence from which the jury might have found that at the time the car injured the plaintiff, the electrician was indulging in a joy ride having no connection with the performance of any service for the defendant, and also evidence from which they might have found that the electrician was impliedly empowered to test the efficacy of the repairs made by him, and that, in operating the machine at the time of the injury, he was actuated by a bona fide purpose of seeing if it would run satisfactorily, it was held that the question whether he was acting within the scope of his employment was for the jury.

It was also held in this case that if, at the time of the collision, the electrician's use of the machine was incidental to the service which he had undertaken for the owner, the fact that the service was rendered gratuitously would not enable the owner to escape liability. Ibid.

by McAlbin and defendant. Those statements are the following. Plaintiff testified that he was taken to the hospital, and that defendant called upon him that afternoon. Asked if the defendant said anything about the driver of the car, he replied: "No, not anything at all in regard to driving the machine, only he said the machine the driver was driving was his machine. He didn't say anything at all then about the driver." Plaintiff further testified that about the second day after he was hurt McAlbin, the driver, came to see him, "and he went on to tell me that he was—this Sunday afternoon he was going somewhere after a trunk, or something of that kind, with this machine; that they were fixing to go out and make a trip somewhere, he and Mr. Callister, I believed. In some way he was going after this trunk to bring back to fix up, you know, for this trip. They were fixing—trying to get the machine ready, or fixing on the machine, to get it in condition to go to make the trip. So that was all, I believe, that he had to say in regards to that."

Plaintiff further testified that afterward, upon a certain day, he had a talk with the defendant on the beach, "a little talk, a friendly talk." Defendant said that McAlbin "had been with him a good while, and he was paying him $3 per day when he was working."

Q. What kind of work did Mr. Callister say that he was doing?

A. He was working on his machine.

Q. Working on his machine?

A. Yes sir.

Q. How long had he been working on his machine?

A. He didn't tell me how long he was working on it, but he told me whenever—he was paying him $3 to work on the machine, was about all he had to tell me about it; that he was in his employ some time,—he didn't say what time, or how long.

Q. When did he tell you he was paying him $3 a day?

A. That was when I was—I believe it was the first time he came to see me.

Q. The first time he came to see you?

A. Yes, sir; I believe it was. I believe it was the first time he came.

Q. What did he say he was paying him this $3 a day for?

A. Well, for his work that he was doing for Mr. Callister.

Q. State what, if you please, Mr. Segler, —anything stated by Mr. Callister in regard to this driver driving the machine.

A. Well, he didn't say anything, except this man was working for him at these times; whenever he was paying him this

$3, and they were fixing up to make this trip; Mr. Callister said they were fixing up to go somewhere, to make some trip, some way. It was some time when I was in the hospital; I couldn't tell you what time it was; I couldn't tell you what day it was.

Q. What trip did he say he was going to make?

A. Some trip out in the mountains somewhere, they were going. That was the words I got, you know, that they were going to make this trip; he didn't say where; they were fixing up for a trip, whenever they got the machine in repairs.

The Court: Who did he refer to by "they?"

A. Mr. Callister and his driver.

Mr. Harker: State whether or not both of them told you this.

A. They both of them told me that.

Q. The driver and Mr. Callister?

A. The driver and Mr. Callister.

Witness Robinson called for the plaintiff, testifies that after the accident McAlbin "ran around there like a crazy man," saying: "I am awful sorry. I don't want to get in trouble over it. I am willing to fix it up,"—and, continues the witness, "he kept going from one question to the other, jabbering different statements. I heard his jabbering something away there about going after some trunks." This is all of the evidence in the case connecting, or tending to connect, defendant with it. The evidence does not even tend to raise a conflict with the direct testimony given by the defendant and McAlbin upon any essential matter. McAlbin might have been going for a trunk, though he denies that he was going, or that he said he was going, but it is not and cannot be asserted that the evidence shows that he was going at the instance and under the direction of Callister for any trunk of the latter. That Callister employed McAlbin to work on the machine, as plaintiff testifies, is exactly what Callister himself declares. That McAlbin was fixing the machine for a trip to the mountains is quite in consonance with defendant's own statement that he and McAlbin "had talked over many trips, and what they were going to do if we ever got the thing in shape,—we probably would have made a trip in the near future." We have then the case of a man who has turned his automobile over to a mechanic to put it in order. He exercised no control over the work nor over the mechanic in the performance of the work. If, in the due performance of that work, it became proper for the mechanic to take the car out on the street to test it, the owner would be no more responsible for damage which might result from the mechanic's bad management of the car than he would if the mechanic, without any authority at all, had taken the ear and so used it. The evidence of plaintiff is not sufficient to raise a conflict upon the question, and it certainly needs no citation of authority to show that the owner, who has surrendered possession and control of his property under the indicated circumstances to an independent contractor, is not legally responsible for the damages which that contractor may occasion in his use of the property.

The order appealed from is therefore reversed.

We concur: Lorigan, J.; Melvin, J.

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN, & HARTFORD RAILROAD COMPANY.

(88 Conn. 65, 89 Atl. 888.)

Carriers — sudden stopping of trains — liability.

1. Stopping a railroad train so suddenly and violently as to throw passengers forward in their seats and cause baggage to fall from the racks is evidence of negligence which the carrier must negative to avoid liability for injury caused by the falling baggage.

Same — fall of baggage — liability for injury.

2. That hand baggage placed by its passengers in overhead racks provided for it by the railroad company is not under the immediate control of the carrier does not relieve it from liability for injury caused by the fall of the baggage by operating the train in such a way as to render the use of the racks in the manner in which they were intended to be used unsafe.

Same — manner of stowing baggage — duty to give warning.

3. If the overhead racks provided by a railroad company for baggage are so constructed that it is not safe to place one suit case on top of another in them, which fact APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Hartford County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by its negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hugh M. Alcorn and William M. Maltbie, for appellant.

It is not necessary for the plaintiff to establish to the satisfaction of this court that the stopping of the train was extraordinary in its suddenness and violence. All that is necessary is to show that there was evidence in the case from which the jury might draw the conclusion that this was so.

Cook v. Morris, 66 Conn. 196, 33 Atl. 994; Bergh v. Spivakowski, 86 Conn. 98, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 855, 84 Atl. 329; Girard v. Grosvenordale Co. 83 Conn. 20, 74 Atl. 1126; Occum Co. v. A. & W. Sprague Mfg. Co. 34 Conn. 529.

From the fact that a train stopped with an unusual degree of violence and suddenness, negligence in its operation may be inferred.

There can be no doubt that the defendant's agents ought, in the exercise of proper care, to have seen the dangerous position of the upper suit case, and the defendant is just as much chargeable with what its agents ought to have known with reference to it, as it is with what they actually did know.

The question, Did defendant exercise the highest practical degree of care and foresight in protecting the plaintiff? is one of fact for the sole determination of the jury.

Donovan v. Connecticut Co. 84 Conn. 531, 80 Atl. 779; Robbins v. Hartford City Gaslight Co. 82 Conn. 394, 74 Atl. 113; Currie v. Consolidated R. Co. 81 Conn. 383, 71 Atl. 356; *Nesbit v. Whether a situation has arisen which requires a carrier to take precautions to protect a passenger from injury, and what precautions, by way of prevention or warning, should be taken, are questions of fact for the determination of the jury, if one is impeded.

Mr. J. F. Berry for appellee.

Beach, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff with two friends was playing cards in the smoking car of a train running from New York to Hartford, when it was suddenly stopped a short distance before reaching the New Haven station, and at the same moment a suit case fell from the rack over the seat in which the plaintiff was then sitting and struck the plaintiff on the head, inflicting an injury which then appeared to be slight, but from which serious consequences afterwards developed. The plaintiff's friends had placed two suit cases in the rack, one over the other, before the train started from New York. The plaintiff makes a twofold claim: First, that the suit case was thrown from the rack by a train stop so unusually sudden and violent that, unless it was satisfactorily explained by the defendant, the jury might reasonably infer therefrom negligence in the operation of the train; and second, that if the stopping of the train was not unusual, and the fall of the suit case was occasioned in whole or in part by the ordinary motion of the train, the defendant ought to have foreseen the danger and protected the plaintiff against it.

The witness who placed the top suit case in the rack testified that it fitted snugly, and that, as he intended to sit under it, he saw it was safe. There is no evidence that it afterwards worked loose or shifted its position prior to the fall. The evidence as to the character of the stop comes from the plaintiff and his witnesses, who describe it as "an awful jar," "like leaping over" "threw me forward," "a strong jolt," "we lunged forward," "gave us a very big jar; I never saw anything like it." Simultaneously the suit case struck the plaintiff on the side of the head and landed in the center aisle of the car. The principal question is whether from this testimony the jury might reasonably have inferred negligence in the operation of the train. The conditions under which negligence may be inferred from sudden movements of trains and electric cars have been recently discussed in Work v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 207 Mass. 447, 93 N. E. 693, in which it is pointed out that the difference between such jars and jolts as are the usual incidents of the operation of electric and steam trains, and those which are so much more abrupt than usual as to give rise to an inference of negligence, is a difference of degree, and that therefore it is a difficult matter in practice to draw the line between two sets of cases in which opposite results are reached. The court then states the Massachusetts rule as follows (omitting citations): "But some points are settled. It is settled that it is not enough for a plaintiff in such a case to introduce the testimony of witnesses who characterize the jerk as an unusual one or as worse than unusual. The plaintiff, to make out a case, must go further than merely to characterize the jerk, jolt, or lurch, and must show, (1) by direct evidence of what the motor-man did, that he was negligent in the way that he stopped or started the car; or (2) by evidence of what took place as a physical fact, or by evidence of what appeared to take place as a physical fact, show indirectly that the motorman was negligent." In this case the witnesses not only characterized the stop as sudden and violent, but they testified to the physical effect on themselves, as throwing them forward in their seats, and to the simultaneous fall of the suit case, which, according to the testimony, had been securely stowed in the rack before the train started. We think that the jury might reasonably have found that the stop was unusually sudden, and caused the suit case to fall from a position from which it would not probably have been dislodged by the ordinary motion of the train. The starting and stopping of trains is a matter peculiarly within the control of the employees of the railroad, and the safety of passengers may be endangered by careless or unskillful handling of the powerful apparatus employed for these purposes. A passenger cannot be expected to know the cause of an abrupt stop resulting in injury, and it is not asking too much of the defendant railroad that it should be put upon its explanation by evidence showing that the stop was uncommonly abrupt, and that it produced a physical consequence in itself unusual, from which the plaintiff's injury resulted. Zeigler v. Danbury & N. R. Co. 52 Conn. 543, 2 Atl. 462; Thorson v. Groton & S. Street R. Co. 85 Conn. 11, 81 Atl. 1024. It is said that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur has no application to this case, because the suit case which caused the injury was not under the control of the defendant. But we are not inclined to follow the suggestion contained in some of the New York cases, that the railroad company is bound to exercise only a reasonable degree of care in protecting its passengers from the risk of luggage falling from racks provided for its stowage. The furnishing of racks for that purpose invites passengers to use them to the extent of their apparent limit of safety, and imposes on the railroad, when the racks are so used, the duty of operating its trains so as not to endanger passengers sitting in the seats underneath such racks. If the defendant maintained racks of such construction that there was a risk not apparent to the ordinary passenger in putting one suit case on top of another, it should have given notice that it was dangerous to do so, either before the train started, or at some time during the hour and a half after the train started, and before the accident happened. If any evidence had been offered from which the jury could reasonably have found that the rack in question could not safely hold two dress suit cases, one on top of the other, we think the jury would also have been justified in finding that the defendant was negligent in giving no warning of that fact, for it is clear that a passenger sitting in a seat provided for that purpose is not bound to maintain a lookout to protect himself against the danger of falling luggage, unless perhaps the danger is so obvious that it ought to attract the attention of any ordinarily observant person. But the evidence as offered pointed the other way, and indicated that the suit case in question was securely stowed in the rack before the train started, and there was no evidence that it was in fact dislodged, or was liable to be dislodged, by the ordinary motion of the train. Under this condition of the testimony, the jury might reasonably have found that the proximate cause of the accident was the unusually abrupt train stop; and this, as already stated, is a cause peculiarly under the control of the defendant's servants.

There is error, and a new trial ordered.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

FRED G. BURNHAM et al.

v.

EDWARD F. DOWD et al.

(217 Mass. 351, 104 N. E. 841.)

Appeal — recommitting master's report — absence of objections — discretion.

1. The question of recommitting a master's report to have rulings by which evidence is alleged to have been erroneously admitted inserted for review is within the discretion of the trial judge, where there

Note. — Right of labor union to forbid its members to handle one's product.

This note is supplemental to notes to Purvis v. Local No. 500, U. B. C. J. 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 643, and Meier v. Speer, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 792.

As appears in the earlier notes, there is a conflict of opinion among the courts as to the right of members of a labor union to agree not to handle the product of an employer of labor, without reference to whether the purpose or end sought thereby to be attained is justifiable.

In Gill Engraving Co. v. Doerr, 214 Fed. 111, it was held that an injunction pendente lite would not lie at the instance of the company injured, to restrain a photo-engravers' union co-operating with the Allied Printing Trades Council, from putting into effect an agreement that they would not do any work in the different steps of photo-engraving, unless they did all of such work, and that the members of such unions would handle the work only of those customers who would assure the union that they would have their engraving done in shops fair to the members. And this was held to be true although the effect of the enforcement of the agreement was to intimidate and coerce the customers of the photo-engraving company from further patronizing such company, which was upon the unfair list of the union, the result being the destruction of much of the former's business and the threatened destruction of the balance. The court regarded the object of the combination complained of as being to increase the power of the union, thereby securing more, better, easier, and better-paid work for its members, and said that the means resorted to was not unlawful, and, since the object and the means to carry out the same were lawful, the fact that as an

was no objection to the admission of such evidence when it was offered, although objection to the report was made upon that ground and exceptions filed in pursuance thereof.

Same — review of ruling — lack of exception.

2. Rulings of a master admitting evidence alleged to be incompetent cannot be reviewed if no exception was taken to them.

Injunction — boycott by labor organization — vender of materials.

3. Members of a labor union may be enjoined from refusing to handle materials sold by one who furnishes supplies to an employer of nonunion labor, if they have no dispute with their employers who purchase such materials.

Damages — uncertainty — boycott by labor union.

4. Members of a labor union who have caused a loss of business to a merchant because of an unlawful boycott of his materials cannot avoid liability to him for such damages as are capable of substantial proof, by the fact that it is impossible to determine the total amount of loss, and may be difficult to ascertain with absolute certainty the money value of even the damages that can be proved.

REPORT by the Superior Court for Hampden County for the determination of the Supreme Judicial Court of exceptions by defendants to rulings made during the trial of an action brought to enjoin them from continuing certain acts alleged to be unlawful and detrimental to plaintiffs' business. Decree for plaintiffs.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. B. Carroll, W. H. McClintock, and J. F. Jennings, for defendants:

The plaintiffs' bill should be dismissed, for:

The relief of the sort prayed for will,

engraving, unless they did all of such work, and that the members of such unions would handle the work only of those customers who would assure the union that they would have their engraving done in shops fair to the members. And this was held to be true although the effect of the enforcement of the agreement was to intimidate and coerce the customers of the photo-engraving company from further patronizing such company, which was upon the unfair list of the union, the result being the destruction of much of the former's business and the threatened destruction of the balance. The court regarded the object of the combination complained of as being to increase the power of the union, thereby securing more, better, easier, and better-paid work for its members, and said that the means resorted to was not unlawful, and, since the object and the means to carry out the same were lawful, the fact that as an under any circumstances, be granted only in the case of irreparable injury.

The policy established by the courts of our commonwealth is opposed to such a curtailment of the rights of the defendants as would result if the relief asked for should be granted, for the general policy respecting the individual's right of initiative is opposed to such an infringement.

incident injury occurred to another was immaterial, as was also the motive of the members of the combination. The court said that the result of legalizing strikes, lockouts, and boycotts under any circumstances must be that those who understand the use of such legal tools can always keep within the law and accomplish their main purpose while inflicting all necessary incidental injury.

In Albro J. Newton Co. v. Erickson, 70 Misc. 201, 126 N. Y. Supp. 949, affirmed in 144 App. Div. 939, 129 N. Y. Supp. 1111, granting an injunction against the agent and officers of certain labor organization at the instance of a private concern, it was held unlawful for labor unions to make war upon an employer of labor deemed unfair, who was the producer of building material, by striking, and threatening to call strikes of union men employed by builders or contractors who used the material produced by 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the manufacturer complained of. This combination was regarded as one to attack the plaintiff's good will, and upon this ground held unlawful.

And in Mears Slayton Lumber Co. v. District Council, C. U. B. C. J. A. 156 Ill. App. 327, a contempt proceeding, it is recognized that it is unlawful for labor organizations to follow the material of an employer of labor deemed unfair, to its destination, and call a strike of the union labor members to prevent the use of such material by the person to whom it was delivered.

And see New England Cement Gun Co. v. McGivern, — Mass. —, 105 N. E. 885, holding it to be unlawful for members of a labor union to procure the breach of a contract to plaster the exterior of a building, by the members refusing to plaster the inside unless also permitted to plaster the outside.

Sheldon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If it appeared from this record that the defendants' exceptions to the admission of evidence by the master had been taken at the hearing before the master, and that the objections made to the report by the defendants upon this ground, and the exceptions filed by them in pursuance thereof, had thus been based upon a proper foundation, it would not have been easy to justify the refusal to recommit the master's report in order that the rulings made upon these points and excepted to by the defendants might be reviewed. But this is not the case. So far as appears, all the evidence to the admission of which objection afterwards was made was received originally without any objection. Nor does it appear that a motion afterwards was made to strike out any part of this evidence, if that would have been sufficient. Undoubtedly, if seasonable objections had been made by the defendant and overruled by the master, and this fact had been shown to the superior court, the motion to recommit would have been granted. As the case stands, the motion was addressed merely to the discretion of the justice who heard it, and there is no reason to suppose that his discretion was exercised wrongly. Cook v. Scheffreen, 215 Mass. 444, 447, 102 N. E. 715; Lee v. Methodist Episcopal Church, 193 Mass. 47, 78 N. E. 646.

We see no ground on which any of the exceptions to the master's report can be sustained. Most of them relate to findings of fact, as to which the evidence is not before us. Others refer to the admission of evidence, and cannot be considered for the reasons already stated. The defendants have not argued separately any of these exceptions, although they have not been waived, and accordingly each one of them has been considered. But it is not necessary to discuss them in detail.

The leading material facts found by the master may be summarized as follows: The plaintiffs carry on a business which includes the selling at wholesale and retail of masons' supplies. The defendants are members of a voluntary unincorporated association or labor union in Holyoke, hereinafter called the union. It is the object and purpose of all the members of this union to make themselves and the union as powerful as possible in Holyoke and its immediate environment, and to exert their power for the purpose of bettering the labor conditions of members of the union, especially with reference to rates of wages and periods of labor. It is a part of their principles which all the members of the union are under obligation to respect and uphold, that all men of their craft or trade working in Holyoke or its immediate vicinity, that is, within the jurisdiction of their union, must be members thereof; that all their members should refuse to work with men of their craft who were not members of the union, or had not declared their intention to join it; should refuse to work for employers who were declared "unfair" by the union; and should refuse to use in their work any materials that had been sold or furnished by any merchant who was declared unfair by the union. They aimed to accomplish their purpose of bettering the labor conditions of their members, primarily by persuasion coupled with the fear of consequences if the party addressed should not yield, and secondarily, if necessary, by troubles and loss to the business of contractors or merchants. This union was connected with the Building Trades Council of Holyoke, which represented the various building trades unions (some fourteen in number) of Holyoke and vicinity, and was composed of delegates sent from these unions. In July, 1911, one Gauthier employed nonunion masons in certain construction work in Holyoke, against the protest of this union; and the plaintiffs furnished to him mason materials. In August, 1911, the union voted to refuse to handle any building material of any firm that furnished stock to Gauthier or to any "unfair" contractor. Soon after this, the delegates from the union to the Building Trades Council reported these facts to that body; and the agent of the council sent a written notice to the plaintiff that Gauthier was "doing work contrary to laws of Building Trades Council," and was "therefore recognized by us as being unfair," and expressing the hope of "co-operation in this matter." The plaintiffs continued to furnish material to Gauthier. Thereupon, by successive votes, the union declared that the plaintiffs were "unfair." This was for the reason that the plaintiffs continued to furnish masons' supplies to Gauthier, and refused to promise not to sell to any party who should not be in good standing with the union. All the members of the union would have refused since August, 1911, and would refuse now and in the future (so long as the plaintiffs were held by the union to be unfair) to work with materials purchased from the plaintiffs. It has not been and in the future it will not be practicable, without the labor of members of the union, to perform building contracts of any size or importance in Holyoke or its immediate vicinity, without serious inconvenience, trouble, and loss to the contractors, and the defendants have intended that owners and contractors should fear this result if they purchased masons' supplies from the plaintiffs. The union and its officers and members, including some of the defendants, have notified various owners and contractors who either were buying or were intending to buy masons' supplies from the plaintiffs for construction work upon which members of the union necessarily were employed, that the plaintiffs were upon the "unfair" list of the union, and that its members would not use or work upon material furnished by the plaintiffs, and in substance threatened to strike if masons' supplies were purchased from the plaintiffs. These contractors and owners feared, and it was intended that they should fear, and they were justified in fearing, that these threats would be carried out; and in consequence thereof they ceased or refrained from buying supplies of the plaintiffs, as otherwise they would have done, and the plaintiffs' sales of masons' supplies were considerably diminished and their profits lessened in consequence of these facts. This state of affairs will continue, to the serious loss and damage of the plaintiffs, unless they shall promise not to sell to anyone considered unfair by the union.

The defendants did not act from actual personal malice towards the plaintiffs; but their acts were done in pursuance of their union principles and purposes, as above stated, and without caring for the injurious consequences to the plaintiffs. Indeed, these injurious consequences were anticipated and contemplated by the defendants. They did not attempt to declare or enforce any boycott against the plaintiffs, except as this is included in the acts that have been mentioned. During the period involved in this case, some of the defendants have bought for their own use small quantities of masons' supplies from the plaintiffs, and others of the defendants during the same time have made purchases from the plaintiffs in other branches of the plaintiffs' business.

Although there has been a little contrariety of decisions in other jurisdictions, we do not consider that there is any doubt as to the rule of law to be applied in this case. The defendants have no real trade dispute with the plaintiffs. No one of the members of the union is, or so far as appears ever has been, employed by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs have not interfered or sought to interfere with the employment of any of those members, or with the rates of pay, the periods of labor, or any of the conditions of such employment. There is no competition between these parties, as there was in Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen, 499. The matter that lies at the foundation of these proceedings is a dispute between the union and Gauthier. He employs or has employed nonunion labor; the defendants (including under this term all the members of the union) object to this. They have a right to say that they will do no work for him unless he will give to them all the work of their trade; that they will do all or none of his work. That was settled by our decision in Pickett v. Walsh, 192 Mass. 572, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 78 N. E. 753, 7 Ann. Cas. 638. If they were employed by Gauthier, and if he employed also nonunion men of their craft, they would have a right, unless they were bound by some term of their contract of employment, to strike, unless all of this work should be given to them or to their associates. But it was pointed out in the same case that not all strikes are lawful; and it now is settled in this commonwealth that it is a question of law whether any particular strike is a lawful one. Reynolds v. Davis, 198 Mass. 294, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 162, 84 N. E. 457; De Minico v. Craig, 207 Mass. 593, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1048, 94 N. E. 317. But the second point decided in Pickett v. Walsh, supra, is in our opinion decisive of the principal question raised in this case. It was there held that the members of a labor union who are employed by a contractor to do work upon a building, and who have no dispute with that contractor as to work which they or their fellows are doing for him, cannot lawfully strike against him for the mere reason that he is doing work and employing some of their fellows upon another building upon which nonunion men are employed to do like work, not by him, but by the owner, of that building. The language and reasoning of that decision are applicable here. The reason of the decision was that, as the court said (Loring, J., 192 Mass. 587) such a strike "has an element in it like that in a sympathetic strike, in a boycott, and in a blacklisting, namely, it is a refusal to work for A, with whom the strikers have no dispute, because A works for B, with whom the strikers have a dispute, for the purpose of forcing A to force B to yield to the strikers' demands." So in the case at bar, the threat of the defendants was to strike against owners and contractors, with whom the defendants had no dispute, for the purpose of forcing those owners and contractors to refuse to buy masons' supplies from the plaintiffs, and thus, by the loss of business and of the profits to be derived therefrom, force the plaintiffs to refuse to sell to Gauthier or others whom the defendants might call unfair, and thus put a pressure upon those persons which should force them to cease employing nonunion masons, and to give all their mason work to the defendants. This was a step further than what was held in Pickett v. Walsh to be an unlawful combination for an unjustifiable interference with another's business. It was in intention and effect a boycott; and it was none the less so because it was aimed at only one branch of the plaintiffs' business. There is no more right to interfere with one branch of a merchant's business, to obstruct it and lessen its profits and so far as may be done to destroy it entirely, than there is so to interfere with, obstruct, and destroy the whole of that business. The difference is merely one of degree, not of kind. And Pickett v. Walsh is well supported as to this point both upon the reasoning of the opinion and by authority. See the cases collected on page 588 of 192 Mass. It has been cited and followed in our later decisions. Reynolds v. Davis, 198 Mass. 294, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 162, 84 N. E. 457; M. Steinert & Sons Co. v. Tagen, 207 Mass. 394, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1013, 93 N. E. 584; Folsom v. Lewis, 208 Mass. 336, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 787, 94 N. E. 316; Hanson v. Innis, 211 Mass. 301, 97 N. E. 756. Most of the decisions in other jurisdictions, besides those cited in Pickett v. Walsh, are to the same effect. Aikens v. Wisconsin, 195 U. S. 194, 40 L. ed. 154, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 3; Emack v. Kane (C. C.) 34 Fed. 46; Shine v. Fox Bros. Mfg. Co. 86 C. C. A. 311, 156 Fed. 357; Rocky Mountain Bell Teleph. Co. v. Montana Federation of Labor (C. C.) 166 Fed. 809; American Federation of Labor v. Buck's Stove & Range Co. 33 App. D. C. 83, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 748; Gompers v. Buck's 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Stove & Range Co. 33 App. D. C. 516; Doremus v. Hennessy, 176 Ill. 608, 43 L.R.A. 797, 802, 68 Am. St. Rep. 203, 52 N. E. 924, 54 N. E. 524; Kemp v. Division No. 241, 153 Ill. App. 344; Perkins v. Pendleton, 90 Me. 166, 60 Am. St. Rep. 252, 38 Atl. 96; Lucke v. Clothing Cutters & T. Assembly No. 7507, K. L. 77 Md. 396, 19 L.R.A. 408, 39 Am. St. Rep. 421, 26 Atl. 505; Albro J. Newton Co. v. Erickson, 70 Misc. 291, 126 N. Y. Supp. 949; State ex rel. Durner v. Huegin, 110 Wis. 189, 249, 62 L.R.A. 700, et seq. 85 N. W. 1046, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 332.

As was said in Hopkins v. Oxley Stave Co. 28 C. C. A. 99, 105, 49 U. S. App. 709, 83 Fed. 912, 917: "Persons engaged in any service have the power, with which a court of equity will not interfere by injunction, to abandon that service, either singly or in a body, if the wages paid or the conditions of employment are not satisfactory; but they have no right to dictate to an employer what kind of implements he shall use, or whom he shall employ."

We have examined with care all the decisions that have been referred to by the defendants. Some of them turn upon a different state of facts from that which here is presented. Some of them we should hesitate to follow to the conclusions towards which they logically tend. But the result which we have reached seems to us to be in accord with sound reason and supported by authority.

The defendants contend earnestly that each one of them has a perfect right to refrain from dealing himself, and to advise his friends and associates to refrain from dealing, with the plaintiffs, and that they have a right to do together and in concert what each one of them lawfully may do by himself. But that is not always so. It is especially true in dealing with such questions as these that the mere force of numbers may create a difference not only of degree, but also of kind. No doubt the defendants' organization is a lawful one, and certainly some of the objects aimed at by the union thus formed are both legal and of high utility. But, as was pointed out by the Supreme Court of the United States in Gompers v. Buck's Stove & Range Co. 221 U. S. 418, 55 L. ed. 797, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 874, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 492, "the very fact that it is lawful to form these bodies, with multitudes of members, means that they have thereby acquired a vast power, in the presence of which the individual may be helpless. This power, when unlawfully used against one, cannot be met, except by his purchasing peace at the cost of submitting to terms which involve the sacrifice of rights protected by the Constitution; or by standing on such rights and appealing to the preventive powers of a court of equity. When such appeal is made, it is the duty of government to protect the one against the many as well as the many against the one." To the same effect is what was said by this court, through Mr. Justice Hammond, in Martell v. White, 185 Mass. 255, 260, 64 L.R.A. 260, 102 Am. St. Rep. 341, 69 N. E. 1085, 1087, quoting the words of Lord Justice Bowen in Mogul S. S. Co. v. McGregor, L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 598, 616: "Of the general proposition that certain kinds of conduct not criminal in any one individual may become criminal if done by combination among several, there can be no doubt." So in Pickett v. Walsh, 192 Mass. 572, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 78 N. E. 753, 7 Ann. Cas. 638, it was held among other things that "what is lawful if done by an individual may become unlawful if done by a combination of individuals." And see the cases collected on page 582 of 192 Mass. in that opinion. This principle is peculiarly applicable to cases like the one at bar. There is no such thing in our modern civilization as an independent man. No single individual could continue even to exist, much less to enjoy any of the comforts and satisfactions of life, without the society, sympathy, and support of at least some of those among whom his lot is cast. Every individual has the right to enjoy these, and is bound not to interfere with the enjoyment of them by others. That right indeed is usually one of merely moral obligation, incapable of enforcement by the courts, but it is none the less an actual wrong for any body of men actively to cause the infringement of that right in definite particulars; and especially where such an infringement is made possible only by the concerted action of many in combination against one, and results in direct injury to his business or property, the courts should interfere for the protection of that person.

In Worthington v. Waring, 157 Mass. 421, 20 L.R.A. 342, 34 Am. St. Rep. 294, 32 N. E. 744, where the court refused to enjoin the defendants from putting the names of the plaintiffs upon a blacklist, and thus making it impossible for them to obtain in that neighborhood employment in their trade, there was a misjoinder of plaintiffs. Apart from this technical difficulty, the decision was put upon the ground that, while courts of equity may protect property from threatened injury when the property rights are equitable, or when they cannot be protected adequately at law, yet equity has in general no jurisdiction to restrain the commission of crime, or to assess damages for torts already committed, and the rights there alleged to have been violated were said to be merely personal rights, and not rights of property. That case is not applicable here, for the rights now in question are distinctly property rights. Accordingly, we need not consider whether the doctrine of that case can be reconciled with our later decisions, or whether it now would be followed if the same state of facts were again presented.

The question of damages remains to be dealt with. Upon that we find no error in the master's report. That the plaintiffs have sustained substantial damage is manifest; and the mere facts that it may be impossible to determine the total amount of their loss, and that it may be difficult to ascertain with absolute certainty the money value of even the damages that can be proved, is no reason for refusing to allow to the plaintiff what has been found to be capable of substantial proof. Fox v. Harding, 7 Cush. 516; Speirs v. Union Drop Forge Co. 180 Mass. 87, 61 N. E. 825; C. W. Hunt Co. v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 199 Mass. 220, 235, 85 N. E. 446, et seq.; De Minico v. Craig, 207 Mass. 593, 600, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1048, 94 N. E. 317. We find nothing inconsistent with this in Todd v. Keene, 167 Mass. 157, 45 N. E. 81; John Hetherington & Sons v. William Firth Co. 210 Mass. 8, 23, 95 N. E. 961, et seq., or the other cases relied on by the defendants. Doubtless merely speculative damages or any damages that have not been proved cannot be recovered; but this does not require absolute mathematical demonstration, or prevent the drawing of reasonable inferences from the facts and circumstances in evidence.

The result is that the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree enjoining the defendants from keeping the names of the plaintiffs upon their unfair list, from threatening to strike or to leave the work of any owner, builder, or contractor by reason of such persons having purchased masons' supplies from the plaintiffs or having dealt otherwise with the plaintiffs, and from ordering or inducing any strike against an owner, builder, or contractor for such reason, and that the plaintiffs shall recover from the defendants the sum of $500 with interest from the date of the filing of the master's report, and their costs of suit, and have execution therefor.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.
(Department No. 2.)

J. P. GLEASON, Appt.,

v.

MICHAEL EARLES, Resp't.

Specific performance — of stock pooling contract.

1. Specific performance will not be granted of an agreement between holders of stock in a corporation to vote it in block as directed by a majority of the contractors, even though the agreement is valid, but the parties will be left to their remedy at law for a breach.

Note. — Specific performance of stock pooling agreement.

As to specific performance of contract for sale of corporate stock, see notes to Ryan v. McLane, 50 L.R.A. 501, and Hogg v. McGuffin, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 401. Where the purpose of the sale is to enable the purchaser to secure control of the corporation, the question is analogous to the one raised by the present note. Cases on that point are not, however, within the scope of this note, which is limited to pooling agreements for the purpose of controlling the corporation without obtaining actual ownership of the majority of the stock.

By reference to cases cited in the notes to Morel v. Hoge, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1136, and Carnegie Trust Co. v. Security L. Ins. Co. 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1186, it will be seen that the decisions are not in complete harmony as to the validity of agreements to control the voting power of corporate stock, most of the cases turning either upon the form of the agreement or the purpose for which the control is sought. For the purpose of the present note, the validity of the agreement is assumed, and the question considered is simply whether specific performance is an available remedy.

While stock pooling agreements made for the purpose of controlling the corporation are very common, practically all the cases involve attacks upon their legality in various forms, including petition for enjoining their execution, rather than for specific performance. See cases in note to which reference has been made, supra. The holding in GLEASON v. EARLES, that such agreement, even if valid, cannot be the basis of a suit by one of the contracting parties for specific performance, finds support in Gage v. Fisher, infra, though the court in that case was not obliged to pass directly upon the point, and in the dictum in Fremont v. Stone, infra. While a few cases are cited, infra, apparently indicating an opposite view, none of them are squarely in point. Therefore, it may be said that the law is not well settled as yet, but that the general trend of opinion seems to support the holding in GLEASON v. EARLES. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Same — transfer of stock.

2. A desire on the part of a minority stockholder in a corporation to become a majority stockholder is not sufficient to take an agreement for transfer of stock out of the rule that specific performance of such agreement will not be enforced, in the absence of peculiar circumstances which leave the remedy at law inadequate.

APPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County dismissing an action brought to enforce specific performance of a stock pooling contract. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

While Gage v. Fisher, 5 N. D. 297, 31 L.R.A. 557, 95 N. W. 809, was not a suit for specific performance, the holding is based upon the proposition that "a court of equity should never specifically enforce a contract by which one person agrees that another should control his stock without purchasing it, where the sole ground of the appeal to equity is the desire of the party making the appeal to secure control of a corporation through the use of the stock he is thus seeking to control." The court said: "The case before us presents a stronger one against the exercise of the equitable powers of the courts to enforce specific performance than a contract for the purchase of stock; for here the contract was to give the minority stockholder the right to dominate and direct the judgment of the plaintiff, as stockholder, in the voting of his stock, without owning the stock himself. Every other stockholder in the bank had the right to demand that the plaintiff should, if he desired so to do, exercise at the very time of the annual meeting his own judgment as to the best interests of all the stockholders, untrammelled by dictation, and unfettered by the obligation of any contract. We know of no case where a court of equity has enforced such an agreement. We regard as controlling on this question the rule that an irrevocable proxy to vote stock is revocable. See Cook, Corp. § 610, note, 6."

In Fremont v. Stone, 42 Barb. 169, the court refused to decree specific performance of a contract by which some of the defendants stipulated with the plaintiff that, on payment by him of a certain amount for a certain number of shares of stock in a railroad company then belonging to them, new directors, to be nominated by the plaintiff and his copurchaser, should be substituted in the place of all the other directors except defendants, who were directors at the time. It does not appear how the change was to be brought about. The decision is based upon the proposition that the contract was contrary to public policy and therefore invalid, but the court said: "If the subject-matter of this contract was of that species which would authorize a court of equity to

Messrs. Hughes, McMicken, Dovell, & Ramsey, for appellant:

The contract relied upon is valid.

Cone v. Cone, 61 S. C. 512, 39 S. E. 748; Griswold v. Sackett, 21 R. I. 206, 42 Atl. 868.

An interest in corporate stock is such an interest as a party is entitled to have in specie, and for that reason, damages at law not furnishing an adequate remedy, specific performance of an obligation to transfer is decreed.

But in Smith v. San Francisco & N. P. R. Co. 115 Cal. 584, 35 L.R.A. 309, 56 Am. St. Rep. 119, 47 Pac. 582, three persons, preliminary to and at the time of purchasing a number of shares of stock, entered into an agreement that all the shares should be voted as a unit for a period of five years, in accordance with a decision of a majority of the contracting parties, to be determined by ballot, and separate certificates were issued to each of the parties for one third of the lot of shares purchased. One of the parties offered his ballot for the plaintiff, who was a candidate for director other than the one designated by the other two contracting parties, but the vote was rejected by the chairman of the meeting, and the other two parties to the contract were allowed to vote the entire lot of shares as a unit for the candidate of their choice. That candidate was declared elected director by the chairman of the meeting, although the voting power of the protesting member's share was determinative of the election as between him and the plaintiff. This was a statutory proceeding for the purpose of having it declared that plaintiff was elected instead of defendant, who had been declared elected by the chairman. It was held that the contract was not against public policy, that it was valid, and that defendant had been legally elected. While it was not necessary that the court act affirmatively in order to give effect to this contract, the holding had the effect of the decree of specific performance. The holding is not based upon the theory of noninterference by the court, but upon the theory that the decision of the chairman was correct. It was held that the contract was in substance an informal, irrevocable proxy.

The holding in Greenwell v. Porter [1902] 1 Ch. 530, 71 L. J. Ch. N. S. 243, 86 L. T. N. S. 220, 9 Manson, 85, while not clearly decisive of the question here considered, furnishes some indication that under certain circumstances specific performance of an agreement to vote for certain persons may be decreed by the English court. The defendants, as executors holding a majority of the shares of stock of a corporation, as well as a few shares belonging to themselves as individuals, induced the plaintiff to purchase some of the shares from them as executors, by agreeing that as long as they held any shares either as executors or as individuals they would use the voting power of such shares for, and not against, two specified persons for directors; three of the four defendants, in violation of the agreement, voted against one of the persons named, and plaintiff asked for an injunction restraining them from so voting at a second or subsequent meeting. The injunction was granted over defendants' objection that the agreement was ultra vires and a delegation of their powers by the executors, and that it was inconsistent with the duty of the defendants as directors of the company. The court points out, however, that the plaintiff does not claim to make the defendants vote in accordance with the agreement, but claims an intention to restrain them from voting against the reelection of the party named. The decision had the same effect as a decree for specific performance, since plaintiff's candidate did not need the votes, provided they were not cast for the opponent. J. W. M.

Messrs. Kerr & McCord, for respondent:

Even though pooling contracts generally, if based upon no illegal consideration and not against public policy, may be valid and upheld by the courts, the contract now before the court is contrary to public policy and is based upon an illegal consideration, and is therefore unenforceable.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant brought this action against the respondent to compel the specific performance of a contract entered into between them, concerning the management and control of certain shares of the capital stock of the American Savings Bank & Trust Company. On filing his complaint the appellant applied for a temporary injunction, and for the appointment of a trustee to take charge of the stock in question pending a trial of the action. This application was resisted by the respondent and denied 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by the court. Thereafter a demurrer was interposed and sustained to the complaint, and the action dismissed. This appeal is from the order of the court denying the application, and from the judgment of dismissal.

The contentions of the appellant can best be stated in his own language, and we herewith set forth his complaint at length:

"Comes now the plaintiff and complaining of the defendant alleges:

"I. That on or about the 20th day of March, 1903, this plaintiff and defendant, together with one J. J. Haggerty, were the owners of certain shares of the capital stock of the American Savings Bank & Trust Company, a banking corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Washington, and then and there doing a general banking and trust business in the city of Seattle, state of Washington, each being the owner of approximately 174 shares of said capital stock; and the said plaintiff and defendant and the said J. J. Haggerty were at said time desirous of and contemplating the acquisition of additional shares of the capital stock of said American Savings Bank & Trust Company. Thereupon, and in consideration of the premises, the said plaintiff and the defendant and the said J. J. Haggerty did make and enter into a certain agreement with regard to the said capital stock then owned or thereafter to be acquired by them, and each of them, a copy of which said agreement is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part of this complaint.

"II. In consideration of the making of said agreement so referred to as 'Exhibit A,' this plaintiff acquired additional shares of the capital stock of said American Savings Bank & Trust Company, so that plaintiff is now the owner and holder of 511 shares of the capital stock of said corporation.

"III. Subsequent to the making of said agreement, the said J. J. Haggerty disposed of the capital stock of the said corporation then owned and held by him to one Bonnafield, and thereafter this plaintiff, with the knowledge and consent of defendant, purchased from said Bonnafield, from one Minahan, one Grant, and one O'Brien 353 shares of the capital stock of said corporation at the price of $240 per share, which said shares were thereupon and thereafter held by the plaintiff subject to the terms of said agreement referred to as 'Exhibit A.' Thereafter the said defendant was desirous of acquiring 262 shares of the capital stock of said corporation, so held by this plaintiff as aforesaid, and the plaintiff then and there transferred to the said defendant 262 shares of the capital stock of said corporation so acquired by him as aforesaid, at said price of $240 per share, with the express understanding and agreement that the same would be held by the said defendant at all times subject to the terms and conditions of the agreement referred to as 'Exhibit A.'

"IV. Thereafter the said defendant acquired additional shares of the capital stock of said corporation, so that he, the said defendant, now holds 776 shares of the capital stock of said corporation.

"V. Disregarding the provisions of said contract, hereinbefore referred to as 'Exhibit A,' that the holdings of stock owned and controlled by the parties to said agreement should be voted together as if one holding in all matters pertaining to the voting, managing, controlling, and officering of the corporation, and that the entire holdings of stock owned and controlled by the plaintiff and defendant should be voted together upon all matters arising in the corporation wherein the stockholders are called upon to vote, the said defendant has refused to co-operate with the plaintiff in voting their joint holdings of stock at stockholders' meetings, or in any matter pertaining to the managing, controlling, and officering of the corporation, and threatens to continue to do so. The defendant by reason of the fact that he has secured a voting alliance with other stockholders in said corporation, and by reason of the further fact that he disregards the agreement hereinbefore referred to with this plaintiff, is able to and does control the said banking corporation.

"VI. At the time of making of said agreement, said plaintiff was the manager and one of the directors of said banking corporation. The said defendant in combination with other stockholders as aforesaid, and by disregarding the rights of said plaintiff under said contract, has attempted to remove the said plaintiff as manager and director of said banking corporation, and, unless this defendant is enjoined by order of your honorable court from disregarding the rights of the said plaintiff under said contract, will remove the said plaintiff as manager and director of said banking corporation, and deprive him of any voice in the management of the affairs thereof.

"VII. By disregarding the rights of the said plaintiff under said contract, and by voting the capital stock now held by him without regard to this plaintiff or the rights of said plaintiff under said contract, the said defendant has chosen and placed in control of the affairs of said corporation trustees and officers who are entirely subservient to him. The said trustees and 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

officers have by his direction and procurement denied to this plaintiff, though a director and officer of said banking corporation, access to the books and papers thereof, so that this plaintiff is unable to properly perform his duties and the duties imposed by law upon him as an officer and director of said banking corporation.

"VIII. The said J. J. Haggerty, having as aforesaid disposed of his interest in the capital stock of said corporation, has declined to act further in determining how said capital stock so referred to in said agreement should be voted. The said defendant wrongfully and fraudulently, and with intent to deprive the said plaintiff of any voice in the management of said corporation, and with wrongful and fraudulent intent to violate the terms of said agreement, has refused and still continues to refuse, and threatens to continue to refuse, to co-operate with the said plaintiff in determining how the vote of the shares of the capital stock so owned by the plaintiff and defendant shall be cast upon any matter arising in the corporate meetings and affecting the control or management of the corporation, so that, by reason of the refusal of the defendant to co-operate as aforesaid, said 776 shares of the capital stock of said corporation now held by the defendant, and said 511 shares of the capital stock of said corporation now held by the said plaintiff, which said stock so held constitutes a majority of the capital stock of said corporation, cannot be voted as is contemplated by the terms of said agreement, and will therefore be robbed of its function and greatly depreciate in value, unless the court shall appoint a trustee to take possession of said capital stock and vote the same at stockholders' meetings of said corporation so long as the said plaintiff and defendant do not agree as to the way in which the votes of said capital stock so jointly held by them as aforesaid shall be cast.

"IX. It is necessary, in order that the rights assured the said plaintiff by the contract marked 'Exhibit A' be conserved to him, that an officer of this court shall take possession of the said 776 shares of the capital stock of said corporation now held by the defendant, and the said 511 shares of said corporation now held by the plaintiff, and sell the same, unless the said plaintiff and defendant will agree as to the manner in which all of said shares of the capital stock shall be voted at stockholders' meetings of said corporation.

"X. On the 14th day of January, 1913, will be held the annual meeting of the stockholders of said corporation for the election of trustees and officers and the transaction of other business relative to the management of said institution, so that an emergency exists, and it will be necessary that a trustee be appointed to take possession of and vote said capital stock now held by the plaintiff and defendant pending the final determination of this action and prior to said stockholders' meeting on January 14, 1913. Unless the said defendant is enjoined by order of this court, he will vote said shares of the capital stock so owned and held by him at said stockholders' meeting on January 14, 1913, in disregard of said agreement and the rights of said plaintiff thereunder, to the great and irreparable damage of the said plaintiff.

"Wherefore this plaintiff prays that the said defendant be enjoined from voting any shares of the capital stock of said corporation owned or controlled by him without agreeing with this plaintiff as to how the vote of said stock shall be cast at any stockholders' meeting; that an officer of this court be appointed to take possession of all of the capital stock of said corporation held by the plaintiff and the defendant, and that such officer forthwith cause said stock to be sold in the open market, the proceeds thereof to be distributed ratably between the plaintiff and the defendant, and that pending said disposition said officer shall cast the vote of said capital stock at all stockholders' meetings of said corporation.

"And further prays that pending the final determination of this action, said defendant be restrained from voting said stock at such stockholders' meeting on January 14, 1913, or at any time to which said meeting may be adjourned, without agreeing with said plaintiff as to the manner of voting said stock.

"And plaintiff further prays that if the said defendant shall disavow the agreement under which, as hereinbefore set forth, said 262 shares of the capital stock of said corporation were transferred to said defendant by this plaintiff, an accounting be had, and that the said defendant be required to re-transfer to this plaintiff said 262 shares of the capital stock of said corporation upon payment to the said defendant of $240 per share, together with interest at legal rate, less dividends which have been paid thereon, which said sum the said plaintiff avows his willingness to pay to the said defendant whenever this court shall by decree determine the amount which in good conscience should be paid therefor.

"And further prays that he may have and recover his costs and disbursements herein, and have such other and further relief as to the court may seem meet in the premises considered."

Exhibit A.

This agreement made and entered into this 20th day of March A. D. 1903, between J. J. Haggerty, J. P. Gleason, and M. Earles, witnesseth: That, whereas all said parties are stockholders in the American Savings Bank & Trust Company, a banking corporation, and therefore interested in the management and success of said corporation, and to that end each of the parties hereto agrees, one with the other, that all the stock owned and controlled in said corporation by each of the parties shall be pooled and joined as if one holding in all matters pertaining to the voting, managing, controlling, and officering the corporation, and to that end doth each enter into this agreement one with the other, to wit:

First. That the entire holdings of stock owned and controlled by the three parties hereto shall be voted together upon all matters arising in the corporation wherein the stockholders are called upon to vote, and such vote shall be cast as decided by a majority of the three parties hereto.

Second. That in the absence of any one of the parties hereto, his stock may be voted by proxy by either or both jointly of the other parties hereto, and shall be voted as directed in such proxy or as decided by a majority vote as before stated herein, on any matter affecting the business of the corporation.

Third. That as trustee of the corporation, each of the parties hereto agrees one with the other to abide by a majority decision, as to any matter arising in the corporate meetings and affecting the control and management of the corporation, and to cast his vote on any such matter as decided by a majority of the parties hereto.

Fourth. That each of the parties hereto hereby agrees and promises one to the other that he will subscribe for and take such shares of stock of the corporation so as that the joint holdings of the three parties hereto shall at all times constitute and be a majority of all the outstanding stock of the corporation, and that each shall take an equal number of shares to that end at any time it may be decided by the board of trustees to sell additional stock to that at present issued, but the sale of additional stock shall be sanctioned and agreed to by the parties hereto only when they and each of them are able and willing to increase their holdings as herein stated.

Fifth. That in case either of the parties hereto wishes to sell or dispose of his holdings in the stock of the corporation, he shall give the right and option to purchase same, to the other parties hereto, for at least thirty days, at the then actual value of such stock as determined by the assets of the corporation, before offering same to any other party; and after such option expires, and in case of an offer of purchase from any other party, the parties hereto shall have the right, and the option is hereby extended, to take such stock at any price offered by any other party, in preference to any such intending purchasers whatever: Provided, that for a period of five years from date the parties hereto agree one with the other that neither shall sell nor offer for sale, except to one another, his stock in the corporation, unless the whole pool or holdings of the parties hereto shall be sold together, and in case of any sale a majority decision of the parties hereto, as to the price, shall be binding.

Sixth. This agreement shall run with the stock now owned by the parties hereto, as well also with all stock hereafter acquired by the parties hereto, and shall be binding upon the parties and their legal representatives until such time as dissolved in writing by mutual consent. This agreement is based upon a valuable consideration which each of the parties hereto hereby acknowledge, one unto the other.

In witness whereof, we, the parties hereto, set our hands and seals this 20th day of March, A. D. 1903.

J. J. Haggerty,
James P. Gleason,
Michael Earles.

In support of his allegation for a temporary injunction and for the appointment of a trustee, the appellant filed with his complaint his own affidavit, in which he set forth more in detail the matters alleged in his complaint, averring specially therein that the respondent had, since the time of the making of the agreement therein referred to up to the time of the meeting of the stockholders in January, 1912, recognized the same as a binding obligation between the parties thereto, and had voted his stock in the corporation in accordance with the provisions thereof.

The respondent filed the affidavit of himself and certain of the trustees and officers of the bank in opposition to the application. In his own affidavit the respondent took issue with many of the material allegations of the complaint. While he admitted the execution of the agreement set forth therein, he denied that it had ever been acted upon by the parties thereto, and averred that upon the purchase of the stock referred to in the complaint as the Bonnafield, Minahan, Grant, and O'Brien stock, the matter of the agreement was talked over between them, and it was then mutually agreed that the same should be treated and considered as an absolute nullity. He also denied the appellant's version of the purchase of such stock, averring that the same was purchased and paid for by himself individually through the instrumentality of one Kavanaugh, who acted as agent for the several holders, and that he afterwards, at the appellant's request, sold the appellant 91 shares of his holdings, none of which was of the stock purchased through Kavanaugh. He denied that the trustees of the bank elected at the January, 1912, meeting of the stockholders were "dummy trustees," or subservient to his control, or that he had absolute or unlimited control of the bank; denied that he had in combination with other stockholders, or otherwise, attempted to remove the appellant as manager and director of the bank; on the contrary he averred that the appellant voluntarily resigned as manager on being confronted with certain of his acts as such manager, and that he was still a director of the bank; denied that he had refused the appellant access to the books of the bank; and averred that the appellant had, on the contrary, been expressly tendered the privilege of examination at any time when such examination would not interfere with the conduct of the business of the bank. He specially averred that he had refused, and would continue to refuse, to vote his stock in conjunction with that of the appellant under the written agreement. The respondent further averred that the appellant, while manager of the bank, had, in furtherance of his private business and business adventures, mismanaged the business of the bank, causing it direct losses in large sums of money, and that the bank had been compelled to cease paying dividends for a time that these losses might be recuperated out of the profits of the bank's general business.

The trustees in their affidavits averred their independence of action. They denied coercion, or attempted coercion, of their acts as such trustees by the respondent, and substantiated the respondent's averments of mismanagement of the affairs of the bank by the appellant.

The affidavits of the officers of the bank show, among other things, the financial condition of the bank. It was shown that it had an unimpaired capital stock of $200,000, a surplus fund of $300,000, and a deposit of upwards of $2,000,000, and that it was doing a legitimate and profitable banking business. Counter affidavits were filed on behalf of the appellant in which the charges of incompetency and mismanagement were denied, and in which charges of misconduct in the management of the bank's affairs were made against the respondent. It was charged that he had secured from the bank, for himself and for corporations of which he was the principal stockholder, loans vastly in excess of the proper limit; that the state bank examiner had complained of these excessive loans, and had insisted that they be reduced, and that the respondent's enmity towards him as manager arose when he insisted on a compliance with the bank examiner's demands. A reply affidavit was filed by the respondent, in which he sought to show that he had not borrowed from the bank in excess of the proper limit, and that the bank examiner's complaint had been made on misinformation, that all of the loans made him from the bank were loans on call, that he stood ready at any time to pay them on demand, and that the appellant made no complaint concerning these loans until after his withdrawal as manager of the bank. He further averred that he at that time personally owed the bank nothing whatever; that he was indorser on paper for others to the extent of $38,280; that he was worth, over and above his debts and liabilities, more than $2,500,000; that the greater part of the paper on which he is indorser is secured by first mortgage on real estate; and that all of the makers of such paper are of themselves abundantly able to pay their several obligations in full.

In this court the appellant assigns error upon the ruling of the court refusing to grant a temporary injunction, refusing to appoint a trustee to take control of and vote the capital stock of the parties pending the final determination of the action, and in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint. He argues that contracts of the nature of the one here in question are valid; that while such contracts have been often attacked in the courts, the present tendency is to uphold them in the absence of a showing that their purpose is to avoid some express provision of the law, or to commit a fraud upon other stockholders; "for," he concludes, "there is nothing inherently illegitimate in a combination by certain stockholders whereby they may, for a lawful purpose, control the conduct of the affairs of a corporation."

Many cases are cited in support of the contention, among which is the case from this court of Winsor v. Commonwealth, 63 L.R.A. (N.S.) 63, 114 Pac. 908. We shall not, however, enter into an extended review of the cases cited from other jurisdictions. We think that an examination of them will show that in none of them has the court, in upholding the contract, gone to the extent we are asked to go in this instance. In all of the cases cited, in so far as we have been permitted to consult them, the contracts relate to corporations engaged in purely private enterprises, having no public or trust character, and in which the suit was brought, either by a minority stockholder to restrain the parties to the contract from acting thereunder, or by one party to the contract against another or others to set the contract aside. In none of the cases was the suit to compel the specific performance of the contract. The case cited from our own court is of the same character. The plaintiff in that case, prior to the execution of the contract of which he complained, was the owner of the majority of the corporation's capital stock. The corporation had become embarrassed financially, and was in the hands of a receiver appointed by the court at the suit of a creditor. The plaintiff had been unsuccessful in his endeavors to extricate it from its difficulties. While in this situation he entered in a contract with certain of the defendants, whereby they agreed, in consideration of the transfer to them of certain of the plaintiff's stock, to advance sums of money to the corporation so that it could be taken from the hands of the receiver, and put back upon a working basis; the contract including a pooling agreement to continue for ten years, under which the remaining stock held by the plaintiff was pooled with that of the other parties to the contract to be voted by such parties during the continuance of the term of the agreement. The contracting defendants had performed their part of the agreement, in so far as it was then capable of being performed, and had advanced large sums of money to the use of the corporation on the faith of the agreement. It was sought to be set aside on two grounds; one that the plaintiff had been overreached, and the other that the agreement was void as being in contravention of public policy. This court denied both contentions, saying with respect to the latter: "The agreement to pool the stock was not against public policy, because there was nothing unlawful about it, and nothing which necessarily affected the rights of minority stockholders. Persons owning stock have the unqualified right to combine their interests to secure the management of the corporation when such management is fair to all stockholders alike. . . . If this agreement had been made for the purpose of depriving some stockholder of his rights in the company, or of doing some other illegal act, a different rule would apply. But this contract seems to have been entered into for legal purposes and in good faith, and has been acted upon. The plaintiff is not now in a position to seek its rescission."

This case we think was rightly decided. So also we think were most, if not all, of the cases cited by the appellant from other jurisdictions to the same purport. But, as we say, we think them not in point on the particular question here presented. The corporation concerning whose capital stock the contract in question was made is a corporation having functions of a public nature, as well as private functions, to perform. It is a banking corporation authorized by law to receive deposits. It is by statute subject to inspection by officers appointed by the state, and subject in a measurable degree to control by such officers. Its stockholders are subject to liabilities in addition to those assumed by stockholders of a merely private corporation. Its trustees are also more restricted in their powers pertaining to the management of the corporation's affairs than are the trustees of a private corporation; and such trustees may, for certain omissions of duty, not necessarily involving moral turpitude, be convicted and imprisoned as for a felony. The cases cited also differ widely from the case at bar in the relief sought. Our own case is illustrative of the others. In it the court was asked to declare void a contract entered into in good faith and for a lawful purpose, which was being carried out by the parties thereto having the obligation to perform, when to do so would result in an irretrievable loss to such parties. In the case at bar we are asked to specifically enforce a contract against the will of one of the parties thereto, when to do so may take the corporation from without the control of officers selected by the mutual agreement of the stockholders, and vest it in officers selected by the parties to the contract, one of whom is coerced to act against his will; or perhaps may vest its control in the court through the medium of a trustee appointed by the court.

If, therefore, we assume that the contract is so far valid that a court would not interfere were the parties thereto carrying it out in good faith, and further assume that it is a contract capable of being specifically enforced by the court, we think it clear that it is a contract a court ought not to specifically enforce. We need not enlarge upon the reasons for this conclusion. They abundantly appear from a consideration of the matters above recited. We may properly add, however, that the complaint is not left utterly without remedy. If the contract be valid, he has an action at law in damages for the injury suffered by him because of the failure of the other party to the contract to carry out its terms. And to this remedy he must be relegated.

from the respondent the capital stock purchased from Bonnafield, Minahan, Grant, and O'Brien, mentioned in the complaint, and which he alleges he transferred to the respondent on the promise that it should be held at all time subject to the terms of the contract. But since the contract itself does not provide this as a remedy for a breach of its condition, the agreement falls within the general rule relating to breaches of condition concerning the transfer of personal property. The general rule is that such contracts will not be specifically enforced, but the injured party will be left to an action in law for damages. Corporate stock comes within the scope of the rule. An exception exists where there are peculiar features concerning the agreement which leave the remedy at law inadequate, but no such peculiar feature exists in the present case. A specific enforcement of the contract is sought that a minority stockholder therein may become a majority stockholder, and this is not sufficient to invoke the rule. Foll's Appeal, 91 Pa. 434, 36 Am. Rep. 671; Gage v. Fisher, 5 N. D. 297, 31 L.R.A. 557, 65 N. W. 809.

The judgment is affirmed.

The question of fraud is closely connected with the question here annotated, but it is not intended to discuss rescission or abatement on the ground of fraud, even though a deficiency in quantity appears. The first two following cases illustrate this class, which has in general been excluded.

One who has purchased coal land on which there has been no developments, experimental or otherwise, to test the existence of coal, but which is represented by an agent had hoped or expected to obtain, provided there is a substantial quantity of coal in the land.

Same — absence of vein.

2. Nor can rescission of the sale executed by such a deed be had because of nonexistence of a particular coal vein or measure in the land.

Evidence — representations.

3. On a bill for such rescission, parol evidence to prove expectancy of a particular vein, or a representation of the presence thereof, in the land, is inadmissible.

Sale — deficiency — abatement from price.

4. Under a sale of land or coal by the acre, there may always be an abatement from unpaid purchase money, or a recovery of purchase money paid, in case of a deficiency in the quantity of the land or coal.

of the vendors claiming to be familiar with coal lands, to contain three underlying veins of coal, is not entitled to a rescission of the contract upon its being discovered that the only coal in the tract is a little under one corner, which could not be profitably worked. Lynch's Appeal, 97 Pa. 349. The representations of the vendors' agent are treated as mere opinions, not facts, and since the purchaser was on the land and saw for himself that it was not developed, he knew perfectly that the representations of the agent were merely the expressions of his opinion. A further fact existed in this case, in that the purchaser represented to the vendors that he intended it for another purpose, in order to conceal his true purpose and get the claim for as low a price as possible. The court states that a contract will not be rescinded except upon the ground of fraud, illegality, or mistake, and the evidence of these should be so clear as to leave no room for hesitation or doubt in the mind of the court.

But where vendors of land through their agent have represented to a prospective purchaser that the land contains large deposits of coal, and prevent a full investigation by an agent of the purchaser by fraudulent means, such purchaser, upon discovery that the land did not contain coal as represented, may rescind the contract. Alger v. Keith, 44 C. C. A. 371, 105 Fed. 103. Petition for leave to file a bill of review was denied in 59 C. C. A. 552, 124 Fed. 32.

So, one who has renewed an option to purchase coal land in ignorance of the fact that the grantor during the continuance of the former option had sold a considerable quantity of the land, the renewal option being taken for the same quantity of land as the original, is entitled to a rescission of the contract, and to be placed in statu quo, unless the vendor can make good his contract by conveying to the purchaser the whole boundary of coal as covered by the first option. Carney v. Harbert, 44 W. Va. 30, 28 S. E. 712.

Under a contract for the sale of coal land, in which it is stipulated for a deduction of a stated amount per acre for any number Deed construction — character of sale.

5. A deed for coal, conveying a certain number of acres as acres of coal, in consideration of a sum of money which is an exact multiple of the number of acres specified, is ambiguous on its face as to whether it is a sale by the acre or a sale in gross.

Same — matters considered.

6. In such case the purpose of the vendee to obtain coal, not land, nonexistence of coal in a large portion of the land, and an option for purchase of the coal in the land at a certain price for each and every acre of the coal, under which the deed was made, may be considered in seeking the intent of the parties; and the deed read in the light thereof is properly construed as embodying a contract of sale by the acre.

of acres of coal not delivered, and another stipulated amount per acre for land not delivered, a purchaser is not entitled to deduction of the area of coal under a creek and that under a railroad. Redstone Oil, Coal & Coke Co's Dissolution, 207 Pa. 125, 56 Atl. 355. The sale here was for a lump sum with the deductions above mentioned provided for.

The court in Redstone Oil, Coal & Coke Co's Dissolution, supra, states that the parties to the contract contemplated a deduction for a deficiency in the absolute acreage of the coal delivered, and not for a deficiency in the available acreage. It appears that a number of acres had been mined out by the grantors, and both parties agreed to the deduction of this quantity according to the price stipulated in the contract, and there was also an excess of surface of about 40 acres conveyed, and for this an allowance at the stipulated price was made.

In Pittsburg Coal Co. v. Cook, 219 Pa. 539, 69 Atl. 85, the parties provided in their contract for an abatement from the purchase price in case of a shortage in acreage, and an extra payment in case the acreage overran as shown by a survey to be made by the parties; a claim for such shortage was held to be properly made after the deed had been delivered and payment made, where it was agreed that such adjustment as might be necessary upon the property conveyed being surveyed should be held open for future settlement.

It was admitted in Fuller v. Mulhollan, 40 Pa. Super. Ct. 257, that a purchaser of coal land was entitled to an abatement from the purchase price where he had purchased a certain acreage of coal and it turned out that a portion thereof had been previously mined, the only question in the case being as to the measure of his damages or the amount of the abatement.

The contract of purchase in Rainey v. Hogsett, 40 C. C. A. 335, 100 Fed. 207, contained a provision that there should be an abatement of the purchase price in case of a shortage in the acreage. The original agreement required the vendee to make claims for shortage within three months APPPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Preston County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to enforce a vendor's lien. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. P. J. Crogan and Goodwin & Reay, for appellants:

Appellants are entitled to cancelation of the deed and the return of cash payment, because of the fraud and deceit practised upon them.

This is a sale of coal by the acre, and there is such a gross deficiency in the quantity of coal conveyed as to amount to failure of consideration, entitling appellants to a rescission of the contract and a cancelation of the deed on that ground.

after entering upon the property, and a claim was made by him for a shortage of 16 acres. The vendor denied the claim, and no agreement having been reached at the time that the first instalment on the purchase price fell due, this amount was paid in full, and a supplementary agreement was entered into providing that if any shortage should be found in the acreage, the amount was to be deducted, and that the amount of the shortage should be ascertained within six months. The vendee was here held not confined to the shortage claimed under the original agreement, but might make a claim for any shortage appearing.

In an action against one who has purchased all the coal lying within or under certain premises at a stated price for every statute acre found in the premises, and until the price be fully paid a stated annual sum, in order to recover the stated annual sum it is not necessary to allege that the purchaser has found the coal, where it is alleged that there is still a large quantity of coal remaining in the premises. Jowett v. Spencer, 1 Exch. 647, 17 L. J. Exch. N. S. 367, 2 Mor. Min. Rep. 499.

Leases.

One who has contracted to lease a mine at a stated minimum rent per annum cannot resist a specific performance of the contract on the ground that the mine is worthless. Haywood v. Cope, 25 Beav. 140, 27 L. J. Ch. N. S. 468, 4 Jur. N. S. 227, 6 Week. Rep. 304, 17 Eng. Rul. Cas. 817, 6 Mor. Min. Rep. 499. The lessee in this case had made a personal examination of the mine and satisfied himself in regard thereto before entering into the agreement.

On the contrary, it has been held that the lessee in a coal lease for a fixed annual rental, executed by the parties under the belief that there was coal under the land, will be relieved from the contract where it is subsequently ascertained that there is no coal, since there is a material mistake of fact, causing a total failure of consideration. Fritzler v. Robinson, 70 Iowa, 500, 31 N. W. 61, 17 Mor. Min. Rep. 105. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A lessee who has agreed to pay the lessor a certain sum per ton for each ton of coal mined, and has further agreed to pay a fixed sum each year as fixed rent whether said rent on coal dug and mined shall amount to said sum or not, is not entitled to an abatement from such fixed sum of an amount equal to the difference between such fixed sum and that to which the coal mined amounted to at the rate agreed upon. McDowell v. Hendrix, 67 Ind. 515, 9 Mor. Min. Rep. 96. The lessors and the lessees here investigated the coal deposit by drillings and tests, and had come to the conclusion that there was more coal in place than was actually the fact. When this mistake was discovered by the actual opening of the mines, the lessee sought an abatement from the rental agreed upon, on the theory that the mistake was a mutual mistake as to fact, and alleged that the contract at least would have never been executed had not the parties thereto been misled as stated.

The question frequently arises over the payment of rent after the coal has become exhausted.

A lessee under a lease for ten years containing a stipulation for the mining of a stated quantity per year and a certain sum per ton, with an agreement that the payments must be made "at the time specified, . . . whether the coal is mined at the time or not," is not entitled to be relieved from the payment upon its appearing that there is not sufficient coal to furnish the stipulated yearly amount for the time of the lease. Stark v. Scott, 4 Luzerne Leg. Reg. 49.

The lease in Stark v. Scott is treated as an absolute agreement to pay a stated sum of money. "No conditions" says the court, "were coupled with these covenants or either of them. The lessees were not to work the coal as far as it could be worked; the rents were not to cease when the mining became unprofitable or even impossible; the existence of a sufficient amount of coal under the premises to meet the terms of the lease was not a condition precedent to the payment of rents."

Ill. 109; Adams v. Pardue, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 36 S. W. 1015.

Defendants having served notice on the plaintiff that they accepted the option, and called on him for the abstract of title and the deed, both of which were accepted, and having had ample opportunity to thoroughly examine the property, they cannot now interpose objections.

Armstrong v. Maryland Coal Co. 67 W. Va. 589, 69 S. E. 195; Simmons v. Palmer, 93 Va. 389, 25 S. E. 6; McCobb v. Richardson, 24 Me. 82, 41 Am. Dec. 374; Truslow v. Parkersburg Bridge & Terminal R. Co. 61 W. Va. 628, 57 S. E. 51.

It appearing from the deed as a whole that all the coal and also all the mining rights and privileges should be considered quiring payment for a certain minimum amount of coal "whether the same should be got or not" is not entitled to recover from the lessor payments made under the lease, where it appears that, owing to the difficulty of mining the coal stipulated for in the lease, the lessee did not obtain the amount to which he was entitled. Mellers v. Devonshire, 16 Beav. 252, 22 L. J. Ch. N. S. 310, 1 Week. Rep. 44.

A lessee is not entitled to be relieved from the payment of rent under a lease providing for the payment of a certain stipulated rent whether the mines were worked or not, although it is impossible to continue the working except at a certain and ruinous loss. Phillips v. Jones, 9 Sim. 519, 3 Jur. 242, 8 Mor. Min. Rep. 344.

A lessee who has agreed to pay a fixed minimum rental whether coal is obtained or not is not entitled to be relieved from the payment when the coal is exhausted so that not enough remains to make up the yearly amount provided for. Bute v. Thompson, 13 Mees. & W. 487, 14 L. J. Exch. N. S. 95, 8 Mor. Min. Rep. 371.

So, in Ridgway v. Sneyd, Kay, 627, 8 Mor. Min. Rep. 414, under a lease containing a stipulation for a minimum rent, it was held that equity would not restrain an action for the minimum, although the coal could not be worked at a profit.

Under a lease requiring the mining of a minimum amount, and the payment of an annual minimum rental of not less than a stated sum, and giving the lessee the privilege in case of failure in any year to mine coal to the amount of the minimum, which it or they shall have paid, to make up the deficiency in any subsequent year during the continuation of the lease without any payment thereunder, a lessee who has failed to mine the stipulated minimum, but has paid the required minimum rental until a short time before the filing of the bill in question, is not entitled to an injunction restraining the lessor from declaring a forfeiture on the lease, on the theory that the payments already made covered all the coal in the land in question, and therefore he should have the right to take the balance 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

without further payment. Lehigh & W. B. Coal Co. v. Wright, 177 Pa. 387, 35 Atl. 919.

A lease of land for ten years for the purpose of mining coal contained thereon, requiring the lessees to mine at least 10,000 bushels of coal every year, or pay a royalty on that amount, was treated as a sale of coal in place, in Timlin v. Brown, 158 Pa. 606, 28 Atl. 236, and it was there held that the lessees could not be relieved from the payment of the annual minimum royalty, although the coal had become so nearly exhausted as to be unworkable at the end of the seventh year. The court, after stating that the existence of workable marketable coal under this land had been demonstrated by the lessees in sinking a shaft, continues: "The only element of uncertainty—the quantity—they took the risk of by an unequalled covenant to pay a fixed minimum sum."

A lessor was enjoined in Smith v. Morris, 2 Bro. Ch. 311, 8 Mor. Min. Rep. 317, from suing for a minimum annual rental under a lease which was to terminate upon exhaustion of the coal, where the mining of coal became very expensive, upon the lessee paying for all the coal remaining.

A lease containing a provision for a minimum rent or royalty was sustained in Coal Creek Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Tennessee Coal, Iron, & R. Co. 106 Tenn. 651, 62 S. W. 162, and a recovery of the minimum rent allowed, although the royalties on the coal actually mined did not amount to this sum. It does not appear, however, that the failure to mine was due to the lack of coal or the difficulty of mining the same. The lease was subsequently terminated for the reason given that, because of existing conditions of the mine, it was impossible to conduct operations, without losing money.

Where there is an express covenant to pay a certain royalty upon a lease of coal lands, the lessor may recover such royalty notwithstanding there is no minable coal that the lessee may take out; especially is this true where the lessee has not pleaded this fact in defense. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Peers, 150 Ill. 344, 37 N. E. 937.

together as constituting the property for which the purchase price was paid, it does not matter that the deed provides that the consideration was so much per acre for the coal.

Arnold v. Cramer, 41 Pa. Super. Ct. 8.

The burden of proof is on the defendants who attack the deed. They absolutely fail to prove fraud of any sort, and therefore cannot set the deed aside.

Armstrong v. Bailey, 43 W. Va. 778, 28 S. E. 766; Burrows v. Fitch, 62 W. Va. 116, 57 S. E. 283; Sanson v. Wolford, 60 W. Va. 380, 55 S. E. 1020; Pennybacker v. Laidley, 33 W. Va. 624, 11 S. E. 39.

Even if the plaintiff had represented that the property in controversy was underlain with the Upper Freeport seam of coal, which he did not, it would only be an opinion, and though such opinion was confidently expressed and equally as confidently relied upon by the purchasers, they relied upon it at their own risk, and it would afford no grounds for relief in equity.

Lynch's Appeal, 97 Pa. 349; Tuck v. Downing, 76 Ill. 71, 7 Mor. Min. Rep. 83; Cooper v. Lovering, 106 Mass. 77, 6 Mor. Min. Rep. 662; McCobb v. Richardson, 24 Me. 82, 41 Am. Dec. 374.

Poffenbarger, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

To the bill for the enforcement of a vendor's lien in this cause, the answer set up two alternative defenses, a right of rescission of the contract of sale, with a recovery of the purchase money paid, and an abatement from the unpaid purchase money for a deficiency, both of which were disallowed by the court, and a decree was entered for the full amount claimed by the plaintiff, with interest thereon.

The deed in which the lien was reserved conveyed "all the coal in, on, and underlying all that certain tract of land owned by the grantors," described as containing 244.55 acres, out of which there was reserved a strip containing 4.157 acres which had been conveyed to a railroad company out of the tract, and 6 acres of coal to be located in a contiguous body under and around the dwelling and outbuildings on the property, leaving 234.4 acres of coal. The consideration was $2,812.80, of which one third was paid in cash and the balance deferred in two equal payments for one and two years, respectively. The conveyance was made March 30, 1907, pursuant to an option dated October 12, 1905, several extensions of which had been granted, the last one until January 2, 1907.

Unsustained by proof, the prayer for rescission was properly denied. The answer set up two grounds therefor, the nonexistent ence of any coal in the land of the kind contracted for, and fraud on the part of the plaintiff, consisting of misrepresentation as to the kind and quantity of coal in his land. Though neither the option nor the deed specifies any particular vein of coal as the subject-matter of the contract, the answer charges the contract was for coal of the Upper Freeport vein, which averment is denied by a special replication. Some witnesses were of the opinion that none of that vein of coal is found in the land, while others believed it contains 5 or 6 acres of such coal. That the quantity thereof, if any, is meager, is an undisputed fact in the case. A witness for the defendant testifies to a representation of the existence of a large quantity of such coal by the plaintiff, but this the plaintiff denies, saying he made no claim of that sort, but, on the contrary, had said there was very little of the Upper Freeport vein of coal in his land. To strengthen the evidence of the claim or representation contrary to the fact, evidence was adduced tending to show the Upper Freeport vein of coal was the only one in that section of the country at that time deemed to have a commercial or marketable value.

The general terms used in the option and deed, calling for all of the coal in the land, clearly negative any intention to limit the conveyance to a particular vein. To admit parol evidence of intention so to limit it would clearly violate a well-established rule of evidence. The terms of the deed are certain and definite. It contains not a word upon which any claim of ambiguity or uncertainty can rest, and no latent ambiguity is disclosed by the oral testimony. Hence there is no basis or ground for the admission of parol evidence. It could perform no office other than contradiction of the plain terms of the written contract, and that is inhibited by a firmly established rule of evidence. Poling v. Williams, 55 W. Va. 69, 46 S. E. 704; Troll v. Carter, 15 W. Va. 567. Having contracted for all of the coal in the land, the defendants are not entitled to rescission of the contract on account of the absence or nonexistence of a particular vein. Shackelford v. Fulton, 71 C. C. A. 295, 139 Fed. 97. Nor is the testimony adduced sufficient to show they were induced to enter into the contract by any representation as to the existence of the vein of coal in question. On this issue the evidence consists of the testimony of two witnesses only, and they squarely contradict each other. Moreover, a preponderance of the evidence favors the presence of the Upper Freeport coal in the land, and there is no pretense of a representation that the Freeport vein underlies the whole thereof. That the land contains less coal than was expected or represented constitutes no ground for rescission, for the quantity was not in any way made an essential element of the contract. Its plainly expressed purpose was to take and pay for such coal as the land contained, whether much or little, provided there should be a substantial quantity of it.

If the sale was one by the acre, as regards the coal, and not in gross, there should have been a large abatement from the price, for 234.4 acres were sold, and, as a matter of fact, the land contained at the most not more than 125 acres of coal in veins, the existence of which has been ascertained and shown. In all cases of sale by the acre, there may be an abatement from the purchase price for deficiency in quantity. Butcher v. Peterson, 26 W. Va. 447, 53 Am. Rep. 89; Bartlett v. Bartlett, 37 W. Va. 235, 16 S. E. 450; Thompson v. Catlett, 24 W. Va. 524; Board v. Wilson, 34 W. Va. 609, 12 S. E. 778; Neal v. Logan, 1 Gratt. 14, 15. Right to abatement or compensation for a deficiency in the case of a sale of land in gross stands upon the existence of a warranty of quantity, or fraud and misrepresentation on the part of the vendor respecting the quantity. Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438; Hansford v. Chesapeake Coal Co. 22 W. Va. 70; Newman v. Kay, 57 W. Va. 98, 68 L.R.A. 908, 49 S. E. 926, 4 Ann. Cas. 39; Winton v. McGraw, 60 W. Va. 98, 54 S. E. 506.

As the consideration agreed upon and recited in the deed is an exact multiple of the number of acres conveyed, it is ambiguous on its face as to whether it was a sale in gross or a sale by the acre. Newman v. Kay and Hansford v. Chesapeake Coal Co. supra. On the question of the construction of such a deed, or determination of the question of intent, only evidence of the circumstances which surrounded the parties, their situation when the deed was made, and their conduct in carrying the contract into execution, is admissible. Winton v. McGraw; Newman v. Kay; Hansford v. Chesapeake Coal Co. and Crislip v. Cain;—supra. A mere declaration of intention cannot be considered. In this instance the vendees were purchasing coal, not land, and it would be unreasonable to suppose they intended to pay coal prices for land in which there was no coal, or, in other words, to pay for what did not exist. The option they had taken upon the land provided for payment of $12 an acre for each and every acre of coal, not for the land, nor any supposed quantity of coal, and also for ascertainment of the coal acreage in the land, and the deed itself represents "a net coal area . . . of 234.4 acres." The force 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

of these facts and circumstances stand unopposed by anything indicative of a sale in gross, and they must be accorded their legal effect, making plain and obvious an intention on the part of the parties to effect a sale of the coal by the acre.

The land was mountainous and steep. Near the top there is a coal area of 5 or 6 acres in the Upper Freeport vein. Some distance below this there is another area which contains about 40 acres, which is supposed to be in the Lower Freeport vein. Still lower down there is an area of about 120 or 125 acres which is said to be in one of the Kittanning measures. Such is the testimony of the witnesses for the plaintiff. That of the witnesses for the defendants classes the upper area as the Lower Freeport, the next one as the Kittanning, and the third one a Mercer coal bed of the Pottsville measures of series. The deficiency established by this evidence is the difference between 125 acres and 234.4 acres, amounting to 109.4 acres, which, at $12 an acre, amounts to $1,312.80. This deducted from the full amount of the purchase money received, $2,812.80, leaves a balance of $1,500, of which $937.60 has been paid, leaving a balance of $562.40, bearing interest from March 30, 1907.

In conformity with this conclusion, the decree will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to enter a decree for said sum of $562.40, with interest thereon from the 30th day of March, 1907, to be added to the principal and included in the decree as of the date thereof, and for further proceedings in accordance with the rules and principles governing courts of equity.

authority upon the question whether a judgment in favor of one or more sureties and against others in an action by the obligee is res judicata as between the surety or sureties held liable and those exonerated by such judgment, in an action by the former against the latter for contribution.

One line of cases is authority for the rule that the original judgment is not res judicata as between the sureties, unless such sureties are adversely interested in the original action, and held that sureties when jointly sued are not so adversely interested. These cases, however, seem hard to justify, because the sureties, although codefendants, are in effect adversely interested, since exoneraton of one ordinarily increases the liability of the others. This would certainly be true where the surety or sureties held liable would have a right to question the exoneraton of the other sureties in an appellate court.

The other, and seemingly the better, rule is that the judgment in the original action is conclusive as between all those who were parties thereto, even though they were not in form adverse parties, and irrespective of the objection that the cause of action between the obligee and the sureties is technically different from that between the sureties for contribution.

Aligned with the first class of cases above referred to is CENTRAL BKG. & SECUR. Co. v. UNITED STATES FIDELITY & G. Huntington Nat. Bank, — W. Va. —, 79 S. E. 662; Hudson v. Iguano Land & Min. Co. 71 W. Va. 402, 76 S. E. 797; and Biern v. Ray, 49 W. Va. 129, 38 S. E. 530, are that, in West Virginia, when the causes of action are different, the former decision is conclusive only as to questions, rights, and facts actually decided thereunder, but is not, as is sometimes held in other jurisdictions, conclusive as to matters which "might" have been decided; and that the former decision is conclusive as to the latter class of matters (those which Judgment — on bond — suit for contribution — effect.

4. A decree in a suit by the distributees of the estate for the benefit of which such bonds were given, against the principal and sureties in all of them, dismissing the bill as to the sureties in the subsequent ones on their separate demurrers thereto, does not conclude the surety in the original bond in a subsequent suit against the sureties in the others for contribution, under the principles of res judicata, after payment and satisfaction of the liability to the estate by the surety in such first bond.

And the decision in CENTRAL BKG. & SECUR. Co. v. UNITED STATES FIDELITY & G. Co. finds support in Miller v. Gillespie, 59 Mo. 220, wherein it was held that a judgment dismissing an action on an administrator's bond as to one surety, he having pleaded a discharge in bankruptcy, and against the other surety, was not res judicata in an action between the sureties for contribution, the court saying that, as both plaintiff and defendant in the latter action were defendants in the previous action, they did not occupy a hostile position to each other, nor was any question of contribution between them involved or determined.

And the principles applied and decision reached in the CENTRAL BKG. & SECUR. Co. CASE are in full accord with those of Koelsch v. Mixer, 52 Ohio St. 207, 39 N. E. 417, wherein it was held that it was no defense to an action for contribution between cosureties that the defendant surety had been exonerated by the jury in the original action, which had been brought by the obligee jointly against both sureties, the ground being that they were not adversely interested in the original action, and that the conclusiveness of the judgment therein depends upon the question whether an issue was joined between the parties and determined material to their respective rights in the action for contribution. In addition to that portion of the opinion in this case which is quoted in the CENTRAL BKG. & SECUR. Co. CASE, the court used the following interesting language: "Whilst the exact limits of the doctrine of res judicata in its application to some cases are not definitely settled, it is accepted as generally true that the judgment relied on for that effect in subsequent litigation must have been pronounced upon the same issues, between the same parties or their privies, standing in an adversary character to one another. By this is not meant that they should have stood upon the record as plaintiff and defendant, but that this should Same — matters not in issue.

5. The cause of action in such subsequent suit is separate and distinct from that involved in the first, and is not therefore merged in the decision therein. In such case, the decree in the first suit does not bar the second, unless the question of liability involved in the second was actually put in issue by proper pleadings and decided in the first.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Wood County in defendants' favor in an action to recover indemnity from liability upon an administra-

have been their real attitude upon the issues tried and determined. . . . The mere fact that it was there [the original action] determined that he was not liable on the bond to the obligee cannot conclude the plaintiff in this action from demanding contribution from the estate of his deceased cosurety, if, as a matter of fact, they were cosureties on the bond, and the plaintiff has been compelled to discharge all or more than his just proportion of the common liability. The subject-matter of the two actions is different. The former was a suit on a treasurer's bond by the obligee against the makers as codefendants to recover for a breach of it. The present is a suit by one surety on the bond against the estate of another for contribution, and had not accrued at the time of the former suit. It is not based upon the bond. . . . The only difference between this case [an earlier Ohio case] and the one under review is that in the former case a judgment was pleaded in which the opposite party was held to an obligation, and, here, he was released. But this can make no difference in the application of the principle; the conclusiveness of the judgment in either case must depend on the same question,—whether an issue was joined between the parties and determined in the former case, material to their respective rights in the subsequent suit; for, as shown by the authorities above cited, and they are sustained by reason, when such is not the case, there is no ground for the application of the doctrine of res judicata, which rests upon that principle of public policy which requires that where a matter has once been tried and determined on issues joined between the parties in interest in a court of competent jurisdiction, there should, in the interest of society, be an end of litigation. It, however, reaches and concludes only parties to the issue, and does not affect persons who, though parties to the suit, were not parties to the issue upon which the judgment was rendered. The latter, being strangers to the issue, are in a legal sense strangers to the judgment."

So, in Comstock v. Keating, 115 Mo. App. 372, 91 S. W. 416, it was held that a judgment on a bond against one and in favor of another surety was not res judicata in a subsequent action between the sureties for contribution, the court stating the rule to be that the parties to a judgment are not bound by it in subsequent controversies between each other, unless they were adversaries in the action wherein the judgment was entered, or unless as coplaintiffs or codefendants they did in fact, though not in form, occupy the attitude of adversaries; and saying that in the present case none of the issues in the original action was between the sureties inter sese.

tor's bond for which defendants were alleged to be responsible with a cross assignment of error in the allowance of partial relief to plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Merrick & Smith for appellant.

Messrs. Van Winkle & Ambler, for appellees:

The parties to this suit are the same as those who appeared and submitted to the jurisdiction of the circuit court of Calhoun county in the suit by the beneficiaries of the bonds and the bill in that suit, which expressly charged liability upon this defendant, was wholly dismissed, and it was adjudicated and decreed that there was no liability upon this demurrant by reason of the giving of the said bond, and each of the ment on a bond against one and in favor of another surety was not res judicata in a subsequent action between the sureties for contribution, the court stating the rule to be that the parties to a judgment are not bound by it in subsequent controversies between each other, unless they were adversaries in the action wherein the judgment was entered, or unless as coplaintiffs or codefendants they did in fact, though not in form, occupy the attitude of adversaries; and saying that in the present case none of the issues in the original action was between the sureties inter sese.

Foremost, perhaps, among those cases which adhere to a contrary doctrine, is Ruff v. Montgomery, 83 Miss. 185, 36 So. 67. In this case an action had been brought against two sureties, and the judgment was in favor of one, upon the ground that he was entitled to release under a statute providing for release upon failure of the creditor to sue after notice, and against the other surety, and it was held, no appeal having been taken from the judgment in the original action, that the surety who was compelled to pay could not maintain an action against his cosurety for contribution, the ground being that, since the surety against whom judgment was obtained in the original action could have appealed and contested the judgment in favor of his cosurety, but failed to do so, such judgment constituted a bar to the action for contribution.

And in Ledoux v. Durrive, 10 La. Ann. 7, where two cosureties had been sued jointly, and, judgment being against the plaintiff as to both, he appealed as to one of the sureties, and judgment was reversed, and the appellee surety paid the judgment and sought contribution from his cosurety, it was held that the judgment in the original action, having become final because of no appeal having been taken as to the one surety, was res judicata as to him, the court saying that, although such judgment perhaps did not amount to a technical bar of the second action, to have which effect it should have been rendered in a suit between the same parties and for the same cause of action, it did decide that there parties to that record are bound and estopped by said decree.

A judgment rendered on the demurrer is conclusive as to facts confessed by the demurrer.

was nothing due from the defendant thereupon the obligation, and therefore it took away the foundation from the action for contribution.

And in Cross v. Scarboro, 6 Baxt. 134, which is discussed with disapproval in CENTRAL BKG. & SECUR. CO. v. UNITED STATES FIDELITY & G. CO., it was held that contribution could not be had by one set of sureties who had been compelled to pay a claim, from another set of sureties who had been joined as defendants in the original action, but as to whom the judgment had been favorable. The facts in this case resemble those of the CENTRAL BKG. & SECUR. CO. CASE, as the bond executed by the second set of sureties was obtained to succeed the first bond, but as the court had failed upon the taking of the second bond to exonerate the sureties on the first bond, the action by the obligee was brought against both sets of sureties, judgment being obtained against the first set only. It is true, however, as is stated in the above referred to criticism, that the court did not discuss the applicability of the doctrine of res judicata, but there seems to be no doubt but that the decision was upon that ground, and that the court regarded it as sufficient that both sets of sureties were parties to the original action.

So, in Hood v. Morgan, 47 W. Va. 817, 37 S. E. 911, which seems to be overruled in effect by the majority opinion in CENTRAL BKG. & SECUR. CO. v. UNITED STATES FIDELITY & G. CO., but which was expressly approved in the dissenting opinion of Williams, J., sureties against whom judgment had been obtained by the obligee sued another surety who was exonerated from liability in the original action, for contribution, it being held that the original judgment was conclusive as between the rights of the exonerated surety and the obligee, and therefore that such surety was not liable in an action for contribution. As is stated in the majority opinion above referred to, however, the court did remark that plaintiff's right to contribution, if any he had, was based upon the exonerated surety's liability to the obligee, and the plaintiff surety's subrogation to the rights of the obligee; but it seems clear that the court

Res judicata applies not only to what was necessarily decided, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject-matter, and which with diligence might have been brought forward.

also had in mind the principles of res judicata, as the court subsequently also said that "the judgment is res judicata."

And in Waggoner v. Walrath, 24 Hun, 443, affirmed without opinion in 92 N. Y. 639, where two cosureties were sued jointly, but judgment was entered against one only, it was held that the other was thereby released from all liability, and could not be called upon for contribution by his cosurety, who paid the full judgment. It was said, however, that the judgment could not have been enforced against the judgment defendant for more than one half of the amount, and that it was his own fault if he paid more than he was legally liable for.

And in Love v. Gibson, 2 Fla. 598, the doctrine of res judicata was carried so far as to be held applicable to an action for contribution between cosureties to a judgment obtained by an obligee against one of such sureties, even though the surety sued for contribution was not a party to the original action, he, however, having had notice of the suit in time sufficient to have put in pleas to the action. In this case the alleged defense of the cosurety was that neither surety was liable to the obligee, rather than that the cosureties stood in different relations to the obligee. This fact affords a possible ground for distinguishing the case from CENTRAL BKG. & SECUR. CO. v. UNITED STATES FIDELITY & G. CO.; but nevertheless the cases seem to be in conflict as regards the principles applied.

In Preslar v. Stallworth, 37 Ala. 402, which is cited in the dissenting opinion of Williams, J., in the CENTRAL BKG. & SECUR. CO. CASE, as pertinent to the question under discussion in the present note, the original action was brought by the obligee against both cosureties, but was discontinued as against the defendant in the action for contribution, he not having been served with process. From this it follows that the rights of the defendant in the contribution action were not adjudicated in the action between the obligee and the other sureties, and furthermore the case does not profess to decide as to whether the judgment in the original action was res judicata upon the question of contribution between the sureties

Poffenbarger, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

After the Central Banking & Security Company, surety in one of the bonds of Amnon Taylor, administrator of Tasriel Taylor, had paid the decrees pronounced against it, as corrected and affirmed by this court, in Taylor v. Taylor, 66 W. Va. 238, 66 S. E. 690, 19 Ann. Cas. 414, it brought this suit, primarily for indemnity and secondarily for contribution, against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, of Baltimore, Maryland, and the Citizens' Trust & Guaranty Company, of Parkersburg, West Virginia, sureties in the two subsequent bonds given by Taylor as administrator of the same estate. The prayer of the bill is in the alternative. The plaintiff claims the subsequent bonds operate in law as full and complete indemnity, requiring the sureties therein, or one of them, to reimburse it to the extent of the whole amount it was compelled to pay as Taylor's surety. It had become the surety in a $6,000 bond given in February, 1903. In July, 1904, the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company gave, before the clerk of the county court of Calhoun county, another bond in the same penalty, and in July, 1905, the Citizens' Trust & Guaranty Company became surety in a third bond in the same penalty and given in the same way. Each of these subsequent bonds contains a recital of desire on the part of the principal therein to release the surety in the preceding one from further liability, and of tender thereof in lieu of the preceding one. The claim for complete indemnity and full reimbursement is predicated upon this recital. In the case of Taylor v. Taylor, the distributees of the Taylor estate sued the principal and sureties in all three of the bonds, and the trial court sustained the demurrers of the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company and the Citizens' Trust & Guaranty Company, and dismissed the bill as to them. It held the Central Banking & Security Company liable as surety in the first bond, and it appealed from the decrees. The sureties in the other two did not appeal, and the dismissal as to them remains unreversed. As the bill in this cause exhibits the printed record of the former one, showing all the proceedings had therein, as well as the mandate and opinion of this court in it, the defendants herein, in their separate demurrers thereto, relied principally upon said dismissal of the former bill as an adjudication in their favor, not only against the plaintiff in the former suit, but as against the alleged cosurety, the plaintiff here. The demurrer of the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company to this bill was unqualifiedly overruled, and that of the other defendant partially sustained, but the bill was not dismissed as to it; the court deeming it a proper party, but not subject to direct liability. Thereafter the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company filed its answer, and answer in the nature of a cross bill, praying affirmative relief against the Central Banking & Security Company, the Citizens' Trust & Guaranty Company, and the administrator and heirs of Taylor, the purpose of which was, in the main, to demand indemnity from the Citizens' Trust & Guaranty Company, its successor in the bond as surety, or rather the surety in the last of the three bonds. The Citizens' Trust & Guaranty Company filed its answer to the original bill and also to the cross bill, and upon these pleadings and general replications of the plaintiff to the answers and a stipulation as to the facts, the court held the parties to be cosureties, and required each of the two defendants to pay to the plaintiff one third of the amount it had been compelled to pay at the suit of the distributees of the Taylor estate. From this decree, the Central Banking & Security Company has appealed, complaining of the disallowance of full indemnity against the other companies, and also of the denial of contribution as to the costs and expense incident to its defense in the cause of Taylor v. Taylor. Denying liability for contribution or indemnity, the two defendants cross assign error in the enforcement thereof, and resist the further claims of the appellant.

In the cross assignments of error, the validity of the two subsequent bonds is denied on account of lack of authority in the clerk of the county court of Calhoun county to take them. As is shown by the report of the decision in Taylor v. Taylor, these two bonds were taken by the clerk in the vacation of the court, and he had no authority, under the statute, to take them as substitute bonds, each releasing the preceding one. The contention in that cause was that they were such bonds, and that there was no liability except upon the last one, the one in which the Citizens' Trust & Guaranty Company was the surety. In the rejection of this claim and contention, the question of the validity of the two subsequent bonds as additional ones was left open and undecided. As the statute nowhere confers upon the clerk authority to take a new bond from a personal representative or other fiduciary, and makes it his duty to report to the court the necessity thereof, it may well be conceded he had no authority to take either of the two substitute bonds, but their absolute invalidity and worthlessness does not necessarily follow. Every bond taken without authority in the officer who took it is not void. Such bonds are often held good as common-law obligations. Numerous authorities holding them void are cited in support of the cross assignments of error, but the bonds in those cases were, for the most part, held void because the taking thereof contravened a principle of public policy. Most of them were recognizances under which officers had discharged prisoners. One of them, involved in Benedict v. Bray, 2 Cal. 251, 56 Am. Dec. 332, was a void attachment bond, but the opinion is unsatisfactory. It assumes, contrary to almost uniform authority, that all bonds taken by officers not authorized to take them are void. The law on this subject was summarized by Judge Green in Porter v. Daniels, 11 W. Va. 250, in the following terms: "The mere fact that a bond not authorized by law has been taken by an officer does not render such bond invalid at common law. Such bonds have been frequently held void at common law, but wherever so held, it has been not simply because taken by an officer without authority, but for other and sufficient reasons appearing in each particular case,—such as that they were not voluntarily executed; that they were given to the officer to induce him to violate his duty as such officer; or to induce him to perform a duty he was bound to perform without the giving of such bonds; that the taking of the bond was oppressive, and it was given without consideration; that the obligee in the bond had no interest in the subject-matter; that the taking of the bond was a violation of public policy, or was executed under circumstances, or contained provisions, which would have rendered a private bond void at law." These bonds were voluntarily given for consideration paid to the sureties, and neither the acceptance nor the giving of the same contravenes any principle of public policy. Hence they are clearly good as common-law obligations.

That they were not substitute, release, or indemnity bonds as matter of law or by force of the statute was decided in the case of Taylor v. Taylor. It is said, however, the parties expressly made them such by stipulation. The only matter relied upon as evidence of such an undertaking is the recital in each of the subsequent bonds as to the motive or purpose of the giving of the same. It says the new bond was tendered in lieu of the old one in compliance with a desire of the principal therein to release the surety in the preceding one from further liability, not from all liability. It proves a tender of the subsequent bond in lieu of the preceding one for the purpose of releasing the former surety from further liability, but it is not a covenant of indemnity for breaches of the condition of the former bond. The assumption of this grave responsibility must be imposed by implication, if at all, and the implication does not necessarily arise from the terms used. Generally a provision, fact, or purpose is not read into an instrument as having been implied, unless necessity therefor is found in the terms used, or purpose expressed therein. White v. Bailey, 65 W. Va. 573, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 232, 64 S. E. 1019; Morgan v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 96 U. S. 716, 24 L. ed. 743; Waterford & W. Turnp. Co. v. People, 9 Barb. 161; Jackson ex rel. Boyd v. Lewis, 17 Johns. 475; United States v. Fisher, 2 Cranch, 358, 2 L. ed. 304; Chitty, Contr. p. 113; Hammon, Contr. pp. 811, 813, § 412; Devlin, Deeds, § 836. The implication is said to arise here out of the fact that the bond given is such a one as would have been required by the court under the provisions of § 10 of chapter 87 of the Code, and must therefore be considered as having been given with intent that it should operate as a statutory bond would; but the circumstances contemplated by said section were not disclosed at the time these bonds were given. The court had not ordered a new bond, nor does it appear that necessity for one had been shown by the report of the clerk or a commissioner, or evidence produced by a surety or other person interested. It cannot be assumed that, under such circumstances, either of the two defendants would have executed a subsequent bond. If the Central Banking & Security Company had moved the court to be released as surety, the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company would have at once suspected some default on the part of the principal, or some other good and sufficient cause for refusal of the surety to remain on his bond, and would almost certainly have refused to take its place. The same observations may be made as to the Citizens' Trust & Guaranty Company. In either case, there would have been a previous ascertainment of the condition of the decedent's estate in the hands of the administrator, and of his ability to make good any devastavit committed by him or other default in the conduct in this trust. No such investigation was made because no steps had been taken that were suggestive of any default or irregularity in 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the administration. Had there been a previous order of the court requiring a new bond, it would have suggested irregularity and failure of duty on the part of the principal, which would, no doubt, have prevented the giving of a new bond and left the surety in the first one liable for the entire default. In view of these facts, the authorities do not sustain an implied undertaking on the part of the sureties in the subsequent bonds. To confer a right or impose an obligation by implication, the intention arising out of the terms used or the purpose of the instrument and circumstances under which it was given, must be so strongly apparent that the contrary thereof cannot be reasonably supposed. The implication must be a necessary one, as is shown by authorities already cited.

Being valid obligations and yet not substitute bonds, and having been given for the same principal as the one for whom the first bond was given, and to guarantee faithful execution of the same trust, the two subsequent bonds are mere cumulative or additional bonds, and the sureties therein are cosureties with the surety in the first one. Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 707. "Successive bonds given by guardian are cumulative securities for the faithful performance of the duties of the office, and the liabilities of the sureties are in proportion to the penalties of the several bonds in which the respective sureties bound themselves." Jones v. Hays, 38 N. C. (3 Ired. Eq.) 502, 44 Am. Dec. 78. "In all these cases the sureties have . . . a common burden; they are joined by the common end and purpose of their several obligations, as much as if they were joined in one instrument, with this difference only, that the penalties will ascertain the proportion in which they are to contribute, whereas if they had joined in one bond, it must have depended on other circumstances." Dering v. Winchelsea, 1 Cox, C. C. 318, 21 Eng. Rul. Cas. 617.

That the dismissal of the bill in the cause of Taylor v. Taylor as to the sureties in the two subsequent bonds is not an adjudication against the right of contribution, nor as between the sureties, is obviously apparent from principles enunciated in Pomeroy Nat. Bank v. Huntington Nat. Bank, — W. Va. —, 79 S. E. 662, not yet officially reported, Hudson v. Iguano Land & Min. Co. 71 W. Va. 402, 76 S. E. 707, and Biern v. Ray, 49 W. Va. 129, 38 S. E. 530. That all three of the sureties were parties to that suit, relating to the bonds in which they were sureties, is not conclusive. Even though parties to a subsequent suit are the same as those to the prior one, a former decision is not conclusive in the second one, and does not bar it, unless the cause of action in the two suits is the same. If the second one is founded upon a different cause of action from that involved in the first, the former adjudication is conclusive only as to matters actually litigated and decided in the first suit. In Hudson v. Iguano Land & Min. Co. cited, these propositions were stated as follows: "When the cause of action in the second suit is the same as that in the first and the parties are identical, they are concluded, not only as to what was actually decided, but also as to all matters which the plaintiff could have adduced to sustain his claim, and which the defendant could have pleaded or proven in defense of the action. In such cases there is no inquiry as to what was actually decided, as contradistinguished from things which could have been decided or may have been. But the principle applies in cases in which the parties to the second suit are the same as those of the first and the cause of action is not the same, so as to prevent a trial in the second suit of a question settled and determined in the first; but the rules in such cases are different. In them it becomes necessary to ascertain whether the particular question sought to be raised in the second suit was actually decided and determined in the first. This necessitates resort to the particular issues made and findings thereon."

In Taylor v. Taylor there was no decision of any question between the sureties. There was one between the plaintiffs in that suit, the distributees of the Taylor estate, on the one hand, and the principal and sureties on the other. The cause of action therein comprehended two things: The right to a proper accounting and distribution of funds by the principal in the bond, guaranteed by the sureties; and failure of the principal to accord such right. The suit was brought for redress of wrongs done the plaintiffs. No pleadings in the cause put in issue any right of contribution or any other matter between the sureties. There was an adjudication of nonliability to the distributees of the estate as to two of the sureties, but this was obviously not an adjudication of nonliability to their cosurety. It could not have been, for no issue of that sort was raised by the pleadings. The cause of action asserted here is a right of contribution among the cosureties, and injury by refusal of the defendants to contribute to the common burden the plaintiff had to discharge under the decree against it in the former suit. Notwithstanding the two rights grow out of the same transaction among the parties, they are not the same nor even similar. The nonidentity of causes of action here asserted is well illustrated in Coville v. Gilman, 13 W. Va. 314. Under an agreement between himself and A, B sunk an oil well. A claimed B was to pay himself a reasonable price for drilling the well out of its production, and thereafter the well was to belong to A. B claimed he was to sink the well and pay himself for the same out of the first oil obtained, and thereafter he and A were to be equal partners in the production thereof. On this theory of the contract, A sued B in assumpsit and recovered a judgment, on the verdict of a jury, for oil produced from the well and sold by B. Afterwards A brought another suit in assumpsit for oil subsequently produced and sold. Then B filed his bill setting up a copartnership relation between them, and asking for a dissolution thereof and settlement of the partnership account and an injunction to prevent the collection of the judgment previously obtained. A endeavored to rely upon that judgment as an adjudication against the existence of the copartnership. To that contention this court replied as follows: "This verdict and judgment did not establish that there was no partnership in the oil pumped after the institution of the first suit, even though it were proven ever so clearly that there was and is no claim that any partnership in any of the oil existed, except such as might have been formed by the original contract, and that, in the trial of the common-law suit, B defended himself by claiming that this original contract created a partnership in all the oil pumped from the well, and obtained from the court an instruction that if the jury believe such partnership existed, they must find for the defendant, and that, as the question of partnership or no partnership was not directly involved in the pleadings, it cannot, so far as oil not sued for in that suit is concerned, be regarded as conclusively determined by the verdict of the jury and judgment of the court, though it be shown by evidence it was the controverted fact on which the verdict of the jury must have been based. Nor is this verdict even evidence of the nonexistence of the partnership."

The limited application of the first proposition, namely, that everything the parties to the first action could have litigated between themselves is deemed to have been determined, in other words, is merged in the judgment, is sometimes overlooked by the courts, and the principle regarded as if it were general in its application. It is for this reason more than any other that courts sometimes fall into an error in applying the principles of res judicata, and the doctrine is so often invoked under circumstances not justifying its application. The rule or principle by which to test the conclusiveness of former litigation between parties seems to have been first deduced and clearly stated by Mr. Justice Fields in Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 351, 24 L. ed. 195, decided in 1876. Since that time the rules and principles governing the doctrine have been much better understood than they were before, and there have been fewer misapplications of it. Prior to that time many courts perceived the difference between a former judgment between the same parties upon the same cause of action as that involved in the subsequent suit, and a judgment between the same parties upon a cause of action different from that involved in the subsequent suit, and correctly applied the principles without defining the standard or test of applicability.

An attempt is made here to show identity of the present cause of action with that involved in Taylor v. Taylor. It is said the principal in the bond is the representative of the sureties, and the latter are bound by his action in all respects, so long as he acts in good faith, wherefore a judgment either for or against him is binding upon all the sureties, not only as regards the right of the creditor or obligee in the bond, but also as regards the relation of co-suretyship. This argument is supplemented by the further proposition that the right of contribution among sureties stands only upon the principle of subrogation. Ordinarily a judgment against a principal is not evidence against the surety, unless the surety was a party to the action, or was made privy thereto by notice. In the latter case, it may be evidence, but it is clearly not conclusive. There are some exceptional instances in which a judgment against the principal alone is conclusive upon the surety, as when the undertaking of the surety is that he will be liable for the result of the suit against the principal. State use of Beard v. Abbott, 63 W. Va. 189, 61 S. E. 369; Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 802. "A judgment against the principal alone is, as a general rule, evidence against the surety of the fact of its recovery alone, and not of any fact which it was necessary to find in order to recover such judgment." Id. § 803. This is given by the author as the general rule, sustained by the weight of authority. Under it the judgment against the principal is no evidence of liability on the part of the surety. By another line of cases, the judgment against the principal is prima facie evidence against the surety, but not conclusive. Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 803. These conclusions deduced from the authorities show the principal is not the representative of the surety in any comprehensive sense of the term. If he were, the judgment against him would be conclusive upon the surety in all cases.

Nor is the right of contribution derived from the equitable principle of subrogation. Contribution and subrogation are separate and distinct things, the latter being in equity a broader right and including the former, just as many other legal rights are obtainable through subrogation. Subrogation gives the surety, as against the principal and cosurety, all the rights and remedies of the creditor, and some of these may be legal. Subrogation is not strictly a remedy. It is an equitable principle through which the benefit of remedies is obtained. As subrogation is not recognized at all by the law courts, the recognition and enforcement of contribution in actions at law prove contribution is not dependent upon the right of subrogation. It must be distinct from subrogation, else courts of law could not enforce it. That a surety has a right of action at law against a cosurety for contribution is well settled. Story, Eq. Jur. § 495; Kemp v. Finden, 12 Mees. & W. 421, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 137, 8 Jur. 65; Mitchell v. Sproul, 5 J. J. Marsh. 264; Bachelder v. Fiske, 17 Mass. 464. The meaning of the declaration, often made, that contribution does not spring from contract, is sometimes misapprehended. It only means that there need not be an express contract for it. This is made clear by the opinion of Lord Chief Baron (Eyre) in Dering v. Winchelsea, 1 Cox, C. C. 318, 21 Eng. Rul. Cas. 617. As the sureties in that case obligated themselves by separate instruments, it was argued there could not possibly be any contract of co-suretyship between them. The court held: "If we take a view of the cases both in law and equity, we shall find that contribution is bottomed and fixed on general principles of justice, and does not spring from contract." The opinion then goes on to show many instances in which the courts of common law had always enforced contribution, not because, however, there was a contract in express terms to indemnify, but because natural justice and equity imposed the duty. In the opinion the lord chief baron said: "Now the doctrine of equality operates more effectually in this court than in a court of law." This is a plain recognition of the jurisdiction of the law courts to enforce contribution, and obviously they could have none if the right were purely equitable. The plain purpose of the argument was to dispense with the necessity of proof of an express contract for contribution or indemnity, and not to deny contribution as a legal right. Of course, the relation of suretyship gives rise to equities, not cognizable by the law courts, in which contribution is included, or equities growing out of the legal right of contribution. There are grounds for interposition of equitable remedies for the protection of a surety before his right to sue at law has accrued, and to obtain greater relief than the law courts can give.

That the demand of a cosurety for contribution is a new and distinct cause of action from that founded on the contract between the creditor and the promisors or obligors in the instrument has been decided and clearly demonstrated by the application of legal principles in Camp v. Bostwick, 20 Ohio St. 337, 5 Am. Rep. 669. The court held: "The right to contribution among cosureties is not founded on the contract of suretyship, but is based on an equity arising from the relation of cosureties. . . . The right of action for contribution among cosureties accrues when one has paid more than his proportion of their liability." In working out this conclusion, Judge McIlvaine said: "But this action was not founded on the note. The note was fully paid and satisfied by the payment of Giddings's judgment by Bostwick, on the 19th of November, 1886. By that payment, however, a new cause of action accrued to Bostwick against the representatives of his deceased cosurety, founded upon a 'general equity' which equalizes burdens and benefits among cosureties. This new cause of action never did accrue to Giddings, and it first accrued to Bostwick only forty days before suit was commenced. . . . If the right of a cosurety to claim contribution rested upon the doctrine of subrogation to the rights of the creditor, the proposition might be true. The doctrine of subrogation has its origin in the relation of principal and surety, whereby a surety who pays the debt of his principal is, in equity, substituted in the place of the creditor, and is entitled to all the rights which the creditor may have against his principal. But the doctrine of contribution has its origin in the relation of cosureties or other joint promisors in the same degree of obligation. It is not founded upon the contract of suretyship. . . . It is an equity which springs up at the time the relation of cosureties is entered into, and ripens into a cause of action when one surety pays more than his proportion of the debt. . . . From this relation the common law implies a promise to contribute in case of unequal payments by cosureties. But equity resorts to no such fiction. It equalizes burdens, and recognizes and enforces the reasonable expectations of cosureties, because it is just and right in good morals, and not because of any supposed promise between them. This equity, having once arisen between cosureties, this reasonable expectation that each will bear his share of the burden, is, as it were, a vested right in each, and remains for his protection until he is released from all his liability in excess of his ratable share of the burden. Neither the creditor, the principal, the statute of limitations, nor the death of a party, can take it away." In accordance with this view, the court further held: "The neglect of a creditor, whereby the estate of one surety is released, under the statutes of limitation, from its direct liability, does not discharge a cosurety from his liability for the whole or any part of the debt." Similarly, in McCrory v. Parks, 18 Ohio St. 1, it was held that the judgment in an action by the obligee against the principal and sureties in a sheriff's bond was not res judicata of the right of contribution among the sureties. The principle was again judicially applied in Koelsch v. Mixer, 52 Ohio St. 207, 39 N. E. 417. In that case Judge Minshall said: "It is not enough that an issue may have been joined between the obligee and the defendant as to the liability of the latter on the bond. Whatever that issue may have been, it was not an issue between himself and his codefendant, the plaintiff in this action, and could not therefore conclude the latter. Though parties to the suit, they were not such in an adversary character, being simply codefendants to the suit on the bond. The plaintiff in this suit could not, in the former suit, as a matter of right, have insisted on the admission or rejection of evidence on the trial of the issue, had no right to move for a new trial, nor prosecute error if aggrieved by the rulings of the court; and hence he cannot be held bound by the judgment in any subsequent litigation to which he may be a party." He then states the limitation upon the doctrine of res judicata as follows: "It is the general rule that parties to a judgment are not bound by it in a subsequent controversy between each other, unless they are adversary parties in the original action,"—and cites abundant authority to sustain the proposition. This is only another way of saying the former judgment, to be conclusive, in the absence of a showing of an express decision of the question in the later one, must have been upon the same cause of action, and fully harmonizes with the principles of res judicata as herein stated.

To make the former judgment in such cases conclusive puts the surety at a fearful disadvantage. As shown by Judge Minshall, he has no control of the action on the bond, and is at the mercy of the creditor, whose sole object is to get his money in the shortest time, with least expense, and at the slightest risk. Standing within his legal rights, he permits all the sureties but one to get away, and then his action, according to the contention here, is forever binding on the remaining surety, cutting off resort to his cosureties for contribution.

Our conclusion harmonizes with other principles. Until he has paid, the surety has no cause of action. How then can he be said to have asserted it in the action on the bond? He had not then paid and had none to assert. If he can be said to have had an equity, a court of law in which he may have been sued would not recognize that; and in a court of equity it is an incomplete cause of action, and a man is not bound to sue until his cause of action is complete. Broadbush v. Siers, 68 W. Va. 125, 69 S. E. 468, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 920.

Only two decisions declaring the contrary of the conclusions here stated have been found. Cross v. Scarboro, 6 Baxt. 134, and Hood v. Morgan, 47 W. Va. 817, 35 S. E. 911. In neither of them was there any effort in the opinion to apply the principles of res judicata. In other words, the principles were not stated, nor was there any effort to demonstrate their application. The conclusions are certainly not sustained by the application of those principles. Hood v. Morgan erroneously assumes that the right of contribution arises by subrogation only, and it is upon that proposition it declares the former judgment in favor of the sureties against the creditor conclusive. The decision in that case may not be wrong. Possibly it can be sustained upon the doctrine of estoppel. As to whether it can or not, it would be useless to enter upon any inquiry now. It suffices to say it makes an erroneous application of the doctrine of res judicata, and no element of estoppel appears in this cause.

As the costs paid and expenses incurred in the litigation in the cause of Taylor v. Taylor by the plaintiff in this bill were the result of its effort, not to refute liability in general to the distributees of the estate of Taylor, but to be relieved from liability on the bond, as a result of the execution of the subsequent ones, the court did not err in refusing to enforce contribution against the defendants as to costs and expenses. In the main the defense was purely personal.

Seeing no error in the decree appealed from, we will affirm it.

Williams, J., dissenting:

I think the decree in Taylor v. Taylor, sustaining the demurrers of the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company and the Citizens' Trust & Guaranty Company, and dismissing the bill as to them, is an adjudication against the Central Banking & Trust Company of any right to contribution. The principal and all the sureties were there sued, and a decree rendered holding the principal and one surety only liable, and releasing the other two. What is the effect of that final and unreversed decree? In the absence of fraud or collusion between the obligee and the discharged sureties, is it not conclusive upon the cosureties as well as upon the creditor? If not, why so? There is a privity of relation and obligation between principal and surety; and it is out of regard to that relation that a judgment against a principal bound for a collateral undertaking is conclusive of the amount for which his surety is liable. Crim v. England, 46 W. Va. 480, 76 Am. St. Rep. 826, 33 S. E. 310; State v. Nutter, 44 W. Va. 385, 30 S. E. 67; Turner v. Stewart, 51 W. Va. 493, 41 S. E. 924. No one, I imagine, will question that a judgment recovered against a principal and all the sureties, in a subsequent suit for contribution by the surety who paid it, would be conclusive of liability to the creditor. They would be estopped to deny liability. Why? Because the right of contribution rests on liability to the obligee, and that liability was an issue adjudicated by the judgment. Why, then, is not a judgment of discharge as to some of the sureties equally conclusive? It will not do to say that a judgment against them has one effect, and a judgment for some of them and against others, on the same issue, has another effect. The judgment must have the same force in either case. The right of contribution is not a primary right; it depends on a common liability to a third person. The sureties must occupy toward the creditor exactly the same attitude. The right to have contribution springs out of a common burden resting on two or more persons occupying the same position in relation to the creditor. 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 483. Therefore, if a surety is not liable to the creditor, he is under no obligation to help bear the burden; he is not then liable to his cosurety. A surety who pays a debt for which another surety is not liable cannot have contribution. 1 Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 267. "He takes the place of the original creditor, and may be resisted on the same principles, and in the same way." Lowndes v. Pinckney, 1 Rich. Eq. 155. A surety paying a debt can occupy no better position than the creditor did.

2 Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 316. In a suit for contribution, by a surety who paid the judgment, there is involved the same identical issue that was litigated in the suit by the creditor against the sureties, and that issue, having been determined by a final judgment, is res judicata. It matters not that the issue was not joined between cosureties. It was joined between the creditor on the one side and the principal debtor and sureties on the other, and, in the absence of fraud, it is conclusive on all parties. It is on the ground that a judgment in such case has a conclusive effect that equity subrogates the surety who pays it to all the rights of the creditor, not only as against the principal debtor, but against the other sureties as well. Hawker v. Moore, 40 W. Va. 49, 20 S. E. 848; Woods v. Douglas, 46 W. Va. 657, 33 S. E. 771; Hess's Estate, 69 Pa. 272; 2 Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 309. What are the rights, then, of a creditor who has obtained a judgment against principal and sureties? Why, he has a final judgment conclusive upon all of them, which the law makes a lien upon their lands. Now, is it not clear that if, in a suit for contribution, a cosurety could controvert the judgment, the surety who paid it would not be enjoying the rights of the creditor? Says Chief Justice Marshall in Lidderdale v. Robinson, 2 Brock. 159, Fed. Cas. No. 8,337, after reviewing some early Virginia decisions: "The principle which the cases decide is this: Where a person has paid money for which others were responsible, the equitable claim which such payment gives him on those who were so responsible shall be clothed with the legal garb with which the contract he has discharged was invested, and he shall be substituted to every equitable intent and purpose, in the place of the creditor whose claim he has discharged. This principle of substitution is completely established in the books, and, being established, it must apply to all persons who are parties to the security, so far as is equitable. The cases suppose the surety to stand in the place of the creditor, as completely as if the instrument had been transferred to him, or to a trustee for his use. Under this supposition, he would be at full liberty to proceed against every person bound by the instrument." Two cosureties were sued jointly, and judgment was rendered in favor of them both. The creditor appealed to the Supreme Court from the judgment in favor of one of them, and such judgment was, as to such surety, reversed, and judgment in the Supreme Court was rendered against such surety for a large amount, which he paid. Held, he could not recover contribution from the other surety. The judgment, which as to him remained in force in the court below, established the fact that he was not liable to the creditor, and consequently not liable for contribution. 1 Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 267. The author cites Ledoux v. Durrie, 10 La. Ann. 7, which is not in the library. But I have no doubt he correctly states the principle decided.

Mr. Black, a very eminent law writer, in his work on Judgments, § 591, says: "Where, in a suit against one of two sureties, judgment is fairly obtained against him, and no collusion existed between him and the party recovering the judgment, or the principal obligor of the bond, if notice of the pendency of such suit has been given his cosurety, the latter stands virtually in privity with him against whom the judgment has been obtained. The cosurety in such case is bound to avail himself of any defense which he may have, and he will not be permitted afterwards, in a suit for contribution brought against him by his cosurety who has paid and satisfied the judgment, to set up any defense which he ought to have pleaded in the original suit upon the bond, by becoming a party for that purpose. It was his duty to join in the defense to the action. Having failed to do so, though he had full notice of the pendency of the action, he waives all defenses he might have had, and in the suit for contribution the matter is res judicata." The author here states a proposition even stronger than the one I am contending for, but he is supported by Love v. Gibson, 2 Fla. 598, and other authorities. I would give the judgment conclusive effect only in case the sureties were parties to the suit. The exact principle for which I contend arose, and was decided, in Hood v. Morgan, 47 W. Va. 817, 35 S. E. 911. But the majority opinion, in effect, overrules that case. The question was also decided by the supreme court of Tennessee in Cross v. Scarboro, 6 Baxt. 134. That case is almost identical with the one at bar. There some of the sureties, as in this case, had executed several obligations. In a suit by the creditor against all of them some were discharged and others held liable. Those that were held liable paid the debt and sued the others for contribution, and the court held that the former judgment of discharge was an adjudication of their nonliability, and was binding on the cosureties. The following cases are also pertinent: Preslar v. Stallworth, 37 Ala. 402; Hess's Estate, 69 Pa. 272; Fletcher v. Jackson, 23 Vt. 581, 56 Am. Dec. 98. In fact, after a very careful examination of the subject, I do not find that any court, except the supreme court of Ohio, holds to the principle deided by the majority opinion. The cases of Pomeroy Nat. Bank v. Huntington Nat. Bank, Hudson v. Iguano Land & Min. Co. and Biern v. Ray, decided by this court and cited in the majority opinion, in my opinion, are not applicable.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

PERCY HAMILTON, Appt.,

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

(41 App. D. C. 359.)

Seduction — conditional promise of marriage — misdemeanor.

Securing sexual intercourse with a sixteen-year-old girl by promising, at her solicitation, to marry her if anything happened, is not within a statute making it a misdemeanor to seduce and carnally know any female of previous chaste character between the ages sixteen and twenty-one.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Supreme Court convicting him of seduction. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry E. Davis for appellant.

Messrs. Clarence R. Wilson and S. McComas Hawken, for the United States:

The act disclosed by the evidence constituted seduction, for there were repeated solicitations and persuasion, resistance by the woman, and finally yielding upon renewed solicitations and promises of protection and marriage.

Note. — Seduction: promise of marriage conditioned on pregnancy.

I. Criminal actions.

a. Under statutes making promise of marriage essential element of crime.

1. Conditional promise in general, 809.

2. Conditional promise together with prior absolute promise, 810.

b. Under statutes not making promise of marriage essential element of crime.

1. Conditional promise in general, 810.

2. Conditional promise together with prior absolute promise, 811.

II. Civil actions, 812.

I. Criminal actions.

a. Under statutes making promise of marriage essential element of crime.

1. Conditional promise in general.

Under statutes making a promise of marriage an essential element of seduction, the rule is almost universal that a promise of marriage conditioned upon pregnancy resulting from the intercourse will not amount to seduction. People v. Jensen, 15 Cal. App. 220, 114 Pac. 585 (obiter); Cherry v. State, 112 Ga. 871, 38 S. E. 341 (obiter); Woodall v. State, 7 Ga. App. 245, 66 S. E. 619; State v. Thomas, 231 Mo. 41, 132 S. W. 225; Russell v. State, 77 Neb. 519, 110 N. W. 380, 15 Ann. Cas. 222; People v. Van Alstyne, 144 N. Y. 361, 39 N. E. 343, reversing 78 Hun, 509, 29 N. Y. Supp. 542; People v. Duryea, 81 Hun, 390, 30 N. Y. Supp. 877; State v. Adams, 25 Or. 172, 22 L.R.A. 840, 42 Am. St. Rep. 790, 35 Pac. 36; Simmons v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 619, 114 S. W. 841; Muhlhouse v. State, 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 288, 119 S. W. 866; Thacker v. State, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

62 Tex. Crim. Rep. 294, 136 S. W. 1095; Gillespie v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 166 S. W. 135.

In People v. Van Alstyne, supra, it is said: "It was never intended to protect a woman who was willing to speculate upon the results of her intercourse with a man, and who only exacted, as the price of her consent, a promise on his part to marry her in case the intercourse resulted in her pregnancy."

And in State v. Adams, 25 Or. 172, 22 L.R.A. 840, 42 Am. St. Rep. 790, 35 Pac. 36, the court assigns its reasons for the decision in the following language: "The gist of the offense is that the seduction shall be accomplished under or by means of a promise of marriage which is unfulfilled. Without the promise there can be no crime under this statute, however reprehensible the conduct of the man may be. A promise of marriage, and her reliance upon it, must be the means of inducing the woman to surrender her virtue. She must be drawn aside from the path of virtue she is then pursuing, and induced to yield to the solicitations of her seducer, by means of and under the influence of a promise of marriage, upon the performance of which she in good faith had a right to rely. Nothing less will satisfy this statute. Its object is not to punish illicit intercourse, but to punish the seducer who, by means of a promise of marriage, destroys the chastity of an unmarried female of previous chaste character, and who thus draws her aside from the path of virtue and rectitude, and then fails and refuses to fulfil his promise. It is, however, not necessary that the promise should be technically valid to sustain a civil action for breach of promise; and, although it may be conditioned upon immediate intercourse, thus rendering it void in a civil proceeding, because founded upon an immoral consideration, it is still held sufficient to sustain a criminal prosecution if the woman in good faith relied upon it and was thereby deceived. . . . In such case, the mutual promise of the woman is implied from her yielding to the solicitations of her seducer under his promise of marriage, and the promise becomes absolute. But when the seduction is accomplished by means of a promise of marriage, to be performed only upon the condition that the intercourse results in pregnancy, no promise of the woman can be implied from such yielding, and it seems to us the contract smacks too much of a corrupt and licentious bargain to fall within the statute. How can it be claimed that a pure-minded woman is led astray and her ruin accomplished under a promise of marriage which, with her assent, amounts to nothing more than a mutual agreement to engage in illicit relations so long as pregnancy does not result, and which neither party expects nor intends shall be fulfilled except upon the happening of an event which may never occur?"

W. 100.

Van Orsdel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant, Percy Hamilton, defendant be-

In Spenrath v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 48 S. W. 192, in which it is held that the evidence is not sufficient to support a verdict for seduction, on account of the fact that the woman did not consent to the intercourse solely because of a promise of marriage to be executed immediately if pregnancy followed, and, if not, at a later time, the court, in stating its conclusion, says: "And this view is strengthened by her original testimony before the examining court, in which she stated, unequivocally, that she agreed to have carnal intercourse with appellant on his promise to marry her if anything happened to her." The court, by ignoring the possibility of basing a conviction upon such a conditional promise, inferentially holds against the sufficiency of such a promise to satisfy the requirements of the statute.

On the other hand, a few cases hold that a promise of marriage conditioned upon pregnancy will be sufficient to satisfy the statute defining seduction.

People v. Hustis, 32 Hun, 58, holding to that effect, has, however, been overruled in effect by subsequent New York cases cited above.

In State v. Sortviet, 100 Minn. 12, 110 N. W. 100, the court says: "We are not 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

low, was convicted in the supreme court of the District of Columbia of the crime of seduction under § 873 of the District Code [31 Stat. at L. 1332, chap. 854], which provides: "If any person shall seduce and carnally know any female of previous chaste character, between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one years, out of wedlock, such a seduction and carnal knowledge shall be deemed a misdemeanor."

The portion of the agreed statement of facts appearing in the record essential to the disposition of this appeal is as follows: "At the time of the alleged commission of the offense laid in the indictment, the complaining witness (hereinafter called witness), was a little under the age of seventeen years, and the defendant a little over impressed by the argument that the promise was not sufficient because it was conditioned upon the girl becoming pregnant. . . . The statute contains no limitation as to the character of the promise. It is general in terms, and is broad enough to cover any promise of marriage, whether conditional or restricted, if it is shown that the effect of the promise was to induce the female to consent to the act of sexual intercourse."

It has also been held that a promise of marriage conditioned upon pregnancy is a "promise of marriage" within the terms of the statute defining seduction. Rex v. Romans, 13 Can. Crim. Cas. 68; Rex v. Comeau, 5 D. L. R. 250, 11 East. L. Rep. 37, 104.

2. Conditional promise together with prior absolute promise.

Intercourse permitted by a woman in reliance upon a conditional promise of marriage if she gets into trouble will not amount to seduction, although there is a subsisting engagement between the parties at the time of the intercourse. People v. Ryan, 63 App. Div. 429, 71 N. Y. Supp. 527.

Where, however, two parties are engaged to be married at a definite future time, intercourse procured by the inducement of such absolute promise, together with the additional inducement to hasten the marriage in case the intercourse results in pregnancy, will amount to seduction. Cherry v. State, 112 Ga. 871, 38 S. E. 341.

And see, in this connection, Spenrath v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 48 S. W. 192, supra, I. a, 1.

b. Under statutes not making promise of marriage essential element of crime.

1. Conditional promise in general.

Under statutes not making a promise of marriage an essential element of seduction, it is agreed that any promises, deception, or artful influences which induce a chaste woman to surrender her chastity by overcoming her natural tendency to-eighteen, and each was unmarried. Prior to the alleged commission of the offense, the defendant and another young man had on several occasions called upon the witness and another young woman at the house of the witness, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia. Each of the several persons mentioned is of the colored race. On the date named in the indictment, namely, April 15, 1912, the said four persons were together in a room at the said house, having a social time, during which the witness had been playing upon a piano, the defendant standing close beside her; and the two other persons were seated in another part of the room. The defendant, leaning over witness, suggested that they go into the next room and have carnal intercourse; which the witness refused to do. Some days later, on a similar occasion and under similar circumstances, the defendant made a similar suggestion, to which witness replied that she was afraid something might happen. The defendant said that there was no use of being afraid; that nothing would happen. The witness then asked the defendant if he would marry her if anything did happen, and upon his saying that he would, she then consented, and the two went into the next room and there had intercourse. After the first occasion the act of intercourse between the witness and the defendant was repeated a number of times up to and including June 30, 1912. The witness's monthly sickness was due July 18, 1912, at which time she missed it; and was, in ward virtue and purity, will satisfy the statutory requirements.

However, there is no seduction "where it is shown that she yielded, not by reason of any promises, deception, or other artful influences, but merely to gratify her lustful desires." 35 Cyc. 1296.

The cases seem agreed that a promise of marriage conditioned upon pregnancy is not such a promise as will ordinarily overcome the natural tendency of a chaste woman toward virtue and honor. However, there seem to be instances where a promise of marriage conditioned upon pregnancy will overcome the natural tendency of a chaste woman. In such cases the conditional promise is considered sufficient basis for a conviction.

In HAMILTON v. UNITED STATES, it was held that the promise was not made under such circumstances as are necessary to constitute an exception to the general rule.

So, in People v. Smith, 132 Mich. 58, 92 N. W. 776, it was held that the defendant could not be convicted of seduction, where his only inducement to procure the intercourse had been a promise of marriage conditioned upon pregnancy, and where the complaining witness was not a young and inexperienced girl. The court says: "The complaining witness in this case, however, was not a young and inexperienced girl. She was nearly twenty years of age, and it is apparent knew quite well the consequences of her act. She cannot complain, therefore, if she is judged by the rules applicable to ordinary pure women. Is a promise to marry, conditioned upon the illicit intercourse resulting in pregnancy, calculated to induce a pure woman to yield her chastity? In our judgment, this question admits of but one answer. Such a promise has no tendency to overcome the natural sentiment of virtue and purity. The woman who yields upon such a promise is in no better position than as though no promise whatever had been made. No wrong is done her if she is put in the class with those who commit the act to gratify their desire. She was willing to lose her virtue if some provision was made to conceal its loss. If pregnant nancy does not result from the illicit intercourse, her conduct is in every respect as culpable as that of her companion."

In State v. Hughes, 106 Iowa, 125, 68 Am. St. Rep. 288, 76 N. W. 520, it is said: "The reasoning of these cases leads to the inevitable conclusion that to induce an unmarried woman of previous chastity to yield her virtue by a promise of marriage in event she becomes pregnant may be seduction. Whether a woman of chaste character would so yield, and whether, if she so does, it is voluntary, and to gratify her desires, rather than because of such conditional promise, may well be considered in connection with all the facts and circumstances shown upon the trial. But it cannot be said as a matter of law that an unsophisticated country girl of seventeen years, when addressed by a young man of five or six years her senior, with possibly a greater knowledge of the world, as in this case, and under the circumstances disclosed, would necessarily be of previous unchastity in yielding on the strength of such a promise, or that she submitted as a result of passion, rather than the false promises of the defendant. The question is not determined in State v. Reilly, 104 Iowa, 13, 73 N. W. 356."

In State v. Reilly, supra, referred to in the preceding quotation, the court holds proper an instruction "that if the prosecutrix assented to the intercourse upon the promise of the defendant to marry her should pregnancy result therefrom, then the verdict should be, not guilty."

It did not appear in Neary v. People, 115 Ill. App. 157, whether the promise of marriage "if anything happened" was made before or after the connection, but it was held that, even assuming that it was made prior thereto, it did not amount to seduction.

2. Conditional promise together with prior absolute promise.

The courts seem to take the position that, where there is a subsisting contract to marry, an additional promise of marriage conditioned upon pregnancy will be likely fact, pregnant. The witness would not have consented to the act in the first instance except for the defendant's assurances as aforesaid. After learning her condition, she asked the defendant to marry her, which he refused to do." The remainder of the agreed statement relates to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, which it will not be necessary to consider.

The case, we think, turns upon the court's refusal to grant an instruction requested by counsel for defendant challenging the sufficiency of the evidence to support a verdict of guilty. The law of seduction is distinguished by two lines of decisions in this country. One is based upon statutes similar to ours, and the other upon statutes requiring a promise of marriage as a condition precedent to the commission of the offense. The distinction has been elaborately pointed out in the briefs of counsel, but, when applied to the facts of this case, we are unable to discover wherein the cases make any real distinction. In Michigan, under a statute similar to ours, the court, in the leading case of People v. Smith, 132 Mich. 58, 92 N. W. 776, defined the application of the statute as follows: "Is a promise to marry, conditioned upon illicit intercourse resulting in pregnancy, calculated to induce a pure woman to yield her chastity? In our judgment, this question admits of but one answer. Such a promise has no tendency to overcome the natural sentiment of virtue and purity. The woman who yields upon such a promise is in no better position than as though no promise whatever had been made. No wrong is done her if she is put in the class with those who commit the act to gratify their desire. She was willing to lose her virtue if some provision was made to conceal its loss. If pregnancy does not result from the illicit intercourse, her conduct is, in every respect, as culpable as that of her companion. If pregnancy does result, his conduct becomes more culpable than hers only when, and not until, he refuses to marry her. The commission of the offense cannot depend upon the happening of a subsequent event."

On the other hand, in New York, where the statute requires a promise of marriage, in the case of People v. Van Alstyne, 144 N. Y. 361, 39 N. E. 343, Mr. Justice Peckham, speaking for the court, said: "It was never intended to protect a woman who was willing to speculate upon the results of her intercourse with a man, and who only exacted as the price of her consent a promise on his part to marry her in case the intercourse resulted in her pregnancy. . . . The statute was passed to protect a confiding and chaste woman in yielding to the solicitations of the man who had promised to marry her. It was not the purpose of the law to throw its protection around the woman who was willing to consent to the act, and who only asked for a promise of marriage in case her lapse from chastity should be discovered by reason of her pregnancy. In such case she consents at a time when there is no real promise."

An attempt has been made to distinguish the holding of the Iowa court, where a statute similar to ours exists, from the holding of the Michigan court in People v. Smith, supra, but the courts are in accord where the facts are similar. In the case of State v. Price, — Iowa, —, 138 N. W. 520, the court affirmed the Michigan rule in the following language: "Where the matter is one merely of barter, as in People v. Smith, supra, there is reason for saying this does not amount to seduction. It is to overcome the natural tendency toward chastity, thus creating one of the exceptions to the rule stated in supra, l. b.

Thus, in State v. Price, — Iowa, —, 138 N. W. 520, it was held that a conviction was authorized upon a finding that the intercourse was procured on the conditional promise of marriage in event of pregnancy, where the prosecutrix was only sixteen years old and engaged to marry the defendant.

And where the evidence showed that an engaged woman submitted to sexual intercourse in reliance upon the promise of immediate marriage if she got into trouble, a case of seduction was made out. State v. O'Hare, 36 Wash. 516, 68 L.R.A. 107, 104 Am. St. Rep. 970, 79 Pac. 39.

A general promise of marriage and a further promise, immediately before intercourse, of marriage if pregnancy results, "may be considered as constituting seductive arts." State v. Stolley, 121 Iowa, 111, 96 N. W. 707.

And where the defendant before connection promised to marry prosecutrix, and, upon her expression of disbelief, again promised to marry her if anything should go wrong, the effect of the promises upon the woman is for the jury. State v. Knutson, 91 Iowa, 549, 60 N. W. 129.

II. Civil actions.

It is competent for plaintiff in an action for seduction to show that the intercourse was obtained under promise of marriage if anything happened, inasmuch as such amounts to a seductive art which might induce such intercourse. Ayer v. Colgrove, 81 Hun, 322, 30 N. Y. Supp. 788.

So, it is held in Rabeke v. Baer, 115 Mich. 328, 68 Am. St. Rep. 567, 73 N. W. 242, that recovery for seduction is not barred by reason of the promise of marriage which induced the connection being conditioned upon the begetting of a child as the result thereof.

then but a blunt offer of wedlock in futuro in exchange for sexual favors in presenti. State v. Reeves, 97 Mo. 668, 10 Am. St. Rep. 349, 10 S. W. 841, 8 Am. Crim. Rep. 698." The rule of the Michigan court was approved in Nebraska, where the statute provides that "any person over the age of eighteen years, who, under promise of marriage, shall have illicit carnal intercourse with any female of good repute for chastity shall be deemed guilty of seduction." Russell v. State, 77 Neb. 519, 110 N. W. 380, 15 Ann. Cas. 222.

With these distinctions in mind, the present case is not difficult of solution. The agreed statement, in substance, shows that when defendant, on the first occasion, made the suggestion, upon the refusal of complaining witness, the matter was dropped, without further argument or solicitation by defendant. When the second suggestion was made, complaining witness did not refuse, but demurred on the ground "that she was afraid something might happen," to which defendant replied "that there was no use of being afraid; that nothing would happen." Then complaining witness solicited and secured a promise from defendant that "he would marry her if anything did happen." If seduction were present in this case, and it were possible for the complaining witness to commit the crime, under these facts it would be difficult to determine which of the parties to this meretricious transaction was the seducer. We are unable to distinguish between a bargain of this sort and one where a virgin deliberately parts with her virtue for a money consideration. The parties were practically of equal age, both of the age of discretion, and it does not appear that they were lovers. Defendant was only a casual visitor to the house where the prosecuting witness resided. There is no evidence of his having practised any art or wile, deception or persuasion, to induce the prosecuting witness to yield to his desires. Hence, none of the elements enter into the transaction upon which the crime of seduction may be predicated. Where, as in this instance, a woman traffics away her chastity for no other consideration than a mere contingent promise of marriage procured by her solicitation as an indemnity against possible pregnancy, it is not seduction under any statute or rule of law with which we are familiar.

The learned counsel for defendant in a single sentence so skilfully marshals the law which distinguishes this case from the cases relied upon by the government that we feel constrained to adopt the following short paragraph from his brief: "Such a 'meretricious transaction' as this case presents, such a matter 'merely of barter,' 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

which 'smacks too much of bargain and barter, and not enough of betrayal,' 'smacks too much of a corrupt and licentious bargain,' consisting only of a 'blunt offer of wedlock in futuro in exchange for sexual favors in presenti,' and conditioned upon ensuing pregnancy, does not constitute seduction; the law knows not such a thing as seduction on de bene esse, to be canceled by marriage nunc pro tunc."

It is urged by counsel for the government that the statute should be so construed as to make the carnal knowledge of any virtuous woman, between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one years seduction. We are not aware of a case where a similar statute has been so construed, and we perceive no sound reason why such a construction should be applied here. The object of the statute is to protect the chaste virgin against betrayal from an honest belief in the betrayer's protestations of love and affection, or an existing promise of marriage, or a present unqualified promise of marriage, as an inducement for the commission of the act. It is not intended as a shield for a lascivious barter and sale of chastity, either by a corrupt consideration or upon a promise of marriage contingent upon the possibility of pregnancy, which would, at most, be remote to the minds of the parties engaging in the immoral transaction.

The judgment is reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

ANNIE CRANDALL ARNOLD

v.

MARCELLUS L. HUSSEY et al.

Evidence — diary entries — admissibility.

1. Entries of temperature in a dairy kept by an individual since deceased, not a part of any employment or duty, are not admissible in evidence in actions between strangers.

Note. — Admissibility of entries in diary.

As to the scope and effect of statutes making competent entries, memoranda, and declarations of deceased persons, see Walter v. Sperry, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 28, and note.

This note deals with the admissibility of entries in diaries proper, as distinguished from account books, official records, memorandum books, or individual memoranda of particular transactions.

The general rule is that such entries are Appeal — Inadmissible evidence — prejudice.

2. The admission in evidence of an entry of temperature in a private diary of a person since deceased, in an action to recover damages for injuries caused by a fall upon a ridge of ice on the sidewalk, is prejudicial.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Piscataquis County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence, which resulted in a verdict in their favor. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. S. Williams and C. W. Hayes, for plaintiff:

Entries of deceased parties in no way connected with the parties to the suit are inadmissible where the entries were not made in the performance of some duty, official or otherwise, or in the regular performance of business pursued by the party making the entry.

2 Wigmore, Ev. § 1523; Leask v. Hoagland, 205 N. Y. 171, 98 N. E. 395, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1199; Kennedy v. Doyle, 10 Allen, inadmissible as evidence, though they may be used to refresh the memory of a witness, if, after such use, he can testify from an independent recollection of the matter.

Thus, in Elliott v. Sheppard, 179 Mo. 382, 78 S. W. 627, an entry by deceased in a diary kept by him, reciting what he did on a certain day, was held to be inadmissible to show that deceased was in a different state at the time a deed purporting to be signed by him was dated, the issue being the genuineness of the deed, there being no showing that the entry was made at the time and place it purported to have been made, the court saying: "Suppose he had made the statements to a third party, and this third party was offered as a witness to prove his statement, would it be contended seriously that this testimony would be competent? This diary does not belong to that class of documentary evidence which is admissible. It is not in the nature of a book account, which, upon showing that it was correctly kept, would render it admissible. It is merely a statement purporting to be made by Hamilton, and is of no more force or effect than if he had made such statements to some witness the day before he died. Again, it is inadmissible, because it falls within that class of testimony denominated self-serving statements."

In Monarch Mfg. Co. v. Omaha, C. B. & S. R. Co. 127 Iowa, 511, 103 N. W. 493, it was held that records of daily observations of the temperature and precipitation taken Messrs. Hudson & Hudson for defendants.

Spear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes to the law court upon exceptions which are stated as follows: This is an action brought for the purpose of recovering against the defendants, as owners of the Braeburn Block, in Guilford, for negligence in so constructing and maintaining said block that the water from the roof was precipitated upon the sidewalk, wholly on the private property of the defendants, so that a ridge of ice naturally would be formed, and the plaintiff alleges actually was formed, on said walk in front of the postoffice which was in said building. Evidence was introduced which tended to show that a ridge of ice was formed in front of the said postoffice, and that the plaintiff, in the exercise of due care and in the prosecution of lawful business, stepped upon said ridge of ice and slipped, voluntarily for the Department of Agriculture by a railroad depot agent, and not identified and verified by him, but produced by his successor, are inadmissible, not being admissible as records because not required to be kept, nor as private memoranda because not verified.

In Mair v. Bassett, 117 Mass. 356, entries by deceased in his diary, which at most were to the effect that he had made an agreement with defendant to take his note with certain mortgages and insurance policies as collateral, and had paid a certain sum on the agreement, which entries were not shown to be known to defendant, were held to be merely the declarations of deceased, and properly excluded as not competent to prove that defendant borrowed money from deceased and gave his note therefor.

In Costello v. Crowell, 139 Mass. 588, 2 N. E. 698, it was held that entries made by a person in his diary were not admissible in evidence after his death, the diary not being an account book, and having no weight beyond that of any memorandum in writing made by him.

In Stabler v. Clark, 155 Mich. 26, 118 N. W. 605, it is held that an entry made in a diary of daily events, of a certain payment, is not admissible in evidence, it not being used as an aid to the memory, and no claim being made that the witness did not have exact, independent memory of the narrated facts.

Entries by a lawyer in his diary as to breaking her leg, which was the injury sued for.

1. The defendants introduced evidence which tended to deny the fact that there was any ice there at the time of the injury, and, for the purpose of showing that the weather on the afternoon of the day on which the accident happened was too warm for the formation of ice, offered to be read to the jury extracts from the diary of one James Ham. Evidence in regard to said diary was adduced by the defendants from their witness Ernest Ham, which is as follows:

Q. What is your residence?

A. Guilford.

Q. Your father's name?

A. James Ham.

Q. When did he die?

A. The 6th of November.

Q. Have you in your possession a record of the weather in his handwriting?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know that he kept a record of the weather there in Guilford village?

A. Yes, he always did.

Q. Will you let me see his book? I show defendants' Exhibit No. 1, and calling your attention to a page at the top of which are the words "Thermometer, Saturday, Jan.

21, 1911," and "weather," and to the handwriting directly thereunder, ask you if that is the handwriting of your father?

A. Yes, it is.

Mr. Hudson: We offer that.

Mr. Hayes: We object.

The Court: A private diary was it?

Mr. Hudson: Yes, your Honor.

The Court: Not kept as a part of any employment or duty?

Mr. Hudson: Simply a matter of custom.

The Court: Do you dare risk it?

Mr. Hudson: Yes, your Honor.

The Court: Admitted.

Mr. Hayes: Exception?

The Court: Certainly.

Q. Do you know how many times a day he took the temperature?

A. Twice a day, at 6 in the morning and 6 at night.

Mr. Hudson: "Saturday, Jan. 21, 1911, 10 above. Cloudy, S. W. P. M." S. W. means wind southwest. That was in the A. M. "P. M. 36 above."

The exceptions raise a question upon the competency of one class of hearsay evidence upon which the authorities are not in full accord. When a deceased person who is a stranger to the transaction has made entries in a book, which become relevant to engagements for certain dates are inadmissible to show that he was not at a different place on those dates, though they could be used to refresh his memory as to such engagements, they being irrelevant when introduced as original entries. Whitaker v. White, 69 Hun, 258, 23 N. Y. Supp. 487.

Entries by a lawyer in his diaries relating to services rendered are to be regarded as self-serving declarations, and therefore clearly inadmissible in a suit by his executrix for fees for such services. Burke v. Baker, 188 N. Y. 561, 81 N. E. 1033, disapproving 111 App. Div. 422, 97 N. Y. Supp. 768, on this point, but affirming the decision generally.

The use of a diary to refresh the memory of a witness is illustrated by Star Mills v. Bailey, 140 Ky. 194, 140 Am. St. Rep. 370, 130 S. W. 1077, where a witness, with a diary kept by himself before him, was enabled to testify that he was not at a certain place on a certain date, and the court said: "While the diary is not evidence, it may be referred to by the witness to refresh his recollection as to where he was on a certain day, and if, when so refreshed, he could remember and say that he was not at the place testified to by the adversary witness, the testimony is not only relevant, but the circumstance indicates a carefulness of habit, and a ready and generally reliable means of refreshing the recollection."

585, 52 L. ed. 352, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 254, in which it was held that a diary kept by a person for fifty years, and containing nothing to excite suspicion, was properly used by a plaintiff to refresh his memory as to dates in issue, and the fact that the diary was in shorthand would not effect its use, it appearing that an interpretation thereof could be made with sufficient certainty by one skilled in the method used.

An entry in a decedent's diary purporting to be the result of an examination of his account as shown by the books of a firm of which he was a member, some of which had been destroyed by fire, which was against his interest when made, was held to be admissible in Miller v. McLean, 31 Ohio C. C. 64.

In Remick v. Rumery, 69 N. H. 601, 45 Atl. 574, entries of items in plaintiff's diaries were held to be admissible as being his books of account.

And the fact that charges are entered in a diary, and not in the plaintiff's regular books of account, does not render them inadmissible where they are of the nature and form of original entries in a book account, rather than mere memoranda. Gleason v. Kinney, 65 Vt. 563, 27 Atl. 208.

If a diary is such a book or writing the production of which will be compelled by the court, it must be shown to contain something pertinent and material to the defense before the court will require that it be produced. Dorris v. Morrisdale Coal Co. 215 Pa. 638, 64 Atl. 855. R. L. S.

the proof of some fact in issue in the case on trial, such entries, with certain limitations, may be admitted in evidence, and although not made in the presence of the parties, and not directly concerning their transactions, yet they may be pertinent and even conclusive proof of coeval facts.

But just what the limitations are is where the authorities divide. Yet there seems to be but one qualification that differentiates the decisions. All agree that such entries, to become admissible, must be made "in the ordinary course of business." Some hold that they must also be made against the interest of the parties making them; others that this is not essential. Accordingly, the result to be reached is not whether this kind of testimony is competent, but what are the limitations to its admissibility as suggested, the important division of the courts upon the limitations is confined to the one question whether the entries must be against interest. But this limitation has been rejected by our court, as will appear below.

While no Maine cases are cited by plaintiff's counsel, yet the Maine reports, in several opinions, contain as comprehensive and satisfactory a solution of the question as we have been able to find. Augusta v. Windsor, 19 Me. 317, very early announced the rule on this subject in harmony with the leading cases of that time, confirmed by the weight of authority since, and consistent with both reason and authority now. The principle here enunciated for the government of the admission of this class of testimony is found in this language, adopted from Nicholls v. Webb, 8 Wheat. 337, 5 L. ed. 630: "We think it a safe principle that memorandums made by a person in the ordinary course of his business, of acts or matters which his duty in such business requires him to do for others, in case of his death, are admissible evidence of the acts and matters so done." In the next paragraph the opinion in terms rejects the limitation found in some states, that the entry must appear to have been made against the interest of the party making it, saying: "This court is not satisfied with the reasoning upon which that limitation was introduced, and does not feel obliged to adopt it."

With the statement of this rule, which has not been modified or repealed, we might well sustain the exceptions without further citation, but as no recent opinion, that we are aware of, has had occasion to discuss this precise question, where it was directly raised, and became the pivot upon which the decision of the case turned, it may be well to collate the few decisions that are found and note the different forms of expression in which the rule is announced. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

We have already referred to Augusta v. Windsor in 19 Me. The next case in which the point is considered is Dow v. Sawyer, 29 Me. 117, which uses this language: "Contemporaneous entries made by third persons in their own books in the ordinary course of business, the matter being within the knowledge of the party making the entry, and there being no apparent motive to pervert the fact, are received as original evidence." This case also holds that such entries may be received without extraneous proof, if, upon inspection of the books, they appear to have been fairly kept and contain entries respecting the matter in issue. The next case is Oldtown v. Shapleigh, found in 33 Me. 278, which states: "'A minute in writing made at the time when the fact it records took place, by a person since deceased, in the ordinary course of his business, corroborated by other circumstances which render it probable that the fact occurred, is admissible in evidence.' And such a minute is competent 'where it is one of a chain or combination of facts, and the proof of one raises a presumption that another has taken place.'" See also cases cited. In Lord v. Moore, 37 Me. 208, it is stated this way: "To make such entries in books of a private character admissible, the books in which they are made must have been fairly and regularly kept, the entries must have been made by a deceased person whose duty it was to make them, or in the regular course of business, who had personal knowledge of the subject-matter entered, and whose situation was such as to exclude all presumption of his having any interest to misrepresent the fact recorded." See also Pike v. Crehore, 40 Me. 503. In Wigmore on Evidence, vol. 2, § 1523, the author says, relating to this class of testimony: "The first general requirement is that the entry must have been made in the regular course of business. The judicial phrasings of this requirement vary in terms. The entry must have been therefore in the way of business." In Leask v. Hoagland, 205 N. Y. 171, 98 N. E. 395, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1199, is found this expression: "The reason for receiving statements in entries made in the course of business, as an exception to the rule [hearsay rule], is that they were made as a part of the regular work of one's livelihood or profession." In Kennedy v. Doyle, 10 Allen, 161, we find this conclusion: "In the United States the law is well settled that an entry made by a person in the ordinary course of his business or vocation, with no interest to misrepresent, before any controversy or question has arisen, and in a book produced from the proper custody, is competent evidence, after his death, of the facts thus recorded." From these varied expressions of the rule, it seems to be well established that the entries of deceased persons in books kept by them, but not connected with the suit in question, and not made in the performance of any duty nor in the course of their own business, are inadmissible; and we fail to find any cases in which a contrary rule is declared. On the other hand, the cases are numerous where entries not made in accordance with the rule herein stated have been rejected.

While public records, kept in the discharge of public duties, when produced by the proper custodian, tending to prove the facts therein contained, are admissible, such as entries made in books kept by the weather bureau, this question is not here involved and requires no discussion.

It very clearly appears from the exceptions that the diary offered and admitted was a book of private memoranda, whose entries were not made by the owner in the performance of any duty nor in the regular course of his own business, and were therefore inadmissible.

It was argued that, even if the exceptions were sustainable, the admission of the entries in the book was not prejudicial. We are not able to concur in this view. The very question at issue was whether the weather conditions on the day in question were such as to congeal the water flowing from the roof of the building, and thus form the ridge of ice complained of, or whether the weather was so warm as to avoid the conclusion that ice could thus form.

Exceptions sustained.

RE ASSESSMENT OF THE COLLATERAL INHERITANCE TAX IN THE ESTATE OF JAMES QUIRK, Deceased.

(— Mo. —, 165 S. W. 1062.)

Tax — inheritance — devise to nonresident charity.

An exception of property conveyed for some educational, charitable, or religious

Note. — Right of charitable, educational, or religious institution to exemption from taxation as affected by the geographical field of operation.

This is a continuation of note to Carter v. Whitcomb, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 733.

The following cases support the holding of RE QUIRK, that exemptions under tax laws in favor of charitable, educational, or religious institutions do not apply to for-purpose exclusively, in a statute imposing an inheritance tax upon property in the state which shall pass by will or the intestate laws, does not extend to property conveyed to charitable institutions located in other states.

APPEAL by the State from an order of the Circuit Court for Nodaway County reversing an order of the Probate Court assessing a tax on property passing to non-resident charities, in an action for the collection of the collateral inheritance taxes from the estate of James Quirk, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John T. Barker, Attorney General, George Pat Wright, and F. C. Donnell, for appellant:

In order for the legislation to relieve any species of property from its proportion of taxation, such legislation should be so clear that there can be neither reasonable doubt nor controversy about its terms.

Respondents' point that where the language of a statute is clear, the intent of the general assembly must be found in the words of the statute, does not deprive the court of the right to determine the intent of the exemption in § 309.

Verdin v. St. Louis, 131 Mo. 163, 33 S. W. 480, 36 S. W. 52; Riesterer v. Horton Land & Lumber Co. 160 Mo. 141, 61 S. W. 238; Herring v. Boston Iron Co. 1 Gray, 134; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 289; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 601; Black, Interpretation of Laws, 2d ed. 180.

"That there is no presumption against exemption from special taxation" is neither borne out by the weight of authority, nor, even if it were correct in law, would it justify the construction of the statute invoked by respondents.

Fitterer v. Crawford, 157 Mo. 51, 50 L.R.A. 191, 57 S. W. 532; Ross, Inheritance Taxn. 1912, §§ 131, 135; Re Gopsill, 77 N. J. Eq. 215, 77 Atl. 793; Leavell v. Blades, 237 Mo. 695, 141 S. W. 115; Lincoln, Inheritance Tax Law, § 170.

And that, although exemptions of institutions and corporations are admittedly, under settled rules of construction, held to be those of the same state when not otherwise stated in the statute, yet the rule is different when religious, charitable, or educational purposes are the subject of exemption, is without merit.

Board of Education v. Illinois, 203 U. S. 553, 51 L. ed. 314, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 171, 8 Ann. Cas. 157; Carter v. Whitcomb, 74 N. H. 482, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 733, 69 Atl. 779; Ross, Inheritance Taxn. § 146.

Messrs. Ira K. Alderman and M. E. Ford, for respondent:

The rule of statutory construction is that statutes purporting to grant exemptions from general taxation are to be strictly construed against the claimant, and in favor stitution is not entitled to the benefit of exemption from legacy tax, although exempt under the law of its organization and origin); Davis v. The Treasurer, 208 Mass. 343, 94 N. E. 556 (succession tax).

So, a foreign religious corporation is held in Re Gopsill, 77 N. J. Eq. 215, 77 Atl. 793, not exempt from the payment of the state collateral inheritance tax, under an amendment impliedly repealing an act exempting from such tax foreign as well as domestic charitable or religious corporations.

It was held in Re Wolfe, 23 Misc. 439, 52 N. Y. Supp. 415, that the American Baptist Publication Society, a foreign corporation, was not exempt from the state legacy tax under the statutory right to take, hold, and enjoy property in the state of New York by devise, bequest, gift, grant, or purchase.

A bequest, however, to the American Missionary Union (Boston, Massachusetts) was, in Re Lyon, 144 App. Div. 104, 123 N. Y. Supp. 1004, held not subject to a transfer tax, although incorporated in three different states, including that of New York, since the union was a distinct legal entity, and was made a domestic corporation by New York state laws. "Theoretically," said the court, "it may be said that there is a distinct legal entity in each of the three states; but the substance is the same in all. It is a single body possessing the franchises 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) and privileges of a domestic corporation in three states. To say that the bequest is to a foreign corporation, merely because the testatrix named the place where its principal office is located, is to substitute form for substance. If she had distinctly said that she intended the bequest to go to the New York corporation, it would have gone into the same treasury, and have been disbursed in the same manner and by the same people."

So, it is stated in State v. New York Yearly Meeting of Friends, 61 N. J. Eq. 620, 48 Atl. 227, that a bequest to the New York Yearly Meeting of Friends is exempt from the payment of an inheritance tax under statute providing that all gifts, etc., to any Bible or tract society, religious institution, or church board not confined in their operations and benefactions to local or state purposes, but for the general good of the people interested therein, of the United States or of foreign lands, as the board of home and foreign missions of various church denominations, shall not be taxed under said act, whether said society, religious institution, or board aforesaid is organized under the laws of this state, or incorporated and organized under the laws of some other state, the New York Yearly Meeting of Friends being the general governing body of the Society of Friends, and having primary control over the missionary purposes and general benefactions of such minor bodies as act by its authority, also its field of operation not being confined to the state of New York.

So, while a legacy to or for the Salvation Army, or other religious or charitable institutions organized under the corporation laws of another state, is not exempted from the inheritance tax of Iowa, a gift or bequest to a branch of such a society, in the nature of a trust to be expended within the state for purely local benefit and local purposes, may be held exempt. Re Crawford, 148 Iowa, 60, 126 N. W. 774, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 992.

So, legacies to the Baptist Convention, a corporation with powers broad enough to authorize the use of its funds in the promotion of religious and charitable objects in other states and countries, are not subject to the New Hampshire inheritance tax, where the charity of the convention is of substantial benefit to the people of that state, within the intent of the statute exempting such property from the tax mentioned. Carter v. Story, 76 N. H. 34, 78 Atl. 1072.

Re Jones, 73 N. J. Eq. 353, 67 Atl. 1035, is set out in note in 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 734, and is affirmed without opinion in 74 N. J. Eq. 447, 70 Atl. 1101.

The fact that a domestic charitable institution expends, for charitable purposes without the commonwealth, part of a fund to which it has succeeded, does not deprive it of the benefit of the statute exempting §1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

charitable institutions within the state from the payment of a collateral inheritance tax. Balch v. Shaw, 174 Mass. 144, 54 N. E. 490.

But, distinguishing Balch v. Shaw, supra, it is held in Pierce v. Stevens, 205 Mass. 219, 91 N. E. 319, that a residuum devised and bequeathed to trustees, the net income of which was to be paid to the board of managers of free schools for girls in a foreign country for a certain period, is not exempt from payment of an inheritance tax, because such trustees had, by the exercise of a discretionary power under the will, formed a corporation for the purpose of so administering the trust. "It is contended by the corporation," said the court, "that it is a charitable and educational institution whose property is by law exempt from taxation, and that therefore no tax can be collected upon the property that passed to it from the trustees under the will. If the corporation had been in existence when the will took effect, and if the will had passed the property from the testator's estate directly to it, there would be strong grounds for its contention. . . . There is no ground for a contention that, by electing to form a charitable corporation under the laws of Massachusetts, instead of forming a corporation in some other state or country, or not forming a corporation at all, they could relieve the property from liability to taxation, or affect the rights of the commonwealth in any way." The exemption in the Missouri inheritance taxation statute, of devises made for educational, charitable, or religious purposes, is sharply and intentionally distinguished from the statutes in other states, where the exemption is made of "institutions" or "corporations," which, under settled rules of construction, are held to be those of the same state when not otherwise stated in the statute.

Graves, J., delivered the opinion of the of the court:

This action arose in the probate court of Nodaway county, and is one wherein it is sought to collect certain collateral inheritance taxes from the estate of James Quirk, deceased. The case involves the construction of the exemption clause of § 299 of article 16 of chapter 1, Rev. Stat. 1899. The case in both the probate and the circuit court of Nodaway county was tried upon the following agreed statement of facts:

Agreed statement of facts.

It is agreed by and between the parties hereto that the facts in the above cause are as follows: That James Quirk, prior to and at the time of his death, was a resident of the state of Illinois; that he died testate on the 13th day of November, 1906, seised of a three-fourths interest in fee in the following described real estate, lying, being, and situated in the county of Nodaway, in the state of Missouri, to wit: An undivided three-fourths interest in and to the north half of the southeast quarter of section ten (10), in township sixty-three (63) north, of range thirty-six (36) west of the principal meridian, in Nodaway county, Missouri; that by the last will and testament of the said James Quirk, dated the 18th day of November, 1902, he bequeathed and devised to Mary Quirk, his sister, also a resident at all times herein mentioned of the state of Illinois, the use, rents, income, and profits of all his estate, both real and personal, including the above lands, so long as she should live; that all the remainder of his estate, including the above lands, both real and personal, which should be left after the death of his said sister, Mary Quirk, and after paying the legacies therein mentioned and expenses of administration, he directed his executors, named in said will, to convert into money, and to pay the same over to the bishop of Peoria, Illinois, the same to be used by him for the use and benefit of the Church of the Visitation of Kewanee, Illinois, and the Dominican Sisters School of Kewanee, Illinois, as he might deem best, and he, the said James Quirk, by his said last will, bequeathed the said remainder of his estate so converted into money to the said bishop of Peoria, Illinois, in trust for such use and purposes; that on the 5th day of August, 1907, the said Mary Quirk died; that, on the death of said Mary Quirk, all the rest and residue of the property of James Quirk, including the lands above, when converted into money by his executors, and after paying legacies and expenses of administration, passed to and vested in the bishop of Peoria, Illinois, in trust for the uses and benefit of the Church of the Visitation of Kewanee, Illinois, and the Dominican Sisters School of Kewanee, Illinois; that on the 18th day of May, 1908, Joseph Jackson, Sr., a resident of the city of Maryville, Nodaway county, Missouri, was, by the probate court of Nodaway county, Missouri, duly appointed as administrator with will annexed, of the estate of said James Quirk, in Nodaway county, in the state of Missouri; that said Joseph Jackson, Sr., as such administrator, under the powers and terms of the will of said James Quirk, sold the lands above described for the sum of $6,400; that the interest in the same of the said James Quirk amounted to three fourths of said sum, or $4,800; that sum was and is the fair market value of said lands; that the debts and legacies of said estate have all been paid except expenses of administration, which amount to $550, and which amount said administrator now retains in his hands; that the said Joseph Jackson, Sr., as such administrator of said estate, has paid to the bishop of Peoria, Illinois, the sum of $4,250. It is further agreed that the bishop of Peoria is not a resident of the state of Missouri, but is a resident of the state of Illinois; that the Church of the Visitation and the Dominican Sisters School are educational, charitable, and religious institutions exclusively devoted to such purposes in the state of Illinois; that said Church of the Visitation and the Dominican Sisters School are located in the city of Kewanee, in the state of Illinois. It is further agreed that if the court decides that said bequests to said Church of the Visitation and Dominican Sisters School are liable to pay a collateral inheritance tax, that the amount of such tax is $212.50, and penalties of $55.25.

William Earl Wiles, Prosecuting Attorney.
Ira K. Alderman, Attorney for Bishop of Peoria, Illinois, and Joseph Jackson, Sr., Administrator.

Upon these facts the probate court found that the property was not exempt from the collateral inheritance tax, and the administrator appealed to the circuit court. The circuit court found that it was exempt, and reversed the judgment of the probate court, and, from that judgment, the opposing parties have appealed, and invoke the judgment of this court. The case is one purely of law.

I. At the institution of this suit, the statute involved was § 299, Rev. Stat. 1899. The statute has not been amended, and is now § 309, Rev. Stat. 1909. The statute so far as material reads: "All property which shall pass by will, or by the intestate laws of this state from any person who may die seised or possessed of the same while a resident of this state, or, if decedent was not a resident of this state, at the time of death, with property or any part thereof shall be within this state, or any interest therein or income therefrom, which shall be transferred by deed, grant, bargain, sale or gift, made or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the grantor, bargainer, vendor or donor, to any person or persons, or to any body politic or corporate, either directly or in trust or otherwise, or by reason whereof any person or body politic or corporate shall become beneficially entitled in possession or expectancy, to any property or the income thereof, other than to or for the use of the father, mother, husband, wife, legally adopted children, or direct lineal descendant of the testator, intestate, grantor, bargainer, vendor or donor, except property conveyed for some educational, charitable or religious purpose exclusively, shall be and is subject to the payment of a collateral inheritance tax of $5 for each and every $100 of the clear market value of such property."

We have italicized the clause which is the crux of this case. Under the agreed facts, the beneficiaries of the fund bequeathed by James Quirk are educational and religious organizations, and the funds go to educational and religious purposes. The only question is whether it was the intent of our law to grant a tax exemption for charities located outside of Missouri. Differently stated, did the Missouri legislature intend this exemption clause of our statute to apply to all charities wherever located, or was it the intent to have it apply only to resident charities? We use the word "charities" to cover all the exempted subjects named in the statute. We have concluded that the legislative intent was to make this exemption apply to Missouri "charities" alone, and for reasons which follow.

II. The following rules of statutory construction are invoked by the respondents: First, it is said that, where the language of the statute is clear and unambiguous, the intent of the general assembly must be found in the statute; secondly, that there is no presumption against exemption from special taxation, and that the rule of presumption against tax exemptions in general taxation has no application to this case; thirdly, it is contended that, by the use of the words "educational, charitable, or religious purposes," the legislature meant to make our law different from the laws of other states, wherein the exemption is extended to "institutions" or "corporations;" in other words, the word "purposes" is emphasized by respondents as having a peculiar and saving grace in our statute; and, fourthly, it is conceded that the legislative power of the state is limited to persons or property within the state, but it is averred that such principle has no application to the case at bar, "where it is sought by judicial construction to limit by taxation the right of a citizen of another state to exercise his charitable disposition over his property for the benefit of the institutions in his own home."

We are not prepared to say that the statute is so plain in terms as not to require judicial construction as to the legislative intent. From statements in the briefs, and in oral arguments, it appears that the circuit courts of the state have not been of one voice in the construction of the statute. In most instances such courts have held that it is not the legislative intent to exempt foreign charities, or charities outside of the state. In the case at bar the learned circuit judge took a different view, and in so doing was opposed in judgment to some of his fellow circuit judges of the state, as well as the probate judge of his county. When the limits and bounds of legislative acts are considered, it is by no means clear what was intended by the act in question. The words used must be considered from all the surroundings. But this matter we discuss later. Suffice it to now say that we believe the wording of the statute is such as to call for judicial determination of the legislative intent as to the subjects of exemption, and on this theory we shall proceed.

III. We do not deem it material to discuss the question as to whether or not the general presumption against exemption from taxation applies to this kind of a case. That presumption is one valuable in the trial of cases, because it forces those claiming the exemption to show that the property sought to be exempt clearly falls within the exempted class. But, if we find that the legislative intent in the instant law was not to extend the exemption to "charities" outside of the state, then there is an end to this controversy, and the reasoning as to whether or not the presumption as to exemptions applicable in general taxes applies to this case is but a side question, upon which there is learning upon both sides. If the law is one requiring judicial construction as to the legislative intent, as we hold, then a determination of that question will forego all other questions.

The basic principle of all statutory construction is the legislative intent. This is true whether such intent must be drawn from the words of the act, or whether we go to extrinsic aids to find the intent. Black, Interpretation of Laws, 2d ed. p. 180; Verdin v. St. Louis, 131 Mo. 26, 33 S. W. 480, 36 S. W. 52; Sedalia ex rel. Taylor v. Smith, 206 Mo. loc. cit. 361, 104 S. W. 15; Perry v. Strawbridge, 209 Mo. 621, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 244, 123 Am. St. Rep. 510, 108 S. W. 641, 14 Ann. Cas. 92; Decker v. Diemer, 229 Mo. 296, 129 S. W. 936. So, at the very threshold of all statutory construction we are met with the paramount question: "What was the legislative intent?" If no ambiguity appears, the courts go to the language of the law itself. If there is an ambiguity or uncertainty, then extrinsic aid may be used in determining the meaning, and these are various. Sedalia ex rel. Taylor v. Smith, supra. In getting at the legislative intent, one of the prime considerations is the condition of the law at the time the new law was enacted, because words general in meaning are often used in legislative acts, because the lawmaking power knows that such broad general meaning is curtailed and limited by general laws, rules of law, or public policies. To these we must oftentimes go to gather the real intent. As stated, one of the things always in the mind of the legislative body is that their language will be construed in the light of existing laws, rules of law, and public policies, and this, perhaps, accounts for the use of many general terms, rather than more limited ones. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

To start with, in this case it must be presumed that the general assembly, in passing this law, and making this exception, did so relying upon the fact that it would be interpreted in the light of existing law. One of the fundamental principles of the then existing law was that a statute would prima facie be declared to be operative only as to persons and things within the territorial jurisdiction of the lawmaking power which enacted it. In the very recent case of State ex rel. Harvey v. Wright, 261 Mo. 325, 158 S. W. loc. cit. 828, our brother Faris has well stated the rule: "Besides this reductio ad absurdum, which would seem to settle this contention, certain presumptions confine us to our own state. 'A statute is prima facie confined in its operation to persons and conditions within the territorial jurisdiction of the legislature.' Beal, Cardinal Rules of Legal Interpretation, p. 232. 'Prima facie every statute is confined in its operation to the person's property rights or contract which are within the territorial jurisdiction of the legislature which enacted it.' Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 513. We elect to our offices our own citizens of our own state under the provisions of our own laws. We never elect by direct suffrage a citizen of another state to any office; these are the elections at which the election commissioners act, and the elections which they are required to hold. We conclude, then, that it is too clear for argument that by the 'leading party politically opposed to that to which the governor belongs' is meant the 'leading party' in this state." In that case we were called upon to determine what was meant by the general term "leading party politically opposed to the governor." It was urged that we should give the phrase such a meaning as to say that the strongest party, nationally speaking, which was opposed to the political principles advocated by the governor, was the "leading party," within the meaning of the act then under consideration. This we declined to do, because of the general existing law which confined all laws to persons and things in the state. The same doctrine should apply here. We should say that the legislature, in using the general terms "some educational, charitable, or religious purpose exclusively," had reference to such charities as were within the territorial limits of the lawmaking power.

In other words, the general doctrine seems to be that prima facie the law should be held to have reference to persons and things within the territorial jurisdiction of the body enacting it, unless it clearly appears that another and different purpose should be gathered from the act itself. Presumptively the lawmaking power is acting in the interest of persons and things within the state. Presumptively the lawmakers in this case were looking after the interests of Missouri, and not legislating for charities in other states, and especially is this so when they were unloosing our own purse strings by this exemption clause. It means, if given the construction urged by the respondent, that a Missouri lawmaking body was releasing its hold upon a source of revenue for charities outside of the state. To give it that construction would, in effect, be to say that the lawmaking body was taking Missouri money to support foreign charities.

In Ross on Inheritance Taxation, § 146, it is said: "It has been contended that the exemption of charitable institutions from inheritance taxation applies to all such institutions, regardless of their location within or without the state granting the exemption, for, it is argued, the exemption is in recognition of the beneficent purpose of these institutions, and, inasmuch as the purpose is common to them all, wherever located, the exemption should be universal. But the courts have not yielded to this argument. They have held, with unanimity, it is believed, that, in the absence of any language plainly indicative of a different intent, the legislature must be deemed to have made the exception for the benefit of its own institutions only, and that foreign corporations, or institutions without the state, must pay the inheritance tax, although exempt in the state of their domicile, and although some of their charitable work and enterprises are carried on within the state enforcing payment of the tax."

So, too, as said by Andrews, Ch. J., in Re Prime, 136 N. Y. loc. cit. 362, 18 L.R.A. 713, 32 N. E. 1095: "It is the policy of society to encourage benevolence and charity; but it is not the proper function of a state to go outside of its own limits and devote its resources to support the cause of religion, education, or missions for the benefit of mankind at large. The argument may have force that the state might, consistently with its proper function, give immunity from taxation to some of the foreign corporations engaged in the work of education or charity. But, however this may be, we are convinced that the statute of 1891 has no application to foreign corporations, and, having reached that conclusion, our duty is ended."

Again, in Carter v. Whitcomb, 74 N. H. loc. cit. 489, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 733, 69 Atl. 784, it is said: "When, however, an auxiliary body like the Auxiliary of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, though connected with a local church and existing within the jurisdiction as an association, seeks as its principal object 'the evangelization of heathen women' and the raising of funds for that purpose alone, it is difficult to discover how the public represented by the people of this state is benefited by the supposed benevolence. Even if there are 'heathen women' in our midst, this society can do nothing for their enlightenment and civilization; for, as found in the case, none of its funds 'are or can be devoted to charitable objects within the state of New Hampshire.' Its money may be sent, and presumably the principal part of it is sent, to assist in the conversion of people living in remote parts of the earth, from their native religion to that of Christianity. The expenditure of large sums of money for the enlightenment upon religious subjects of the natives of the antipodes evidently was not one of the objects the legislature intended to encourage when, in 1895, the property of charitable associations 'devoted exclusively to the uses and purposes of public charity' was exempted from taxation, or when, in 1905, legacies to such associations 'in this state' were exempted from inheritance tax. The benefit to the public of this state of such a trust is so visionary, problematical, and uncertain that it cannot be deemed for the purposes of this case a public charity, without imputing to the legislature motives which it is reasonably certain they did not entertain. The state is not itself a charitable institution, and does not authorize its representatives to expend the public money, by exemptions from taxation or otherwise, for purposes having little or no relation to the welfare of the inhabitants of the state. The purpose of such laws is the acquisition of some supposed public advantage. Opinion of Justices, 58 N. H. 623; Perry v. Keene, 56 N. H. 514. If it is impossible to see how the public good of the state is promoted by a claimed exemption from the tax burden, it cannot be inferred that the legislature intended such a result from language which does not necessarily require such a construction. 'If a statute is capable of two meanings, and one is more reasonable, and therefore more probable, than the other, this fact is necessarily considered, with all other competent evidence, on the question of intent. The evidence of intention may include various inherent probabilities and the probative force of many circumstances, as well as the literal sense of the words used. When the meaning is found by giving due weight to everything that legally tends to prove it, it is not a matter of discretion whether it shall be adopted or rejected. If the evidence establishes the fact that the literal sense is not the true sense, a literal construction would be an alteration of the

And, further, at page 491 of 74 N. H., in the same case it is said: "As a matter of practice, it has devoted substantially all its funds to the support of charities outside of New Hampshire, and presumably it will continue that practice. If its object was to maintain an orphans' home or a hospital for poor people on the Pacific coast, and all its resources were devoted to that purpose, the public benefit of such a charity in New Hampshire would not be apparent. Perhaps it would be no more evident than the maintenance of missions in China. Its relation to the public interests of this state, which alone the legislature is ordinarily presumed to have in view, would be so slight, arising merely from a general community of interstate interests, that it is not probable such a charity would be the object of legislative bounty and encouragement. Nor should we expect to find the lawmakers exempting from the common burden of taxation a society whose purpose is, as established by long practice, to use its funds exclusively in the promotion of charities in other states. If some substantial local benefit accrues of a public nature by the actual use of some of its funds for charitable purposes in this state, it might be found that it was included within the exemption, though it used the balance of its funds in other jurisdictions. Balch v. Shaw, 174 Mass. 144, 54 N. E. 490. The question would be whether its charity was of such a character and so administered as to be of any substantial benefit or advantage to the public of this state; and this would be principally a question of fact, to be determined upon competent evidence." (The italics are ours.)

Quite a number of cases are cited by Ross in his work on Inheritance Taxation, supra, but these suffice to illustrate the rule and the reasons of the rule. There is no deep-seated meaning in the use of the word "purposes" in our act which can avail the respondents.

Under the great weight of the case law, we are constrained to hold that it was not the legislative intent, by the exemption clause of our statute, to include property conveyed for educational, charitable, or religious purposes outside of this state. I. this view of the law, other questions are immaterial.

From this it follows that the property in question is subject to a collateral inheritance tax, under § 309, Rev. Stat. 1909, and the circuit court was wrong in holding contra.

remanded, to be proceeded with in accordance with this opinion.

All concur, except Woodson, Bond, and Walker, JJ., who dissent in an opinion by Walker, J.

Walker, J., dissenting:

I do not concur in the majority opinion. The statute (§ 299, Rev. Stat. 1899, now § 309, Rev. Stat. 1909) is general in its terms, and unmistakable in its meaning. Under its provisions, property which passes by deed, grant, bargain, sale, or gift to other than the father, mother, husband, wife, or natural or adopted children, is subject to the collateral inheritance tax, except when conveyed for educational, charitable, or religious purposes. These clear and definite provisions do not, in my opinion, require adventitious aid in their interpretation. There is no indication that the exemption of the property conveyed for the purposes mentioned was to be limited to that bequeathed to benevolences located within the state. If the terms of the statute demanded a liberal interpretation, it certainly should be given when the purpose of the exemption is beneficent in its nature; but the terms of the statute are broad and clear enough in themselves without recourse to any rule in regard to liberal interpretation. The framers of the law, having in view the encouragement of bequests and grants for the general good, did not intend that the statute should be limited to geographical lines; and it is immaterial whether the property granted or bequeathed passes to an institution within the borders of Missouri, or to one in a sister state or a foreign country; it is the purpose of the grant which the legislature had in mind, and not the location of the benevolence to be aided. If I am correct in my conclusion, then it is necessary, before the statute can be construed as it has been by the majority, for these words, "within the state of Missouri," to be inserted after the exceptions in the statute, so that the same shall read as follows: "except property conveyed for educational, charitable, or religious purposes exclusively within the state of Missouri." Under no rule of construction with which I am familiar is this interpolation authorized.

A tax, under any view that may be taken of it, is a burden; an express statute is necessary to authorize its imposition; here, instead of such a statute, we have an express exemption. Under this state of facts, I am of the opinion that the taxation of the property specified as exempt under § 309, supra, is unauthorized.

So much for the grounds of my difference with my Brethren as to the rules of construction applicable to this statute.

Woodson and Bond, JJ., concur herein.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

THOMAS J. KEMP, Appt.,

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

(41 App. D. C. 539.)

Postoffice — nonmailable letter — interpretation — consideration of one which it answers.

1. To determine whether or not a letter deposited in the mail violates the statute forbidding the mailing of any letter giving

Note. — Instigation or consent to crime for the purpose of detecting criminal as a defense to prosecution.

Illegal sale of liquor.

"Decoys are permissible to entrap criminals, but not to create them; to present opportunity to those having intent to or willing to commit crime, but not to ensnare the law-abiding in unconscious offending." United States v. Healy, 202 Fed. 349.

So, it is no defense to a charge of selling intoxicating liquors in violation of the law, that the purchases were made by persons seeking to ascertain if the accused was engaged in the unlawful sale of such liquors. State v. Spiker, 88 Kan. 644, 129 Pac. 195.

And it is no bar to a prosecution for selling intoxicating liquors without a license, that the sale was made to two police officers of the prosecuting city, who went to the defendant's store and asked to purchase the liquors for the express purpose of obtaining evidence that the defendant was selling intoxicating liquors there. Salt Lake City v. Robinson, 40 Utah, 448, 125 Pac. 657. The court said: "While it may be conceded that the particular sale in question here would not have been made if the two officers had not asked to purchase the liquor, yet in view of the facts and circumstances the appellant was no more induced to make this sale than he would be induced to make any sale in his place of business. Moreover, the sale in question was seeming-information as to where or by whom an abortion would be performed, it may be interpreted in the light of the one to which it is an answer.

Evidence — as to nonmailable character of letter.

2. Upon the question whether or not a letter deposited in the mail gives information prohibited by statute, evidence is admissible of an interview with the sender by one supposed by him to have appeared in response to it.

Same — decoy — information leading to.

3. In a prosecution for depositing in the mail a letter containing information as to where an abortion would be performed, in violation of statute, in answer to a decoy letter sent by a detective, the information upon which the detective acted is immaterial, as well as his motive in sending the decoy, if it was not to induce the commission of a crime.

Postoffice — sending nonmailable letter — decoy — effect.

4. It is no defense to a prosecution for ly only one of many that appellant was prepared to make. . . . It was not the purpose of the officers to induce the appellant to make a sale for the sole purpose of convicting him of making that sale, but it seems their object was to obtain evidence from which it was made manifest that appellant was engaged in the illegal traffic of intoxicating liquors, and that they desired to break up such traffic. As public officers who, under their oaths, were required to enforce the ordinances of the city, we cannot see wherein they offended against public policy or against good morals in seeking to obtain evidence against a willing offender against the law for the purposes aforesaid."

And in State v. Hopkins, 154 N. C. 622, 70 S. E. 394, following State v. Smith, annotated in 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 946, it was held to be no defense to a prosecution for illegally selling liquor, that a policeman, to catch the defendant in the act of violating the law, procured another person to go to the defendant's house to purchase whisky, and gave him a marked dollar bill to pay for it, and went with him and overheard the conversation between him and the defendant at the time of the sale in question.

But in a prosecution for an unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor to an Indian, although there was suspicion that the defendant was making like unlawful sales, a conviction is unjust and contrary to public policy, and should be set aside, where the sale in question was solicited from the defendant by an Indian who was in the service of government officers as a decoy, and the defendant was ignorant that the purchaser was an Indian, and nothing in the latter's dress, speech, manner, or appearance served to put him on inquiry as to that fact. United States v. Healy, supra. The court said: "Where a statute, as here, makes an act a crime regardless of the act mailing a letter containing information as to where an abortion would be performed, contrary to statute, that it was sent in response to a decoy letter of a detective who wrote under an assumed name.

Appeal — refusal to permit recall of witness — immateriality of evidence.

5. Whether or not one mailing a letter giving information as to where an abortion would be performed, contrary to statute, had a physician's sign on his office, is immaterial, and it is not error to refuse to permit a witness to be recalled for cross-examination on that question.

Indictment — variance — materiality.

6. The variance between purported language of a letter alleged to have been unlawfully deposited in the mail, set out in the indictment as "and have to say here one week," and the letter itself as offered in evidence, "I would have to stay here one week," is immaterial.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Supreme Court convicting him of sending a letter through the mails containing forbidden information, in violation of statute. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John E. Laskey and A. S. Worthington, for appellant:

The admission in evidence by the court below, of the defendant's reply to the

or's intent or knowledge, ignorance of fact is no excuse if the act be done voluntarily; but when done upon solicitation by the government's instrument to that end, ignorance of fact stamps the act as involuntary, and excuses, or at least estops the government, from a conviction. In the former case the actor is bound to know the facts, and acts at his peril. In the latter case he is relieved of the obligation by the government's invitation, which is of the nature of fraudulent concealment and deceit, and, if not consent, yet doth work an estoppel. Though the seller has violated the statute, he was the passive instrument of the government, and his is a blameless wrong for which he cannot be justly convicted. If, however, the decoy is one whose appearance, or otherwise, conveys knowledge of his disability, or is sufficient to put the seller on inquiry, any sale made is voluntary, establishes guilt, and warrants conviction. For in such case the seller is either of guilty intent, or negligent ignorance or recklessness, which relieves the government's participation of any taint of fraudulent concealment or deceit. It will be observed the case at bar is not of those where the actor knows his act violates the law. Of the latter is he who, on solicitation, sells or passes money known to him to be counterfeit, or he who thus mails prohibited matter, or he who thus sells intoxicants without a license or in 'dry' territory. These latter acts are criminal, let the status of the solicitor be what it may; and hence that he is a decoy does not neutralize the criminal quality of the act. In the case at bar the act is innocent but for the status of the solicitor, and because he is a decoy of concealed disability the act is blameless, and there is estoppel against conviction. Were it otherwise, honest men could easily be made felons. Many of the government's Indian wards are not distinguishable from Caucasians. Any purveyor of liquors, and anyone moved by hospitality to share thereof with guests, ignorant of their status, would unhesitatingly sell or give to them. As decoys in the service of government officers, what instruments of oppression they might be to men devoted to law, but ignorant of their disability! That the seller is suspected of voluntary like sales does not justify entrapping as here; for thereby a law-abiding person may as easily be ensnared. And the result proves nothing but overzeal, to put it mildly, of government officers. The practice cannot be tolerated, and a conviction for an offense so procured cannot stand."

So, in Smith v. State, 61 Tex. Crim. Rep. 328, 135 S. W. 154, reversing, apparently on other grounds, a conviction of violating the local option law, which had been obtained largely upon the testimony of a witness who had been employed by the sheriff as a detective in local option matters, the court said: "In regard to this phase of the bill, we desire to say the state's case was made by the hired detective, who worked up cases, and in this case developed the fact that he had induced the appellant to secure the whisky for him with a view and for the purpose of instituting this very prosecution. In every case . . . [the detective] had induced the violation of law to which he testified. This manner of instituting prosecutions against the citizenship of the state, and inducing them to commit crime, is to be deplored. While it is eminently proper that officers should be diligent in ferreting out crime and violations of the law, yet it does not occur to us that the theory of our law is predicated upon the idea that parties should be induced to violate the law in order that a prosecution may be brought about. The machinery of the state should be put into operation to detect and punish crime, but not to organize and institute it. The prevention of crime is one of the main purposes of our law, not its encouragement or propagation."

And in Scott v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 153 S. W. 871, also reversing on another ground a conviction of violating the local option law, the court said: "The writer has had occasion heretofore to criticize the character and manner of inducing men to commit crime as is evidenced by this record. This witness [the main witness for the prosecution] testifies, and is not controverted or contradicted, that the sheriff agreed to give him $10 for each case he would 'turn in,' and additional money or compensation if a conviction should oc-

The action of the court in hearing, out of the presence of the jury, testimony as to whether the Quincy Compton letter was sent to the defendant, and in deciding that question on such evidence, instead of submitting it to the jury, was erroneous.

cur. The officers are not justified in inducing men to commit crime, or in employing others to induce them to commit crime, in order that prosecutions may be instituted. It is his duty as an officer, where he understands that parties are engaged in crime, to use every effort legitimate and permissible by law, to detect and ferret out crimes and bring criminals to trial and justice. But this does not justify him in employing parties to go out and induce the citizens to commit crime that prosecutions may be instituted and carried on."

And in Salt Lake City v. Robinson, 40 Utah, 448, 125 Pac. 657, the court further said: "By what we have said we do not mean to be understood as offering any encouragement to a certain class of so-called private detectives or informers who may, in pursuance of offered rewards, or for other valuable considerations, act as decoys, and as such induce certain individuals to commit offenses. When it is made to appear that the offense charged was induced by a detective or other person, or that such detective or person was paid for obtaining the evidence necessary to convict, or that he is to receive additional compensation in a case of conviction, both the prosecuting officers and the trial courts should carefully scrutinize the evidence, and should permit no conviction to be had, or, if had, to stand, in case the offense was induced as aforesaid; and in case of paid evidence, none should be permitted to stand if there is any doubt of the guilt of the accused."

It is no defense to a prosecution for sending through the mail a letter conveying information as to where obscene matter may be obtained, that a postoffice inspector, believing from general information and from an advertising pamphlet issued by the defendant that he was engaged in illegal use of the mails, sent to him a "decoy letter," in response to which the letter in question was sent by the defendant. Ackley v. United States, 118 C. C. A. 403, 200 Fed. 81 L.R.A.(N.S.)

217. The court said that when an officer, or even a private citizen, desirous of enforcing the laws, believes from general information that the laws are being violated, he has the legal, as well as the moral, right to send "decoy letters;" and that it is now too late to complain of decoy letters in such a case (citing authorities).

And see also KEMP v. UNITED STATES.

One in charge of the mailing department of a corporation, who is indicted for the embezzlement and larceny of United States postage stamps belonging to the corporation, was not so encouraged or solicited to take the stamps as to prevent his conviction therefor, where postoffice inspectors, having arrested a person who had been obtaining stamps from the accused, arranged with this person and representatives of the corporation that he should arrange to obtain more stamps from the accused, and the representatives of the corporation should mark certain stamps belonging to the corporation, so that they could identify them, and the accused was subsequently arrested by the inspectors with some of the marked stamps in his possession, when he met the accomplice to deliver stamps to him as arranged. "The criminal design and intent originated in the mind of plaintiff in error [the accused]. Neither the owner of the stamps nor its agents urged or advised the commission of the crime, but, suspecting the plaintiff in error, it took precautions to ascertain whether he would commit the offense. The law does not prohibit this being done. If it did, it would destroy one of the most effective agencies for the detection of crime." People v. Smith, 251 Ill. 185, 95 N. E. 1041.

So, there is no such consent on the part of a gold milling company, through its agents, to the taking of gold amalgam from its mill, as will prevent the taking from constituting larceny, where a watchman in the employ of the company, having been approached by conspirators with reference to their obtaining amalgam from the mill, reported this to the company, and, with its knowledge and approval, pretended to act as an accomplice of the thieves, and, in accordance with an arrangement with them, pretended to give one of them a signal when it was safe to take the amalgam, but did not persuade or induce the conspirators to take the property, or himself assist in the actual taking, and merely allowed the amalgam to be taken for the purpose of detecting and entrapping the thieves. *State v. Burglary.

Where the defendant suggested to an employee of a pawnbroker a plan by which the defendant might burglarize the pawnbroker's shop, and the employee pretended to agree to the proposed scheme, but in fact informed his employer and the police authorities thereof, and thereafter, acting under the instructions of the police, with the pretended object of assisting the defendant to carry out his scheme, lent him the keys of the shop, from wax impressions of which he made duplicate keys, with one of which, on a day arranged with the employee, after returning the original keys to him, the defendant unlocked a padlock securing the outer door, and entered the shop, where he was arrested by the police officers who had been keeping watch near by,—the shop owner and the police having been informed by the employee of the arrangement with the defendant,—there was no such assent on the part of the shop owner to the entry as to prevent the defendant from being guilty of the offense of shop breaking. Rex v. Chandler [1913] 1 K. B. 125, 82 L. J. K. B. N. S. 106, 108 L. T. N. S. 353, 77 J. P. 80, 29 Times L. R. 83, 57 Sol. Jo. 160, 23 Cox, C. C. 330. The court said: "In our opinion, although the prosecutrix may have been fully aware of what was going to be done, she did not assent to the breaking and entering of her premises by the prisoner for the purpose of stealing. The 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

keys were only supplied to the prisoner by the servant of the prosecutrix in order that he might be detected in the commission of the offense; that did not make the servant an accomplice of the prisoner, nor make the breaking and entering lawful."

But there can be no conviction of the crime of housebreaking where the owner of the building which was entered directed a servant to induce the defendant to break into the building, and the servant obeyed his orders, and he and the defendant entered the building together, and the owner and a policeman and others were present watching them, and arrested the defendant after he so entered. State v. Goffney, 157 N. C. 624, 73 S. E. 162. The court says that, while it recognizes the principles laid down in State v. Smith (annotated in 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 946), there is an obvious distinction between that case and this. "In that case it is properly held that the fact that a party was deceived into a violation of the liquor laws of the state by a detective will not be a justification. In the case at bar the owner himself gave permission for the defendant to enter, which destroyed the criminal feature and made the entry a lawful one."

A coal dealer who knowingly sells and delivers 1,750 lbs. of coke as a ton, and charges and receives therefor the price of a ton, is guilty of obtaining money by false pretenses, notwithstanding the purchaser had a strong suspicion that the dealer was selling by short weight, but could not have testified to it as a fact, and had to buy the coke in question and weigh it to find out with certainty that it was short weight. State v. Ice & Fuel Co. — N. C. —, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 81 S. E. 737, affirmed on motion to reconsider opinion in — N. C. —, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 81 S. E. 956. The court said: "The defendant offered a ton of coke for $5, the offer was accepted, and $5 was paid for a ton. The prosecutor acted

There was no material or fatal variance between the copy of the letter set out in the indictment, and the letter admitted by the appellant to have been written and mailed by him, which was offered in evidence.

in good faith, because he paid the purchase price for a ton, and on weighing it, the only possible method, he found that there was not a ton. He was therefore induced to part with his $5 in reliance upon the assertion of the defendant that a ton of coke had been sent him. He could not possibly know beforehand whether this would be done or not, nor indeed after he saw the coke, until he had actually weighed it. However much he might have mistrusted the defendant's representation, he relied on it by paying the $5 charged."

In its second opinion (— N. C. —, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 81 S. E. 956), the court, in distinguishing this case from the larceny and burglary cases, in which it is held that, if the act is committed with the consent of the owner, the perpetrator cannot be convicted, further said: "The difference between the cases like this and those cases in which the defense can be set up that the prosecuting witness was consenting to the act seems to be that where the owner of the property procures the offense to be committed, and seduces or influences the perpetrator to do the act, then he cannot complain. But where the offender commits the act of his own volition, and an officer or other party, suspecting that the crime is being committed, sets a trap, as by furnishing money to buy whisky that is being sold illegally, or, as in this case, bargains for an article which, on being weighed, proves to be short weight, or sends decoy letters through the mail to 'trap' a person who is suspected of using the mails illegally, and in like cases, such conduct does not procure the offense to be committed, but the offender acts of his own volition, and is simply caught in his own devices."

fluence his action as an official. "The offer to bribe a public official is a transgression of a public right, and the consent or non-consent of the officer cannot affect the criminality of the act of the person who makes the offer, and even though Mr. Wilson [the officer], by his words, acts, and conduct, may have been the inducing cause of the offer to bribe, yet, if appellant did, in fact, tender money to the officer with the intention and for the purpose of influencing his action as such officer, he would be guilty under our statute. It would not be an offense against Mr. Wilson so much as an offense against the public welfare, and one which no officer would have the authority nor power to give his consent to." Davis v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 158 S. W. 288.

Supplementing note in 25 L.R.A. 345.

It is no defense to a prosecution for conspiracy to procure the passage of ordinances through councils by the gift or promise of bribes, that two of the conspirators were hired detectives seeking to entrap the defendants, where every essential element of a criminal conspiracy was present when the defendants entered into the confederation with the detectives. Com. v. Wasson, 42 Pa. Super. Ct. 38. The court said: "No deception or subterfuge was resorted to to induce belief in the minds of the defendants that the part they were to perform in carrying out the general scheme would not be criminal, as on its face it plainly was. . . . Upon what ground, then, can it be claimed that the fact that they would not have confederated had it not been for the deception and subterfuges resorted to, and the promises made by the detectives, constitutes a defense? Certainly not upon the ground that the defendants had performed the acts to be performed by them, they would have been disappointed in their expectation of receiving bribes therefor; nor upon the ground that the commonwealth is estopped by any action of its officers; nor

Appellant, Thomas J. Kemp, defendant below, was convicted of the crime of sending a letter through the mails in violation of § 211 of the United States Criminal Code [35 Stat. at L. 1129, chap. 321, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 1651], which, in part, provides as follows: "Every . . . letter . . . or notice of any kind giving information directly or indirectly, . . . where or by whom any act or operation of any kind for the procuring or producing of abortion will be done or performed, or how or by what means conception may be prevented or abortion procured, whether sealed or unsealed, . . . is hereby declared to be nonmailable mat-upon the ground that the detectives' consent to acts which were to be performed by the defendants would have deprived their acts, if performed, of any essential element of criminality; nor upon the principle upon which it has been held in some cases to be no burglary where a servant to whom a scheme of burglary has been proposed tells his master or the police, and, while apparently confederating with the burglar, acts with the knowledge and advice of his master, and lets the thieves into the house by opening the door. If there is any ground upon which the facts as to the part the detectives took in the formation of the conspiracy can be held to be a defense, it is upon the ground of public policy, and it is strenuously contended that an acquittal should have been directed for that reason. In general, one who has committed a criminal act is not entitled to be shielded from its consequence merely because he was induced to do so by another. There has been much discussion in the courts of this country and by the text writers as to the relation of detectives to crime, and many of their methods have been severely denounced. A few exceptional cases can be found where, upon grounds of public policy, the courts have refused to sustain convictions because of the abhorrent methods adopted to lure the accused into crime. Upon the other hand there are many cases wherein the courts, while in some instances condemning the methods employed by the detectives, have sustained the convictions, although the particular crime charged would not have been committed had it not been for the deceptions or subterfuges or the suppression of the truth resorted to by the detective. . . . In considering the question of public policy, the clear distinction, founded on principle as well as authority, is to be observed between measures used to entrap a person into crime in order, by making him a criminal, to aid the instigator in the accomplishment of some corrupt private purpose of his own, and artifice used to detect persons suspected of being engaged in criminal practices, particularly if such criminal practices vitally affect the public welfare rather than individuals. Without declaring that under no circumstances ought the courts to direct an acquittal of a crime clearly proved, upon the ground that the accused was entrapped into it by immoral and illegal detective methods, we are quite clear that there is enough evidence that the purpose was to secure the conviction and punishment of those suspected to be engaged in criminal practices, to bring this case within the second class above mentioned, and that the court did not err in refusing to direct an acquittal upon the ground of public policy."

Miscellaneous.

It is no defense to a prosecution of a street railway company for violation of a city ordinance requiring it to stop its cars at every street crossing to take on passengers, that the refusal to stop the car in question was upon the signal of a policeman acting as a detective for the purpose of securing evidence of a violation of the ordinance, and having no bona fide desire to become a passenger. "He was not merely an informer seeking to make a case, in order that he might obtain or share the penalty, but a public official acting for a public purpose in pursuance of his official duty. Under such circumstances his motive is of no more importance than the motive of one pursuing his legal right in a court of justice." Camden v. Public Service R. Co. 84 N. J. L. 305, 86 Atl. 447, affirming 82 N. J. L. 242, 82 Atl. 608, ter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any postoffice or by any letter carrier. Whoever shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited for mailing or delivery, anything declared by this section to be nonmailable . . . shall be fined . . . or imprisoned," etc.

It appears that one James L. Woltz, a detective in the employ of the Postoffice Department, caused to be mailed the following letter from Concord, North Carolina, to defendant in Washington, District of Columbia, signed by the fictitious name, "Quincy Compton:"

Concord, N. C., Nov. 14, 1912.

Dr. Thomas J. Kemp, 433 G. St., N. W.,
Washington, D. C.,

My Dear Doctor:—

I trust you will pardon my writing you as I am, but I am in such great distress and so anxious to find some way out of it, that this is my only excuse. I am a young man, married, and have been unfortunate enough to have gotten a young woman friend into trouble; to be plain, she is in a family way. Of course, I cannot marry her, and the condition she is in makes it necessary that she be afforded relief at as early a period as possible. She cannot permit the matter to go to full period either, as that would mean the ruin of her reputation, a thing not to be thought of. The girl is only twenty-two years old, and is about two and a half months gone. If you can and will take this matter for us and relieve the girl of her trouble, will you please let me know what it will cost and about how long she would have to stay up there in Washington? Will it be necessary for her to go to a hospital, or could the business be done here by the use of medicines? I want to be frank and tell you that we have tried two or three things we saw advertised and got at the drug store here, but they have been without effect.

Sincerely, Quincy Compton.

And it is no defense to a conviction of the statutory crime of knowingly receiving money for and on account of procuring and placing women in the custody of another person for immoral purposes, that a trap was laid for the defendant, and that the principal witness, in whose custody the women were placed, did not intend to, and did not in fact, make use of them for immoral purposes,—the defendant having, in fact, knowingly received the money, having knowingly procured the women, and having intended to deliver, and having delivered, them for immoral purposes. People v. Moore, 142 App. Div. 402, 25 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 471, 127 N. Y. Supp. 98, affirmed without opinion in 201 N. Y. 570, 95 N. E. 1136.

In United States v. Phelps, 16 Philippine, 440, reversing a judgment convicting the defendant of having smoked opium on a certain occasion in violation of the law, which judgment rested solely upon the testimony of a single witness who was secretly acting as an employee of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the court said: "According to the statements made by the witness Smith, he not only suggested the commission of this crime, but he (Smith) also stated that he desired to commit the same offense and would pay his part of the expense necessary for the commission of the prohibited act. Such conduct on the part of a man who is employed by the government for the purpose of taking such steps as are necessary to prevent the commission of the offense, and which would tend to the elevation and improvement of the defendant, as a would-be criminal, rather than further his debasement, should be rebuked rather than encouraged by the courts; and when such acts as those committed by the witness Smith are placed beside the positive testimony of the defendant, corroborated 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by the Chinaman and the doctor, the testimony of such witness sinks into insignificance and certainly does not deserve credit. When an employee of the government, as in this case, and according to his own testimony, encourages or induces persons to commit a crime in order to prosecute them, such conduct is most reprehensible. We desire to be understood that we base our conclusions as to the conduct of the witness Smith and the incredibility of his testimony on his own acts according to his own testimony. We are therefore of the opinion, and so hold, that the appellant is not guilty of this crime. The judgment of the lower court is reversed and the appellant acquitted."

In a civil action by a city against a druggist to recover a penalty for a violation of a provision of the Municipal Code prohibiting the sale of morphine, no such unlawful entrapment of the defendant by the police officers to make the sale in question, as will prevent a recovery, is shown by evidence that the purchaser had notified a police inspector that she could get morphine from the defendant, and the inspector told an officer to see if she could do it, whereupon the officer took her to the defendant's store, gave her money with which to make the purchase in question, and waited outside the store for her while she made the purchase, and received from her the envelop containing the morphine tablets purchased. "The police officers had no communication whatever with plaintiff in error [defendant below] prior to the sale of the morphine by him. They merely afforded him an opportunity to voluntarily and deliberately do what they had reason to believe he would so do, if opportunity offered. This did not constitute unlawful entrapment." Chicago v. Brendecke, 170 Ill. App. 25. A. C. W.

In answer to this letter, defendant mailed in the District of Columbia, in an envelop addressed to Quincy Compton, Concord, North Carolina, the following letter:

Washington.

Dear Sir:—

Your letter received and would say it would cost about two hundred and would have to stay here one week—destroy this letter—Can't write about this better come—This is answer to your letter won't sign my name.

It is conceded that this letter was written by defendant. For the purpose of interpreting what it was intended to convey, the government introduced the Compton letter in evidence, and the testimony of a detective named Honvery, who interviewed defendant a short time after the letter in question was written, representing that he was Quincy Compton and that the girl referred to in the Compton letter was at the Metropolitan Hotel, in this city, prepared to undergo treatment. He testified that defendant refused to see the girl in his office, but went so far as to procure a room for her and fix the time for the treatment to begin. Much of the evidence given by this witness was denied by defendant. This, however, created an issue of fact for the jury, with which we are not concerned.

It is urged by counsel for defendant that the indictment does not charge an offense, because the letter written by defendant to Quincy Compton does not, in itself, give information "where and by whom any act or operation of any kind for the procuring or production of abortion will be done or performed." The trial court was not confined to the letter of defendant. It properly held that, in determining the intent of defendant, his letter should be interpreted in the light of the one to which his was an answer. "The letter addressed to the defendant, which is set out in the indictment, is perfectly clear in its terms as to what information is desired, and the letter deposited by the defendant, which is alleged to be in pursuance of the request contained in the letter to him, and in reply thereto, and with his knowledge that it gave the information desired, considered in connection with the letter received by him and the allegations in the indictment, is sufficient, in my opinion, to sustain a charge of the offense prohibited by the statute of giving the prohibited information 'directly or indirectly.'" United States v. Kline, 201 Fed. 954. See also Ackley v. United States, 118 C. C. A. 403, 200 Fed. 217; Clark v. United States, 121 C. C. A. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

It was also competent to establish that defendant's letter gave information prohibited by the statute, by the extrinsic evidence of the detective who interviewed defendant when he supposed the girl was in a hotel in this city.

"In a prosecution of this character the government is not confined to the letter itself, but may show by any competent extrinsic testimony that the letter gives information which the statute prohibits being given through the mail, and that it was in fact intended to convey such information. If the character of a letter cannot be thus shown by extrinsic facts, the statute under which this indictment is drawn could be easily evaded and would prove a dead letter." United States v. Grimm, 50 Fed. 528.

Applying these rules of interpretation, it is not difficult to bring this case within the statute. Compton, after detailing the girl's condition and the relief sought, wrote in part: "If you can and will take this matter for us and relieve the girl of her trouble, will you please let me know what it will cost and about how long she would have to stay up there in Washington?" Defendant replied: "Your letter received and would say that it would cost about two hundred and would have to stay here one week." Read together, defendant's reply can be interpreted as meaning but one thing: I will perform the operation, or procure someone who will perform it; it will cost $200, and the girl will have to stay in Washington one week. This interpretation is confirmed by defendant's interview with the witness Honvery, when he supposed that he was talking to Compton, and that, in response to his letter, the girl had been brought by Compton to Washington. It is unnecessary that the letter should upon its face disclose the information. It may be innocent upon its face. Grimm v. United States, 156 U. S. 604, 39 L. ed. 550, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 470; De Gignac v. United States, 52 C. C. A. 71, 113 Fed. 197.

Defendant was charged with mailing a letter intending to furnish the information sought in the Compton letter. We think the proper test to be applied is, whether or not, reading the letters together, defendant's answer gave Compton information upon which he could intelligently act. Of this there can be no doubt. It matters not whether defendant intended to treat the girl himself, or procure another to give the treatment. His letter furnished the forbidden information. To hold that the letter itself must directly contain on its face the information would be to defeat the

Error is assigned in the refusal of the court to require witness Woltz, the writer of the Compton letter, to give the name of the person who made complaint against defendant. The record does not disclose that such complaint was ever made. The witness testified: "The letter in question was sent to the defendant not to induce him to break the law, but to discover whether he was using the mails in violation of the law, and but for information possessed by the witness that the defendant was probably using the mails in violation of the law, the letter signed 'Quincy Compton' would not have been sent." It is true this statement was made to the court, out of the hearing of the jury, when the court was ascertaining from this witness his motives in sending the decoy letter, in order that the preliminary question of its admissibility might be determined. The court properly found that the letter was admissible. It is not material upon what information Woltz acted. It does not appear that it was his purpose to induce defendant to commit a crime, but to ascertain whether he was engaged in an unlawful business. It is no defense that the letter written by defendant was in answer to a decoy letter written, as in this case, by a government detective. Andrews v. United States, 162 U. S. 420, 40 L. ed. 1023, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 798. Neither is it material that the letter was written under an assumed name and contained a false statement of fact. The trap set was a proper one. "The official, suspecting that the defendant was engaged in a business offensive to good morals, sought information directly from him, and the defendant, responding thereto, violated a law of the United States by using the mails to convey such information, and he cannot plead in defense that he would not have violated the law if inquiry had not been made of him by such government official. The authorities in support of this proposition are many and well considered. . . . The law was actually violated by the defendant; he placed letters in the postoffice which conveyed information as to where obscene matter could be obtained, and he placed them there with a view of giving such information to the person who should actually receive those letters, no matter what his name; and the fact that the person who wrote under these assumed names and received his letter was a government detective in no manner detracts from his guilt." Grimm v. United States, 156 U. S. 604, 39 L. ed. 550, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 470.

cross-examination of this witness. The admission of the letter and the further testimony of the witness that "the idea of writing the said letter to the defendant originated with said Woltz, and the said letter was entirely fictitious, none of the statements of fact therein contained being true, the name of Quincy Compton being also fictitious, there being no such person in existence," were sufficient to lay the witness open to a searching cross-examination as to his motives in writing the decoy letter.

The motive, however, of the writer of the decoy letter, is not important. The letter was admissible on its face, irrespective of the motive of the writer. It was not such an inducement to commit crime as the law condemns. It left the way open to defendant, either by ignoring it, or by answering it, to disclose that he was not conducting the sort of unlawful business in which he was requested by its express terms to engage. It was optional with him either to act the part of an honest man, or the part of a criminal. Without any influence from anyone, he chose the latter course. He is estopped to complain when he is confronted with the trap into which he knowingly and voluntarily stepped. "Even if inducements to commit crime could be assumed to exist in this case, the allegation of the defendant would be but the repetition of the plea as ancient as the world, and first interposed in Paradise: 'The serpent beguiled me and I did eat.' That defense was overruled by the great Lawgiver, and whatever estimate we may form, or whatever judgment pass upon the character or conduct of the tempter, this plea has never since availed to shield crime or give indemnity to the culprit, and it is safe to say that under any code of civilized, not to say Christian, ethics, it never will." Board of Excise v. Backus, 29 How. Pr. 33.

It is assigned as error that the court refused to permit counsel for defendant to recall, for further cross-examination, the witness Honvery, the detective who interviewed defendant under the assumed name of Quincy Compton, when he (defendant) supposed the girl was in this city. This witness testified in the course of his examination that he "looked for but saw no sign on the outside of 433 G Street, and his recollection was that there was no sign there." It appears that after witness had testified, in a conversation with a policeman relative to the sign, witness said that he had testified there was no sign on defendant's office, and he did not want to be made out a liar. It was evidently for the purpose of laying the ground for impeachment by the testimony of the policeman that counsel for defendant sought to recall this witness. This was merely a collateral matter. It is not important, nor even material, whether there was a sign on the house or not. It is conceded defendant is a physician; but that is not important, since the offense could be as well committed by a layman as a physician. Besides, the defendant got the full benefit of the evidence, in so far as it tended to impeach the witness, when the policeman was permitted to testify as a witness for defendant that "for eight years . . . the defendant had out physicians' signs at his office, which had never been removed."

It is insisted that there is a fatal variance between the copy of the letter signed by defendant, as set out in the indictment, and the original letter offered in evidence. The letter, as set out in the indictment, contained the words, "It would cost about two hundred and have to stay here one week." In the original letter, the expression read, "It would cost about two hundred & would have to stay here one week." It will be observed that in the copy the word "would" is omitted, and instead of the sign for the word "and" the word is spelled out. These errors in no way change the sense or meaning conveyed by the letter. The question of variance is one of law for the court, and, unless it appears that it is prejudicial to the rights of the accused, it will not be deemed material. The gravamen of the offense here charged is not the writing of the letter, but the depositing of it in the mail. Hence, there is no occasion for the application of the strict rule which is sometimes invoked in cases of forgery, fraudulently procuring an indorsement of a promissory note, or other kindred crimes, where the offense relates directly to the instrument relied upon. Thomas v. State, 103 Ind. 419, 2 N. E. 808. The old technical rules of pleading in criminal cases, inherited from an early English civilization, have been greatly relaxed, and have been supplanted by the more reasonable rule "that only material and substantial variances between the pleadings and the proofs will be regarded." Williams v. United States, 3 App. D. C. 335.

The court committed no error in refusing to grant defendant's request for an instructed verdict, or his request for an instruction to the effect that the jury should return a verdict of not guilty if it appeared from the evidence "that there was no such person as Quincy Compton, that the statements in the letter to the defendant signed 'Quincy Compton,' were false, and were made for the purpose of entrapping the defendant and in pursuance of a plot or scheme adopted and carried out by officials of the Postoffice Department to induce or solicit the defendant to mail a nonmailable letter." We have held it immaterial that the letter addressed to defendant was signed in the name of a fictitious person and that its contents were false. Defendant's crime consisted in mailing a letter containing the forbidden information, and it is not important that it could never reach the person to whom it was addressed. The crime was complete when defendant deposited in the mail a letter giving such information as the statute prohibits. United States v. Grimm, 45 Fed. 559, 50 Fed. 528, 156 U. S. 604, 39 L. ed. 550, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 470; Ackley v. United States, 118 C. C. A. 403, 200 Fed. 217; United States v. Musgrave, 160 Fed. 700.

For physical or mental incapacity as an excuse for failure to give notice of injury required as a condition of municipal liability, see Touhey v. Decatur, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 350, and the note thereto.

This note does not cover the effect of insanity to suspend the period allowed for claiming dower, or electing between dower and benefits under a will: nor does it cover cases like Downham v. Holloway, 158 Ind. 626, 92 Am. St. Rep. 330, 64 N. E. 82, holding that the statute of limitations does not begin to run against a deed of an insane person who is not under guardianship, until disaffirmed by the grantor after becoming sane, or by his heirs after his death.

Evidence — incapacity — sufficiency.

2. As against a demurrer to the evidence, an allegation of legal incapacity is sufficiently sustained by testimony that the plaintiff was a morphinomaniac; that she was incompetent of exercising any judgment and discretion in the ordinary business affairs of life; that she was not responsible; that she was a maniac; that her will power was gone; that she could not fix her attention on anything.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Rosamonde Gillmore sued Mary A. and Frank B. Gillmore, alleging that they had induced her to marry their son, knowing that he had a communicable disease, and that they had made her a victim of the morphine habit. A demurrer to her evidence was sustained, and she appealed. Upon the original hearing in this court the judgment was affirmed on the ground that the statute of limitations had run, because the action was not brought until more than a year after the plaintiff had been cured of the habit. Gillmore v. Gillmore, 91 Kan.

A person mentally weak, but neither an idiot nor lunatic, having power to comprehend the nature of the fraud upon him when explained to him by friends, does not come within the exception. Piper v. Hoard, 107 N. Y. 67, 1 Am. St. Rep. 785, 13 N. E. 632.

The fact that a party was old, credulous, and so feeble in mind and body that he was unfit to transact business, is not sufficient to bring him within the exception of the statute as being insane. Rugan v. Sabin, 3 C. C. A. 578, 10 U. S. App. 519, 53 Fed. 415.

In Carter v. Stewart, — Tenn. —, 43 S. W. 366, where the evidence as to a party's mental capacity was quite conflicting, and witnesses not interested in the suit regarded her as being sane, the court refused to reverse the finding of the chancellor that her mental condition interposed no bar to the statute of limitations.

It is not generally necessary that an insane person be adjudged insane to bring him within the exception to the statute of limitations. Lantis v. Davidson, 60 Kan. 389, 56 Pac. 745; Kaack v. Stanton, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 495, 112 S. W. 702.

But incompetency does not prevent the running of the statute in Louisiana, unless the incompetent has been interdicted. Cox v. Ahlefeldt, 105 La. 543, 30 So. 175.

Disability arising after accrual of cause of action.

The general rule that disability intervening after the statute has commenced to run will not operate to suspend it (2 Cyc. 126) has been applied to disability arising from insanity.

Thus, mental disability arising after the statute has begun to run does not suspend its operation. Black v. Ross, 110 Iowa, 112, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

293, 137 Pac. 958. This ruling was based upon the date of the filing of the amended petition on which the case was tried. It appears that the original petition contained substantially the same averments, and was filed within the year. For this reason a rehearing was granted.

The defendants maintain that the plaintiff neither pleaded nor gave evidence of any facts tending to show that at the time her cause of action accrued she was under any "legal disability" in the sense in which that term is used in the statute of limitations. Civil Code, § 18 (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 5611). The phrase is elsewhere defined as including persons "of unsound mind." Gen. Stat. 1909, § 9037, subd. 27. The petition does not employ apt words to bring the plaintiff clearly within the terms of the statute. It does not use the phrase "legal disability," or "of unsound mind," or any obvious equivalent. We think, however, that by a very liberal construction it may be regarded as containing allegations which, when supplemented by inferences fairly to

And this rule has been applied even though the insanity commenced within a short time after the injury which gave the cause of action. Roelefsen v. Pella, 121 Iowa, 153, 96 N. W. 738; McCutchen v. Currier, 94 Me. 362, 47 Atl. 923.

But in Nebola v. Minnesota Iron Co. 102 Minn. 89, 112 N. W. 880, 12 Ann. Cas. 56, it is held that, inasmuch as the law does not taken notice of parts of a day, the statute was suspended where the injury and the insanity resulting from it occurred on the same day.

And in Sasser v. Davis, 27 Tex. 656, mental incapacity resulting from the assault for which suit was brought was held to prevent the statute from running, the question of the time the incapacity began not being discussed.

Period of suspension.

When an insane person has been restored to his right mind for such length of time as to have enabled him to have looked into his affairs, and to have instituted an action to recover his rights, the statute will start and continue to run though the disability be drawn therefrom, are sufficient to bring the case within the statutory exception. It alleges that in July, 1899, she had become a "morphine fiend," and was affected with "morphinomania," although she did not know this until 1910; that the habit was so fixed and permanent that she was unable to control her desire for the drug, and was wholly under the influence of the defendant Mary A. Gillmore; that she first fully realized that she had been addicted to the use of morphine, and first fully realized the wrongs practised upon her, after she had been cured of the habit, in 1910. It also alleges that the plaintiff had become "mentally weak and incapacitated." This is said however, of her condition at the time of the commencement of the action,—not when her cause of action accrued. To say that a person is addicted to the morphine habit does not necessarily imply that he is of unsound mind, or under legal disability. But where it is added that he is afflicted with "morphinomania," is wholly under the influence of another person, and does not realize his condition, we think a basis is laid for introducing evidence. In Howard v. Carter, 71 Kan. 85, 80 Pac. 61, an allegation that the plaintiff was "mentally weak" was held a sufficient plea of incapacity. There was no clear and explicit evidence that the plaintiff's condition, as the result of the morphine habit, amounted to unsoundness of mind. But upon the entire record we think there was room for an inference to that effect. A physician testified that a person in her condition is incompetent of exercising any judgment and discretion in the ordinary business affairs of life; that he is not responsible; is a maniac; his will power is gone; he cannot fix his attention on anything; and he starts to do something he will forget it. He also gave testimony of a contrary tendency, but the present question is whether there was any evidence at all to support the theory of legal incapacity. Another witness said that at times the plaintiff's mind wandered,—that there was no sense to her talk. A letter written by her gives room for an returned. Clark v. Trial, 1 Met. (Ky.) 35; Duncan v. Vick, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 750.

In Verdery v. Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. 82 Ga. 675, 9 S. E. 1133, a somewhat different rule was adopted, it being held that successive periods of competency may be added in making up the statutory period.

The statute begins to run from the time of the removal of the disability and knowledge of the existence of the deeds in question. Dicken v. Johnson, 7 Ga. 484.

Restoration of sanity will start the statute running, so that, though a woman is insane when married, subsequent sanity for the prescriptive period will bar any right of action by her heir to recover her property from the husband. Ward v. Dulaney, 23 Miss. 410.

The Pennsylvania statute provides that no exception to the statute shall extend more than thirty years after the right of entry to land accrues to any person within the exception, and it was held that the time began to run from the date of the deed, not from the death of the lunatic. Boyd v. Weber, 193 Pa. 651, 44 Atl. 1078.

The suspension of the statute ends with the death of the incompetent. Parker v. Betts, 47 Colo. 428, 107 Pac. 816; Wood v. Wood, 136 Iowa, 128, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 891, 125 Am. St. Rep. 223, 113 N. W. 492; Sanford v. Sanford, 2 Hun, 94; Arnold v. Arnold, 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 174, 55 Am. Dec. 434; Warlick v. Plonk, 103 N. C. 81, 9 S. E. 190.

And the general rule that disabilities cannot be piled one upon another, but a party claiming the benefit of the exception can avail himself only of the disability existing when the right of action first accrued (25 Cyc. 1270), has been applied where the incompetent's heirs are under similar disability at the time of his death, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that fact not affecting the running of the statute against them. Hale v. Ritchie, 142 Ky. 424, 134 S. W. 474; Bensell v. Chancellor, 5 Whart. 371, 34 Am. Dec. 561; Griswold v. Butler, 3 Conn. 227.

In Thurman v. Shelton, 10 Yerg. 383, it was held that the statute began to run as to the real property of a non compos at his death, but not as to his chattels until letters of administration were granted.

In Molton v. Henderson, 62 Ala. 426, it was held, that death of the trustee of the estate of a lunatic, who might have brought suit, does not interrupt the running of the statute of limitations against the lunatic.

But in Bradley v. Singletary, — Ala. —, 59 So. 58, it was held that the statute did not run against a non compos as to a conveyance made fraudulently by his guardian, the ward being in effect without a guardian as to the subject-matter.

And in Bourne v. Hall, 10 R. I. 139, it was held that the fact that a non compos had guardians who might have sued for him does not qualify the privilege conferred upon him by the exceptions in the statute of limitations.

Disability never shortens the period of limitation, so that a provision extending the statute for a certain period after the disability is removed will in no event bar the right of action in a shorter time than the original prescriptive period. Langer v. Newmann, 100 Minn. 27, 110 N. W. 68; Fowler v. Pritchard, 148 Ala. 261, 41 So. 667.

In Iowa the statute is construed to mean that the period of limitation runs against an insane person, but is extended for one year after the disability is removed. McNeil v. Sigler, 95 Iowa, 587, 64 N. W. 604.

argument that her mind was not unsound, but cannot be said to establish this conclusively. We think there was sufficient evidence of incapacity to require the overruling of the demurrer. Cases on the general subject are collected in the works cited, but few of them are sufficiently similar to this to be helpful. 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 237; 25 Cyc. 1265; Note in Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1013; Note in 39 L.R.A. 262; 5 Words & Phrases, 4060; 8 Words & Phrases, 7212.

As to the defendant Frank B. Gillmore, we conclude after a careful examination, that there was no substantial evidence against him upon the merits of the action, and that as to him the demurrer was properly sustained. There was evidence that he knew his son was afflicted with a communicable disease, but the same evidence showed that he told the bride's father of the fact before the marriage took place, so he cannot be regarded as having induced the wedding by concealing the fact. And we find no evidence of complicity on his part in the administering of morphine to the plaintiff. That he was willing to pay the expense of having her treated for the habit does not justify the inference that he was a party to its formation. In this state a husband is not liable for a tort committed by his wife where he is not a participant. Norris v. Corkill, 32 Kan. 409, 49 Am. Rep. 489, 4 Pac. 862.

The judgment is reversed as to Mary A. Gillmore and affirmed as to Frank B. Gillmore.

Johnston, Ch. J., and Burck, Smith, Benson, and West, JJ., concur.

Porter, J., dissenting:

I adhere to the view expressed in the former opinion (91 Kan. 293, 295, 137 Pac. 958), where it was said: "It seems clear, therefore, that the plaintiff, many years before this action was brought, not only knew of the fact that the morphine habit had been fixed upon her, and how this had been accomplished, but also knew, at least in a general way, the nature and consequences of the habit." (p. 295.) To my mind it seems incredible that during all the years from 1899 to 1910 the plaintiff could have been wholly under the control of the defendant, or that she first fully realized in 1910 the wrongs practised upon her, and first realized that she had been addicted to the use of morphine after she had been cured of the habit, in 1910. In my opinion, these claims are wholly unsupported by evidence, and are contradicted by her own testimony. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. H. Settle for appellant.

Mr. John W. Douglas for appellee.

Nunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Hixson sued to recover of Slocum damages for assault and battery, and upon the trial in the lower court the jury returned a verdict in favor of Slocum, the defendant.

The parties are elderly men living in the town of Owenton; but on the day of the difficulty Slocum had returned to town in a new automobile after a visit to the Note. — Right of self-defense against assault provoked by abusive language.

Generally, as to the right of accused who began conflict to plead self-defense, see note to Fouth v. State, 45 L.R.A. 687.

As to the right of officer to arrest without warrant for abusive language, see note in 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 881.

As to abusive language as justification for assault on passenger by train employee, see note in 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 280.

Both civil and criminal cases are included in this note, which is intended to treat generally of the right of self-defense against any assault provoked by the abusive or insulting language of the accused, either to his assailant or to some third person. While it includes a number of cases in which there was something more than opprobrious language relied upon to deprive the accused of his right to protect himself against injury, it is primarily the purpose of this note to include only those cases passing upon the question whether or not such language in itself is sufficient to take away this common right of all who do not seek to use it as a means of offense instead of defense.

country. The machine attracted quite a crowd, and Slocum insists that the presence of the machine and the crowd immediately in front of Hixson's hotel was a mere coincidence. Hixson maintains that it was premeditated on the part of Slocum, so that Slocum might come upon Hixson and provoke him to a difficulty. Slocum admits that he had had two drinks. The other evidence in the case shows that he was either drunk, or considerably under the influence of whisky. At all events, these enemies of long standing were thus brought together, and Hixson says that Slocum broke the years of silence in these words addressed to Hixson: "We are always fighting each other." Hixson replied: "You are fighting whisky," and turned back into his hotel. In a few minutes he came out, and Slocum was still on the sidewalk in front of the hotel, and seeing Hixson on his hotel porch, Slocum spoke to him with vile and vulgar epithets. Hixson came down the steps from the hotel, and according to his evidence, when he came to the last step, he reached for Slocum with his left hand, and held his right arm extended down by his side. Slocum then struck Hixson three times with what Slocum terms a "little rattan cane." Another witness testifies that, at the time Slocum used the cane, Hixson was either on the last step of his hotel, or the sidewalk, he could not say which. All of the other witnesses say that he was off the step, and went to Slocum out on the sidewalk.

sential to the right of self-defense that the accused should not have been the aggressor in the difficulty, that is, as some courts say, he must be wholly free from fault in provoking the trouble (Baldwin v. State, 111 Ala. 11, 20 So. 528; McQueen v. State, 103 Ala. 12, 15 So. 824; Gibson v. State, 89 Ala. 121, 18 Am. St. Rep. 98, 8 So. 98; Bankhead v. State, 124 Ala. 14, 26 So. 979), or reasonably free therefrom, as others say. So the question involved in this note may be said to resolve itself into the question whether the accused's use of offensive language in provoking the difficulty amounts to such provocation as to make him the aggressor in such sense as to deprive him of the right to defend himself.

Clearly, where, as in Alabama, the rule of absolute freedom from fault prevails, it would seem that the use of opprobrious language in provoking an assault abrogates the right of self-defense. See Alabama cases previously cited; also Harrison v. State, 144 Ala. 20, 40 So. 568; Myers v. State, 62 Ala. 599; Jackson v. State, 81 Ala. 33, 1 So. 33.

And in Howell v. State, 79 Ala. 283, it is said that the combatant who provokes a difficulty by using the first words of insult, or otherwise, being regarded as the aggressor, cannot plead that he afterward struck in self-defense, whether he fought willingly or unwillingly.

But this is not true as to one who merely answers one verbal insult or abusive epithet with another. This does not deprive him of the privilege of afterward defending himself without being amenable to the law, provided he did not fight willingly or by his voluntary consent. Not being the author or originator of the difficulty, he may still protect his person from assault and injury, by opposing force to force as far as may be necessary, taking care that he uses no more violence than is requisite to repel the attack upon him; that is, that his defense does not degenerate into aggression. Ibid.

bama court. As in Hixson v. Slocum, some courts, proceeding upon the theory that abusive language toward another, no matter how grievous, is not sufficient justification or provocation for an assault, hold that one who uses such language is not thereby deprived of his right of self-defense, and may employ such force as is necessary to prevent the other from doing him personal injury. State v. Higgerson, 157 Mo. 395, 57 S. W. 1014; State v. McDaniel, 94 Mo. 301, 7 S. W. 634; Smith v. State, 75 Miss. 542, 23 So. 260; Allen v. Com. 80 Ky. 642, 6 S. W. 645; Wheatley v. State, 93 Ark. 409, 125 S. W. 414; People v. Curtis, 52 Mich. 616, 18 N. W. 385.

So, one is not deprived of the right of self-defense by the fact that he seeks another to straighten out a misunderstanding, and, during the interview, applies to him opprobrious epithets which provoke an assault. State v. Doris, 51 Or. 136, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 660, 94 Pac. 44.

The same is true of one who seeks an interview with, and uses words of abuse and vilification toward, another who he is justified in believing has insulted his wife. Gray v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 90, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 513, 114 S. W. 635.

And that one after arming himself, before asking an explanation of insulting language spoken of him, upon the repetition of such language without provocation on his part, replies in terms equally insulting, does not deprive him of the right to take his adversary's life in self-defense. Shannon v. State, 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 2, 60 Am. St. Rep. 17, 28 S. W. 687.

And the right to defend one's self from a public horse whipping is not defeated by the circulation of slanders about relatives of the assailant. State v. Bartlett, 170 Mo. 658, 59 L.R.A. 756, 71 S. W. 148.

So, one assaulted by citizens of a town for the purpose of compelling him to leave it is not bound to retreat to avoid a conflict, in order to protect himself from liability to prosecution for assault, but he may repel force with force as long as he uses only such force as is necessary, short of killing his assailants, even though he Hixson explains that he carried his right arm to his side because his right hand was crippled. It is not shown that Slocum knew this fact, and therefore Slocum's statement is not without plausibility that he feared Hixson was trying to grab and hold him with his left hand, and with his right use a knife on him, and which he believes Hixson was carrying. Slocum admits that when Hixson returned from the hotel he addressed Hixson without Hixson having said anything to him, and called him the vile names as testified to by Hixson; but he takes issue with Hixson as to the words spoken before Hixson went into the hotel. He claims while in the crowd, and finding himself standing in Hixson's presence, he said to him, "Why can't we be friends?" Hixson replied, "You are fighting boose; you are drunk now." Slocum replied, "Every time I speak to you, Mr. Hixson, you insult me." Then Hixson went into the hotel, and returning, Slocum began the conversation by saying, "Mr. Hixson, you always go out of your way to insult people." Both agree that then Hixson ordered him away, and that Slocum called him the vile names which soon led to the encounter.

It is not shown that Hixson suffered any physical injury, and his whole complaint is that Slocum brought on the difficulty by the provoking language used, and his chief effort is to magnify the effect of Slocum's words; while Slocum is mainly concerned in minimizing the size of his "little rattan provoked the attack by profane and obscene language, drunkenness, and other disorderly conduct. State v. Evenson, 122 Iowa, 83, 64 L.R.A. 77, 97 N. W. 979.

In Georgia, by statute, opprobrious words may justify a simple assault or an assault and battery, but they do not justify an attack with a deadly weapon, made in a manner likely to produce death. And where such an attack is made upon the accused upon the sole provocation of his language to his assailant, the latter is engaged in the commission of a felony upon him, against which he has the right to defend himself to the extent, if necessary, of taking his assailant's life. Provocation of this kind not only does not justify a deadly assault, but it is not such provocation as could be considered in mitigation, so as to reduce the assailant's guilt from murder to manslaughter, if the assault should prove fatal. Of course, if the purpose of the accused in his language and conduct on the particular occasion is to provoke an attack which will afford him a pretext for killing his assailant or inflicting serious bodily harm upon him, the necessity afterward arising to kill in defense of his own life would not render the killing justifiable. The law will not hold him guiltless who thus creates the necessity to kill another. But if he has no purpose of this kind, the fact that the language he uses to his assailant is the occasion of the difficulty does not render him chargeable with having brought on the assault or created the necessity to kill, if it appears that the attack upon him exceeds the provocation, and is of such an aggravated character as to be without any legal justification or excuse. He is not responsible for a result which, in the eyes of the law, is not a legitimate result of his words or conduct, and which therefore he is not legally bound to anticipate. One who insults another by opprobrious words may be bound to anticipate that the person insulted will repel the insult to the extent the law allows, but he is not bound to anticipate that the latter will go to the extent of trying to take his life; and if such

cation than mere words, and the person thus assaulted kills his assailant under a reasonable belief that it is necessary to do so in order to save his own life, it is neither murder nor manslaughter. Butler v. State, 92 Ga. 601, 19 S. E. 51; Boatwright v. State, 89 Ga. 140, 15 S. E. 21; Crawley v. State, 7 Ga. App. 95, 66 S. E. 273; Sam v. State, 124 Ga. 25, 52 S. E. 18; Brown v. State, 58 Ga. 212. See also Mitchell v. State, 41 Ga. 527.

The whole idea here is that when the prosecutor made an assault of greater degree than the opprobrious words would justify, he put himself in the wrong, and placed himself in the same attitude as if he were the aggressor ab initio; and the defendant had the right to make any counter attack upon him that would not exceed the necessities of a defense against his attack. Crawley v. State, 7 Ga. App. 95, 66 S. E. 273.

So, a defendant who used profane and abusive language to another was not thereby precluded from defending herself with her fists against an attack made upon her by a third person with a board. Arthur v. State, 9 Ga. App. 298, 70 S. E. 1127.

In South Carolina, on the other hand, it is stated that the true rule is that the plea of self-defense is not available to one who used language which was so opprobrious that a reasonable man would expect it to bring on a physical encounter, and which did actually contribute to bringing it on. State v. Rowell, 75 S. C. 494, 56 S. E. 23; State v. Ferguson, 91 S. C. 235, 74 S. E. 502; State v. Lee, 85 S. C. 101, 137 Am. St. Rep. 869, 67 S. E. 141; State v. Hunter, 82 S. C. 153, 63 S. E. 685. See also State v. Trammell, 40 S. C. 331, 42 Am. St. Rep. 874, 18 S. E. 940.

This rule is not limited to opprobrious language used toward the deceased himself. Opprobrious or insulting language directed to a man's wife or daughter, or to some other person in his care and under his protection, in his presence, might and probably would provoke a difficulty even more quickly than if directed to himself; and the person who used it might reasonably expect ane," and the amount of whisky he had imbibed that day. Ordinarily one in an intoxicated condition is not a safe bearer of the olive branch, and if he goes to his enemy to bury the hatchet, he should be careful not to carry the hatchet with him. Reasoning from these propositions, Slocum was not at all discreet, if in fact he was sincere, in his effort to make peace with Hixson; but the action here is not to recover damages for language used, or words spoken of or concerning Hixson, but for the assault and battery committed upon him. An actionable assault "is any attempt or offer with force or violence, to do a corporal hurt to another, whether from malice or wantonness, with such circumstances as denote, at the time, an intention to do it, coupled with a present ability to carry such intention into effect." 3 Cyc. 1020. And the same book (pages 1021 and 1022) further correctly defines an assault and battery "as an unlawful touching of the person of another by the aggressor himself;" and again "the force or violence attempted or offered must be physical, and no words of themselves can constitute an assault." In the case of White v. South Covington & C. S. R. Co. 150 Ky. 684, 150 S. W. 838, this court held: "An assault . . . is not excused . . . by the fact that the passenger [assaulted] had used grossly profane and abusive language . . . without provocation." Applying these fundamental principles to the facts, it would seem that the lower court was that it would, and therefore he would be at fault in bringing on the difficulty. State v. Ferguson, 91 S. C. 235, 74 S. E. 502; People v. Curtis, 52 Mich. 616, 18 N. W. 385.

Whether or not the language used in a particular instance was so opprobrious that it might have reasonably been expected to bring on a difficulty is a question of fact for the jury. State v. Ferguson, supra.

Notwithstanding the difference in the decisions of the courts on this question, it would seem, upon reason and principle, that the true rule should be that abusive or insulting language reasonably calculated to provoke a physical encounter deprives one of the right of self-defense against a simple assault provoked thereby, but not against an aggravated or deadly assault. This rule would fix the penalty according to the offense; and the decision in State v. Gordon, 191 Mo. 114, 109 Am. St. Rep. 790, 89 S. W. 1025, seems to sustain it, but the decision in that case is based upon the Butler and Boatwright Cases, supra. See also Harris v. Com. 140 Ky. 41, 130 S. W. 801.

All the courts, however, seem to agree upon one point, and that is that one cannot use opprobrious language for the purpose of provoking an assault, and affording him a pretext for wreaking his malice upon his adversary, and then exercise his right of self-defense. State v. Lewis, 118 Mo. 79, 23 S. W. 1082; State v. Higginson, 157 Mo. 395, 57 S. W. 1014; State v. McDaniel, 94 Mo. 301, 7 S. W. 634; Butler v. State, 92 Ga. 601, 19 S. E. 51; Wheatley v. State, 93 Ark. 409, 125 S. W. 414; Allen v. Com. 86 Ky. 642, 6 S. W. 645; Jackson v. State, 32 Tex. Crim. Rep. 192, 22 S. W. 831; Hays v. Territory, — Okla. —, 52 Pac. 950, reversed on rehearing in 7 Okla. 15, 54 Pac. 300; State v. Bryant, 102 Mo. 24, 14 S. W. 822; State v. Scott, 41 Minn. 365, 43 N. W. 62; Barstado v. State, 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 255, 87 S. W. 344. See also Garza v. State, 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 382, 88 S. W. 231; Pedro v. State, 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 406, 88 S. W. 233; Gray v. State, 61 Tex. Crim. Rep. 454, 135 S. W. 1179.

ready to fight cannot provoke an assault by insulting language, and, when assaulted with a mere blow of the fist, at once shoot his assailant. Hollingsworth v. Warnock, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 883, 47 S. W. 770. See also to the same effect, Cartwright v. State, 14 Tex. App. 486.

Where defendant used abusive language to decedent, and decedent expressed his intention of striking him if he repeated such language, and he did repeat it, it was held in State v. Doherty, 52 Or. 591, 98 Pac. 152, that defendant could not successfully set up the right of self-defense, unless he had, in good faith, withdrawn, or attempted to withdraw, from the conflict. Such a holding the court said was but an announcement of the general rule that one who provokes a difficulty in which he kills another cannot plead self-defense, unless he, in good faith, withdrew, or attempted to withdraw, therefrom. People v. McGrath, 47 Hun, 325, 13 N. Y. S. R. 359, is to the same effect.

Evidence of vile language applied to the deceased by defendant, in People v. Dobbins, 138 Cal. 694, 72 Pac. 339, was held sufficient to countervail against the plea of self-defense, and to justify a verdict of murder in the first degree.

In Shaw v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 73 S. W. 1046, it was held that if defendant provoked the difficulty by cursing and abusing the injured party, he could not justify on the ground of self-defense.

Besides the cases already cited containing other circumstances than mere abusive language as ground for the denial of the right of self-defense, see the following cases: People v. Robertson, 67 Cal. 646, 8 Pac. 600, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 519; Godfrey v. Com. 15 Ky. L. Rep. 3, 21 S. W. 1047; State v. McDonald, 67 Mo. 13; State v. Kloss, 117 Mo. 591, 23 S. W. 780; Hinton v. State, 24 Tex. 454; King v. State, 13 Tex. App. 277; Carver v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 148 S. W. 746; Isaacs v. State, 25 Tex. 174; Barnett v. State, 100 Ind. 171; Turner v. State, 80 Tenn. 547, 15 S. W. 838; Smith v. State, 105 Tenn. 305, 60 S. W. 145; Moore v. People, 26 Colo. 213, 57 Pac. 857. W. W. A.

very liberal with Hixson in suffering his case to go to the jury at all.

The first encounter was a mere war of words, and upon which no action can or is attempted to be based. Slocum remained upon the sidewalk, where he had a right to be. Although on the second encounter Slocum began it by the use of abusive language, still that did not justify Hixson leaving his premises to come upon the sidewalk, and grab, or attempt to grab, Slocum. Under such circumstances the jury were warranted in finding, under the court's instructions, that "the defendant (Slocum) then and there believed, or had reasonable grounds to believe, that the plaintiff was about to inflict upon him great bodily harm," and that in striking Hixson with the cane, he used only such means or force at his command as was necessary to resist the assault of plaintiff, and he was thereby excusable on the grounds of self-defense.

Appellant concedes that the instructions given by the court correctly apply the law to the general run of assault and battery cases, but insists that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury so that they might believe the assault was begun with the first passage of words, and that the defendant was therefore the aggressor, and for that reason he cannot justify assaulting Hixson with the cane upon the grounds of self-defense. But, as we have seen, words do not constitute an assault, and therefore they cannot be the beginning of one.

Neither is appellant's contention sound that he had a right to go upon the sidewalk and make or force Slocum to leave it. The sidewalk belongs to the public. If Slocum's conduct was equivalent to a breach of the peace, he should have been prosecuted for it, and the record discloses the fact that he was. Appellant was not justified in attempting to take the law into his own hands.

While there is very little conflict of a material kind in the testimony, such as there was, under proper instructions of the court, the jury considered, and in rendering a verdict for Slocum, the appellee, we are unable to discover that they erred.

We therefore affirm the judgment of the lower court.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment obtained by Amos Allen, who sues by his guardian, against the appellant, Dr. Peyton Ligon, for damages for alleged malpractice in the treatment of appellee's broken arm.

On December 4, 1911, the appellee, a boy about nine years of age, fell from a box to the floor of his father's store and fractured the bone in his arm called the humerus, about 2 inches above the elbow. The appellant, a practising physician, was promptly called and set the arm, binding it in splints and leaving the finger tips exposed. Appellant says he examined the fracture and placed the ends of the bones in a position, retaining them in position by placing an angular splint from axilla to the ends of the fingers inside of the arm, and from shoulder to elbow joint on the outside, and that over these he applied a wider bandage down to and including the hand, leaving a part of the fingers exposed. He left the boy about 10 o'clock at night, with instructions for the father to call him promptly if the boy suffered any pain or showed any symptoms that indicated the need of attention. The father did not call appellant during the night. On the morning of the second day thereafter, about thirty six hours after he had applied the dressing, appellant made his second visit, and from an examination of the exposed fingers he saw the circulation of the arm was not good. He thereupon removed the dressing

I. Introduction.

This note is supplementary to the one appended to Dederichs v. Salt Lake City R. Co. 35 L.R.A. 802, where the earlier cases will be found.

The effect and conclusiveness of photographs as evidence are discussed in a note to Higgs v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1162, and that question is excluded from this note.

II. In general.

Photographs duly verified are admissible as aids to the jury in understanding the evidence or the situation or condition of objects or premises material and relevant to the issues. Higgs v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 16 N. D. 446, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1162, 114 N. W. 722, 15 Ann. Cas. 97; Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Morris, 80 Ark. 528, 98 S. W. 363, 10 Ann. Cas. 618; Davidson v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 164 Mo. App. 701, 148 S. W. 406.

But it is better to exclude photographs which can serve no special purpose. State v. Hossack, 116 Iowa, 194, 89 N. W. 1077.

Thus, photographs of a horse hitched to a carriage and standing at rest were properly excluded as having no tendency to disprove its alleged habit of kicking, which was the issue. Morgan v. Hendrick, 80 Vt. 284, 67 Atl. 702.

And when it is not shown that photographs will develop anything new or strengthen other proof, their rejection is not prejudicial error. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Wilson, 87 Ill. App. 360.

However, if a photograph might be of some assistance in determining the issues presented to the jury, it should be admitted. Re Lyle, 93 Neb. 768, 141 N. W. 1127.

The difference between the image made upon a photographic plate and that made upon the retina of the eye is no reason for excluding the former, but goes only to its effect as evidence. The jury should, however, be carefully warned against the liability of the photograph to mislead. Scott v. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

New Orleans, 21 C. C. A. 402, 41 U. S. App. 498, 75 Fed. 373.

Notice to the other party of the taking of a photograph is not necessary to render it admissible. Mauch v. Hartford, 112 Wis. 40, 87 N. W. 816, 11 Am. Neg. Rep. 63; Hawkins v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 36 Tex. Civ. App. 633, 83 S. W. 52.

The trial judge may in his discretion allow photographs which have been put in evidence to be taken to the jury room. Williams v. Carterville, 97 Ill. App. 160; State v. Shaw, 73 Vt. 149, 50 Atl. 863, 13 Am. Crim. Rep. 51. And the appellate court cannot revise the exercise of his discretion in the matter. Halloran v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 211 Mass. 132, 97 N. E. 631.

The jury may properly be allowed to inspect a photograph with a magnifying glass. State v. Wallace, 78 Conn. 677, 63 Atl. 448.

III. Preliminary proof.

a. In general.

Where the photographer's testimony showed that photographs were misleading as to the distances, objects, and conditions they purported to represent, they should not have been admitted. Morris v. Territory, 1 Okla. Crim. Rep. 617, 99 Pac. 760, 101 Pac. 111.

In Chicago v. Hutchinson, 129 Ill. App. 239, where photographs had been admitted to show only the general surroundings of the place of an accident, it was held to be error to reject subsequent testimony offered to prove their accuracy as to the condition of the ice and snow at the time of the accident, so as to make them admissible to show such condition.

One need not be a photographer or an expert to testify as to whom a photograph looks like. Russell v. State, — Ala. —, 38 So. 291.

b. Necessity for showing accuracy.

Photographs are legitimate evidence, but must be shown by other evidence to be and found the arm to be considerably swollen, with blisters on it, and other evidence of defective circulation. Appellant then called Dr. Letcher to see the case with him on the same day; and, owing to the defective circulation of the arm, the doctors discarded the splints and used only bandages to hold the cotton on the arm, and splints only for the purpose of protecting the arm.

Appellee testified that he had suffered greatly during the night, but that the pain was removed intermittently by taking several small tablets which appellant had left with his father to be given to the boy in case his arm pained him.

Appellant says, however, that the defective circulation was not due to the tightness of the bandage, which had always been sufficiently loose not to interfere with the circulation, but that the defective circulation was due to some injury to an artery or pressure from the fragments of the broken bone which caused the formation of a clot, and that this, with a natural swelling of the parts, produced such pressure upon the musculospiral nerve as to interfere with the function of that nerve; and that this condition frequently results from such fracture where no bandages or splints have been used. For about ten days appellee continued to suffer greatly with his arm. At the end of that time appellant and Dr. Letcher extended the arm for the purpose of increasing the circulation and relieving the pressure of the blood supply; Dr. Floyd administering the chloroform, and photographs of the place or objects they purport to represent. Smart v. Kapsas City, 91 Mo. App. 586.

Thus, in Beardslee v. Columbia Twp. 188 Pa. 496, 68 Am. St. Rep. 883, 41 Atl. 617, the court said: "Photographs are competent evidence, and when properly taken are judicially recognized as of a high order of accuracy. . . . But in careless or inexpert or interested hands, they are capable of very serious misrepresentation of the original. Before they are permitted to be used in the trial, therefore, there should always be preliminary proof of care and accuracy in the taking of them, and of their relevancy to the issue before the jury."

Photographs unsupported by any proof that they correctly represent the place shown as it was at the time of an accident are properly excluded. Goldsboro v. Central R. Co. 60 N. J. L. 49, 37 Atl. 433, 2 Am. Neg. Rep. 408.

A photograph introduced to show the height of a rail from the ground is inadmissible without preliminary evidence as to its accuracy. Cunningham v. Fair Haven & W. R. Co. 72 Conn. 244, 43 Atl. 1047, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 427.

And in Com. v. Stirling, 10 Pa. Dist. R. 437, the court said: "Where the offer of a photograph in evidence may affect so serious a question as one of life or death, the offer ought to be accompanied with proof of the circumstances under which the photograph was taken, and of its subsequent custody and history."

But it must be presumed by the appellate court that the preliminary proof is sufficient in the absence of anything appearing to the contrary. Griffin v. Fredonia Brick Co. 90 Kan. 375, 133 Pac. 574.

Although it was error to permit a witness to refer to a photograph and point out upon it the place of an accident, without any proof as to its accuracy, the error was cured by making the necessary proof before the photograph was formally admitted in evidence. Beardslee v. Columbia Twp. supra.

However, in Cubbage v. Youngerman, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

155 Iowa, 39, 134 N. W. 1074, it was held that photographs which have not been sufficiently verified to be admissible as independent evidence may be used as illustrations enabling a witness to testify more intelligibly.

In the absence of proof of its correctness, a photograph of plaintiff in an action for assault and battery, taken on the day of the assault, to show plaintiff's injuries, is inadmissible. Martin v. Moore, 99 Md. 41, 57 Atl. 671.

c. Effect of time of taking.

The time at which a photograph was taken is not important except as to the probability of change in the conditions or objects shown, and, ordinarily, when witnesses are able to verify photographs as substantially correct representations of conditions as they were at the time in question, they will be admitted in evidence, though taken at a different time. Tracy v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 98 Fed. 633; M. McGirr Sons Co. v. Babbitt, 61 Misc. 291, 113 N. Y. Supp. 753; Mahar v. Montello Granite Co. 146 Wis. 46, 130 N. W. 949.

Thus, though photographs of the scene of a crossing accident were taken several months after the accident, at a time when there was no snow on the ground and after a building had been removed, they were admissible where these changes did not materially affect their value for the purpose for which they were introduced. Sherlock v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 24 N. D. 40, 138 N. W. 976.

The fact that photographs were taken one and two years after the date involved does not render them incompetent when they are offered to show the topography of the country and other permanent conditions. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Dale, 36 Okla. 114, 128 Pac. 137.

If the changes made between the time when an accident occurred and when a photograph was taken were not so great as to be entirely misleading, it may properly be introduced, allowance being made

Dr. Forward being present. The doctors agree in the opinion that no surgical interference at that time was proper, and that such interference would have been dangerous. In the meantime the blisters upon the arm had developed into running sores.

About three weeks after the fracture the arm was examined by Drs. Watson and Smith. Upon a careful examination and measurement, the arm was found not to have shortened. Thereafter appellant and Dr. Letcher made daily visits to appellee for some time, and later visiting him at intervals of every three or four days, until February 14th, when they ceased to call at his father's residence, but instructed the father to bring the boy to appellant's office in order that he might observe the condition of the boy's arm and direct such treatment as might be needed. In the meantime the father was instructed to massage and flex the fingers and elbow joint.

Appellant testifies that, when he and Dr. Letcher saw the boy's arm for the last time, on February 14th, its condition was much improved; that the bore had united and showed no deformity or shortening of the arm; that it was healing in a satisfactory manner; and that appellant and Dr. Letcher then believed that with continued massaging, which they repeatedly urged upon the boy's father as of supreme importance, the arm would be restored to all its motions. Appellee, however, did not go to appellant's office after February 14th. And a few for the changes. Craig v. Augusta-Aiken R. Co. 93 S. C. 49, 76 S. E. 21.

Where photographs of a hole in a sidewalk were shown to represent conditions as they were at the time of the injury, they were equally admissible though taken two months after the accident, as though they had been taken on the day it occurred. San Antonio v. Talerico, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 78 S. W. 28.

It is proper to admit photographs of a house and its surroundings, the scene of a murder, upon testimony of several witnesses that they correctly represent the place as it was at the time of the murder, though there is no satisfactory proof as to when the photographs were taken. Gibson v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 349, 110 S. W. 41.

Where the physical condition of plaintiff before and after an injury is in issue, it is proper to admit a photograph of him taken two months before the injury, upon his testifying that it was a good likeness of himself as he appeared at the time of the injury. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Harper, 53 Tex. Civ. App. 614, 114 S. W. 1169, 1199.

It is not error to admit a photograph of plaintiff taken two and one-half years before an accident, and another taken after, their correctness and accuracy being established by witnesses. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Cluck, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 84 S. W. 852.

A photograph of deceased, shown by her parents to be a correct likeness of her as she appeared shortly before her death, though taken two years prior thereto, was admissible for the purpose of identifying her as the woman a witness had seen in defendant's office under such peculiar circumstances that he observed her critically. State v. McCoy, 15 Utah, 136, 49 Pac. 420.

And the fact that a photograph of a murdered girl was taken two or three years before her disappearance does not render it inadmissible, where a sister testifies that it fairly represented her as she appeared at the time of her disappearance. People v. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 Pac. 75, 10 Am. Crim. Rep. 499.

In the absence of proof of change, it will be presumed that photographs of a bridge and an approaching trestle represent conditions as they were at the time of an accident, though they were taken long afterward. Wade v. Southern R. Co. 89 S. C. 280, 71 S. E. 859.

The fact that a photograph of an injured leg was taken long after the injury would be proper to consider upon the weight which should be given it, but would not affect its competency. Bonnet v. Foote, 47 Colo. 282, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 136, 107 Pac. 252.

But in Porter v. Buckley, 78 C. C. A. 138, 147 Fed. 140, photographs were held properly excluded on the ground that they were taken more than a year after the accident, and disclosed conditions which could not be proved to have been the same at the time of the accident.

And it was not error to exclude photographs of a railroad crossing taken three years after an accident, where it was not shown that the crossing was in the same condition when photographed as when the accident occurred. Columbia & P. D. R. Co. v. State, 105 Md. 34, 65 Atl. 625.

So, the fact that a photograph of an old man was taken twenty-nine years before the time it was sought to identify him as having been seen by a certain person is sufficient at least to make its exclusion a proper question for judicial discretion. State v. Ready, 77 N. J. L. 329, 72 Atl. 445.

And in Western Maryland R. Co. v. Martin, 110 Md. 554, 73 Atl. 267, where plaintiff, who offered a photograph in evidence, was unable to tell when it was taken or from what position or how long ago, but could say only that it represented conditions before a fill was made, according to his way of looking at them, its admission was held to be error.

A photograph of a plaintiff in a personal injury action, taken nine years before trial, should not have been admitted, as it could only have misled the jury with-weeks thereafter appellant learned from appellee's father that he had sent the boy away for treatment; the father declining, however, to tell where he had sent him.

Appellee testifies, however, that his arm became stiff and the hand drawn, and that, by the time he had been discharged by appellant, on February 14th, the muscles had hardened, rendering the arm and hand practically useless. This condition of the arm, however, was not reported to appellant.

In April appellee's father sent appellee to Dr. Ford, at Livermore, Kentucky, for examination and treatment. Dr. Ford took an X-ray photograph of the arm and concluded that an operation would be necessary in order to relieve the pain caused by what he thought was the lapped bone of the broken arm. This operation was performed by Dr. Ford and his assistant, in which they took off about an inch of the protruding bone, and then wired the two ends together with a silver cord. Appellee testifies that the operation relieved the pain and enabled him to raise his hand as high as his shoulder, but the muscles and ligaments in the arm remained atrophied; the arm becoming withered to some extent and having little life.

Appellant testified that the X-ray photograph taken by Dr. Ford before the operation performed by him in April did not correctly show the condition of the boy's arm as it was at the last time appellant saw it in February, since the arm at that time was not shortened or deformed, and the boy then out proving any important fact for the appellee. Rock Island v. Drost, 71 Ill. App. 613.

d. Effect of change in conditions.

See also supra, III. c.

The effect of a change in conditions between the time in question and the time when the photograph offered in evidence was taken depends upon the extent of the change.

Thus, whether photographs of a building taken soon after a fire were sufficiently accurate to throw some light on the condition of the building at the time of the fire was a question of fact determinable at the trial. Turner v. Coheco Mfg. Co. 75 N. H. 521, 77 Atl. 999.

And in a suit involving the existence of a partnership at the time certain goods were sold, a photograph of the building in which the alleged partners were doing business was properly excluded, where it appeared that a sign had been removed so that the photograph did not represent the premises as they were at the time of the transactions involved. Alpaugh v. Hulse, 72 App. Div. 438, 76 N. Y. Supp. 571.

A photograph offered to show the general situation at a railroad and highway crossing was not rendered inadmissible by the fact that a car appeared in the photograph which was not there at the time of the accident, the jury being properly cautioned concerning it. Curtis v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 32 R. I. 542, 80 Atl. 127.

In State v. Rogers, 129 Iowa, 229, 105 N. W. 455, it was held that photographs of a room in which a murder was committed were admissible, it being shown that the partitions and entrances were the same, even though the furniture may not have been similarly located.

Though the season had changed and some trees had been trimmed at the place of an accident before photographs were taken, the action of the trial judge in admitting them will not be reversed without clear proof that injury was thereby inflicted 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

upon defendant. Maryland Electric R. Co. v. Beasley, 117 Md. 270, 83 Atl. 157.

And photographs of a wreck taken an hour after it occurred were properly admitted, the only change shown to have been made in the meantime being the piling up by workmen of ties which were torn loose and broken in the wreck. Johnson v. Union P. R. Co. 35 Utah, 285, 100 Pac. 390.

Where defendant put in evidence photographs of the sidewalk where plaintiff was injured, plaintiff could show that changes had been made between the time of the accident and the taking of the photograph. Achey v. Marion, 126 Iowa, 47, 101 N. W. 435.

e. Sufficiency of proof of correctness.

The correctness of the representation by a photograph of the objects portrayed need not be proved by the one who took it, but may be shown by any witness competent to speak from personal observation. Mow v. People, 31 Colo. 351, 72 Pac. 1069; McGar v. Bristol, 71 Conn. 652, 42 Atl. 1000; Temple v. Gilbert, 86 Conn. 335, 85 Atl. 380; Indiana Union Traction Co. v. Scribner, 47 Ind. App. 621, 93 N. E. 1014; Consolidated Gas, E. L. & P. Co. v. State, 109 Md. 186, 72 Atl. 651; McKarren v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 194 Mass. 179, 80 N. E. 477, 10 Ann. Cas. 961; Hall v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 76 Minn. 401, 79 N. W. 497; Stiasny v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 58 App. Div. 172, 68 N. Y. Supp. 694, affirmed without opinion in 172 N. Y. 656, 65 N. E. 1122; Com. v. Swartz, 40 Pa. Super. Ct. 375; Hughes v. State, 126 Tenn. 40, 148 S. W. 543, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1202; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Magee, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 49 S. W. 928; New York, S. & W. R. Co. v. Moore, 45 C. C. A. 21, 105 Fed. 725; Parker v. C. A. Smith Lumber & Mfg. Co. — Or. —, 138 Pac. 1061.

It was not error to admit enlargements of original photographs of the scene of an accident without calling the maker of the enlargements as a witness. Diller v. North- had full use of it at the elbow joint; the fingers were not deformed, but could be flexed and extended considerably; that the arm as a whole was in a very good condition and showed marked signs of improvement, with every reason to believe at the time that, if appellant's directions to flex and massage the fingers and elbow joint had been carried out, the use of the arm would have been restored. Dr. Letcher corroborates appellant in all respects as to the treatment of the boy's arm and its condition on February 14th, and states that the treatment of the arm by appellant was that which is usually given and required by good surgery in such cases.

Dr. Letcher further testified that, when he last examined the boy's arm on February

14th, there was very good motion in the elbow joint; no deformity of the arm at the point of the fracture nor in the hand; very good movement of the fingers and hand, with every indication that, if the improvement should continue, good use of the hand and arm would result; and that he joined appellant in urging upon appellee's father the importance of taking the boy to see the appellant at short intervals thereafter in order that he might see the injured arm and continue to advise as to future treatment. Dr. Letcher further says that he is satisfied the symptoms which developed in the arm could not have been produced from any bandage that had been applied, but was largely due to the general physical condition of the boy, which was poor; the mother

A photograph of a room in which a murder was committed is sufficiently authenticated by testimony of the person who took it that it was taken immediately after the shooting, and correctly represented the objects sought to be shown and their relative positions, though the photographer who finished the picture was not sworn. People v. Ah Lee, 164 Cal. 350, 128 Pac. 1035.

But in MacFeat v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 5 Penn. (Del.) 52, 62 Atl. 898, a photograph of the scene of an accident was held inadmissible, apparently because it was not taken by the witness offered to authenticate it, and a different photograph taken by the witness was admitted.

To render a photograph competent, it is not necessary that it be taken by a skilled photographer, it being sufficient to show that it is a correct likeness of the objects it purports to represent. Mow v. People, 31 Colo. 351, 72 Pac. 1069.

And an amateur who has taken but few photographs, and makes no claim to being an expert, is nevertheless competent to testify as a photographer, the limited character of his experience going to the weight rather than to the admissibility of his evidence. McGovern v. Hays, 75 Vt. 104, 53 Atl. 326.

A witness, to verify the correctness of the representation of a photograph, need not have seen the photograph taken. Huntington Light and Fuel Co. v. Beaver, 37 Ind. App. 4, 73 N. E. 1002; Hebbe v. Maple Creek, 121 Wis. 668, 99 N. W. 442.

The only identification of a photograph of the scene of an accident necessary is testimony that it properly represents the scene, which could be sworn to by any witness who knew the fact. Thompson v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. 48 Tex. Civ. App. 284, 106 S. W. 910.

So, where the testimony of several witnesses tended to show that the appearance of a place was fairly represented by photographs, it was not error to admit them, though no one in terms testified to their accuracy. Smith v. Central Vermont R. Co. 80 Vt. 208, 67 Atl. 535.

Testimony by prosecutor's physician that certain photographs were of prosecutor, and that the wounds appeared upon the photographs as they were upon his body at the time he examined him, is a sufficient showing of the accuracy of the photographs. Carter v. State, 4 Ala. App. 72, 59 So. 222.

When photographs of a corpse are used only for purposes of identification, there is no necessity for showing when, where, by whom, or under what circumstances they were taken. Lamb v. State, 69 Neb. 212, 95 N. W. 1050.

Where a witness who took photographs of a railroad crossing testified that they were correct representations of the surroundings, they were admissible. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Robbins, 38 Ind. App. 172, 76 N. E. 804.

The point of view from which a photograph is taken may affect its value as evidence, but not its admissibility. Ibid.

Testimony by one who took photographs of land, that he made the photographs and that there were rocks and brush on the land as shown in them, is sufficient to warrant their admission. Wicks v. German Loan & Invest. Co. 150 Iowa, 112, 129 N. W. 744.

Testimony of plaintiff that a photograph correctly represents the scene of an accident is sufficient to render it admissible. Accousi v. G. A. Stowers Furniture Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 87 S. W. 861.

But where the correctness of the position of dummy figures in a photograph depended only upon the testimony of plaintiff, who was unconscious when in the position which the photograph is supposed to show, it should not have been admitted. Riggs v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 216 Mo. 304, 115 S. W. 969.

And it was error to admit a photograph of a man's leg, showing an injury where plaintiff claimed he had been injured, in the absence of evidence identifying the photograph, or indicating when it was taken, or whose leg was shown, or whether of the boy having been tubercular and the boy addicted to the use of cigarettes. He says that, of all the fractures of the body, a fracture at the point where this one occurred is most frequently attended by stiffness of the elbow joint.

Drs. Floyd, Watson, Poole, and Forward all corroborated the appellant and Dr. Letcher to the effect that the treatment of appellee's arm by appellant was the proper treatment under the circumstances.

Upon the trial the jury returned a verdict for $3,000 damages and $105 doctors' bills; but upon a motion for a new trial, the court having suggested to plaintiff that the verdict was for too much, and that he should remit a thousand dollars thereof, the plaintiff agreed that the remittitur might be entered, whereupon the court reduced the judgment to $2,105, and the motion for a new trial was overruled. To this ruling the appellant excepted and was granted an appeal.

Appellant assigns four grounds for a reversal: (1) Error in admitting the X-ray photographs in evidence; (2) newly discovered evidence; (3) the verdict is flagrantly against the evidence; and (4) the court having found the verdict to be excessive, the plaintiff could not avoid a new trial by remitting a part of the verdict.

Dr. Ford was introduced by appellee and testified that he first examined appellee's arm about April 4, 1912, and found the arm was swollen, distorted, and paralyzed, and that he operated on April 16th. He says it truly represented the character of plaintiff's injury. Hammond Packing Co. v. Dickey, 106 C. C. A. 317, 183 Fed. 977.

Photographs of hoops from a vat were held inadmissible in the absence of satisfactory proof that they were the ones from the vat which burst and caused the injury sued for. Hupfer v. National Distilling Co. 114 Wis. 279, 90 N. W. 191.

But where, on a subsequent trial of the same case, satisfactory proof of the identity of the hoops was made, the photographs were held to have been properly admitted. 127 Wis. 306, 106 N. W. 831.

In a suit by a husband for divorce on the ground of adultery, photographs of a man and woman known by witnesses to be living as husband and wife were not properly verified where the only witness identifying the woman shown in the picture as plaintiff's wife was plaintiff himself, and the evidence of the other witnesses was indefinite as to the time they knew the persons shown in the picture to be living together. Pessolano v. Pessolano, 34 Misc. 16, 69 N. Y. Supp. 449.

f. Discretion of court.

Whether a photograph offered in evidence is a correct representation of the object or thing in question is a preliminary question for the trial court. Dillar v. Northern California Power Co. 162 Cal. 531, 123 Pac. 359, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 908; McGar v. Bristol, 71 Conn. 652, 42 Atl. 1000; State v. Cook, 75 Conn. 267, 53 Atl. 589; Temple v. Gilbert, 86 Conn. 335, 85 Atl. 380; Parker v. C. A. Smith Lumber & Mfg. Co. — Or. —, 138 Pac. 1061.

And the same is true as to their practical instructiveness. Carey v. Hubbards-ton, 172 Mass. 106, 51 N. E. 521; Halloran v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 211 Mass. 132, 97 N. E. 631; Eldredge v. Mitchell, 214 Mass. 480, 102 N. E. 69.

There is, however, some apparent conflict as to the finality of the ruling of the trial court upon the sufficiency of the preliminary proof for the admission of photographs in evidence.

In some cases it is said that the sufficiency of the preliminary proof is largely within the discretion of the trial court. Re Hayes, — Colo. —, 135 Pac. 449; State v. Miller, 43 Or. 325, 74 Pac. 658; Whaley v. Vidal, 27 S. D. 642, 132 N. W. 248.

Some say his determination is final (McKarren v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 194 Mass. 179, 80 N. E. 477, 10 Ann. Cas. 961), and is not open to exception (Jameson v. Weld, 93 Me. 345, 45 Atl. 299; Stone v. Lewiston, B. & B. Street R. Co. 99 Me. 243, 59 Atl. 56; Babb v. Oxford Paper Co. 99 Me. 298, 59 Atl. 290; Pritchard v. Austin, 69 N. H. 367, 46 Atl. 188).

It is apparent, however, that it was not the intention of the courts in the above cases to hold that the admissibility of photographs rested finally with the trial judge, for in the case of Rodick v. Maine C. R. Co. 109 Me. 530, 85 Atl. 41, the court said that, while it would have been wiser to have excluded the photographs in question, it was not such an abuse of discretion to admit them as to warrant the sustaining of exceptions. "It may have been error, but not such an exceptionable error as would justify the ordering of a new trial."

In De Forge v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 178 Mass. 59, 86 Am. St. Rep. 464, 59 N. E. 669, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 501, the court said that the discretion of the trial judge as to the admission of photographs is not unlimited, and he is not at liberty to exclude photographs in disregard of the rules of law.

And in Everson v. Casualty Co. 208 Mass. 214, 94 N. E. 459, the court says: "The general rule respecting the admission of photographs, plans, and models, is that whether they are to be received or not is a preliminary question resting largely, though not entirely, in the discretion of the trial court, whose duty is primarily to determine whether there is sufficient similarity between what is offered and the original, which is the subject of inquiry, to make it of any assistance to the jury in passing upon the issue before them. While the discretion of the trial judge in this regard is not unlimited, his action will the result of the operation was as good as he had expected, considering the time the boy was under his treatment, but that his father took the boy away before Dr. Ford had time to secure the results that he thought he could have secured in the way of improving the boy's condition had he remained longer under his treatment. Dr. Ford also stated that, as he did not know the condition of the boy's arm at the time of the injury, he could not say positively whether there was anything connected with the fracture of the arm to prevent a good apposition or union, and that he could not say whether there was any negligence at the time the arm was set; but in his opinion the arm was neglected afterwards, if it had been properly set. He also stated his first impression was that the trouble with the arm was due to a dislocation, but a closer examination showed a fracture of the humerus, and that, while it is not difficult to reduce such a fracture, it is hard to get good functional results, and that bad results often followed. In his opinion the operation was necessary for the purpose of correcting the deformity and taking the pressure off of the muscles, common nerves, and blood vessels, which was causing paralysis and obstructing the circulation.

As a part of his deposition Dr. Ford filed two X-ray photographs, one of which he took before the operation was performed, the other afterwards. These photographs were admitted in evidence over appellant's objection. Conceding the general rule to be not be revised unless it appears to have been plainly wrong, or in disregard of some rule of law governing the rights of the parties."

In Mitton v. Cargill Elevator Co. — Minn. —, 144 N. W. 434, it was held that when a competent witness testifies that a photograph correctly represents the objects it purports to portray, it is not for the court to decide that the witness is unworthy of belief, or that the photograph is misleading.

And in State v. Miller, 43 Or. 325, 74 Pac. 658, the case was reversed because of the admission of certain photographs.

In Consolidated Gas, E. L. & P. Co. v. State, 109 Md. 186, 72 Atl. 651, it is held that preliminary verification and practical instructiveness are questions for the court, and his discretion in admitting photographs is not the subject of exception, unless it is plainly exercised in an arbitrary manner.

And the court's decision upon this preliminary question will rarely be reviewed. Harris v. Ansonia, 73 Conn. 359, 47 Atl. 672; Hassam v. Safford Lumber Co. 82 Vt. 444, 74 Atl. 197 (dictum).

When rejected photographs are not in the record, their rejection will not be reviewed on appeal. Whaley v. Vidal, 27 S. D. 642, 132 N. W. 248.

And when the ground for rejection does not appear, and may have been because of plaintiff's failure to make out some preliminary matter of fact to the judge's satisfaction, his decision will not be reversed. Harris v. Quincy, 171 Mass. 472, 50 N. E. 1042.

In Kaufman v. National Lumber Ins. Co. 231 Pa. 642, 81 Atl. 53, the court refused to review the discretion of the trial court in rejecting photographs of the locus in quo, where the objection to them was that they were taken without care by an inexperienced amateur, and that the jury had viewed the premises so that the photographs were unnecessary.

Where a statute made the allowance of a view of the premises involved discretionary with the court, it was held that the 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

admission of photographs of the premises was likewise discretionary, for to hold otherwise would involve the absurdity of placing the admission of the best evidence within the court's discretion, while the admission of secondary evidence would be beyond such discretion. Morris v. Territory, 1 Okla. Crim. Rep. 617, 99 Pac. 760, 101 Pac. 111.

IV. As secondary evidence.

It is not error to exclude a photograph on the ground that the jury has viewed the premises. A photograph is at best secondary evidence, and, when direct observation has been had, is usually incompetent. Dobson v. Philadelphia, 7 Pa. Dist. R. 321.

Nor is the exclusion of photographs prejudicial where the testimony of witnesses is sufficiently full and explicit to enable the jury to understand what they were intended to show. Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Morris, 80 Ark. 528, 98 S. W. 303, 10 Ann. Cas. 618.

And where personal injuries are perfectly capable of verbal description, it is error to admit photographs of them, as the only reason for offering them must have been to inflame the sympathies of the jury. Cirello v. Metropolitan Exp. Co. 88 N. Y. Supp. 932.

Photographs of gunshot wounds upon a body, which are subject to accurate oral description, being neither necessary nor instructive and tending to arouse the indignation of the jury, should be excluded. State v. Miller, 43 Or. 325, 74 Pac. 658.

But it has been held that the mere fact that the situation shown by a photograph may be verbally described is no ground for excluding it. Zancanella v. Omaha & C. B. Street R. Co. 93 Neb. 774, 142 N. W. 190.

And photographs of objects or places are sometimes admitted though the originals are also in evidence or have been viewed by the jury. Thus, in Com. v. Best, 180 Mass. 492, 62 N. E. 748, bullets and also photographs of them were put in evidence.

that photographs are admissible in evidence when their accuracy is shown, appellant insists there is no proof showing that either of the photographs admitted in this case correctly represented the condition of the arm at the time it was taken, or that the photograph taken before the operation was performed represented the condition of the arm as it was when it was last treated or seen by appellant. Did the circuit court err in admitting the photographs?

The general rule as to the admission of ordinary photographs is stated as follows in 17 Cyc. 417: "When, in an action for personal injuries or other action of tort, or in criminal prosecutions, it becomes material to know the location, surroundings, and condition of the premises upon which the accident, injury, or crime in controversy occurred, photographs of the locus in quo, if verified by proof that they are true representations, are competent evidence. But the value and admissibility of the photograph, as in other cases, depend upon the fact that it is a correct representation of the place in question, and that the condition existing when it was taken was an exactly accurate reproduction of the condition existing when the accident, injury, or crime occurred. Hence, if the photographs are taken so long after the occurrence that the surroundings or conditions have changed, or whenever taken, if they do not for any reason appear to represent the subject or the conditions existing at the time of the occurrence in controversy in such a way as Though plaintiff was in court, and there was no reason why his injured leg could not have been shown to the jury, the admission of photographs of it was not prejudicial error, where the descriptions by witnesses accorded with the photographs and defendant made no request for a view by the jury. Baxter v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 104 Wis. 307, 80 N. W. 644, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 740.

The skull of deceased and a photograph thereof were properly admitted to be used by experts in explaining their testimony. Savary v. State, 62 Neb. 166, 87 N. W. 34.

It is not prejudicial error to admit in evidence a photograph of plaintiff's injured leg, though the leg was also exhibited to the jury. Toledo Traction Co. v. Cameron, 69 C. C. A. 28, 137 Fed. 48.

Where a plaintiff lives in another state, and is not present at the trial, the production of her photograph as secondary evidence is not objectionable. Cunnius v. Reading School Dist. 7 Lack. Leg. News, 177.

The trial court has discretion to admit a photograph of wearing apparel taken from a murdered body, although the apparel is in court at the time of the trial. Com. v. Tucker, 189 Mass. 457, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1056, 76 N. E. 127.

And it was not error to admit a photograph of the pieces of a broken knife put together, though the original pieces were already in evidence. Ibid.

After a photograph of a letter has been admitted without objection to it on the ground that it is secondary evidence, it can be excluded only by a motion to strike. Frank v. Berry, 128 Iowa, 223, 103 N. W. 358.

V. Of persons.

a. In general.

A photograph may be admitted to show the appearance of a person at a certain time. Hoyt v. Chicago City R. Co. 166 Ill. App. 361.

So, a photograph showing plaintiff in an action for personal injuries, walking to the courthouse, apparently in good physical condition, was evidence for the consideration of the jury, but it would have been error for the court to have directed particular attention to it. Simpson v. Peoria R. Co. 179 Ill. App. 307.

In Davis v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 136 N. C. 115, 48 S. E. 591, 1 Ann. Cas. 214, photographs of a child taken just before its injury, and also thereafter before its death, were admitted.

A full length photograph of deceased was properly admitted to rebut testimony of defendant that he was smaller than deceased, when the witness who identified the photograph was also represented in it and was about the same distance from the camera as deceased. Com. v. Keller, 191 Pa. 122, 43 Atl. 198.

Photographs of the body of a girl whose death it was claimed was caused by defendant's brutal treatment were properly admitted if measurably true representations of it as it appeared after death. Young v. State, 49 Tex. Crim. Rep. 207, 92 S. W. 841.

Negatives found near the scene of a burglary, and claimed to be photographs of defendants, who were on trial for the burglary, were properly admitted. Russell v. State, — Ala. —, 38 So. 291.

Photographs of an injured person which correctly represent his appearance shortly after the injury are not rendered inadmissible by the fact that his appearance as shown by them is likely to awaken sympathy in the minds of the jury. People's Gaslight & Coke Co. v. Amphetlett, 93 Ill. App. 194.

But the introduction of the photographs of a beautiful woman for whose death her husband and children are suing could but introduce the personal element where pecuniary damages alone should be considered, and is reversible error. Smith v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 177 N. Y. 379, 69 N. E. 729.

So, also, photographs showing a woman's injured foot in aggravated aspects, liable to be instructive, they will be rejected. Moreover, where the photograph is not offered as a mere general representation of the locus in quo, but to show distances, relative sizes, or locations of objects, it may be very deceptive and misleading, and it seems that much more convincing proof of its accuracy is required than in ordinary cases."

The rule above announced is equally applicable to X-ray photographs. In the volume above quoted from, at page 420, it is said: "While a picture produced by an X-ray cannot be verified as a true representation of the subject in the same way that a picture made by a camera can be, the rule in regard to the use of ordinary photographs on the trial of a cause applies to photographs of the internal structure and conditions of the human body taken by the aid of X-rays, when verified by proof that they are a true representation."

A photograph is only a pictured description of what the witness saw, and is therefore admissible, if the fact is relevant. The use of maps, models, diagrams, and photographs, as testimony to the objects represented, rests fundamentally on the theory that they are the pictorial communications of a qualified witness, who uses this method of communication instead of, or in addition to, some other method. 1 Wigmore, Ev. § 793.

In 1 Wigmore on Evidence, § 792 (3), it is further said: "The objection that a photograph may be so made as to misrepresent the object is genuinely directed against to arouse the sympathy of the jury, are inadmissible in an action by her husband for nursing, medical attendance, and loss of services and society, where there was other evidence showing the expense and the extent of her impaired condition. Selleck v. Janesville, 104 Wis. 570, 47 L.R.A. 691, 76 Am. St. Rep. 892, 80 N. W. 944.

And where a homicide occurred as the result of mistreatment of defendant's sister by her husband, which it was claimed had made her a physical wreck in a few months, and defendant had put in evidence as to her physical condition and appearance before her marriage, it was not error to exclude a photograph of her, taken before her marriage, as a photograph of a beautiful woman, together with evidence offered that defendant brooded over this picture of his sister, would be likely to distract the attention of the jury from the main issues. Willis v. State, 49 Tex. Crim. Rep. 139, 90 S. W. 1100.

It was within the discretion of the trial court to exclude photographs of assured in an action on a life insurance policy, where the photograph was offered by defendant, and was taken under unfavorable circumstances by a person employed by defendant more than a year after the date of the policy, and when the condition of the assured's health had changed. Dolan v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 173 Mass. 197, 53 N. E. 398. The nature of the photograph involved in this case is shown in a footnote by the reporter, which appears only in the official report.

Where a material issue was the appearance as to age of a young girl at the time of her employment, it was error to admit a photograph of her in her communion dress taken a year before she was employed, because it would necessarily be misleading on account of the rapid changes in persons of her age. Dresch v. Elliott, 137 App. Div. 252, 122 N. Y. Supp. 14.

A photograph of a testator is inadmissible upon the issue of testamentary capacity. Varner v. Varner, 16 Ohio C. C. 386, 9 Ohio C. D. 273. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

b. For identification.

The fact that a photograph used to identify accused was taken by a police officer after his arrest is no ground for excluding it. Shaffer v. United States, 24 App. D. C. 417.

In State v. Hasty, 121 Iowa, 507, 96 N. W. 1115, a prosecution for adultery, a photograph of defendant's paramour was held admissible to identify her as the female with whom he lived in another state.

A photograph of defendant taken from the Rogues' Gallery is admissible to identify him. Com. v. Johnson, 199 Mass. 55, 85 N. E. 188.

Where there was some testimony as to a change in the appearance of accused due to his wearing glasses, which he refused to remove, a photograph taken of him without glasses was admissible to aid in his identification. People v. Carey, 125 Mich. 535, 84 N. W. 1087.

In State v. Fulkerson, 97 Mo. App. 599, 71 S. W. 704, a photograph of defendant by which prosecuting witness had first identified him as her assailant was admitted in evidence.

Where a physician who performed an autopsy did not personally know deceased, a photograph of him in life was admissible to enable the physician to identify it as that of the person upon whom he performed the autopsy. State v. Finch, 54 Or. 482, 103 Pac. 505.

And where a trial was held four years after a burglary was committed, it was proper to admit photographs of those accused, which were shown to be good likenesses of them at about the time of the crime, to establish their identity by witnesses who testified that they were shown the photographs shortly after the burglary, and were then able to identify them as pictures of men they saw in the vicinity on the day the crime was committed. Considine v. United States, 50 C. C. A. 272, 112 Fed. 342, writ of certiorari denied in 184 U. S. 699, 46 L. ed. 765, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 938, its testimonial soundness; but it is of no validity. It is true that a photograph can be deliberately so taken as to convey the most false impression of the object. But so also can any witness lie in his words. A photograph can falsify just as much and no more than the human being who takes it or verifies it. The fallacy of argument occurs in assuming that the photograph can come in testimonially without a competent person's oath to support it. If a qualified observer is found to say, 'This photograph represents the fact as I saw it,' there is no more reason to exclude it than if he had said, 'The following words represent the fact as I saw it,' which is always in effect the tenor of a witness's oath. If no witness has thus attached his credit to the photograph, then it should not come in at all, any more than an anonymous letter should be received as testimony. There can be no middle ground between these two consequences."

If, however, the photograph should not represent the fact as the witness saw it, it is not admissible; and the only person who can show that it does represent the fact as the witness saw it is the witness himself. It necessarily follows, therefore, that, where the witness fails to make an

But in Stiasny v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 58 App. Div. 172, 68 N. Y. Supp. 694, affirmed without opinion in 172 N. Y. 656, 65 N. E. 1122, it was held that a photograph of plaintiff was inadmissible to contradict the description of him given by witnesses who claimed to have seen him at the time he was injured, without first showing it to the witnesses and asking them whether it was a photograph of the person they saw injured.

c. Of part of body.

Photographs of the head and face of deceased, taken shortly after discovery of the body, were properly admitted to show marks and bruises thereon corresponding to those which would be inflicted by the peculiar kind of hatchet used in the establishment where defendant worked. People v. Rogers, 163 Cal. 476, 126 Pac. 143.

Photographs of the body of deceased, showing the entrance and exit of a bullet, were admissible as illustrating how he was killed. People v. Lee Nam Chin, — Cal. —, 137 Pac. 917.

In State v. Bailey, 79 Conn. 589, 65 Atl. 951, where the skull of a murdered man was admitted in evidence, there was no error in admitting duly authenticated photographs of the skull, taken before the brain had been removed, for the purpose of showing the condition of the skull and its interior and the injury to the skull and brain.

Properly authenticated photographs of the body of a murdered person are admissible to show the location and nature of wounds thereon, and the fact that defendant admits the location and character of the wounds does not render them inadmissible. State v. Powell, 5 Penn. (Del.) 24, 61 Atl. 966.

Photographs of a person correctly showing the injury sued for are admissible. Fuller v. Kelso, 163 Ill. App. 576.

Photographs of part of plaintiff's body, showing the injury for which recovery is sought, are admissible when relevant and properly verified. McKarren v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 194 Mass. 179, 80 N. E. 477, 10 Ann. Cas. 961.

defective sidewalk, a photograph taken some weeks after the injury, showing a sore which had developed, was held admissible. Davis v. Adrian, 147 Mich. 300, 110 N. W. 1084.

Photographs showing the wounds of deceased before they had been altered by surgeons are admissible in a prosecution for murder, they being illustrative and instructive in connection with the testimony of the doctor and other witnesses. State v. Roberts, 28 Nev. 377, 82 Pac. 100.

Photographs of plaintiff, a gymnast, showing his legs as they appeared before the injury complained of, were held admissible in Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. De Onzo, 87 Ohio St. 109, 100 N. E. 320.

Photographs of deceased showing the gunshot wounds from which he died are admissible to show the location and direction of the wounds, the position he was in at the time defendant shot him being material on the issue of self-defense. Morris v. State, 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 29, 115 Pac. 1030.

Photographs of the wounds on the head of deceased, after proof of their accuracy, are admissible in a prosecution for murder. Smith v. Territory, 11 Okla. 669, 69 Pac. 805.

It was not error to admit, in connection with expert testimony, a photograph of the brain of deceased after part of the skull was removed, it being charged that he was killed by a blow on the head. Monson v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 63 S. W. 647.

Photographs of the left hand of defendant, taken with his consent, after due warning, were properly admitted to show a correspondence between a peculiarly formed finger on the hand and marks left at the scene of a homicide. Powell v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 592, 99 S. W. 1005.

It was not an abuse of the discretion of the court to admit photographs of prosecuting witness showing injuries received at the time of the robbery, they being shown to be correct representations of the injuries at the time they were inflicted, except as they would naturally change in five or six days. State v. Fatch-Mohamed, — Wash. —, 136 Pac. 676.

X-ray photograph admissible by testifying to its accuracy, it is not admissible and should be rejected. This rule is recognized by all the authorities. See Stewart, Legal Medicine, § 13; 2 Wharton & M. S. Med. Jur. § 564; 3 Witthaus & B. Med. Jur. § 779.

In 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, 16th ed. § 439h, it is said: "The use of photographs taken by the vacuum tube—Röntgen rays—may involve slightly different principles. Since the operator will usually not have perceived the object, usually a concealed bone, which his ordinary organs of vision, he will not be able to put forward the photograph as corresponding to the results of his own observation; nevertheless, if he can testify that the process is known to him (by experience or otherwise) to give correct representations, the photograph is in effect supported by his testimony and stands on the same footing as a photograph of an object whose otherwise invisible details have been rendered discernible by a magnifying lens."

The rule above announced has been more than once approved by this court. See Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Brown, 127 Ky. 746, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1135, 106 S. W. 795, and Bowling Green Gaslight Co. v. Dean, young woman showing a rear view, nude from below the shoulders to mid-thigh, was grossly improper. If the condition of any private part of the body of any party male or female is material, it should be privately examined by experts out of court, and expert testimony given of it. Guhl v. Whitcomb, 109 Wis. 69, 83 Am. St. Rep. 889, 85 N. W. 142.

VI. Of places.

a. In general.

Properly authenticated photographs of land are admissible to enable a witness to explain his testimony as to the effect of the diversion of water upon the land. Pickett v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 153 N. C. 148, 69 S. E. 8.

But in an action for flooding land, photographs of rivers tributary to the one causing the flood, without evidence as to the time the condition shown continued, or as to the depth or volume of the water shown, were held inadmissible. Zinser v. Sanitary Dist. 175 Ill. App. 9.

In an action for damages for changing the grade of a street, photographs of the place after the change was completed are admissible. Robinson v. St. Joseph, 97 Mo. App. 503, 71 S. W. 465.

A photograph of plaintiff's property, taken ten or eleven years before an injury thereto by a change of the grade of a sidewalk, was properly admitted to show the relative elevations of the property and the sidewalk. Grand Park v. Trah, 115 Ill. App. 291, appealed on other grounds, and affirmed in 218 Ill. 516, 75 N. E. 1040.

In Raab v. Roberts, 30 Ind. App. 6, 64 N. E. 618, 65 N. E. 191, it was held that a photograph of a house in front of which it was proposed to take a strip of land for improvement of a highway was admissible to show the width of the strip, its proximity to the highway, and the character of the improvement affected.

And in Beals v. Brookline, 174 Mass. 1, 54 N. E. 339, the admission of photographs of property before improvements were made, assessments for which were being resisted, was held a proper exercise of the court's discretion. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Photographs taken at points not material to the controversy are properly excluded. Whaley v. Vidal, 27 S. D. 642, 132 N. W. 248.

And there was no error in excluding photographs of premises which did not fairly represent anything in a way that could be of assistance to the jury. Harris v. Ansonia, 73 Conn. 359, 47 Atl. 672; Schneider v. North Chicago Street R. Co. 80 Ill. App. 306.

While great care should be exercised in receiving photographs showing elevations, they may be received when properly verified. Sherlock v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 24 N. D. 40, 138 N. W. 976.

b. Scene of accident.

1. Generally.

Photographs of the scene of a personal injury are, as a general rule, admissible when properly authenticated. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Myers, 86 Ill. App. 401; Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Lawrence, 96 Ill. App. 635; Wabash R. Co. v. Prast, 101 Ill. App. 167; Vanarsdall v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1666, 65 S. W. 858; Sterling v. Detroit, 134 Mich. 22, 95 N. W. 986; Forseth v. Iron River Lumber Co. 142 Wis. 87, 124 N. W. 1036.

So, it is error to exclude photographs of the scene of an accident, taken at a time when the place was in the same condition as when the accident occurred, where there is nothing in the evidence or in the photographs themselves tending to discredit their accuracy. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Wilson, 189 Ill. 89, 59 N. E. 573.

In Wabash R. Co. v. Farrell, 79 Ill. App. 508, it was held that a photograph of the scene of an accident should not be received in evidence in the absence of clear proof that the conditions were the same as when the accident occurred.

This, however, is a stricter rule than is adopted in most cases.

Thus, a fair representation of the general features of the place is sufficient. Warner v. Randolph, 18 App. Div. 458, 45 N. Y. Supp. 1112.

And photographs of the scene of an acci-

142 Ky. 686, 134 S. W. 1115. In the last-named case we said: "Of course, the accuracy of a photograph as a correct reproduction of what it purported to show should be established to the satisfaction of the court before being admitted as evidence, but when its accuracy is shown, we have no doubt of its admissibility. Wigmore, Ev. §§ 790-797; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Brown, 127 Ky. 732, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1135, 106 S. W. 795; Higgs v. Minnesota, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 16 N. D. 446, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1162, 114 N. W. 722, 15 Ann. Cas. 97; Dedericha v. Salt Lake City R. Co. 35 L.R.A.

802, and note, (14 Utah, 137, 46 Pac. 656); 2 Elliott, Ev. §§ 1224-1228." See also Geneva v. Burnett, 65 Neb. 464, 58 L.R.A. 287, 101 Am. St. Rep. 628, 91 N. W. 275, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 104; Mauch v. Hartford, 112 Wis. 50, 87 N. W. 816, 11 Am. Neg. Rep. 63; Miller v. Mintun, 73 Ark. 183, 83 S. W. 918; Bruce v. Beall, 99 Tenn. 303, 41 S. W. 445; Elzig v. Bales, 135 Iowa, 208, 112 N. W. 540; Eckels v. Boylan, 136 Ill. App. 265.

Applying this well-settled rule to the facts of this case, it is apparent that appellee failed to establish the preliminary re-dent are admissible if there have not been such changes between the time of the accident and that when the photographs were taken as to destroy the substantial identity of the place. Pruner v. Detroit United R. Co. 173 Mich. 146, 139 N. W. 49; Beardslee v. Columbia Twp. 188 Pa. 496, 68 Am. St. Rep. 883, 41 Atl. 617.

Photographs of a portion of a railroad and highway near a crossing where an accident occurred were admissible, though they did not show every possible view of the crossing that might have been taken. Illinois Southern R. Co. v. Hayer, 225 Ill. 613, 80 N. E. 316, affirming 128 Ill. App. 315.

Photographs of the scene of an accident at a railway crossing, taken a month after the accident, changes, if any, being explained by the evidence, which would tend to show some things material to the case, should have been admitted. Wabash R. Co. v. Jenkins, 84 Ill. App. 511.

Photographs which correctly show the premises where an accident occurred, except that there was snow on the ground when they were taken, about a month after the accident, were held to be admissible in Fitzgerald v. Hedstrom, 98 Ill. App. 109.

And to the same effect is Considine v. Dubuque, 126 Iowa, 283, 102 N. W. 102, where ice and snow present at the time of the accident were gone when the photograph was taken.

Photographs which correctly represent an obstruction in a street are admissible in connection with other evidence, in an action for injuries resulting from such obstruction. Huntington v. Lusch, 33 Ind. App. 476, 70 N. E. 402.

Photographs of a defective street taken before any material change had been made in it, which the witnesses agreed fairly represented its condition at the time of the accident, were admissible. Louisville v. Arrowsmith, 145 Ky. 498, 140 S. W. 1022.

Photographs of a sidewalk taken several days after plaintiff's injury thereon should be admitted for what they are worth as illustrations of plaintiff's testimony, not as independent evidence. Baustian v. Young, 152 Mo. 317, 75 Am. St. Rep. 402, 53 S. W. 921.

Photographs of a sidewalk where plaintiff was injured were not rendered inadmissible because they showed 800 to 1,000 feet of the walk beside the actual spot where the injury occurred, especially as the instructions charged the jury to find that the injury occurred at the place specified. Diel v. Ferguson, 158 Mo. App. 286, 138 S. W. 545.

A photograph of a building where plaintiff was injured was admissible though taken a considerable time after the accident, there being no claim that the place had changed materially. Leeds v. New York Teleph. Co. 79 App. Div. 121, 80 N. Y. Supp. 114, reversed on other grounds in 178 N. Y. 118, 70 N. E. 219.

Photographs of a hallway, taken by flash light, were admissible to show the construction of a staircase and its situation in the hall way, though they could not aid the jury on the question of the sufficiency of the lighting of the hall way. Bretsch v. Carsten, 82 App. Div. 399, 81 N. Y. Supp. 868.

The objection to a photograph of a hole in a street, that it was taken several months after the accident, was rendered ineffectual by proof that it represented it as it was then, except that the hole did not appear to be quite so deep when the photograph was taken. Miller v. New York, 104 App. Div. 33, 93 N. Y. Supp. 227.

In Morrow v. Gaffney Mfg. Co. 70 S. C. 242, 49 S. E. 573, a witness was permitted to use a photograph of a room in another factory than the one in which an accident occurred, for the purpose of illustrating his testimony.

But photographs of the scene of an accident are inadmissible when they are not so taken as to correctly exemplify the actual situation and surroundings at the time of the accident. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Crose, 214 Ill. 602, 105 Am. St. Rep. 135, 73 N. E. 865.

So, a photograph taken so long after an accident that it does not fairly represent the place where it occurred is inadmissible. Iroquois Furnace Co. v. McCrea, 191 Ill. 340, 61 N. E. 79, affirming 91 Ill. App. 337; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Corson, 198 Ill. 98, 64 N. E. 739.

A photograph of the scene of an accident, taken by an amateur two years after the accident, which is at variance with testimony given by each party, should not be quirements necessary to make the photographs admissible. Dr. Ford merely states that he took the photographs. He does not state that they correctly represent what he saw, or how they were taken, or that he had ever taken an X-ray photograph before, or knew anything about how they ought to be taken. We are given no assurance as to the character or accuracy of his X-ray machine, or its condition or working order. While it may not be necessary to establish all of these facts in order to make the photographs admissible under the rule above stated, it is clear the rule requires that the accuracy of the photographs must be so established, for, if they do not show what the witness saw, they have no place in the case. In this respect the testimony of Dr. Ford is wholly insufficient; and, as no other witness testified upon this subject, the circuit court should have sustained appellant's objection to the admission of the photographs. In view of the conclusion reached, it is unnecessary to consider the other errors assigned.

admitted. Chicago v. Vesey, 105 Ill. App. 191.

And a photograph showing a stone pile, taken three months after an injury, is inadmissible where one of plaintiff's witnesses testified that the stone pile causing the injury was removed three days after the accident, so that if there was a stone pile there when the photograph was taken, it could not have been the one causing the injury. Buck v. McKeesport, 223 Pa. 211, 72 Atl. 514.

2. Railroad wrecks.

Photographs taken just after a derailment are admissible in an action for injuries received in the accident. Bach v. Iowa C. R. Co. 112 Iowa, 241, 83 N. W. 959.

And a photograph of a wreck, the accuracy of which is sworn to by the one who took them, is admissible in an action for personal injuries. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Brown, 127 Ky. 732, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1135, 106 S. W. 795.

Photographs correctly showing the condition of a trestle, track, and car shortly after an accident are admissible. Kirkpatrick v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 211 Mo. 68, 109 S. W. 682.

It was proper to admit photographs of a wreck in which plaintiff was injured, showing the derailed train, overturned engine, and broken cars, and a derailed car of stone in front of the engine, where they were taken the same day and were correct representations of the situation. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Nichols, 39 Okla. 522, 136 Pac. 159.

Though some work has been done on a wreck, photographs of it are admissible to show the force of the impact, if the changes made are not so material as to destroy their value for that purpose. Maynard v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 46 Or. 15, 68 L.R.A. 477, 78 Pac. 983.

So, it was not error to admit a photograph of a car which was wrecked in a collision, taken soon thereafter, for the purpose of showing the force of the collision, though before the photograph was taken, the colliding engine had backed away and men were at work on the car. Halloran v. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 211 Mass. 132, 97 N. E. 631.

And photographs which tended to show physical conditions existing at the time, and also threw light on the rate of speed cars were traveling at the time of a collision, were properly admitted. Edge v. Southwest Missouri Electric R. Co. 206 Mo. 471, 104 S. W. 90.

Although the seriousness of a collision is not denied, plaintiff, who was injured in it, has a right to have photographs of it admitted when proved to be correct. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Roller, 49 L.R.A. 77, 41 C. C. A. 22, 100 Fed. 738.

And though the only issue is the amount of damages, liability being admitted, photographs of a wreck are admissible to show the force of the impact and probability of injury to plaintiff, who was a passenger. Taylor v. Spokane, P. & S. R. Co. 72 Wash. 378, 130 Pac. 506.

3. Showing repairs after accident.

Generally, as to evidence of repairs made or precautions taken after an accident, see note in 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1127.

Where negligence was charged against an electric railway in not providing guard rails or other obstructions to prevent derailed cars from going into a pond, and photographs taken the day of the accident had been admitted, other photographs taken after a guard rail and fence had been erected were properly excluded, as their admission would have enabled plaintiff indirectly to get improper evidence before the jury. Donovan v. Connecticut Co. 84 Conn. 531, 80 Atl. 779.

But while photographs of a repaired sidewalk would not be admissible to show defendant's negligence, their admission would not be prejudicial when defendant had already given evidence that the repairs had been made. San Antonio v. Talerico, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 78 S. W. 28.

And where the extent of the hole was in issue, photographs of the place after repairs were made by a cement patch were admissible, in connection with other testimony, to show the extent of the hole. Ibid.

Photographs of the scene of an accident are admissible where the conditions have not been changed; and where defendant offered photographs of such a place, evidence that a hole thereat, alleged to have caused the injury, had been filled since the accident, was competent to prove that the photographs were not true representations of the place at the time of the accident. Sample v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 233 Ill. 564, 84 N. E. 643.

c. Scene of crime.

Photographs of the scene of a homicide are admissible to assist the court and jury in understanding the testimony, they being, of course, properly authenticated. People v. Phelan, 123 Cal. 551, 56 Pac. 424; State v. Nordmark, 84 Kan. 628, 114 Pac. 1068; Com. v. Chance, 174 Mass. 245, 75 Am. St. Rep. 306, 54 N. E. 551.

Thus, photographs of a room taken six days after a homicide was discovered, but showing the articles therein substantially as they were at the time of the discovery of the homicide, are admissible. People v. Grill, 151 Cal. 592, 91 Pac. 515.

Photographs of the country between a cabin where a murder was committed, and the place where the body was buried, were admissible to show the nature of the ground traversed by the murderer, and especially for the purpose of showing the necessity for dismemberment of the body. People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 6, 112 Pac. 720, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1193.

Where photographs of the scene of a homicide were admitted, it was not error to permit the photographer to speak of a certain spot shown as the place where deceased fell, when it was apparent that he meant only the place pointed out to him by witnesses as the spot where deceased fell. State v. Baker, — Iowa, —, 135 N. W. 1097.

A photograph of a room in which an assault was alleged to have been committed was properly admitted, where its correctness was certified to by witnesses and the jury visited and inspected the room for themselves. State v. Hersom, 90 Me. 273, 38 Atl. 160.

In a prosecution for arson it was not error to admit photographs of the burned building, though they also showed a dwelling owned by defendant which had been partially burned, there being no evidence as to the circumstances under which the dwelling was burned. Com. v. Fielding, 184 Mass. 484, 69 N. E. 216.

In an action on an insurance policy, defended on the ground of suicide, it was not error to admit a photograph showing an outside stair on the building in which deceased was found, to support the theory of murder and robbery by showing a possible means of escape of the murderer. Kornig v. Western Life Indemnity Co. 102 Minn. 31, 112 N. W. 1039.

Photographs of the scene of a homicide taken the next morning, shortly after its discovery, and showing a buggy with the body of deceased in it as it was found, were properly admitted. Sanchez v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 149 S. W. 124.

And photographs of the ruins of a house in which it was alleged a murder was committed and the body burned were admissible upon being shown to be correct representations of the premises. Paulson v. State, 118 Wis. 89, 94 N. W. 771, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 497.

But where a photograph of the scene of a homicide could serve no useful purpose with the jury, but on the contrary might be confusing, it should be excluded. Newcomb v. State, 49 Tex. Crim. Rep. 550, 95 S. W. 1048.

d. Of attempted reproduction of scene.

Some courts look with disfavor upon photographs of the scene of a crime or accident showing persons, dummies, or other objects placed to illustrate the particular theory or contention of the party offering them, and hold that photographs so taken should not be admitted. Babb v. Oxford Paper Co. 99 Me. 298, 59 Atl. 290; Rodick v. Maine C. R. Co. 109 Me. 530, 85 Atl. 41.

Thus, in Grant v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 176 Ill. App. 292, it was held that photographs of the scene of an accident, taken in behalf of defendant, with engines and cars placed to represent their position at the time of the accident, were inadmissible for the reason that neither plaintiff nor anyone representing him was present when they were taken; that he had no control over the engine and cars so as to cause like pictures to be taken; and no opportunity to offer evidence as to whether they correctly represented the situation.

And, likewise, in Ellis v. Flannigan, 253 Ill. 397, 97 N. E. 696, involving the execution of a will, a photograph of the room in which it was executed was excluded, the furniture being arranged for the purpose by the contestant and her sister as they testified it was at the time the will was executed.

A photograph of the place of an accident, taken after a hole in question had been filled, and with a car placed where defendant claimed the one was at the time of the accident, and a crowbar placed at the supposed location of the hole, was properly excluded, as it could not aid the jury and might mislead it. Stewart v. St. Paul City R. Co. 78 Minn. 110, 80 N. W. 855, 7 Am. Neg. Rep. 80.

The admission of photographs of tableaux arranged by the chief witness for the state in a prosecution for murder, showing his version of the tragedy, was held to be ground for reversal in Fore v. State, 75 Miss. 727, 23 So. 710. And to the same effect is Brett v. State, 94 Miss. 669, 47 So. 781.

And in People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 253, 86 Pac. 187, it was held to be error to permit the introduction of a woodcut made from a photograph of the porch where a homicide occurred, and showing a man lying thereon supposedly in the position in which deceased was found, neither the one who took the photograph nor the man representing deceased having seen the body of deceased on the porch.

Objection to the admission of such photographs is by no means universal however, and in a number of cases they have been held admissible.

Thus, in Hughes v. State, 126 Tenn. 40, 148 S. W. 543, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1262, a photograph of a room in which a homicide occurred, with the furniture arranged as it was and a person placed on the floor in the position deceased was found, according to the recollection of a witness who was in the room shortly before and immediately after the homicide, was admitted to illustrate the testimony of such witness. Another photograph was admitted in the above case, showing the room and furniture with a man sitting in a chair where deceased was when seen by the witness shortly before the homicide, and where, according to the prosecution's theory, he was when first shot, with marks on the neck of the person to show where the bullet entered the neck of deceased, and a mark on the window frame where the bullet lodged after passing through his neck.

The admission of photographs of a room in which an assault was alleged to have been committed, showing the furniture located according to the testimony of witnesses for the prosecution, not offered as proof of conditions on the day of the assault, but merely to visualize the testimony of such witnesses, is not error. People v. Veld, 154 App. Div. 752, 139 N. Y. Supp. 788.

Photographs of the scene of a homicide, showing objects placed by a witness to indicate where deceased and other objects lay when the place was first visited by the witness, were held to be admissible in People v. Mahatch, 148 Cal. 200, 82 Pac. 779.

And photographs of the scene of a murder, with persons placed to illustrate the position of deceased and defendant at the time of the killing, according to the evidence for the defense, are admissible, provided there is testimony that they faithfully represent the objects and situations portrayed. Sellers v. State, 91 Ark. 175, 120 S. W. 840, second appeal in 93 Ark. 313, 124 S. W. 770.

A somewhat similar case was the admission of photographs of the scene of a homicide, with marks to show where witnesses said deceased was lying and where defendant stood. People v. Crandall, 125 Cal. 129, 57 Pac. 785.

In Harrison v. Green, 157 Mich. 690, 122 N. W. 205, it was held proper to admit a photograph showing the machine where plaintiff was injured, with two witnesses and plaintiff placed where the two witnesses testified the three stood at the time of the accident.

And in Bowling Green Gaslight Co. v. Dean, 142 Ky. 678, 134 S. W. 1115, a photograph of a telephone pole with a man on it in the position deceased was in when he 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

received the shock was held to be admissible upon proof of its accuracy.

VII. Of documents.

a. In general.

A photograph of a hotel register showing signatures is admissible where the register is outside the jurisdiction of the court, in connection with the testimony of a witness that the signatures shown are signatures of the persons they purport to be. Fuller v. Robinson, 230 Mo. 22, 130 S. W. 343, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 938.

Photographic copies of records are admissible upon being properly verified, when the originals cannot be produced. Re McClellan, 20 S. D. 498, 107 N. W. 681.

And a photograph of a document which cannot be produced is admissible when shown to be a true copy. Parker v. C. A. Smith Lumber & Mfg. Co. — Or. —, 138 Pac. 1061.

But where photographs of a deed are mere duplicates of the original, which is in evidence, they are inadmissible. Howard v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 189 Ill. 68, 59 N. E. 1106.

Preliminary proof of a photograph is especially necessary when it is of handwriting, the genuineness of which is in question. Re Hayes, — Colo. —, 135 Pac. 449.

b. For comparison.

The admission of photographs of handwriting for the purpose of comparison is proper. People v. Mooney, 132 Cal. 13, 63 Pac. 1070.

So, an accurate photographic copy of a note is admissible for the purpose of comparing signatures, upon its being shown that the original is in the records of a court of another state. Stitzel v. Miller, 250 Ill. 72, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1004, 95 N. E. 53, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 412.

Photographs of genuine signatures, to illustrate the testimony of an expert as to the difference between the genuine and alleged spurious signatures, are admissible. State v. Ready, 77 N. J. L. 329, 72 Atl. 445. And the photographs are not rendered inadmissible by the fact that they were taken so that they appeared upon a background of ruled squares to show the uniformity in the size and proportion of the letters.

Where original documents are in the possession of respondent in a prosecution for forgery, and he refuses to produce them upon demand, photographic copies may be introduced, and every intentment will be indulged in favor of their correctness. Grooms v. State, 40 Tex. Crim. Rep. 319, 50 S. W. 370.

c. Enlarged copies of handwriting.

Enlarged photographs of a disputed signature and of undoubtedly genuine ones are admissible upon proper proof of their accuracy. First Nat. Bank v. Wisdom, 111 Ky. 135, 63 S. W. 461; Johnson v. Com. 102 Va. 927, 46 S. E. 789.

Such enlargements are admissible though the original deed is in evidence. Howard v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 189 Ill. 568, 59 N. E. 1106; State v. Skillman, 76 N. J. L. 466, 70 Atl. 83.

Enlarged copies of an alleged forged signature and a signature offered as a standard for comparison are admissible in evidence, on proof by the photographer of the accuracy of the method pursued and the results obtained in making the copies. United States v. Ortiz, 176 U. S. 422, 44 L. ed. 529, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 466.

Where enlarged photographs of signatures are in evidence, it is within the discretion of the court as to whether to require a witness to point out on the enlargements the differences between the signatures alleged to be forgeries and the ones admitted to be genuine. People v. Bird, 124 Cal. 32, 56 Pac. 639, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 442.

VIII. Of other things.

In State v. Cook, 75 Conn. 267, 53 Atl. 589, a new trial was granted for failure to permit defendant in a prosecution for improper care of horses, to introduce in evidence photographs of the horses taken two months after the date charged in the indictment, upon his offer to prove that the photographs were accurate, and that the horses were in the same condition of flesh when they were taken as on the dates alleged in the indictment.

In People v. Jennings, 252 Ill. 534, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1206, 96 N. E. 1077, enlarged photographic copies of finger prints were admitted for the purpose of comparison with finger print records of defendant, but the objection thereto seemed to be to the admission of finger prints rather than to the photographs. See note to this case in 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1206, for finger prints as evidence.

In an action for injuries received in a corn shredder, photographs of another shredder of the same make were held admissible on behalf of plaintiff, where defendant's own proofs showed they were fair representations of the machine on which the accident occurred. Smith v. Eichelberger, 175 Ill. App. 231.

In Henke v. Deere & M. Co. 175 Ill. App. 240, the court said that photographs of a machine upon which plaintiff was hurt, taken shortly after the accident, and before any changes had been made, should have been admitted, but as they were only supplementary to the oral testimony, they would not reverse the judgment for that error alone.

In Com. v. Best, 180 Mass. 492, 62 N. E. 748, it was held that the fact that photographs of bullets were avowedly taken to bring out the likeness in the markings on them was not ground for rejecting them, inasmuch as the original bullets were also in evidence, so that the jury could correct the impression given by the photographs if there were other aspects more favorable to the defense.

Enlarged photographs of sections of tools by one of which plaintiff was injured, and also of a typical piece of steel, enlarged 100 and 1,000 diameters, were properly admitted to illustrate the testimony of a chemist as to microscopical tests he had made. Potvin v. West Bay City Shipbuilding Co. 156 Mich. 201, 120 N. W. 613.

Photographs of a machine on which plaintiff was injured are admissible so that its operation may be properly explained by mechanical experts. Brown v. Douglas Lumber Co. 113 Minn. 67, 129 N. W. 161.

Or to illustrate statements of witnesses. Record v. Chickasaw Cooperage Co. 105 Tenn. 657, 69 S. W. 334.

But it was not error to exclude a photograph of a room showing the furniture on an issue as to the value of the furniture where the photograph, while showing the form and style of the furniture, did not show of what material it was made. Davenport v. Crowell, 79 Vt. 419, 65 Atl. 557.

IX. Extraneous matter on photographs.

The fact that distances were indicated and certain remarks explanatory of them written upon photographs did not render them objectionable, where witnesses verified every mark or notation that was material to the case. Wade v. Southern R. Co. 89 S. C. 280, 71 S. E. 859.

A photograph of defendant introduced for purposes of identification, and having on its back written statements likely to create unfavorable impressions (apparently memoranda of his conviction of another crime), should be excluded. Com. v. Stirling, 10 Pa. Dist. R. 437.

And the police history indorsed on the back of a photograph is sufficient to render it incompetent to go to the jury, if attention is called to it. But in the absence of objection on that ground, or of a showing that the jury saw the objectionable matter, a verdict will not be set aside on appeal because of it. Com. v. Johnson, 199 Mass. 55, 85 N. E. 188.

X-ray photographs, when properly verified, are admissible to show internal conditions of the human body. Elzig v. Bales, 135 Iowa, 208, 112 N. W. 540; Geneva v. Burnett, 65 Neb. 464, 58 L.R.A. 287, 101 Am. St. Rep. 628, 91 N. W. 275, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 104; Tish v. Welker, 5 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 725, 7 Ohio N. P. 472; Brace v. Beall, 99 Tenn. 303, 41 S. W. 445; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Shapard, 54 Tex. Civ. App. 596, 118 S. W. 596; Miller v. Dumont, 24 Wash. 648, 64 Pac. 804; Mauch v. Hartford, 112 Wis. 40, 87 N. W. 816, 11 Am. Neg. Rep. 63.

Such photographs are admissible though they are not infallible and may be misleading, the jury being made aware of their fallibility. Miller v. Mintun, 73 Ark. 183, 83 S. W. 918.

It is not error to admit X-ray negatives in evidence, instead of positive prints from the negatives. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Upton, 115 C. C. A. 379, 194 Fed. 371.

When X-ray plates had been proved and interpreted by a physician, it was proper to permit him to show and explain them to the jury. United R. & Electric Co. v. Dean, 117 Md. 686, 84 Atl. 75.

And they may be taken to the jury room. Brookman v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 116 Minn. 409, 133 N. W. 969.

If there is any difference between X-ray and ordinary photographs as to their admissibility in evidence, it is only in regard to the preliminary proof required.

Thus, in Dean v. Wabash R. Co. 229 Mo. 425, 129 S. W. 953, the court said: "The art of making photographs of the bones of a living man by use of the X-ray is yet still more in the keeping of science than the art of common photography, but that fact only requires more care in laying the foundation for the introduction of such photographs; it does not exclude them from evidence."

And in Marion v. B. G. Coon Constr. Co. 157 App. Div. 95, 141 N. Y. Supp. 647, it was said that the doctrine that an ordinary photograph is the best evidence of what it contains should not be applied to X-ray photographs. The opinion of the expert is the best evidence of what they contain.

But a consideration of the cases fails to show any essential difference between the preliminary proofs required by the courts for X-ray photographs and those required as to the ordinary kind.

To the objection that an X-ray photograph cannot be verified as can an ordinary photograph, the court says in Eckels v. Boylan, 136 Ill. App. 258: "Appellants say the ordinary photograph can be verified by the eye, and that this is the reason why an ordinary photograph can be proved by the statement of a proper witness that it is a correct representation of the object photographed. But so, in the present stage of the art, can an X-ray photograph be verified by the eye. By looking through the fluoroscope, the same things are shown to the eye as an X-ray photograph shows in a picture."

Such photographs must be identified as being of the person they are claimed to represent. Lake Shore Electric R. Co. v. Hobart, 32 Ohio C. C. 154.

Testimony of a physician who had never had any experience in taking X-ray photographs, that he was present when the one in question was taken and saw it before it was delivered to the photographer to be developed, and that the radiograph exhibited was the same as the impression on the glass which he saw just after it was taken, was sufficient proof of its accuracy and correctness to make it admissible. Prescott & N. W. R. Co. v. Franks, — Ark. —, 163 S. W. 180.

An X-ray photograph authenticated by the one who took it, who was an expert engaged in taking such photographs, is admissible to show the nature of the injury to the internal organs of a plaintiff in an action for personal injuries. Chicago & J. Electric R. Co. v. Spence, 213 Ill. 220, 104 Am. St. Rep. 213, 72 N. E. 796.

Testimony of an experienced physician and surgeon, that he was experienced in making X-ray photographs, and was competent to make such views, and made the original negatives and prints therefrom, which were correct representations of what they purported to show, was sufficient preliminary proof to make such photographs admissible. Chicago City R. Co. v. Smith, 226 Ill. 178, 80 N. E. 716, affirming 124 Ill. App. 627.

A prima facie showing for the admission of an X-ray photograph is made by testimony of a witness that she was engaged in taking such photographs, that she made the exposure, developed the negative, and printed the picture therefrom, which is a correct representation of the negative. Krauss v. Ballinger, 171 Ill. App. 534.

And the fact that the witness was not a physician, and had no means of knowing that the picture was a correct representation of the bones of the hand, was not sufficient reason for excluding it, where plaintiff testified that she had not had any other accident or trouble with her hand from the time she was treated by defendants till the photograph was taken. Ibid.

Testimony by the physician who directed the taking of an X-ray photograph, and who was present when it was taken, that it correctly represented complainant's body, was sufficient identification, without calling the electrician who operated the machine. State v. Matheson, 142 Iowa, 414, 134 Am. St. Rep. 426, 120 N. W. 1036.

It was not necessary to show that an X-ray photograph was taken by a competent person, nor that the apparatus used was such as to insure accuracy, to render it admissible, where a physician who had made an X-ray examination of the injury testified that the photograph correctly represented its condition, and another physician testified to the same effect from an examination he made by manipulation. Carlson v. Benton, 66 Neb. 486, 92 N. W. 600, 1 Ann. Cas. 159.

It was not error to admit X-ray photographs of plaintiff's leg without proof as to the skill of the person taking them, when the surgeon in connection with whose testimony they were introduced testified that upon operating he found conditions to be as shown by the photograph. Wallace v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 222 Pa. 556, 128 Am. St. Rep. 817, 71 Atl. 1086.

Even if error was committed in admitting testimony concerning X-ray photographs of an injury, because of insufficient showing of expert knowledge of such photographs by the physicians testifying, it is harmless where the condition shown by the photographs did not differ from the testimony of the physicians based upon their observations. Kimball v. Northern Electric Co. 159 Cal. 225, 113 Pac. 156.

But X-ray plates which, according to the testimony of the expert who took them, would be unintelligible to anyone but an expert, should not be admitted in evidence. Colesar v. Star Coal Co. 255 Ill. 532, 99 N. E. 709.

When an X-ray photograph of an injured arm has been admitted for plaintiff, it is error to exclude another X-ray photograph of a normal arm of another person, offered by defendant for comparison. Mellwain v. Gaebe, 128 Ill. App. 209.

After a proper foundation is laid, it is not error to admit X-ray photographs of plaintiff's injured foot, together with others of the foot of another person showing the normal position of the bones. Haywood v. Dering Coal Co. 145 Ill. App. 506.

X-ray photographs of plaintiff's hips, taken a year and five months after an accident, were properly admitted, their integrity being established and it being shown that plaintiff had sustained no intervening injury or illness. Judejko v. Chicago City R. Co. 166 Ill. App. 140.

In State v. Matheson, 130 Iowa, 440, 114 Am. St. Rep. 427, 103 N. W. 137, 8 Ann. Cas. 430, which was a prosecution for assault to murder, in which the direction that a bullet took after entering the body of the party assaulted became material, an X-ray photograph was held to be admissible to show the location of the bullet in his body, though the photograph was the only evidence of its location.

In De Forge v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 178 Mass. 59, 86 Am. St. Rep. 464, 59 N. E. 669, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 501, it was held error to exclude X-ray photographs offered by defendant for the purpose of showing that other X-ray pictures introduced by plaintiff were improperly marked as to which was plaintiff's left and right foot.

Where a verdict has been rendered for defendant, on the ground of contributory negligence, the exclusion of X-ray photographs of plaintiff's injury is harmless. Fraser v. California Street Cable R. Co. 146 Cal. 714, 81 Pac. 29, 18 Am. Neg. Rep. 5.

In Dean v. Wabash R. Co. 229 Mo. 425, 129 S. W. 953, it was held that there was no error in overruling a motion to compel plaintiff to submit to having an X-ray photograph taken of his injury, the court being advised that the process is sometimes dangerous to the subject. R. L. S.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT. (Division No. 1.)

KATHERINE DEVINE, Appt.,
v.

CITY OF ST. LOUIS, Resp.

Appeal — granting new trial — discretion.

1. The discretion of the trial court in granting a new trial for excess of damages 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

for a sprained ankle, the effect of which has extended over a period of two years, will not be interfered with on appeal, where the evidence is conflicting as to the painful and disabling quality of the injury.

Jury — constitutional rights — granting new trial.

2. The constitutional right to trial by jury is not infringed by the granting by the court of a new trial for the award of excessive damages by the jury.

(April 2, 1914.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Circuit Court of St. Louis setting aside a verdict in her favor and granting a new trial in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. Glendy B. Arnold for appellant.

Messrs. William E. Baird and Truman P. Young, for respondent:

A motion for a new trial is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court.

Parker v. Britton, 133 Mo. App. 270, 113 S. W. 259; Gould v. St. John, 207 Mo. 619, 106 S. W. 23; Rodan v. St. Louis Transit Co. 207 Mo. 392, 105 S. W. 1061; Morrell v. Lawrence, 203 Mo. 363, 120 Am. St. Rep. 660, 101 S. W. 571, 11 Ann. Cas. 650; Karnes v. Winn, 126 Mo. App. 712, 105 S. W. 1098; Crow v. Crow, 124 Mo. App. 120, 100 S. W. 1123; Handlan-Buck Mfg. Co. v. Wendelkin Constr. Co. 124 Mo. App. 349, 101 S. W. 702.

The jurisdiction of this court is appellate. To undertake to reverse the case on the condition that a remittitur is entered would be to try the case de novo.

Ables v. Ackley, 126 Mo. App. 84, 103 S. W. 974; Chandler v. Gloyd, 217 Mo. 394, 116 S. W. 1073.

The ruling that the damages were excessive was not an abuse of the trial court's discretion.

Feddeck v. St. Louis Car Co. 125 Mo. App. 24, 102 S. W. 675; Fairgrieve v. Moberly, 39 Mo. App. 31, 29 Mo. App. 141; Doherty v. Kansas City, 105 Mo. App. 173, 79 S.

Note. — Granting new trial because of excessive verdict as interference with constitutional right to jury trial.

There seems to be no real dissent from the proposition that the granting of a new trial because of an excessive verdict does not violate the constitutional right of trial by jury. This is true as well where the common law permits the granting of a new trial upon that ground, as where such privilege has been granted by express statutory provision.

A great number of cases have dealt with the question of the general right of a court

W. 716; Bragg v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 192 Mo. 331, 91 S. W. 527.

The power of the trial court to order a remittitur is well established.

The courts may also set aside verdicts as being inadequate.

Brown, C., filed the following opinion:

The appellant seeks to recover damages for personal injury suffered by her in the city of St. Louis by falling through a cinder sidewalk on Brannon avenue. The cinder surface broke under her weight, so that her foot went through into an excavation beneath it in such a manner as to seriously sprain her ankle. This occurred on January 4, 1908, and the ankle was still weak at the time of the trial, on March 14, 1910. There was much conflicting evidence as to her disability during the time intervening between the injury and the trial. The jury returned a verdict for

$2,000. The defendant in due time filed its motion for a new trial, stating, among other grounds therefor, the following:

(6) "The court erred in overruling the demurrer to the evidence at the close of the whole case."

(11) "The amount of the verdict is excessive, and is not supported or justified by the evidence."

(12) "The verdict is the result of sympathy, passion, and prejudice for the plaintiff on the part of the jury, and against the defendant."

The trial court afterwards announced that it would sustain the motion and grant a new trial, unless the plaintiff should, within ten days thereafter, remit from said verdict the sum of $800. This she refused to do, and, after the expiration of the ten days allowed for that purpose, the court sustained said motion and granted a new trial on the ground that "the verdict of the jury is excessive." The appeal is taken from this order.

1. The appellant insists in her brief that the verdict is not excessive, that "no man who has ever carried a rheumatic pain in a joint for two years—just acute enough to keep one fully advised of its presence—will ever say that $25 or even $50 a month is excessive compensation for his suffer-to interfere with a verdict for excessive damages (see, upon this general question, the note to Burdiet v. Missouri P. R. Co. 26 L.R.A. 384), but comparatively few cases seem to have expressly passed upon the question as to whether the granting of a new trial for excessive damages interferes with one's constitutional right to trial by jury.

To the latter class of cases belongs Devine v. St. Louis, which adheres to the rule that the granting by the trial court of a new trial, the plaintiff having refused to remit a portion of the damages, does not work a denial of the constitutional right to trial by jury.

And in Arkansas Valley Land & Cattle Co. v. Mann, 130 U. S. 69, 32 L. ed. 854, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 458, it was held that making the denial of a motion for a new trial depend upon a remission of a part of the verdict was not in effect a re-examination by the court in a mode not known at common law of facts tried by the jury, and therefore was not a violation of the 7th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, which guarantees the right to have the question of damages tried by a jury. Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the court, said that the practice adopted by the trial court did not in any just sense impair the constitutional right of trial by jury, and that "it cannot be disputed that the court is within the limits of its authority when it sets aside the verdict of the jury and grants a new trial where the damages are palpably or outrageously excessive. . . . 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

But, in considering whether a new trial should be granted upon that ground, the court necessarily determines, in its own mind, whether a verdict for a given amount would be liable to the objection that it was excessive. The authority of the court to determine whether the damages are excessive implies authority to determine when they are not of that character. To indicate, before passing upon the motion for a new trial, its opinion that the damages are excessive, and to require a plaintiff to submit to a new trial unless, by remitting a part of the verdict, he removes that objection, certainly does not deprive the defendant of any right, or give him any cause for complaint. Notwithstanding such remission, it is still open to him to show, in the court which tried the case, that the plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict in any sum, and to insist, either in that court or in the appellate court, that such errors of law were committed as entitled him to have a new trial of the whole case."

And in Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Pipkin, 64 Fla. 24, 59 So. 564, it was held that in directing that a remittitur be entered, and in the alternative that a new trial be granted, the court, whether trial or appellate, does not usurp the function of a jury, or deny to either party a right to a jury trial, the ground being that both the power and duty rest in the court to determine the validity of the verdict, both as to its nature and amount.

ing;" and expresses doubt that "the learned jurist nisi was ever a rheumatic, or had ever had a bone broken or an ankle sprained, else he would not have laid his heavy hand on this verdict." The inference is that some member or members of this court may have been favored with a broader experience, and therefore be qualified to check the exercise of the uneducated discretion of the trial judge. Whether or not we have that power in this case is the important question presented. In Hewitt v. Steele, 118 Mo. 463, 24 S. W. 440, we held that, "if the action of the court in granting the new trial can be sustained upon any ground set forth in the motion for that purpose, that it is our duty to do so." This language was approved in First Nat. Bank v. Wood, 124 Mo. 72, 76, 27 S. W. 554, 555, in which this court, after quoting it, said: "Circuit courts have large discretion in the matter of granting new trials, particularly upon the ground that the verdict is against the weight of evidence. This court has often ruled that, in law cases, where there is a conflict in the evidence, it would not review it and determine its weight, and it has as often declared it to be, not only the right, but the duty, of circuit courts to supervise the verdicts of juries and grant new trials, if the verdict is, in their opinion, against the weight of evidence. When there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, we should no more interfere with the action of the circuit court in granting a new trial than we should in such case interfere with the verdict which has been approved by that court." In McCarty v. St. Louis Transit Co. 192 Mo. 396, 401, 91 S. W. 132, 133, Judge Lamm for this court, after quoting a number of our own cases to sustain him, said: "The wise exercise of this judicial discretion on the part of circuit judge has always been encouraged by this court." In State ex rel. Bates v. Shaw, 163 Mo. 191, 63 S. W. 371, we said that if, when the motion for a new trial is presented, the court was of the opinion that the finding of the jury on the merits of the case was against the evidence, "it was not only its province, but it was its plain duty, to do as it did, set aside its finding and grant a new trial;" and it cites many cases in support of that statement. Coming to our later cases, we said, in Gould v. St. John, 207 Mo. 619, 631, 632, 106 S. W.

that allowing an option to take judgment for a sum less than the verdict, or to submit to a new trial, did not violate the constitutional rights of either party as to trial by an impartial jury. To the same effect is Willette v. Rhineland Paper Co. 145 Wis. 537, 130 N. W. 853.

And in Southern Power Co. v. White, 92 S. C. 219, 75 S. E. 459, it was held that the granting of a new trial because of excessive verdict does not deprive a party of his constitutional right of trial by jury.

So, in Burdick v. Missouri P. R. Co. 123 Mo. 221, 26 L.R.A. 221, 45 Am. St. Rep. 528, 27 S. W. 453, the majority of the Missouri supreme court held that they could allow the option of a reduction of the verdict or submission to a new trial. There was a strong dissent, however, upon the ground that such course violated the plaintiff's constitutional right of trial by jury.

But it seems that there is a limit to the number of times which a new trial will be granted upon the ground of excessive verdicts. See Hazzard v. Savannah, 77 Ga. 54, wherein it was said that to allow new trials ad infinitum upon this ground would oust the jury of its constitutional prerogative. In this case a "reasonable verdict" was permitted to stand, and the trial court's third order granting a new trial for excessive verdict reversed.

And see Dale v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 63 Mo. 455, 16 Am. Neg. Cas. 455, wherein it was said: "The verdict in this case on the first trial was set aside on account of the damages being, in the opinion of the court, excessive. A second verdict was for the same amount, which the court refused to set aside, and any interference by this court would be a usurpation of the province of the jury."

As before stated, the general rule is the same where the right to a new trial for excessive verdict is expressly granted by statute.

Thus, an Alabama statute (Acts 1911, p. 587) which authorizes an affirmance of a judgment by the appellate courts with consent of the parties on remittitur of excess, where an excessive verdict is the only error, and provides that in case either party dissents to the reduction, the case shall be remanded for new trial, has been held not to be an unwarranted infraction of the right of trial by jury in respect to the assessment of damages. Ex parte Stevenson, 177 Ala. 384, 58 So. 992, affirming 3 Ala. App. 313, 57 So. 494. In the court of appeals the court, in upholding the statute, said: "The power of a trial court to set aside, upon a proper motion for a new trial, the verdict of a jury because the verdict was excessive, is undoubted. From the judgment of the trial court upon such motion, an appeal undoubtedly lies to the supreme court or to the court of appeals. The power to review such judgment is undoubtedly vested in these courts, and when the bill of exceptions shows that the judgment of the lower court was wrong, and that it should have granted the appellant a new trial because of the excessive verdict of the jury, the supreme court or the court of appeals not only has the power, but it is the duty of such court, to reverse the judgment of the lower court. The statute under consideration simply provides that, in such a case, the supreme court and court of appeals, with the consent of both the appel-

23, 26, that in granting new trials the courts have much discretionary power, and that, where the weight of the evidence is involved, this court will not interfere with that discretion, unless it has been unwisely exercised. We also said in that case, citing McKay v. Underwood, 47 Mo. 187, "that the granting of a new trial on the ground that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence rests peculiarly with the judge presiding at the trial." In Rodan v. St. Louis Transit Co. 207 Mo. 392, 406, 105 S. W. 1061, 1065, we said: "It must be assumed as a commonplace of the law, arising to the level of an axiom, that the granting of a new trial rests within the sound discretion of the trial court; and its action in that behalf will not be disturbed on appeal, unless it appears that its discretionary power was abused, i. e., exercised in an arbitrary or improvident manner."

In Morrell v. Lawrence, 203 Mo. 363, 381, 120 Am. St. Rep. 660, 101 S. W. 571, 575, 11 Ann. Cas. 650, this court applied the same principle in a case where the ground assigned as a reason for granting a new trial was that the verdict was excessive. We said: "That is a point peculiarly within the province of the trial judge; it is one that he is better qualified to judge than an appellate court. The law puts that important responsibility upon him, and it advances the cause of justice when the trial judge courageously performs that duty." In this case we see no reason for departing from this rule. The evidence was conflicting, at least in its coloring as to the painful and disabling quality of the injury. The trial court had the plaintiff and all the witnesses before it, and was much better qualified than we to determine whether justice will be promoted by another trial. It may be that, as in Goetz v. Ambs, 27 Mo. 28, cited by appellant, the verdict will be increased in another trial. If so, the statute (Rev. Stat. 1909, § 2023) which permits but one retrial for this cause will relieve the courts of much of their responsibility.

2. The appellant insists that the action of the trial court and also of this court in the many cases to which we have referred are all in violation of article 2, § 22, of the Constitution of our state, because they amount to a denial of the right of trial by jury as enjoyed before the adoption of that lant and the appellee, may reduce the judgment to an amount which the members of the court may deem right and just under all the facts and circumstances of the case. If the appellant and the appellee do not consent to the reduction, the judgment of the trial court is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. If they do consent to the reduction, the judgment as reduced is affirmed. The above, in plain English, is all that the act under consideration does or undertakes to do, and it in no way offends any constitutional provision touching the right of trial by jury."

And the Texas statute (Rev. Stat. art. 1029a) which authorizes the court of civil appeals, upon finding a judgment excessive, to reverse or grant a new trial upon failure to remit a suggested excess, has been held not to be violative of the constitutional provision guarantying the right of trial by jury. Texas & N. O. P. R. Co. v. Syfan, 91 Tex. 562, 44 S. W. 1064.

So, in Ingraham v. Weidler, 139 Cal. 588, 73 Pac. 415, it was held that California Code Civ. Proc. § 657, which authorized the granting of a new trial where excessive damages had been awarded was not violative of the constitutional declaration that the right of trial by jury shall be secured to all, the court saying that the power to grant a new trial upon this ground was a long recognized part of the "right of trial by jury." In this case, like DEVINE v. St. Louis, the plaintiff had declined to consent to a modification of the amount of damages, and a new trial was granted upon the ground of excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion and prejudice.

And in Kennon v. Gilmer, 131 U. S. 22, 33 L. ed. 110, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 690, it was said with respect to the provisions of the Montana Code authorizing the trial court to set aside a verdict and grant a new trial "for excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice," that "under these statutes, as at common law, the court, upon the hearing of a motion for a new trial, may in the exercise of its judicial discretion either absolutely deny the motion or grant a new trial generally, or it may order that a new trial be had unless the plaintiff elects to remit a certain part of the verdict," etc., without infringing the constitutional right of trial by jury.

So, in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Fox, 11 Bush, 495, it was held that a reversal by the court of appeals of an order of the trial court denying a new trial, upon the sole ground that the verdict was excessive, was not an infringement of the right of trial by jury, the Civil Code, § 369, providing that a verdict may be set aside by the trial court and a new trial granted "for excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice," and § 15, giving the court of appeals appellate jurisdiction over such orders.

And in Smith v. Times Pub. Co. 178 Pa. 481, 35 L.R.A. 819, 36 Atl. 296, it was held that a Pennsylvania statute under which the supreme court reversed a judgment on a verdict for excessive damages, and ordered a new trial, did not infringe the constitutional right to a jury trial, although the trial court had denied a motion for a new trial.

instrument in 1875, and that we should overrule our own more recent cases and turn to the good old doctrine which she thinks was held by us in Gurley v. Missouri P. R. Co. 104 Mo. 211, 16 S. W. 11, and Rodney v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. 127 Mo. 676, 28 S. W. 887, 30 S. W. 150. She says that we should do this if we are of the opinion that, under the common and statute law of this state as it existed prior to that time, our own and English courts did not assert or exercise the power now claimed. Acting upon the old theory that a recurrence to first principles is a great assistance to keep us from swerving from the right track, it is well enough to refer to the early history of the power to grant new trials. The first reported case on that subject which we have read is the Slade Case, Style 138, which was decided in the King's bench in 1648. It arose upon motion for judgment formerly stayed upon a certificate made by Baron Atkins that the verdict passed against his opinion. Baron, J., said, "Judgments have been arrested in the common pleas upon such certificates;" but Roll, J., held: "It ought not to be stayed, though it have been done in the common pleas, for it was too arbitrary for them to do it, and you may have your attain against the jury, and there is no other remedy in law for you; but it were good to advise the party to suffer a new trial for better satisfaction." The new trial was accordingly ordered. The next case we notice is Wood v. Gunston, page 466 in the same report, which was decided in 1655 in the King's bench. Wood sued Gunston for slander, and obtained a verdict for £1,500 damages. The defendant moved for a new trial on the ground that the damages were excessive. Glyn, J., said: "It is in the discretion of the court in some cases to grant a new trial, but this must be a judicial, and not an arbitrary, discretion, and it is frequent in our books for the court to take notice of the miscarriages of juries, and to grant new trials upon them, and it is for the people's benefit that it should be so, for a jury may sometimes by indirect dealings be moved to side with one party, and not to be indifferent betwixt them, but it cannot be so intended of the court; wherefore let there be a new trial the next term."

In 1773 the new trial seems to have got well into harness as appears from Vernon v. Hankey, 2 T. R. 113, 1 Revised Rep. 444. In the meantime, in 1757, Bright v. Eynon, 1 Burr. 391, came up in the King's bench, in which Lord Mansfield, in a long and in-51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

structive opinion concurred in by the other justices, and expressly indorsing Wood v. Gunston, said: "Trials by jury in civil causes could not subsist now without a power somewhere to grant new trials." His masterly argument in this opinion will well repay perusal. We have been greatly aided by the English cases collected and cited by the learned counsel for the appellant. They all recognize the power of the trial court, in the exercise of a proper discretion, to grant a new trial on the ground of excessive damages, and there is no instance on the part of an appellate court of an attempt to control that discretion. Wilford v. Berkeley, 1 Burr. 609, so cited, was an action for criminal conversation with plaintiff's wife, at the trial of which, in King's bench in 1758, Lord Mansfield presided. There was a verdict for £500 and a motion to set it aside because it was excessive. The report states: "The court were all three, clear and unanimous, that, although there was no doubt of the power of the court to exercise a proper discretion in setting aside verdicts for excessiveness of damages in cases where the quantum of the damage really suffered by the plaintiff could be apparent, or they were of such a nature that the court could properly judge of the degree of injury, and could see manifestly that the jury had been outrageous in giving such damages as greatly exceeded the injury, yet the case was very different where it depended upon circumstances which were properly and solely under the cognizance of the jury, and were fit to be submitted to their decision and estimate. And they held the case of criminal conversation with another's man's wife to be of this latter kind."

We think, with the court in that case, that the damages accruing to one for criminal conversation with his wife are so largely personal and sentimental in their nature that judicial experience affords little or no aid in estimating them, so that the judge, with respect to them, labors under all the difficulties that beset the jury. The most of the English cases cited by appellant are of that general character. Benson v. Frederick, 3 Burr. 1846, is, however, an action like this, for personal injury, and well repays notice in this connection. It was brought against the defendant, a colonel of the militia, for ordering the plaintiff, a common soldier, to be stripped, and receive twenty lashes from two drummers. Owing to the leniency of the drummers, he did not suffer much injury; but the jury assessed his damages at £150. The report states: "Lord Mansfield said he had no doubt but that it might be right to give an opportunity of reconsidering verdicts where excessive damages had been given. But in the present case he was not dissatisfied with the verdict, for Sir Thomas had manifestly acted arbitrarily, unjustifiably, and unreasonably." Mr. Justice Wilmot, concurring, observed that "he had no doubt but that the court might look upon these damages to be too high in a common and ordinary case, and had power to set aside the verdict and award a new writ of inquiry; yet, as in this case the defendant had acted very arbitrarily, and was well able to pay for it, he did not think the court were obliged to set aside the verdict that the jury had found." Mr. Justice Aston, concurring, said: "He was very full in vindicating the discretion of the court to grant new trials, even when the damages were ideal; and cited the case of Wood v. Gunston. But as, in the present case, the defendant had acted very arbitrarily and unjustifiably, and under the circumstances that appeared upon the report he did not think this to be a proper occasion for the court to set the verdict aside," so it seems that in that case a new trial was refused on the sole ground that all the judges thought the defendant only got what was coming to him. It contains the whole pith of the matter, and vindicates the discretion of the court, even in cases where the action of the jury in the assessment of damages is "ideal." Leith v. Pope, 2 W. Bl. 1327, to which appellant's counsel directs our attention, is of the same character, and the court was influenced by a similar motive. The jury found a verdict in an action of malicious prosecution for £10,000. The defendant moved for a new trial "on account of the outrageousness of the damages, which exceeded (it was said) all example." Justices Gould, Blackstone, and Nares, in their opinion refusing a new trial, said: "A prosecution thus aimed at the life of the plaintiff, and proceeding from such wicked motives, must evidence a most depraved and corrupt heart, for which, had he had an associate, both might have been indicted for conspiracy, and have received the most infamous, called emphatically the villenous, judgment. In such a case the court cannot say that any sum assessed by the jury is too much, if the circumstances of the parties will warrant it. (2) Now the plaintiff is a man of family, a baronet, an officer in the army, and a member of Parliament; all of them respectable situations, and which may render the value of an injury done to him, especially when directed against his life, adequate to £10,000. The court cannot enter into stories of private scandal, which have been liberally propagated on both sides. This is the light in which the plaintiff appears upon the record and the evidence. (3) The defendant appeared upon evidence to be exceeding wealthy, and well able to sustain such a verdict."

We can safely say that in England the practice of granting new trials at the discretion of the court for miscarriages of the jury, including the award of excessive damages, was firmly established in the eighteenth century, and has continued unabated. It is a part of the common law of England adopted in the territory of Missouri on the 19th day of January, 1816, and which has during the entire period of our statehood been a canon of constitutional and statutory interpretation to which we have had frequent recourse.

We have carefully read the numerous Missouri cases to which counsel for appellant has referred, and greatly appreciate the industry and learning he has brought to our aid. They all deal with the power and duty of this court with respect to the verdicts of juries; but we find in them no authority against the proposition that the granting or refusing of new trials on the ground that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence rests peculiarly with the judge presiding at the trial, and that this discretion will not be ordinarily interfered with, unless it appears that it has been unsoundly or arbitrarily exercised. This rule applies to the verdict in its entirety, without reference to whether the evidential weakness be in its amount or in some other controlling particular. In the former case justice commends the practice by which it may be corrected by the action of the party for whom it is rendered, without the cost and delay of a new trial.

It follows from what we have said that the order of the Circuit Court for the City of St. Louis granting a new trial must be affirmed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

As to right of railroad company to delegate to independent contractor the maintenance of gates or a flagman at a street crossing, see note to Boucher v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1177.

The present note is confined to cases wherein the question is as to the responsibility of joint employers for the torts of their common servants, as affected by the fact that such servants are in the employment of two or more persons or corporations.

The great weight of authority is to the effect that joint employers are liable both jointly and severally for the torts of an employee, and this notwithstanding the particular service being rendered was for one only of the employers, and notwithstanding such employee was paid directly by only one of the joint employers.

The general rule that joint employers are all liable for the torts of a common servant is laid down in Landers v. Felton, 73 Fed. 311, wherein it was held that the liability of two railroad companies which jointly owned a yard engine, for injuries caused by the negligent operation of such engine by one employed and under the control of both the companies, was both joint and several. So, in Williams v. Southern 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

when going to the drawer for supplies, and held in such negligent manner while forcibly pulling open another drawer as to cause its discharge and the injury complained of.

Same — joint service — liability of either master.

2. That the joint agent of two railroad companies at a particular station was performing a service for one of them when he inflicted an injury upon a bystander does not relieve the other from liability for his acts.

Same — establishment of relation — employment and payment of salary.

3. That a baggage master at a union depot was appointed and paid by one of the companies does not prevent his negligent infliction of an injury while looking after baggage for another company using the

R. Co. 102 Miss. 617, 59 So. 850, where two carriers maintained a station in charge of a joint agent, and a passenger was injured by remaining therein a reasonable length of time when it was insufficiently heated, it was held that such carriers were jointly and severally liable for the injuries resulting from the failure of the joint agent to properly heat the station. And in Moling v. Barnard, 65 Mo. App. 601, where an animal was killed by a negligently operated railroad train, it was said that if the operation of such train was under the joint control of the officers and agents of the two railroad companies, then either or both of such companies are liable for the damages resulting from the negligence. And in American Cotton Co. v. Simmons, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 189, 87 S. W. 842, where an employee was injured by reason of the negligence of the common foreman of two corporations, it was held that the liability of the corporations was both joint and several. And in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Rust, 55 Tex. Civ. App. 359, 120 S. W. 249, where a traveler on a highway was injured by the negligence of a messenger furnished by a telegraph company and a messenger company as joint masters, it was held that both companies were liable for the injuries. And in Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Snyder, 128 Ill. 655, 21 N. E. 520, where a train employee was injured in a collision between two trains resulting from the negligence of one employed and paid by the two defendant railroad companies, each of which owned one of such trains, to operate a semaphore in the interest of both companies, by one of which plaintiff was employed as a trainman at the time of the injury, it was held that it was proper to refuse an instruction that the semaphore operator at the time of the accident was the agent only of the railroad company which employed plaintiff, and not of the other defendant, where it appeared that such operator was directing the movements of both trains; and judgment against both railroad companies was sustained.

And the same rule has been adopted where the action was brought against one depot, from rendering the former company liable, under a statute making railroad companies liable for injuries negligently inflicted by servants on fellow servants, if he was in fact the agent of both companies for the performance of such duties at that station.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Forsyth County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the wrongful death of plaintiff's intestate, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's servant. Affirmed.

of the joint employers only. Thus, in White v. Fitchburg R. Co. 136 Mass. 321, where a passenger on the train of one railroad company was injured as a result of the negligence of a brakeman employed and paid by another railroad company, while engaged in a service which the two companies had agreed should be performed for their joint benefit, it was held that the former railroad company was liable for such injuries, it being said that while performing the service in question he was acting for both companies. So, in Roberts v. Wabash R. Co. 153 Mo. App. 638, 134 S. W. 89, it was held that a railroad company was liable for an assault upon a passenger by its operator, although such servant was acting in the double capacity of operator for defendant and for a telegraph company, and though the passenger called to send a private message. And in Illinois C. R. Co. v. King, 69 Miss. 852, 13 So. 824, it was held that the fact that a station agent was acting for another railroad company as well as the defendant did not prevent a recovery by one unlawfully arrested by such agent while acting in the scope of his duties, the court saying that such fact merely showed that two might have been sued instead of one. So, in Penfield v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 26 App. Div. 413, 50 N. Y. Supp. 79, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 449, it was held that the carrier of a passenger who was injured at a union station by reason of the wrongful act of the station officer was liable for such injuries, since, as between the defendant and its passengers, such officer was the defendant's servant. And in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Shelton, 96 Tex. 301, 72 S. W. 166, affirming 30 Tex. Civ. App. 72, 69 S. W. 653, on rehearing in 70 S. W. 359, where a switching crew were equally the servants of two railroad companies, although employed and paid by one, the other paying one half the cost, it was held that the company which merely bore one half the expense was liable for the torts of a member of such switching crew in ordering a passenger to alight from a moving train at night, to the same extent as if 51 L.R.A. Messrs. Manly Hendren & Womble, for appellant:

A pistol in the hands of a grown young man, possessed and kept under the circumstances of this case, does not come within the category of a dangerous agency, so as to make his employer responsible for all damages that may be caused by its unintentional discharge, though negligently done.

he had been employed and directly paid by it.

And that the general rule of joint and several liability obtains notwithstanding the fact that the joint employee was performing a service for one of his employers only when the tort was committed was the holding in MOORE v. SOUTHERN R. Co. Another excellent case with regard to whether a joint employee is at the time of the commission of a tort the servant of both masters, or merely of the one for whom he is acting at the time, is Buchanan v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 75 Iowa, 393, 39 N. W. 663, forceful language from which is quoted in MOORE v. SOUTHERN R. Co., in which it was held that a flagman for three railroads at a point where they crossed a street was not acting solely for the company owning a certain track, and operating a train thereon, negligence in flagging which was the cause of injuries to plaintiff, a traveler upon the street. In this case, by agreement between the three railroads, one employed and paid a flagman at one street crossing; the second at another crossing; and the other at a third street, which all their tracks crossed, and the plaintiff brought action against the company which paid the flagman at the crossing where the accident occurred, and the defense was that at the time in question such servant was flagging for a train on one of the other roads, and therefore that that road was the only one liable; but as above set out this contention was held untenable. And see also Roberts v. Wabash R. Co. as set out supra.

And the holding in MOORE v. SOUTHERN R. Co., to the effect that one railroad company cannot excuse liability for the negligent infliction of injury by proof that the negligent person was employed and paid by another railroad company, provided such person was in fact in the service of both companies, is supported by the decision in Taylor v. Western P. R. Co. 45 Cal. 323, wherein it was held that a railroad company which intrusted a servant employed and paid by another railroad company, at a junction point between the two railroads, with the business of attending to its trains at such junction, could not deny its liability for damages caused by such servant's negligence upon the ground that the servant was hired by the other company. The court said that it was immaterial by which company the servant was paid, if he was intrusted by the defendant with the responsibility of looking after its trains at the junction point. So, in Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Gustafson, 21 Colo. 393, 41 Pac. 505, it was held that a railroad company may be liable for injuries to a traveler on a highway resulting from the negligence of a flagman at a railroad crossing, although such flagman was engaged and paid by another railroad company which also used the crossing, the flagman in question having acted at the crossing for both companies. In this case the court said: "Employment and payment of a person are not indispensable elements to charge one as a master for the negligence of such one who renders him service. When one knowingly and without objection receives the benefits of labor, or holds out to the public one as engaged in his service, he is liable as a master for the negligence of such servant, when the act or failure constituting the negligence comes within the apparent scope of the servant's employment, even though the person for whom the service is rendered has not employed or paid the servant. The facts of this case sufficiently show that the defendant knowingly availed itself of the services of the flagman for a long series of years, and held him out to the public as its servant." And in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Bond, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 104, 20 S. W. 930, it was held, assuming that the employee whose negligence caused injury to a trainman was employed jointly by two railroad companies, that such trainman could recover against one of the companies, although at the time of the accident the other company was paying the wages of the negligent employee. And in Schulte v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 128 Ky. 627, 108 S. W. 941, where a traveler on a highway was injured at a railroad crossing by reason of the negligence of a gate tender, it was held that all railroad companies using the something more must be proved than that the wrongful act was in some way connected with the servant's authorized functions, or that he committed it at a time when he was occupied with the discharge of those functions.

crossing were jointly and severally chargeable with the negligence of the watchman in failing to close the gates, and where, as here, more than one railroad company used the crossing, it was immaterial who employed or paid the gate watchman. And in Boucher v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 196 Mass. 355, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1177, 82 N. E. 15, it was held that the fact that a gate tender at a point where two railroads cross a street was hired and paid by one of such railroad companies did not prevent a finding that the gate tender was also the servant or agent of the other company, so as to render it liable for injuries resulting from his negligence. And in Usher v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 122 Mo. App. 98, 98 S. W. 84, it was held that a telegraph company was liable for the tort of one acting jointly for it and for a railroad company, although the railroad company paid such agent's wages, the court saying that such circumstances was not controlling. And see Brow v. Boston & A. R. Co. 157 Mass. 399, 32 N. E. 362, wherein it was said that it did not necessarily follow from the fact that it might be inferred from the facts that one railroad company exercised the exclusive right of selecting the gateman whose negligence caused the injury in question, and of controlling and discharging him, and that it was in a legal sense his master, that the other railroad companies for whom he performed services might not also be liable, on the ground that the jury might find that such companies jointly with the first company employed a common agent, for whose torts in the performance of his duties each and all were responsible. And see also White v. Fitchburg R. Co. 136 Mass. 321, and Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Shelton, 96 Tex. 301, 72 S. W. 165, as set out supra.

And the rule that the liability of joint employers for the torts of an employee is both joint and several is not necessarily obviated by the fact that there is no express contract between the companies as to such employment. This was the holding in Brow v. Boston & A. R. Co. supra, which is sufficiently set out in MOORE v. SOUTHERN R. Co.

In some instances two or more masters which employ the same person to act for both have provided by contract that each party should alone be responsible for all loss or damage caused by the fault of such an employee while acting in its behalf. A contract of this character is undoubtedly binding between the parties thereto, as is illustrated by Louisville, H. & St. L. R. Co. v. Illinois C. R. Co. 29 Ky. L. Rep. 265, 93 S. W. 4, wherein it was held that, as between two railroad companies operating under such a contract, which also provided that one of such companies should select and hire and discharge flagmen, and that the other company should pay a certain portion of the compensation, the latter railroad company, for whom a flagman was acting at the time of a collision caused by his negligence, between defendant's train and a street car, must bear the whole loss.

But contracts providing that one of two masters shall be liable for the torts of persons in their joint employment are not controlling as between such employers and third persons. Thus, in Schoen v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 112 Minn. 38, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 841, 127 S. W. 433, it was held that either or both of two companies which operated a switch engine as a joint enterprise were liable for injuries caused by the negligence of its operators, although by private contract one of such companies had assumed all liability for injuries caused by the operation of the engine.

Another class of cases which is of interest in connection with the present note is composed of those cases wherein two or more persons or corporations operate a business jointly. Of this character is Jones v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 8 Mackey, 178, affirmed on this point in 155 U. S. 333, 39 L. ed. 176, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136, wherein it was held that several railroad companies operating jointly as one line, and each contributing to the expense and sharing in the profits, were jointly and severally liable for injuries caused by the negligence of the employees on one of the trains. In this case the employees were hired by the various companies, and were upon the individual pay rolls 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

of the hiring company, but were all paid by a common agent. The court said that such employees were, as a matter of fact, each the agent of all the companies. So, in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Breeden, 111 Ky. 729, 64 S. W. 667, it was held that where a train is run by two railroad companies on joint account, both companies are liable for the negligence of those in charge of the train, to third persons, whatever their rights may be as to each other. And in Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Carroll, 6 Heisk. 347, it was held that where the train which, because of negligent operation, injured plaintiff, was operated jointly by two railroad companies, both companies were liable. The train in this case was run by an engineer and brakeman in the employment of one company, and a conductor in the employment of the other company. And in Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Davis, 119 Ky. 641, 60 S. W. 14, where the track on which a train was negligently operated was owned by one railroad company and the engine by another, and the evidence as a whole warranted the conclusion that the train was operated by the two companies jointly, it was held that they were jointly liable for injuries to a person at a street crossing resulting from such negligent operation. And see also Smith v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 96 Fed. 504, wherein it was held that railroad corporations created by the legislatures of adjoining states, to operate jointly a continuous line, are jointly liable for a tort committed by their employees in one of such states. Bissell v. Michigan S. & N. I. R. Cos. 22 N. Y. 258, is to the same effect as regards both conclusions and facts as the Smith Case, except that the tort in the former case was committed in a third state, where such companies jointly operated on the tracks of a third company.

In connection with the present note, see also Goodman v. Wilson, post, —, and note appended thereto, wherein will be found a treatment of cases involving the question of the liability of joint owners of an automobile or carriage for the torts of a common servant.

Clark, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for the wrongful death of plaintiff's intestate through the negligence of a fellow servant. The baggage agent of the defendant left a loaded revolver in a drawer in the desk in the baggage room. It was lying upon some baggage checks, and the baggage agent, in removing the pistol from the drawer in order to get the checks, held it in one hand while pulling open another drawer, causing the pistol to fire. It was directed towards the deceased, a fellow servant in the employ of the defendant, and was discharged, thereby killing him.

The court charged the jury that, if they found that the defendant company through its agent left a loaded revolver in said desk, where it was necessary to be handled in order to transact the business of the department, and should also find that, in removing the pistol from the drawer in the course of his employment, said agent took hold of and handled the pistol without the exercise of ordinary care as to the manner in which he was handling it, and carelessly, and without the exercise of ordinary care, and without due regard to the direction in which it was pointed, pressed the trigger, and as a result of such careless conduct and want of care, the plaintiff's intestate was killed, and the jury should further find that by the exercise of ordinary care the injurious result ought reasonably to have been anticipated as a consequence of such conduct, to find the first issue, "Yes," otherwise to answer it, "No."

In this we find no error of which the defendant can complain. Indeed, in requiring, in addition to the last two circumstances, the jury to find further that there was negligence in leaving the pistol in the drawer, there was error; but of this the defendant cannot complain. It was an immaterial circumstance.

If the baggage agent had suddenly and forcibly pulled the drawer open without observing the fact that another employee was standing close by, and by reason of such negligence and unusual and forcible manner of pulling open the drawer, the sharp corner of the drawer had struck the deceased on the temple, killing him, and by the use of ordinary care the agent could reasonably have anticipated such consequence, the defendant would have been liable for the negligence, just as if one employee had negligently thrown a crosstie or a lump of coal on another, as in Fitzgerald v. Southern R. Co. 141 N. C. 531, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 337, 54 S. E. 391, where the point is thoroughly discussed, or dropped a bar of iron on his foot. Horton v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 145 N. C. 132, 58 S. E. 993, and many similar cases.

The injury was an accident in the sense only that the killing was not intentional. The jury, under the last paragraph of the charge, must have found that the killing was in consequence of the negligence of the baggage agent from the careless manner in which he held the pistol while pulling open another drawer. He was in the discharge of his duties in the course of his employment. He was negligent, as the jury find, both in the manner of holding the pistol while pointed at another, and in pulling open the drawer at the same time. The statute is explicit that, for "injury caused by the negligence, carelessness, or incompetence of a fellow servant," the defendant is liable. Revisal 1905, § 2646. The able and experienced counsel of the defendant do not base their motion for a nonsuit upon the ground that the witness Wall was the agent solely for the Southern Railway, and that the death of the decedent was caused by him when acting solely as agent of the Norfolk & Western, either by exception on the trial, or by taking such point in their briefs. But, as the suggestion is made, it is well to refer to the testimony of Wall himself, who says: "I was the joint agent of the Norfolk & Western and the Southern Railway Companies. Lincoln Moore [the deceased] was employed to help me look after the baggage for the Southern and Norfolk & Western." He also says: "I was assistant baggage agent at the union station at Winston-Salem, and worked in the baggage room." On the motion to nonsuit, the evidence must be taken as true in the aspect most favorable to the plaintiff. According to the evidence above set out, it appears that Wall was the joint agent of the two railroads, and operating the joint baggage room of the union depot in their behalf. That being so, it cannot be said that any one service was done by him at the responsibility of one railroad, and the other service at the responsibility of the other. The witness testified that he was the "joint" agent of both roads, operating the "joint" business of both roads. It follows, therefore, that the plaintiff could have sued either or both roads at her option. It was a joint employment, and he was a joint agent. There is no evidence tending to show, and it is unreasonable to suppose, that he was paid according to the trains he served. He was doubtless employed by the month, as is customary, and whatever work he did according to his testimony was as joint agent in the joint or common business of the two roads.

A case almost exactly in point is Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Dorsey, 66 Tex. 148, 18 S. W. 444. In that case the plaintiff was employed by one railroad company to act as night switchman in a union yard jointly kept and used by that company and two others. While performing his duty upon a train and track of one of the latter companies, and because of some negligence of that company, he received personal injury, and it was held: (1) Between the plaintiff and his employer the relation of master and servant existed by express contract. Between the plaintiff and the other companies that relation arose by inference from the service and the connection of the companies. (2) No proof being offered as to the contract between the companies, their duties respecting the yard where the plaintiff was injured could only be inferred from the manner in which the premises were used. (3) It appearing that the plaintiff was employed to work in the 'union yard,' that it was used by the three companies in common, and the plaintiff was injured while performing his duty, it was not error to instruct the jury that, if the injury resulted from the negligence of either company, all were liable jointly and severally." This is a well-considered case, and there are many others like it. In Vary v. Burlington, C. R. & M. R. Co. 42 Iowa, 246, it did not appear whether the plaintiff was injured on the road of the defendant or of the company by which he was employed. His engagement was to serve both companies very much in the same way as the plaintiff's intestate in this case, and it was held that he could sue either or both, and it was said: "This principle is elementary, and needs no citation of cases in its support." Among other cases to the same purport is Buchanan v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 75 Iowa, 393, 39 N. W. 603, in which it is said: "The idea that the employee was under the employment of one company for five minutes, and then another for a few minutes, and another for a short time, and that he changed his employers with the facility with which the kaleidoscope exhibits an array of colors, involves an absurdity,"—and adds that this would make the service, "not only the ridicule of the public, but a system of deception, to the great peril of the most prudent and careful drivers." Another case is Brow v. Boston & A. R. Co. 157 Mass. 399, 32 N. E. 362, which held that in such cases, where an employee is in a common employment at a union station, rendering service first for one company and then the other, that one injured by the negligence of such servant could recover out of either or all of the companies, though there was no express contract between the companies as to his employment.

If, as Wall testified, he was the joint agent of both companies, they were jointly and severally liable. If, however, as he also testified (and which is not incompatible), he was appointed and paid by the Southern to attend to the joint business for both companies in the baggage room, both companies are liable. Certainly the Southern Railway which is the one sued here, cannot object that Wall was not in its service when he was handling baggage by its direction for the other company. Nor are we impressed with the suggestion that a farmer would not be held responsible for the negligence of his servant in a case of this kind, and therefore the railroad should not be. The railroad would not have been liable until the enactment of chapter 56, Laws 1897, now Revisal 1905, § 2646, which provides: "Any servant or employee of any railroad company operating in this state who shall suffer injury to his person, or the personal representative of any such servant or employee who shall have suffered death in the course of his services or employment with such company by the negligence, carelessness or incompetence of any other servant, employee or agent of the company or by any defect in the machinery, ways or appliances of the company shall be entitled to maintain an action against such company." This statute has been sustained by repeated decisions of this court, and, indeed, such statutes have been now almost universally adopted.

This being a motion for a nonsuit, the evidence must be taken as true. The witness testified that he was the joint agent of both railroads, and so was the deceased, who was his helper. The latter was killed "in the course of his services or employment," and the jury found that this was done "by the negligence, carelessness, or incompetence of the other servant." all testified that he was appointed and paid by the defendant, the Southern Railway; but he also says that he was the joint agent of both companies in their joint business of looking after the baggage that came to the union depot.

No error.

Brown, J., dissenting:

I am of opinion that the conclusion reached by the majority of my brethren is in contravention of the previous decision of this court, and that the motion to nonsuit should be sustained. As the facts are not stated fully in the opinion, I set them out from the record. The only witness examined who testified to the facts was J. A. Wall, introduced by the plaintiff. After testifying that he was assistant baggage agent at the union station in Winston-Salem, the witness says: "About seven days before Lincoln Moore was killed I found a pistol in an old desk in the baggage room. This desk set on the back side, where we kept all our checks and some supplies. I found the pistol a few days after Mr. Minter the baggage agent, took charge. I took it out and rubbed it up, and got the dust off of it. Mr. Minter saw me when I found it. When I put the pistol in the drawer immediately after finding it, I did not put it in the drawer where we keep the baggage checks. The drawer in which I put it contained a book and some old circulars. On the morning that Lincoln Moore was killed the pistol was in the drawer on top of Norfolk & Western Railway checks. I put it there. It was put in that place the evening before Moore was shot. There was one cartridge in the pistol. Up to the time I put it in the drawer just spoken of, it had been in the drawer where the circulars and book were. Mr. Minter said to me, 'I found a cartridge I believe will fit your old gun.' When he told me about this cartridge, I took the pistol out and put the cartridge in it. Lincoln Moore had been working in the baggage room about two months and a half. He was hired by Victor Davis. His duties were to help load baggage going out and unload baggage coming in. He was under my instructions, and did what I told him to do. We were both at the station that morning getting the baggage off on the 5:40 Southern train. The next train that left after that was the 7:05 train over the Norfolk & Western for Roanoke. After getting the baggage off on the Southern, Lincoln Moore and I came around near my desk, and Lincoln Moore sat on a stool inside of the office and was combing his hair. I went to get some Norfolk & Western checks to put strings on them to prepare to check the baggage going out on the 7:05 Norfolk & Western. Opening the drawer, I found the pistol lying on top of the checks, and I picked it up with my right hand and was going to lift it back into the other drawer, and just as I went to pull the drawer it got hung. I stepped back like this [indicating], and as I stepped back it went off; the bullet striking Lincoln Moore and killing him. I had pistol in my right hand, and was trying to open the drawer with my left hand, and in jerking the pistol went off."

It is not contended that the defendant or its officers either authorized or knew of the keeping of the pistol in the desk by the baggage agent, Wall. In my opinion, it was the unauthorized and personal act of Wall for which the defendant is not liable.

1. Wall was not acting within the scope of his authority or in furtherance of this defendant's business. He says his purpose in opening the drawer was to get checks to put on baggage for the 7:05 Norfolk & Western train, and that the pistol was lying on top of those checks, and that he picked it up for the purpose of putting it in the other drawer from which he had taken it. He was no more acting for the defendant when he took the pistol up to remove it to the other drawer and accidentally killed Moore than he would have been had he wilfully and intentionally discharged it.

Suppose a merchant's clerk had placed a pistol in his desk without the knowledge or authority of his master, and, in going into the desk to get out papers in his master's business, he had taken the pistol off the needed papers, and in so doing had accidentally, but negligently killed a fellow clerk; does anyone for a moment suppose that this court would hold the merchant liable for such unauthorized act? If the merchant would not be held liable under such circumstances, then this defendant, although a railway company, ought not to be.

The test laid down by Justice Hoke in Sawyer v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 142 N. C. 1, 115 Am. St. Rep. 716, 54 S. E. 793, 9 Ann. Cas. 440, is: "Where the question of fixing responsibility on corporations by reason of the tortious acts of their servants depends exclusively on the relationship of master and servant, the test of responsibility is whether the injury was committed by authority of the master, expressly conferred or fairly implied from the nature of the employment or the duties incident to it." And in the same case it is held that private corporations are liable for their torts (of this character) under such circumstances as would attach liability to natural persons. In this case a railway company was exonerated from liability for the tortious conduct of a superintendent when refusing employment to one who had applied to him for it. This case is cited and approved in Marlowe v. Bland, 164 N. C. 141, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1116, 69 S. E. 752, where a farmer ordered his servant to cut and pile cornstalks, who, after piling them, without authority from his master, set fire to them and caused damage. The master was held not liable.

This same idea is expressed by Wood in his work on Master & Servant, § 307, quoted in Marlowe v. Bland: "The simple test is whether they were acts within the scope of his employment, not whether they were done while performing the master's business, but whether they were done by the servant in furtherance thereof, and were such as may fairly be said to have been authorized by him. By 'authorized' is not meant authority expressly conferred, but whether the act was such as was incident to the performance of the duties intrusted to him by the master, even though in opposition to his express and positive orders."

In Jones v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 150 N. C. 475, 64 S. E. 206, it is said: "Certainly no one will seriously contend that a master is an insurer of his servant's conduct in respect to torts committed by him while in his employment, without regard to the pivotal question whether such conduct had any relation to or was in the scope of the employment."

This subject is so fully discussed in the cases I have cited, as well as by Justice Walker in Jackson v. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 139 N. C. 347, 70 L.R.A. 738, 51 S. E. 1015, and Daniel v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 136 N. C. 517, 67 L.R.A. 455, 48 S. E. 816, 1 Ann. Cas. 718, that it is useless to cite other authorities.

It is true the pistol was on top of the checks; but the declared purpose in taking the pistol out of the drawer was not so much to get at the checks as to put the pistol back in the other drawer from which witness had taken it. The checks could easily have been taken out by lifting up the pistol, and not removing it from the drawer. It was not at all necessary, in order to accomplish the master's work, that the pistol should have been taken out of the drawer it was in. That was the personal act of Wall, for which the defendant should not be held liable, as it neither knew of it, nor could by any sort of means have prevented it.

2. There is another ground upon which it appears to me the motion to nonsuit should be sustained. This action is brought against the Southern Railway, and not against the Norfolk & Western. While under the statutes of North Carolina these two railway corporations are compelled to co-operate in maintaining a union station in Winston-Salem, they are not and cannot be in any sense copartners, and neither is liable for the contracts or torts of the other. The fact that the Southern Railway assisted in maintaining this union station, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) and employed Wall to load its baggage, did not make it responsible for Wall's acts when he was acting exclusively for the Norfolk & Western in checking and loading its baggage.

Wall testifies that the Southern Railway train had been loaded with baggage and had gone. At the time of the injury he was getting Norfolk & Western checks for the baggage on that train. He was performing no act whatever for the Southern Railway when he went in the desk and removed the pistol.

It is surely permissible for one person to act as agent for two others in performing separate and distinct duties at different times for each principal, without making both principals liable jointly for all his acts; there being no partnership or privity between the principals.

It is true that this particular reason for sustaining the nonsuit is not urged in the brief; but it is our duty to consider it when we pass on the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant a recovery of this defendant.

Walker, J., concurs in this dissent.

JAMES DORMAN, Plff. in Err.,
v.

CONNECTICUT FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Insurance — agent's authority to contract.

1. Ordinarily, a traveling soliciting agent, without actual authority to contract, who is furnished by his principal, an insurance company, with no indicia of authority other than printed blank forms of application for insurance, addressed to it, which either negative the idea of authority to contract, or, as in the present case, is signed by the applicant without actual knowledge of its contents, does not have the apparent authority to enter into a contract of insurance.

The general rule laid down in the note to Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Neafus, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1211, where the early cases upon the question under consideration are gathered, to the effect that mere delay in passing upon an application for insurance cannot be construed into an acceptance by the insurer, is supported by the result reached in DORMAN v. CONNECTICUT F. INS.

actual knowledge of the applicant, are free from specific limitation upon the authority of such agent, does he thus have the apparent authority to bind such principal, as inducement to the making of such application, by a temporary contract of insurance, until such principal may reject such application?

Same — essentials of contract.

2. There is no contract of insurance unless the minds of the parties have met in agreement as to (a) the subject-matter, (b) the risk insured against, (c) the period of risk, (d) the amount of insurance, and (e) the premium.

Same — retention of application.

3. An unaccepted application for insurance, accompanied by the premium, although retained without notice of objection for five days after its date, and until the applicant has suffered the loss against which he desired the insurance, is not a contract of insurance.

Same — absence of acceptance.

4. Acceptance of an application may ordinarily be inferred from the retention and application of the premium; but when there is evidence reasonably tending to show that there was no such acceptance in fact, the law does not imply acceptance from such retention; and the adverse finding and judgment in the trial court are conclusive against appellant's claim of acceptance.

ERROR to the District Court for Grant County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action on an alleged contract of insurance upon a growing crop of wheat. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. C. S. Ingersoll and F. G. Walling, for plaintiff in error:

There was a sufficient contract of insurance.

Van Arsdale-Osborne Brokerage Co. v. Cooper, 28 Okla. 598, 115 Pac. 779; Hardwick v. State Ins. Co. 20 Or. 547, 26 Pac. 840; Putnam v. Home Ins. Co. 123 Mass. 324, 25 Am. Rep. 93; Preferred Acci. Ins.

Co. v. Stone, 61 Kan. 48, 58 Pac. 986; Campbell v. American F. Ins. Co. 73 Wis. 100, 40 N. W. 661.

Having received and accepted the application, having received and accepted and retained the premium, and having expressly stated when the insurance would become effective, through its authorized agents, the defendant company placed plaintiff in a position which resulted in injury, damage, and loss to him; for these acts on the part of its agents, the defendant company is certainly liable.

Messrs. Scothorn, Caldwell, & McRill for defendant in error.

Thacker, C., filed the following opinion:

Plaintiff in error was plaintiff, and defendant in error was defendant, in the trial court; and this action was upon an alleged contract of insurance upon a growing crop of wheat, for loss sustained by hail pending an application for a policy; judgment being for the defendant upon the evidence. Plaintiff, on May 19, 1909, voluntarily applied to defendant for insurance by voluntarily approaching its agents and signing, without actual knowledge of its contents, an application in printed form furnished by defendant and prepared for signature by and in the hands of Joel Mulligan and C. L. Nash, who were then acting as defendant's subagents under D. M. Sullivan. At the same time, plaintiff executed his note without full knowledge of its contents to said Nash, or to the Bank of Nashville, Oklahoma, under the impression that it was to defendant, which note said Nash cashed at said bank, for the full amount of the premium for such insurance. Mulligan and Nash, who had no actual authority to issue policies or enter into contracts of insurance, and were merely traveling solicitors for and takers of applications and

Co., and it is also supported by the only other case which has been disclosed passing upon the point since the writing of the note referred to.

Thus, in Shawnee Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. McClure, 39 Okla. 535, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1054, 135 Pac. 1150, where a soliciting agent of limited authority did not mail an application and the premium for fire insurance until four days after he received them, and an investigation of the risk was being made by the insurer when the property was burned two days after the application was forwarded, the court said that it could not be contended that the insurer held the application and premium so long, or otherwise conducted itself in such a way in reference thereto, as to be tantamount to an acceptance, remarking that it was not necessary to cite the many cases holding that mere delay in accepting an application does not raise a presumption of acceptance.

A recovery against insurers based upon negligence has been allowed by some courts because of a failure to use due diligence in acting upon an application. This question of the liability of an insurance company for negligent delay in passing upon or issuing a policy until after loss is covered in the note to Boyer v. State Farmers' Mut. Hail Ins. Co. 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 164; and see the later case of Duffy v. Bankers' Life Assn. 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 25.

J. T. W.

premiums in Grant county, Oklahoma, addressed to defendant for such insurance, on the next following day, May 20, 1909, at Pond Creek, in said county, presented said application to said Sullivan, an agent with office there, and authorized to accept or reject such applications and enter into contracts of insurance. On the third day next thereafter, May 23, 1909, plaintiff suffered the loss for which he sues. When Mulligan and Nash, on the third day before the loss, presented the application to Sullivan, the latter first objected to it, and marked it "Refused," because it was for insurance upon the equivalent of 60 acres of wheat on one section of land in excess of the 100-acre limit which the rules of the defendant imposed; but, upon the suggestion of Mulligan and Nash, Sullivan immediately indicated a willingness to hold it pending an opportunity to present it to Mr. Rushmore, defendant's state agent, for his instruction upon it, in the belief that he might consent to its acceptance notwithstanding such excess; and the said application was being so held, and was still not accepted by Sullivan nor presented to Rushmore on the fourth day after the day of its date, when plaintiff's loss occurred; the premium being held in the hands of Nash or Mulligan, or both.

It certainly cannot be, and apparently is not, contended that defendant expressly accepted the application and entered into a contract of insurance through its duly authorized agent, Sullivan; and if there was such contract, it must be found in an acceptance inferred from the retention of the premium, or in an actually or apparently authorized acceptance of the application by Mulligan and Nash, and in a contract made on the part of the defendant through them; but, allowing the presumption we must in favor of the judgment of the trial court, no such acceptance or contract appears.

The only evidence upon which we may assume plaintiff claims there was such a contract is found in the retention of the premium and in the following voluntary statement made by the plaintiff when one of his counsel asked him the day of the week on which he signed the application, to wit: "I asked when that policy would take effect; one or two of them, I could not say which, says, 'to-day noon at 12 o'clock; to-day noon at 12 o'clock.'" It is unnecessary to determine whether this should be understood to mean more than that, if the application was accepted and a policy issued it would relate back to noon of May 19, 1909; but we cannot assume the trial court either accepted as true any evidence which would tend to impeach the judgment, and is in 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

conflict with other evidence, or construed any dubious testimony otherwise than as favorable to the judgment; and, further, if we should so assume, we cannot assume the trial court found the existence of facts from which the authority of Nash and Mulligan to make such a contract would appear. Neither Mulligan nor Nash, who were witnesses for plaintiff, and apparently not unfriendly, were questioned or testified in regard to this imputed statement; and one of them, without contradiction, testified that the application was taken in the afternoon of the day of its date.

A contract of insurance consists of an agreement between the insured and the insurer, including the following elements: (1) The subject-matter; (2) the risk insured against; (3) the amount; (4) the period of risk; and (5) the premium; and there is no contract until the minds of the parties meet in these respects. 1 Cooley, Briefs in Ins. 368, 392, 411, 513; 1 Beach, Ins. 507; 1 May, Ins. §§ 43-65; 1 Joyce, Ins. §§ 45-50; Kerr, Ins. § 40 pp. 73-77, Id. § 53, p. 113; Shawnee Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. McClure, 39 Okla. 535, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1054, 135 Pac. 1150, and cases there cited; Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Whitman, 75 Ohio St. 312, 79 N. E. 459, 9 Ann. Cas. 218, and notes; Bell v. Hudson Bay Ins. Co. 44 Can. S. C. 419, 21 Ann. Cas. 788, and notes; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Babcock, 104 Ga. 67, 30 S. E. 273, 42 L.R.A. 88, 69 Am. St. Rep. 134, and notes. As to an oral contract in presenti, see Van Arsdale-Osborne Brokerage Co. v. Cooper, 28 Okla. 600, 115 Pac. 779; Whitman v. Milwaukee F. Ins. Co. 128 Wis. 124, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 407, 116 Am. St. Rep. 25, 107 N. W. 291.

An application for insurance is not itself a contract, but is a mere proposal, which requires acceptance by the insurer through someone actually or apparently authorized to accept the same, to give it effect as to contract. 1 Cooley, Briefs on Ins. 413; 1 Joyce, Ins. § 54; 1 May, Ins. 3d ed. § 43H; Elliott, Ins. § 106; Kerr, Ins. §§ 51, 52; Richards, Ins. 3d ed. 282; Van Arsdale v. Young, 21 Okla. 151, 95 Pac. 778; Shawnee Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. McClure, 39 Okla. 535, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1054, 135 Pac. 1150.

Nor does the mere retention of both application and the premium, without any action thereon, constitute a contract of insurance. Van Arsdale v. Young, 21 Okla. 151, 95 Pac. 778; Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Neafus, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1211, and notes (145 Ky. 563, 140 S. W. 1026); 1 Beach, Ins. 499; 1 May, Ins. § 43H.

We have not overlooked the holding in Van Arsdale-Osborne Brokerage Co. v. Cooper, supra, that "independent of the issuance and delivery of the policy, the approval of said application may be made . . . impliedly by the acceptance and application of the premium;" but in that case it was indisputable that the application was actually accepted. The policy was actually issued, the same was lost in the hands of the local agent of the insurer without having been delivered to the insured, and the latter had, in response to notification given by him that he had not received the policy, been advised that another policy would be issued and sent to him upon his signing and returning a lost policy affidavit furnished to him; and, further, in that case it is stated that the question was "whether any evidence tends to show the approval of the application."

In the present case, such an implication or inference of fact in respect to the application after it reached the hands of Sullivan on the day after it was signed is clearly negated by other evidence.

Ordinarily a traveling soliciting agent, without actual authority to contract, who is furnished by his principal, an insurance company, with no indicia of authority other than printed blank forms of applications for insurance, addressed to it, which either negative the idea of authority to contract, or, as in the present case, is signed by the applicant without actual knowledge of its contents, does not have the apparent authority to enter into a contract of insurance. Kerr Ins. 203; Richards, Ins. 3d ed. 198; 1 Joyce, Ins. § 526.

The blank form of application furnished by defendant does not expressly limit the authority of its soliciting agents, except by the following provision therein, to wit: "It is understood and agreed that a policy based on this application will in no event take effect sooner than noon of the day succeeding my having signed this application,"—and, in view of the fact that no good reason appears why such blank forms should not specifically limit the authority of such agents to that actually given, and such agents be instructed by their principal to furnish a copy to the applicant, we reserve decision as to whether such merely soliciting agents, furnished as in this case with such blank forms, might not be therefrom found to have the apparent authority, as inducement to the making of the application, to enter into a temporary contract of insurance, not inconsistent with the application itself, binding upon the insurer until the application is rejected by it, where the applicant has knowledge that such forms do not, in that respect, specifically limit the agent's authority (see 1 Cooley, Briefs on Ins. 382, and 3 Cooley, Briefs on 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Ins. 2484, 2485; also 69 Am. St. Rep. 145); but, in the present case the applicant did not actually know the contents of the application, and had no knowledge as to whether the agent's authority was not further limited by the provisions thereof, and claims no contract of insurance other than a contemporaneous oral one somewhat inconsistent with the only limitation therein contained. The writing generally controls in such cases. Joyce, Ins. 61; Elliott, Ins. 159, 160; 2 May, Ins. 579; Winnesheik Ins. Co. v. Holzgrafe, 53 Ill. 516, 5 Am. Rep. 64; Allen v. Massachusetts Mut. Acci. Asso. 167 Mass. 18, 44 N. E. 1053.

Even if it had appeared that the application was such as the defendant was accustomed to accept, and that it probably would have been accepted if finally acted on by defendant before it had knowledge of the loss, which is not true, the overwhelming weight of authority is to the effect that mere delay in passing upon an application is not equivalent to its acceptance, as will appear from an examination of the authorities cited supra.

Although it has been held that where a policy is issued after loss of the crop intended to be insured, and it appears that it would have been issued in time to have operated as insurance thereon but for the unreasonable delay of the soliciting agent of the insurer taking the application in transmitting it to the proper officer to pass upon same and issue the policy, the insurer is liable for the loss (Boyer v. State Farmers' Mut. Hail Ins. Co. 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 167, and notes [86 Kan. 442, 121 Pac. 329]; but in the present case it does not so much as appear that the application was acceptable, or would in any event have been accepted; and neither that case nor the case cited in the note thereto (in 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) supra) tend to support plaintiff's contention in this case.

Except as already stated in this opinion, there was no evidence whatever, either of the authority of Mulligan and Nash to enter into a contract of insurance binding upon defendant, or of any agreement between the plaintiff and these soliciting agents which, if they had authority, could be construed as a contract of insurance; and we do not feel authorized to disturb the judgment of the trial court, which, in effect, includes a finding of fact against plaintiff upon both propositions.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed.

Note. — Homicide: independent, intervening, or concurring cause of death as affecting criminal responsibility.

Cases dealing with the question as to which of two or more causes resulted in the infliction of the wound are not within the scope of this note. The question discussed is, conceding that the defendant inflicted a wound upon the deceased, What is the defendant's responsibility where other causes intervene and contribute to the wounded person's death?

As to homicide resulting from injuries by different persons acting independently, see the notes to Walker v. State, 67 L.R.A. 426, and Bennett v. Com. 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 419.

As to the criminal responsibility of one who inflicts a wound on another resulting in the latter's death, as affected by negligence or lack of skill in treatment or care of the wounds, see the notes to Noble v. State, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 841, and Tibbs v. Com. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 665.

There are several notes in this series of interest in the present connection, which deal with civil liability for inflicting injury upon another. The question as to the extent and character of developments following the personal injury for which the person inflicting the injury is liable is discussed in note to Allison v. Fredericksburg, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 93. Therein will be found references to other annotation.

Generally.

One who maliciously inflicts a serious wound upon another, from which as the mediate, but not immediate, cause he dies, is criminally responsible for the death, though other causes contributed to the death. Huckabee v. State, 159 Ala. 45, 48 So. 796; Smith v. State, 50 Ark. 545, 8 S. W. 941.

As death is appointed to all the living, and must come to all sooner or later, every act of homicide only hastens the inevitable event. The law therefore does not permit a party charged with murder to speculate on the chances of the life of his victim, or to endeavor to apportion his own wicked

Evidence — expert witness — hypothetical question.

2. Hypothetical questions to expert witnesses, on a trial for homicide, need not cover all the undisputed facts proven. The opposite party may, if desired, protect himself by including all such facts in other hypothetical questions propounded to the same witnesses on cross-examination.

Homicide — concurrent cause of death — effect.

3. On a trial for homicide where the evidence tends to show a mortal wound by defendant, and a subsequently self-inflicted wound by deceased, which may or may not have been mortal, it is error to tell the jury in instructions propounded by the state, either (1) that defendant, who inflicted the first mortal wound, is guilty of act by dividing its effects with the operation of natural causes on the body of the deceased. If such a defense were permitted, it would be impossible, in any case, to say with certainty that some fatal accident or sudden stroke of disease might not have terminated the life of the deceased in a few hours, or even minutes, if the homicidal act had not been committed. Com. v. Fox, 7 Gray, 585.

When a wound from which death might ensue has been inflicted with murderous intent, and has been followed by death, the burden of proof is upon the party inflicting the wound to establish, to the satisfaction of the jury, that the death did not result from such wound, but from some other cause. State v. Briscoe, 30 La. Ann. 433, followed in Edwards v. State, 39 Fla. 753, 23 So. 537. In the Louisiana case the court said that it understood the trial court's charge to that effect to mean that, the state having first shown a sufficient cause of death, due to the act of the accused, and followed by death, it is presumed that the death resulted from such cause, unless the accused rebuts the presumption by showing that the death was reasonably attributable to another cause. The court further said, while this rule goes to the extreme, it does not militate against the general doctrine of the presumption of innocence and reasonable doubt in favor of the accused.

Where the death is due to causes other than the wound inflicted by the defendant, the latter may be subject to conviction for assault with intent to murder, though not guilty of homicide. Tomerlin v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 26 S. W. 66.

Predisposing influence.

One may be guilty of homicide by inflicting upon another a blow which, though not of itself mortal, accelerates death. The blow need be only a contributing cause. The fact that the deceased was at the time suffering from an affliction, or was in a condition which might have ultimately caused death, does not relieve the defendant from the consequences of aggravating the condition and thus hastening the death. State v.

first degree murder, notwithstanding the subsequently self-inflicted wound by deceased may have accelerated or been the immediate cause of his death; or (2) that defendant should be found so guilty, if upon the evidence the jury should find beyond a reasonable doubt, that deceased would have died from other causes, or would not have died from the wound inflicted by defendant had not other causes operated with it.

Same — proximate cause.

4. Instructions so limited ignore the well-established rules of homicide (a) that if, after a mortal wound is inflicted by one person, another independent responsible agent in no way connected in causal relation with the first intervenes, and wrongfully inflicts another injury, the proximate cause of the homicide, the latter, and not the former, is guilty of murder; and (b) that if such intervening responsible agent wrongfully accelerates death, he, and not the agent first to wound, is guilty of the homicide.

Trial — instructions — homicide — concurring cause of death.

5. Where in such cases the evidence justifies it, and it is sought to hold the one inflicting the first blow or wound guilty of the homicide, because his act resulted in rendering the one on whom his mortal wound had been inflicted irresponsible, and to cause him to inflict upon himself another mortal wound, or a wound accelerating his death, the instructions given should be so framed as to present clearly that theory of the case.

Where a person in a weak state of health is so beaten as to endanger her life or do great bodily harm, and she dies from fever caused by the combined effect of the beating and the previous weak condition, the person inflicting the beating is guilty of either murder or manslaughter, depending

In Wooten v. State, 99 Tenn. 189, 41 S. W. 813, the court held it error for the trial judge to refuse to charge that if the jury believed that the clot of blood on the brain of the deceased was produced by the use of stimulants and intemperance, and that this, and not the unlawful act of the defendant, caused the death, or if the jury had a reasonable doubt on the point, it should acquit. While this charge is technically correct in so far as it may be construed as meaning that if the blood clot that caused death was due entirely to previous intemperance, the defendant could not be responsible for the death, it ignores the question whether the blow inflicted by the defendant contributed to the production of the blood clot. According to the prevailing view of the courts, the defendant would have been responsible for contributing to the production of the blood clot, even though the defendant's condition was such as to render the formation of blood clots more easy than in a perfectly normal person.

Even though the wounds were at first trifling, the defendant cannot justify or minimize his criminal act by the fact, if a fact, that his victim was so diseased that he readily succumbed to the injuries so wrongfully inflicted. Dumas v. State, 159 Ala. 42, 133 Am. St. Rep. 17, 49 So. 224.

It must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant inflicted the two wounds, and that they caused his death; if the deceased, by the self-inflicted wound, caused his own death, the defendant is not guilty as charged.

(abstract), the court is represented as holding, where it appeared that the deceased had pneumonia, and that the wound, which was not necessarily or probably fatal, did not cause death until three months after it was inflicted, that, in order to convict, it must be found that the wound was the proximate cause of death.

In Harvey v. State, 40 Ind. 516, no objection appears to have been offered to the charge that if deceased died from a disease not brought on by a blow given by the defendant, the jury must acquit, no matter what violence the defendant may have inflicted upon the deceased, if it did not mediate or immediately accelerate her death.

In Johnson's Case, 1 Lewin, C. C. 164, the court directed an acquittal, saying that where death is occasioned partly by a blow and partly by predisposing circumstance, it is impossible to apportion the operations of the several causes, so as to be able to say with certainty that the death was caused by any one of them in particular.

In Stockdale's Case, 2 Lewin, C. C. 220, it was held that an indictment charging exposure as a cause of death was not supported by proof that it accelerated death.

Of course, nothing of value in the present connection is contained in cases like United States v. Knowles, 4 Sawy. 517, Fed. Cas. No. 15,540, holding that if the deceased, a sailor, was killed by a fall into the sea from the yardarm of a ship, the captain is not punishable as for homicide for failing to make any attempt to rescue him.

Intervening influence—generally.

While, as has been seen above, a person who inflicts blows or injuries upon a person who is suffering from disease or injury 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

may be convicted of homicide if he accelerated death, the person who inflicts the first injury may nevertheless be convicted if it appears that the injury or wound inflicted by him would have caused death but for an intervening cause. Thus, in Com. v. Costley, 118 Mass. 1, involving an indictment for killing with a pistol, the trial court was requested to instruct that, although the deceased may have received a mortal wound from a pistol, yet if before death had actually resulted therefrom, though the deceased remained entirely insensible, any other cause of death intervened so as to hasten her death in any degree, then, in contemplation of law, the pistol was not the cause of death, and the defendant should not be found guilty. But the trial court refused so to instruct, and instructed the jury in the following manner, which was upheld by the supreme court: The government must prove that the pistol wound given by the prisoner was the cause of the death, and if other circumstances came in to prevent any recovery that might otherwise have taken place, or to aggravate even the effect of the wound, yet if the wound was the cause of which he died, the fact that such other circumstances hastened or retarded the effect of the wound does not prevent the wound from being the cause of death; but if, while the deceased was alive, another cause came in, which, independently of the pistol wound, caused death, so that the death resulted from that, and not from the pistol wound, then the jury cannot find a verdict of homicide from the cause alleged in the indictment.

Livingston v. Com. 14 Gratt. 592, stands practically alone in holding that where a disease supervenes independently of the injury, and causes death, the assailant is not legally responsible, although death would not have come so soon but for the wound. The court conceded that one who accelerates the death of a person suffering from a mortal disease is responsible for homicide, since he cannot apportion his wrong; and that where gangrene or the like develops in a wound, the defendant is answerable, since the wound is the cause of the gangrene. But the court said that the situation is far different where disease supervenes independently of the injury, and that in such circumstances the blow and the death have no necessary or natural connection with each other as cause and effect, the blow being neither the proximate cause of death, nor linked with it in the regular chain of causes and consequences, though made by circumstances to accelerate the death.

It is the general rule that a person is criminally answerable for a homicide where he inflicts a wound upon another which develops into or initiates an affliction or a disease which ultimately results in death. It is not indispensable to a conviction that the wounds are necessarily fatal, and are the direct cause of death. It is sufficient that they cause death indirectly through a chain of natural effects and causes unchanged by human action. This rule is applied not merely where the consequential development is in the form of an immediate infection of the wound itself, such as erysipelas (Denman v. State, 15 Neb. 138, 17 N. W. 347), or septicemia or blood poisoning (Clements v. State, — Ga. —, 81 S. E. 1117; Com. v. Silcox, 161 Pa. 484, 29 Atl. 105; Hart v. State, 15 Tex. App. 202, 49 Am. Rep. 188); but also where the condition developing is anatomically dissociated from the mere external wound, as in the case of miscarriage (People v. O'Connell, 78 Hun, 323, 29 N. Y. Supp. 195), or pneumonia (Smith v. State, 50 Ark. 545, 8 S. W. 941; State v. Wilson, 114 La. 398, 38 So. 397; Quinn v. State, — Miss. —, 64 So. 738; State v. Chiles, 44 S. C. 338, 22 S. E. 339; State v. Foote, 58 S. C. 218, 36 S. E. 551; Burnett v. State, 14 Lea, 439); or where blows caused congestion of the brain resulting in death, or in exposure which caused death (Kelley v. State, 53 Ind. 311).

Where there is evidence that blows inflicted upon a pregnant woman were sufficient to produce the miscarriage of which she died, and there is no evidence of any other cause of the miscarriage, the person who inflicted the blows may be found guilty of homicide. People v. O'Connell, 78 Hun, 323, 29 N. Y. Supp. 195.

And where a party feloniously assaulted is knocked down or falls down in an effort to escape the assailant, the latter may be convicted of murder if his attack was the primary cause of the death, although the death may have resulted from the fall. Thornton v. State, 107 Ga. 683, 33 S. E. 673; State v. Adams, 155 Iowa, 660, 136 N. W. 1051.

So, if the defendant's violence induced fright which caused death, he may be convicted under an indictment alleging that the prisoner caused death in some way and manner, and by the use of some means and instruments, to the jury unknown. Cox v. People, 80 N. Y. 500. The court said: "It was not necessary, in order to convict the prisoner, that it should appear that his actual personal violence was the sole and immediate cause of the death of the deceased. If his violence so excited the terror of the deceased that she died from the fright, and she would not have died except for the assault, then the prisoner's act was in law the cause of her death."

While the above proposition is true, it is also the law that if the wound is not in its nature mortal, and death results solely from an entirely independent cause, the person inflicting the wound cannot be held responsible for the death; and the accused is entitled to an acquittal unless it appears from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the disease was not the sole cause of death, and that the death was caused or contributed to by the wound. Quinn v. State, — Miss. —, 64 So. 738.

There can be no conviction where the disease that caused death is not shown beyond a reasonable doubt to be traceable in any way to the wound. Treadwell v. State, 16 Tex. App. 560 (death from pericarditis, ten months after gunshot wound near navel); Bush v. Com. 78 Ky. 268 (scarlet fever).

No conviction can be had on evidence that the accused knocked the deceased down and that a horse jumped on him, it appearing that the blow struck by the defendant did not kill him. People v. Rockwell, 39 Mich. 503, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 224.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On an indictment defendant was found guilty of murder in the first degree and adjudged to be hung in expiation of the crime.

He was indicted August 14, 1912, about three weeks after the homicide, and put on his trial the next day, assisted by counsel then appointed by the court. Counsel then moved the court for a continuance to August 19, to enable them to confer with the prisoner, a young Italian who could not speak English, to consult expert medical men, and to prepare for the trial. This motion was supported by the affidavit of one of the counsel so appointed, and by other evidence. If we had been sitting in the trial in place of the circuit judge, we would have granted the reasonable motion of counsel; but the trial judge has a discretion, and we cannot say from the record that he abused that discretion, or that the prisoner was prejudiced by the adverse ruling of the court. We ought to see prejudice before reversing for such error, so our cases hold. State v. Madison, 49 W. Va. 96, 38 S. E. 492; State v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 729, 18 L.R.A. 224, 15 S. E. 982, 9 Am. One who fires a shot, necessarily fatal, in self-defense, is guilty of homicide in firing 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

another shot which also would be fatal, after the other party has abandoned the conflict, where and only where the last shot contributes to hasten the death. Rogers v. State, 60 Ark. 76, 31 L.R.A. 465, 46 Am. St. Rep. 154, 29 S. W. 894.

In Miller v. State, 37 Ind. 432, where the defendant inflicted two series of blows upon the deceased, the court held that the defendant was entitled to have the court charge the jury that if the blows which caused the death were given in self-defense, and other blows were afterward given which were not given in self-defense, not mortal, the defendant should be found not guilty.

It was held under an early Texas statute that one who inflicted an injury upon another which would not of itself have proved fatal, was nevertheless liable as he would have been in the case of a fatal injury, if he wilfully failed or neglected to call in a physician or procure medical attendance for his victim, and the injury caused death as a consequence of such neglect. Williams v. State, 2 Tex. App. 271. It was further held that the fact that the deceased was wounded and died in the presence of his family did not relieve the defendant from the burden of procuring medical aid.

Generally, as to the effect of failure to provide medical attendance to render one guilty of manslaughter, see the notes to Westrup v. Com. 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 635, and Stehr v. State, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 559.

The fact that one dying from a wound is induced by the pain, by remorse, or by a desire to shield his assailant, to end his life sooner than the wound would have done, will not, if the wound actually contributes to the death, relieve the one who inflicted it from being guilty of manslaughter. People v. Lewis, 124 Cal. 551, 25 L.R.A. 783, 57 Pac. 470.

In Lewis v. Com. 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1139, 42 S. W. 1127, holding that if the deceased's death was caused by poisoning from arsenic administered by herself, and not from the blow inflicted by the defendant, the latter should be acquitted, no question appears to and defendant awarded a new trial, on other grounds, and as the same conditions may not now or hereafter exist in the county where the homicide occurred, we need not consider that question on this hearing.

Another ground of error is that hypothetical questions to physicians were allowed, calling for their opinions, which did not cover all the undisputed facts proven. The argument is made that these questions, propounded to the state's witnesses, elicited entirely different responses from those propounded to the witnesses for defendant, which included all the facts, wherefore defendant was prejudiced. The authorities concur in holding that such questions need not cover all the facts, even the undisputed facts, in the case. 1 Wigmore, Ev. § 682, pp. 778, 779; Bowen v. Huntington, 35 W. Va. 682, 14 S. E. 217; State v. Cook, 69 W. Va. 717, 72 S. E. 1025; Stearns v. Field, 90 N. Y. 640; Jackson v. Burnham, 20 Colo. 532, 39 Pac. 577. The rule is different when it comes to instructions to the jury. Binding instructions may not without error omit facts or theories on which the case may turn. The remedy for the side opposing such hypothetical questions is on cross-examination to repeat the hypothetical questions to the witnesses with the omitted facts included, and elicit answers to the questions based thereon. Williams v. State, 64 Md. 384, 1 Atl. 887, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 512.

Lastly, as to the instructions given and refused. We have examined them all. All the instructions given on behalf of the state, except those numbered 9 and 13, are clearly good. They propound only well-settled rules and principles of criminal law, and the objections thereto are not relied on here. And as to the instructions proposed by defendant, which were rejected, they were clearly inapplicable to the facts proven, and were rightly denied.

Defendant's exceptions to state's instructions numbered 9 and 13, overruled, are the errors mainly relied on. By number 9, the jury were told, in substance, that if defendant was found to have inflicted a mortal wound on Shaver, wilfully, deliberately, and premeditatedly, and that within a minute or a minute and a half thereafter Shaver shot himself in the head inflicting a wound not necessarily fatal, and that in about twenty minutes after the infliction of the mortal wound by defendant, Shaver died, and that his death was not the result of the self-inflicted wound, but that if it had any effect only hastened his death, the result of said mortal wound, it was then their duty to find defendant guilty of first degree murder.

By instruction 13, the jury were told, substantially, that if in the manner stated in instruction 9 defendant inflicted on Shaver a mortal wound with like wilfulness, deliberation, and premeditation, and that thereafter in about twenty minutes he died, defendant was guilty of first degree murder, as charged, provided the shot fired by him really contributed either mediately or immediately to the death of Shaver, even though they might believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Shaver would have died from other causes, or would not have died from the shot fired by defendant had not other causes operated with it.

We do not think that either of these instructions correctly propounded the law of the case. The attorney general does not much defend them. His contention is that though erroneous they were not prejudicial, if, on the evidence, defendant actually fired the fatal shot and was guilty of the crime. But we cannot concur in this view of the case. The jury, on proper instruction, not the court, are the triers of the fact of guilt. To accept the argument advanced on behalf of the state would be to put the court in a position to deny the prisoner a trial of the fact by the jury. This would not do in any case, particularly in a case of a capital crime. We cannot see that these erroneous instructions did no harm, and the authorities cited are inapt.

Both instructions, and particularly the latter, are in conflict with the well-established rule or principle of homicide, that have been raised as to whether the taking of arsenic might have been induced directly or indirectly by the deceased's condition following the blow.

It is proper for an indictment to charge that death was caused by a blow, where laid under evidence that the accused inflicted the blow and that death resulted immediately from the act of the deceased while in a delirium caused by the blow, in tearing off the bandages after an operation to overcome the effects of the wound. Stanton's Case, 2 N. Y. City Hall Rec. 164.

Even if a person seriously wounded is removed elsewhere at his own request, and 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

such moving causes the wound to produce death, the dying is by law attributed to the wound, and the guilt is imputed to him who inflicted it. State v. Hambright, 111 N. C. 707, 16 S. E. 411.

See also the notes cited in the preceding subdivision. L. A. W.

if after a mortal blow or wound is inflicted by one person, another independent responsible agent in no way connected in causal relation with the first intervenes and wrongfully inflicts another injury, the proximate cause of the homicide, the latter, and not the former, is guilty of the murder. Wharton, Homicide, §§ 28-33; 1 Wharton, Crim. Law, § 160. The rule is different where the agent so interposing is irresponsible. 1 Wharton, Crim. Law, § 161; Wharton, Homicide, § 37. The rule violated is the same where the negligence of a responsible agent intervenes to cause the death, as in the case of surgeons, but not if death results from proper surgical or medical aid, for death resulting immediately from that cause is one of the consequences of the previous unlawful act, and does not excuse the one responsible therefor. Wharton, Homicide, § 35; 1 Wharton, Crim. Law, § 157. The rule respecting the intervention of an independent responsible agent has been applied where death resulted immediately from a self-inflicted injury, or from suicide. Wharton on Homicide, § 33, citing Lewis v. Com. 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1139, 42 S. W. 1127.

Instruction 9, moreover, violates another rule of homicide, that the intervening responsible agent who wrongfully accelerates death is guilty of the murder, and not the one who inflicted the first injury though in itself mortal, the law being that the one who thus hastens the death of another himself becomes the intervening agent and proximate cause of the death. Mr. Wharton says: "And one whose wrongful act hastens or accelerates the death of another, or contributes to its cause, is guilty of homicide, though other causes co-operate." And he adds pertinently to the proper theory of this case, we think: "And he is guilty if his act was the cause of the cause of the death." Wharton, Homicide, § 27.

Number 13, furthermore, is rather inconsistent within itself. In the first place it presupposes a mortal wound inflicted by defendant, and if guilty thereof, that defendant is guilty of first degree murder, provided, this mortal shot contributed mediately or immediately to Shaver's death, though the jury should find he would not have died from the mortal blow of defendant had not other causes operated with it. The only evidence of other cause or causes of death to which the instruction could have referred was the evidence of the self-inflicted wound by Shaver. If defendant's "mortal wound" would not have resulted in death, except as co-operating with the intervening act of deceased, defendant could not, upon the principle of a supervening responsible agency, above referred to, have been found guilty of murder. Besides this 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) inconsistency the instruction was cloudy and misleading.

On the evidence before the jury at the trial, the proper theory of the state's instructions should have been a mortal wound by defendant, and that the self-inflicted injury by deceased, though it may have been the proximate cause of death, was not the act of an intervening responsible agent, but of one rendered irresponsible by the wound inflicted by defendant, and as the natural result of that wound, the causing cause of the immediate death of deceased.

Because of these erroneous and misleading instructions we are of opinion to reverse the judgment and award the prisoner a new trial.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

J. M. LAMON

v.

ROBERT GOLD et al.

and

(— W. Va. —, 79 S. E. 728.)

Judgment — effect of bar of statute of limitations.

1. When a judgment becomes barred by the statute of limitations, it ceases to be a lien on the debtor's land and a court of equity will not enforce it.

Same — duration of lien.

2. The lien of a judgment continues so long as the right to have execution issued or to bring an action or scire facias on it is not barred.

Limitation of actions — judgment — suspension — absence from state.

3. Notwithstanding a debtor's departure

Headnotes by WILLIAMS, J.

Note. — Limitation of actions: absence from state as affecting running of statute against judgment.

This note is limited to questions that are peculiar or distinctive to judgments, as distinguished from other classes of claims. Therefore, it assumes that there is a general statutory provision suspending the running of the statute during the absence of the debtor: and that the particular case presents the other conditions essential to that provision if it applies to judgments. And so cases turning upon the general question as to what constitutes "absence" within the statutory provisions, or other questions not distinctive or peculiar to judgments, are not included, even though, as a matter of fact, they may have involved judgments.

LAMON v. GOLD, in holding that the absence of the judgment debtor from the state suspends the running of the statute of limi-from and residence out of the state, after a judgment has been recovered against him, may not obstruct the creditor in the enforcement of his lien, it will suspend the running of the statute and preserve the lien of the judgment.

(June 17, 1913.)

APPEAL by defendant Janney from a decree of the Circuit Court for Berkeley County overruling her exceptions to the report of the master commissioner in a suit to subject property of Robert Gold to the payment of plaintiff's judgment, which gave plaintiff's claim priority over that of exceptant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Faulkner, Walker, & Woods, for appellant:

A judgment lienor can plead the statute of limitation.

Callaway v. Saunders, 99 Va. 350, 38 S. E. 182; McCartney v. Tyrer, 94 Va. 198, tations against an action on the judgment, has the practically unanimous support of the authorities.

It was so held in Davidson v. Simmons, 11 Bush, 330; Brittain v. Lankford, 110 Ky. 434, 61 S. W. 1000; Union Nat. Bank v. Ryan, 23 N. D. 482, 137 N. W. 449; Bignold v. Carr, 24 Wash. 413, 64 Pac. 519.

And where the judgment becomes dormant because of failure to issue an execution within the time limited, the running of the statute of limitations as to an action to revive or for debt is suspended during the judgment debtor's absence. Spiller v. Hollinger, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 148 S. W. 338.

And in Seymour v. Deming, 9 Cush. 527, it was held that under statute a judgment debtor's absence and residence out of the state shall not be computed as part of the term of the limitation.

That removal of the judgment debtor from the state is an obstruction which will prevent the running of the statute of limitations while he remains away was held in Cheatham v. Aistrop, 97 Va. 457, 34 S. E. 57; Fisher v. Hartley (Hogg v. Hartley) 48 W. Va. 339, 54 L.R.A. 215, 86 Am. St. Rep. 39, 37 S. E. 578.

But Brown v. Butler, 87 Va. 621, 13 S. E. 71, while admitting the general rule, held that, as it appeared that there was no obstruction actual or constructive in this instance, absence of the judgment debtor did not prevent the running of the statute.

In Hill v. Snyder, 7 La. Ann. 557, an action of debt on a judgment obtained in Mississippi, it was held that the plea of the Mississippi statute of limitations in bar was bad, as under such statute the period of the debtor's absence from the state must be deducted.

And the same was held in Bull v. Chénault, 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 458, also an action on a Mississippi judgment.

ing that absences must be deducted in computing the time of limitation of an action on a judgment, the court stated that, while the necessity or propriety for excluding absences may not be so general in cases of judgment debtors as in those of other debtors, yet there must be numerous instances where the reason for such exclusion is as strong for one as the other.

The statutory provision that the time of absence of the debtor from the state shall not be taken as any part of the time limited for the commencement of a personal action was held in Shelden v. Barlow, 108 Mich. 375, 66 N. W. 338, to apply to limitation to the right to execution for deficiency on mortgage foreclosure, although, as contended, a substituted service might have been ordered, since such substituted service would not be given extraterritorial effect, and it should not be held that the neglect to resort to such uncertain and incomplete remedy would constitute such laches as to bar a proceeding taken on a personal service.

And so, also, in Newlove v. Pennock, 123 Mich. 260, 82 N. W. 54, citing Shelden v. Barlow, supra, the statutory provision that the time of the debtor's absence shall be excepted from the period limited for the commencement of a personal action was held to apply by analogy to time limited with respect to proceedings to enforce judgment.

In Hartley v. Crawford, 12 Neb. 471, 11 N. W. 789, action on an Ohio judgment where both parties were at the date of the judgment, and at all times subsequent thereto, nonresidents of Nebraska, it was held that the statutory provision that "if, when a cause of action accrues against a person, he be out of the state, . . . the period limited for commencement of the action shall not begin to run until he come into the state," applied, and the action was not barred. The court stated that the construction contended for by counsel that such provision applied only to causes of action accruing in the state or in behalf of one of its citizens would be exceedingly forced. That the language was general, and if the legislature had intended that it should apply only to causes of action arising in the state or in favor of its own citizens, it is not at all likely that language of so general import would have been employed.

Mr. J. O. Henson, for appellees:

One judgment creditor of a living debtor cannot assert the bar of the statute of limitations where the debtor declines to assert

So, also, in Nicholas v. Farwell, 24 Neb. 180, 38 N. W. 820, an action on a foreign judgment where defendant subsequent to rendition of, and before the statute of limitations had run against, the judgment in the state where rendered, became a resident of Nebraska, it was held that the action would not be barred until defendant had resided in the state the full period limited for the commencement of the action.

On the other hand, it was held in Smalley v. Bowling, 64 Kan. 818, 68 Pac. 630, that as a judgment creditor can preserve his rights by causing execution to issue during a judgment debtor's absence, such absence will not prevent the running of the statute of limitations upon a domestic judgment.

The decision in Baker v. Hummer, 31 Kan. 325, 2 Pac. 808, as to when an action on a dormant judgment may be maintained, was grounded upon the fact of the absence of the judgment debtor from the state (Schuyler County Bank v. Bradbury, 50 Kan. 355, 43 Pac. 254); but, as pointed out in Smalley v. Bowling, 64 Kan. 818, 68 Pac. 630, the question in the Baker Case was whether an action could be maintained upon a judgment upon which an execution had been issued less than six years, but not within five years, before the suit was commenced, and the absence of the judgment debtor from the state would have afforded an additional reason for its decision if the contention that such absence would suspend the operation of the statute were tenable, 51 L.R.A. Absence from the state of a judgment debtor is proprio vigore an obstruction within the meaning of the statute.

Ficklin v. Carrington, 31 Gratt. 219; Wilkinson v. Holloway, 7 Leigh, 277; Markle

but that, after stating the effect of such absence in the opinion, the court wholly ignored its own recital, and declined to say that the plaintiff in that action could avail himself of the absence of his adversary to reinstate a judgment which he had suffered to become dormant. And it was further said that, while some expressions in the Schuyler Case, in referring to the Baker Case, seem to give a negative support to the contention that the operation of the statute is suspended by absence from the state, yet they were not necessary to the decision in that case, and must be regarded as obiter dicta.

A provision that general statutes of limitation shall not run during nonresidence of a debtor has no application to the duration of a judgment lien. Albee v. Curtis, 77 Iowa, 644, 42 N. W. 508. And so it was held that the right to redeem from foreclosure sale was barred at the end of the time limited, though the purchaser at the sale was a nonresident.

And the exception was held inapplicable to nonresident defendants in Maitland v. Keith, 30 Miss. 499, and Clements v. Brown, 31 Miss. 93, actions on foreign judgments, because of an express provision following the exception, limiting the time for suing on foreign judgments to a specified time.

And although the defendant was a resident when the cause of action on which a judgment was rendered arose, it was held in Fisher v. Hartley (Hogg v. Hartley) 48 W. Va. 339, 54 L.R.A. 215, 86 Am. St. Rep. 39, 37 S. E. 578, that he was not within the exception suspending limitations where he removed from the state before the judgment was rendered.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a judgment creditors' suit, and Maria E. Janney, a defendant and judgment creditor, has appealed from a decree overruling her exceptions to the report of a master commissioner, to whom the cause was referred to make report of the lands owned by the judgment debtor and the liens thereon.

In the years 1897 and 1898, a number of judgments were recovered against Robert Gold and his several indorsers on notes executed by him to different persons. Those judgments bear different dates. W. O. Nicklas, as administrator of Louisa Martin, deceased, recovered two judgments against said Gold on the 11th of January 1898, for $984.86 and $492.73, respectively. Maria E. Janney paid these two judgments and took an assignment of them. In November, 1897, George I. Pitzer, first indorser on a note held by the Citizens' National Bank, and joint judgment debtor with said Gold to said bank, having paid the judgment, instituted a suit in chancery against Gold and others, the purpose of which was to subject all his lands, except his estate in remainder in the dower lands of his mother, to the payment of the liens thereon. In that suit all his lands, except his said estate in remainder, were sold, and the proceeds derived therefrom were sufficient to pay only a portion of the liens. The purposes of that suit having been accomplished, it was retired from the docket by decree made on September 30, 1898.

J. M. Lamon, indorser for, and joint judgment debtor with, said Gold, having paid the judgment against him and his principal in favor of the Citizens' National Bank, brought the present suit on the 3d of June, 1909, the purpose of which is to subject Gold's undivided one-third interest in remainder in a tract of 69 acres; it being the tract which was assigned as dower to his mother out of the lands of which his father had died seised.

More than ten years had elapsed between the return days of the last executions issued on all of the judgments against said

Gold and the bringing of the present suit, except the two judgments now held by Maria E. Janney. Executions were issued upon those two judgments on January 4, 1907, and were returned not satisfied on February 4, 1907, which was within ten years from the return of the last executions that had been issued thereon. Notwithstanding executions had not been issued on the prior judgments for a period of more than ten years before the suit was brought, the commissioner reported them as liens superior in dignity to the lien of the judgments held by Maria E. Janney, and she excepted to the report, and the court overruled her exceptions. Appellant's judgments are subsequent in date, but she contends that the prior judgments have not been kept alive by having executions issued thereon within the time required by § 10, chap. 139, Code 1906, while she was diligent and did keep her judgments alive. She contends that her judgments are the only existing liens.

Robert Gold was a resident of the state at the time the judgments were recovered, but some time in the year 1899 he left the state and has ever since continued to be a non-resident. He was proceeded against, in this suit, by order of publication, but before final decree he filed his answer, admitting that the judgments reported in favor of appellees had not been paid.

Relying upon Welton v. Boggs, 45 W. Va. 620, 72 Am. St. Rep. 833, 32 S. E. 232, counsel for appellees insist that the statute of limitations is purely a personal defense to the debtor, and that, so long as he is living, one judgment creditor cannot rely upon it to defeat the lien of another judgment creditor. But counsel for appellant attack the soundness of that decision, and have presented very strong argument in their brief to show that it is inequitable and against the weight of authorities upon that question, and should therefore be overruled. In support of their argument they cite the following cases, viz.: Callaway v. Saunders, 99 Va. 350, 38 S. E. 182; McCartney v. Tyrer, 94 Va. 198, 26 S. E. 419; Monk v. Exposition Deepwater Pier Corp. 111 Va. 121, 68 S. E. 280; Brandenstein v. Johnson, 140 Cal. 29, 73 Pac. 744; De Voe v. Rundle, 33 Wash. 604, 74 Pac. 836; Boucofaki v. Jacobsen, 36 Utah, 165, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 898, 104 Pac. 117; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 146. But we do not think that a decision of this question is essential to a determination of the case, for the reason that the suit is brought to enforce liens against the real estate of the debtor; and if the court can see that the liens ceased to exist before the bringing of the suit, it will not enforce them. The court will not enforce a right which it sees does not exist. Although § 5, chap. 139, Code 1906, creating the lien of a judgment, does not expressly limit its duration, yet, in view of other provisions of the law, the lien ceases to exist after a time, if certain requirements for keeping it alive and in existence have not been complied with.

The lien of a judgment is a right created by statute, and the legislature has prescribed conditions and requirements for the preservation of such right, and noncompliance with those requirements will operate to divest the right. Ordinarily limitations relate to and affect the remedy without destroying the right. But a lien is a right; the enforcement of it is a remedy. If time has destroyed the lien, it cannot be restored by simple consent; it must be done by some kind of legal proceeding. So, while a barred judgment may furnish the basis of an action or scire facias on which another judgment may be obtained, if limitation is not pleaded, it is not evidence of a lien.

The creditor's right to the lien of his judgment is gone forever when his right to sue out execution on the judgment or to revive it by scire facias is barred. In Wendenbaugh v. Reid, 20 W. Va. 588, it was held that "the lien of a judgment ceases when the right to sue out execution on the judgment or to revive it by scire facias is barred by the statute of limitations." The same question was decided in Shipley v. Pew, 23 W. Va. 487, and in Reilly v. Clark, 31 W. Va. 573, 8 S. E. 509. In the latter case Judge Snyder, in his opinion at page 573 of 31 W. Va., says that it has been repeatedly decided and has become the settled law of this state. One who seeks the enforcement of a right must certainly satisfy the court that the right exists; and if his bill is brought to enforce a judgment lien which the court sees does not exist, because the creditor's right to sue out execution on, or to revive, his judgment by scire facias, is barred, it will not enforce it. It does not follow that, because a creditor obtained a judgment against his debtor, he may, at any time thereafter, enforce it as a lien against his debtor's land. If it is more than ten years old, he must show that he has kept it alive. But plaintiff alleges in his bill, and it is also an admitted fact, that Robert Gold left the state in 1899 and has ever since then been a nonresident.

This brings us to a consideration of the next question raised in the case, which is whether the debtor's absence from the state has prevented the running of the statute of limitations and has saved the liens of the judgments. Sections 10 and 11, chap. 139, Code 1906, prescribe limitations upon the time of issuance of an execution on a judgment, and also upon an action, suit, or scire facias brought on a judgment within a period of ten years from its date, or if execution issued within two years from the date of the judgment, then in ten years from the return day of the last execution which has not been returned or which has been returned unsatisfied. Section 11 says no execution shall issue, and no action, suit, or scire facias shall be brought, on any judgment after the time prescribed in § 10, but it contains the following provision in regard to computing the time, viz.: "The period mentioned in the 4th section of chapter 136 of this Code, and any time during which the right to sue out execution on the judgment is suspended by the terms thereof, or by legal process, shall be omitted from the computation; and the 16th 17th, 18th and 19th sections of chapter 104 of this Code shall apply to the right to bring such action, suit or scire facias, in like manner as to any right, action, suit or scire facias, mentioned in those sections."

The terms of the judgments in question place no limitation upon the right to sue out execution, and we have already said more than ten years had elapsed between the issuance of executions on all of the judgments, except upon the two now owned by appellant, and the bringing of this suit. But the judgment debtor left the state in 1899 and has ever since resided elsewhere, and therefore counsel for appellees insist that the debtor's becoming a nonresident after the recovery of the judgments, and his continuance as such, stopped the running of the statute, not only against their right to bring an action or scire facias upon the judgment, but also against their right to sue in equity for the enforcement of their liens. Section 18 of chapter 104 is referred to in § 11, chap. 139, and is expressly made a part of it. So much of said last-named section as relates to the question under consideration reads as follows: "Where any such right as is mentioned in this chapter, shall accrue against a person who had before resided in this state, if such person shall, by departing without the same, or by absconding or concealing himself, or by any other indirect ways or means, obstruct the prosecution of such right, or if such right has been or shall be hereafter obstructed by war, insurrection or rebellion, the time that such obstruction may have continued shall not be computed as any part of the time within which the said right might or ought to have been prosecuted."

There is a very able and ingenious argument by counsel for appellant in their brief to demonstrate that the time of the debtor's absence from the state should not be omitted from the computation of time, unless his absence actually prevented the bringing of the suit. Otherwise they say the creditor has not been obstructed, and the statute was intended to apply only when there has been an actual obstruction of the right. But the language of the statute is too plain, it seems to us, to admit of doubt that the legislature regarded absence from the state, in and of itself, such an obstruction of the creditor's right as to justify a suspension of the statute of limitation on that account, and did so suspend it. Whether, in all cases, absence from the state does operate as an obstruction or not, we think the legislature, by the clearest intendment, so regarded it. It is put on the same footing with a party's absconding or concealing himself, and then follow these words, "or by any other indirect ways or means, obstruct the prosecution of such right." The words quoted clearly indicate that a debtor's departing from the state suspends the running of the statute. It is true that the debtor's absence did not prevent the bringing of this suit; he was proceeded against by order of publication, and that could have been done at any time after he became a nonresident. The location of the land sought to be subjected to the lien conferred jurisdiction. But the statute, being designed to protect a right, is entitled to a liberal construction; and even if an actual obstruction were necessary to give it application, the obstruction of any of the creditor's remedies for the collection of his debt would be sufficient.

The word "obstruct," as here used, does not mean to prevent altogether, but it rather means to interrupt, to impede, or embarrass the creditor in the pursuit of any of his remedies, whether by execution, action, scire facias, or by suit in equity. So, while the creditors were not prevented, by Gold's absence, from proceeding to enforce their liens against his land, or from having executions issued on their judgments, they were certainly prevented from bringing an action on them or reviving them by scire facias, jurisdiction of the debtor's person being essential to those remedies. Hence his absence from the state has actually prevented the judgment creditors from pursuing some of their remedies.

The lien of a judgment remains so long as the right to bring an action on it or revive it by scire facias exists. If the debtor had returned to the state at the time this suit was brought, we do not think the right of his creditors to bring an action or scire facias on their respective judgments, and to exclude from the period of limitation the time of his absence, can be doubted. Having such right, their liens are preserved and may be enforced in this suit. It was 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

not necessary to revive the judgments by actions or scire facias before bringing the suit. The liens of the judgments never ceased. Sections 10 and 11, chap. 139, authorize the bringing of a suit to enforce a judgment lien whenever and as long as the creditor has the right to bring an action or a scire facias. The statute treats them as alternative remedies; and if any one of them is saved to the creditor, all are saved.

The term "suit," as used in §§ 10 and 11, clearly means a suit in equity for the enforcement of a judgment lien.

Finding no error, we affirm the decree.

Petition for rehearing denied.

JESSE ANDERSON

v.

BALTIMORE & OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(— W. Va. —, 81 S. E. 579.)

Negligence — escape of railroad car.

1. Where a corporation engaged in mining coal for shipment accepts a car for use at its mines knowing it to be inadequately equipped with brakes, and in an effort to adjust the car to the tippie to receive its complement of coal, negligently permits it to escape, thereby inflicting injury on the property of another not its employee or an employee of the carrier furnishing the car, the carrier will not be held liable therefor, though the injury may not have occurred

Headnotes by LYNCH, J.

Note. — Liability of railroad company for injury resulting from act of shipper or consignee in setting car in motion.

Generally, as to proximate cause of injury caused by car or engine set in motion by third person, see note to Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Dever, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 719.

As to liability of carrier for personal injuries to consignor or consignee or their employees, caused by unsafe car, see note to Chicago, I. & L. R. Co. v. Pritchard, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 857.

The carrier was relieved from liability in ANDERSON v. BALTIMORE & O. R. Co. because the proximate cause of the damage to plaintiff's property was not the inadequate brake, but the negligence of the agents of a coal mining corporation in setting the car in motion.

So, in Logan v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 139 Ky. 202, 129 S. W. 575, the negligence of employees of a manufacturing company in moving a coal car to a place on a spur track to be unloaded, knowing that had the car so furnished been equipped with brakes adequate to control its movements.

Proximate cause — intervening negligence — effect.

2. While the negligent act of one person may, as a natural consequence, cause injury to another, yet if, before the injury results, the negligent act of a third person intervenes and produces the injury, the latter alone is responsible therefor, though but for the first negligent act the injury could not have occurred.

Same — last act.

3. Where, by the intervening negligent act of a responsible agency, the causal connection between the first negligent act and the injury is broken, the last act, in legal contemplation, is regarded as the sole cause of the injury. The proximate cause thereof is the last negligent act contributing thereto, and without which the injury would not have resulted.

(April 7, 1914.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Marshall County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to his property alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hooton & Hooton for plaintiff in error.

Mr. D. B. Evans, for defendant in error:

Whether or not the intervening act of a third person will render the earlier act too remote depends simply upon whether the

the brake thereon was so defective that it would not control the movements of the car, and not the defective brake, was held the proximate cause of injury to another employee of the company mentioned, as a consequence of this car striking others on the same track. The decision in this case was put distinctly upon the ground that the act of the railway company in putting a car with defective brake on the spur tracks was not the proximate cause of the injury complained of, but that the efficient cause of the injury was the act of the employees of the coal company in negligently attempting to move the car with full knowledge of the fact that the brake was useless.

A railroad company which built, but neither owned nor controlled, a spur track running into a grain elevator building, was, in Sauls v. Chicago, R. I. & T. R. Co. 36 Tex. Civ. App. 155, 81 S. W. 89, held not liable for injury to a servant of the elevator company, injured by a car set in motion by a fellow servant of that company. The fellow servant rule applied in this case so as to relieve the elevator company also from liability.

In Georgia P. R. Co. v. Underwood, 90 Ala. 40, 24 Am. St. Rep. 756, 8 So. 116, the agents of a coal company, after unloading a car which was resting on a spur, pushed it so far back beyond the clearing posts showing the point beyond which the cars were not to be left, that it scraped a passenger coach on the main line, injuring a passenger whose arm happened to be protruding out of the window. The railway company was held liable, the court charging the jury "that the defendant is responsible in law for the wrongful acts or omissions of the servants of Moore & Wells in moving and placing the cars on the spur track; that the cars belonging to the defendant, and the spur track also belonging to the defendant, on its right of way, and connected with its main line, the defendant owed the duty to its passengers to keep such spur track clear of obstructions that might come in contact with passing trains; and that the negligence of the servants of Moore & Wells, if the evidence showed that there was negligence in placing the cars on the spur track, was imputable in law to the defendant."

In the case just cited it will be observed that the decision did not turn upon any question as to proximate cause, but upon the point that the carrier was responsible to the passenger for the negligence of the company.

In ANDERSON v. BALTIMORE & O. R. Co. it appears to have been assumed without discussion that the railroad was not responsible for the negligence of the employees of the mining company, which was held to have been the proximate cause of the damage. Nor does there appear to have been any suggestion in Logan v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. or Sauls v. Chicago, R. I. & T. R. Co. supra, that the railroad company might be responsible for the negligence of the employees of the company using the car. In those cases, however, unlike the ANDERSON CASE, the plaintiff was himself an employee of the company using the car.

But in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Bryant, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 4, 66 S. W. 804, also a case where the plaintiff's deceased was an employee of the company whose agents negligently moved the car, the court said that the railroad company would be liable for injuries caused by persons moving the car with its consent. In this case, however, a judgment for the plaintiff was reversed because of error of the trial court in submitting the question of proximate cause to the jury, upon the hypothesis that deceased was well acquainted with the situation of the track and cars; and that they were liable to be moved, causing a loud noise calculated to frighten horses; and that he negligently left his horses unhitched; and that when, frightened at the noise of a car which had been set in motion, they started to run, he, without being frightened at the approach of the car, jumped into his wagon without regard to his own safety, and in so doing lost his balance and fell to the ground. The court said that such facts would necessarily be, if found to exist, the proximate cause of the injuries sustained. J. D. C.

Watson, Damages for Personal Injuries, 75; Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 136; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Lockhart, 29 Ala. 315; Clark v. Chambers, L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. 127, 47 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 427, 38 L. T. N. S. 454, 26 Week. Rep. 613, 19 Eng. Rul. Cas. 28.

Where, though there may be some intervening cause or agency, such cause or agency and its probable consequence are such as could reasonably have been anticipated by the original wrongdoer, the causal connection between the original wrongful act and the subsequent injury is not broken, and an action will lie therefor.

Watson, Damages for Personal Injuries, 205; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Reaney, 42 Md. 117; Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 139; Beauchamp v. Saginaw Min. Co. 50 Mich. 163, 45 Am. Rep. 30, 15 N. The act of a third person intervening and contributing a condition necessary to the injurious effect of the original negligence will not excuse the first wrongdoer, if such act ought to have been foreseen. The original negligence still remains a culpable and direct cause of the injury.

Lynch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The answer to the question, Who is directly responsible for the injury to plaintiff's property? solves the only important inquiry presented on this writ of error.

The declaration avers that the railroad company, as a common carrier and as operator of a spur track or switch from its main line to a coal mine, furnished the coal company a car which, because of defective brakes, escaped from its employees, ran down an incline, and collided with and injured plaintiff's wagon and team. The 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

defect alleged was want of a brake on the colliding car sufficient to enable the employees of the coal company to check and control its movements, in order to adjust it to the coal dumps from which to receive coal for shipment. That injury occurred in the manner averred is not denied; nor is the fact that the coal company's agents failed, either by the brakes or by the use of any other adequate appliances, to control the movements of the car while attempting to adjust it to the coal tipples, though at the time they knew the brakes were insufficient for the purpose; nor is the further fact that plaintiff was rightfully engaged in the act of loading another car, placed on the spur track for that purpose by the defendant at plaintiff's instance.

While there is some evidence tending to show that the brakes were sufficient to check and control the movements of the car, yet, in view of the other facts appearing in the record and of the conclusion reached on this review, it may be conceded that the brakes were inadequate. If so, both the coal company and defendant knew of the defect, because the same car escaped the mine employees the day prior to the accident of which plaintiff complains, and, at their instance, the defendant again replaced the car near and above the tipple. With this knowledge, the coal company's agents and employees undertook to move the car after it was partially loaded, when it again escaped and ran down the incline to the place of injury. Hence the query whether the negligence of the railroad company, which placed the car on the switch, or that of the coal company in failing to control the car, caused the injury. Whose was the negligent act without which the injury would not have occurred?

Proximate cause, the courts have said, is that which naturally led to, and which may have been expected to be directly instrumental in producing, the loss. State v. Manchester & L. R. Co. 52 N. H. 552; Topsam v. Lisbon, 65 Me. 449; Ætna F. Ins. Co. v. Boon, 95 U. S. 117, 24 L. ed. 395. Or, as differently stated, it is that act which directly produced or concurred in producing the injury. The construction or interpretation of the oft-recurring legal maxim most frequently adopted is that, "in determining what is the proximate cause, the true rule is that the injury must be the natural and probable consequence of the negligent act." Hoag v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 85 Pa. 293, 27 Am. Rep. 653; West Mahanoy Twp. v. Watson, 116 Pa. 344, 2 Am. St. Rep. 604, 9 Atl. 430; Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. ed. 256; Putnam v. Broadway & S. Ave. R. Co. 55 N. Y. 108, 14 Am. Rep. 190; Sharp v. Powell,

But it may be urged, in dissent from the application of this construction to the facts of this case, that the coal company could not, by the exercise of ordinary prudence or due and reasonable care, have foreseen that the movements of the car would pass beyond the control of its agents, and thereby cause the injury. Evidently neither company intended to injure plaintiff's property. However, it is not essential, to raise a liability, that the injury should have been intended or contemplated by either of them. The active agency in the production of the wrong may nevertheless be held liable for any injury which, after its completion, appears to have been the natural and probable consequence of his act. The general character of the act is that to which the law looks to determine the real agent of the wrong. "Where there is danger . . . of a particular injury, which actually occurs, we must surely say that it is the usual, ordinary, natural, and probable result of the act exposing the person or thing injured to the danger." West v. Ward, 77 Iowa, 323, 14 Am. St. Rep. 284, 42 N. W. 309; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Wood, 113 Ind. 544, 14 N. E. 572, 16 N. E. 197, 3 Am. Neg. Cas. 197; Hill v. Winsor, 118 Mass. 251; Bunting v. Hogsett, 139 Pa. 363, 12 L.R.A. 268, 23 Am. St. Rep. 192, 21 Atl. 31, 33, 34; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Chapman, 80 Ala. 615, 2 So. 738. The proximate cause is the one without which the accident would not have occurred. Taylor v. Baldwin, 78 Cal. 517, 21 Pac. 124.

The railroad company and the coal company knew the spur track was constructed on an ascending grade, the highest point being near the tipple; and that, uncontrolled, the car would run violently down the grade in the direction of defendant's main track, and thus probably cause injury. But, notwithstanding defendant's negligence in placing on the switch a car improperly or defectively equipped, was such negligence on its part the proximate or the remote cause of the injury? Whose negligence was it which in fact caused the injury? When defendant replaced the car at or near the tipple, it secured it by brake and by blocks. The car there remained until released by the coal company's agents, released by them, of course, to adjust it to the tipple for the purpose of receiving its complement of coal. But it is immaterial whether defendant was or was not negligent in the first instance; he is not the real actor whose negligence in fact resulted in the production of the injury.

It has been held that if a traveler on the highway erects and insecurely props a fallen telephone pole which obstructs his passage, but which later, because of insufficient support, again falls and injures another traveler then passing, the owner and operator of the line is not liable for the injury, although the duty imposed by law required it to use a high degree of care in the selection and frequent inspection of its wire-carrying appliances in order to make secure against accident those using the highway. Harton v. Forest City Teleph. Co. 146 N. C. 429, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 956, 59 S. E. 1022, 14 Ann. Cas. 390. It was the intervention of another which became the superseding or responsible cause. Had he permitted the pole to remain where he found it, the accident would not have occurred, however negligent the company may have been in the performance of its legal obligations to the public. The defendant's negligence in failing properly to secure its poles was not deemed the proximate cause of the injury, because its connection with the injury was broken by a responsible intervening cause. So, in this case, the defendant is not liable for the injury, unless the injury was, in the natural and ordinary course of things, to be anticipated as the direct consequence of its negligent act, so that its negligence was an essential link in the chain of causation. In other words, had not the coal company negligently permitted the car to escape, would the mere negligent act of the defendant have resulted in producing the injury inflicted upon plaintiff's property?

A railroad company was held not liable in damages for injury to a boy of tender age who released the brake on a car standing upon a side track, which ran down grade and killed him, because the accident was not such that the company could have reasonably anticipated it, although the company knew other cars standing upon the same branch had been released and set in motion in a similar way by other boys. See also Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Cromer, 101 Va. 667, 44 S. E. 898; Mars v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 54 Hun, 625, 8 N. Y. Supp. 107.

As stated in 1 Thomp. Neg. 59: "If, subsequent to the original wrongful or negligent act, a new cause has intervened, of itself sufficient to stand as the cause of a misfortune, the former must be considered as too remote. . . . The proximate cause of an injury is that act or omission which immediately causes or fails to prevent the injury, and without which the injury would not have happened, notwithstanding other acts or omissions concurrent therewith."

It is a maxim of the law that the immediate, not the remote, cause of an event, is regarded; and in applying the maxim, the law rejects, as not constituting ground of action, damages not flowing proximately from the act complained of. Gilson v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 65 Vt. 213, 36 Am. St. Rep. 802, 26 Atl. 70. Or, as said by Wharton, Neg. § 134: "Supposing that, if it had not been for the intervention of a responsible third party, the defendant's negligence would have produced no damage to the plaintiff; is the defendant liable to the plaintiff? This question must be answered in the negative, for the general reason that causal connection between negligence and damage is broken by the interposition of independent responsible human action. I am negligent in a particular subject-matter. Another person, moving independently, comes in and either negligently or maliciously so acts as to make my negligence injurious to a third person. If so, the person so intervening acts as a nonconductor, and insulates my negligence, so that I cannot be sued for the mischief which the person so intervening directly produces. He is the one who is liable." This statement of the rule aptly applies to the facts of this case. See Winfree v. Jones, 104 Va. 39, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 201, 51 S. E. 153.

In Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. ed. 256, Justice Strong said: "The question always is: Was there an unbroken connection between the wrongful act and the injury, a continuous operation? Did the facts constitute a continuous succession of events, so linked together as to make a natural whole, or was there some new and independent cause intervening between the wrong and the injury? It is admitted that the rule is difficult of application. But it is generally held that, in order to warrant a finding that negligence, or an act not amounting to wanton wrong, is the proximate cause of an injury, it must appear that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the . . . wrongful act, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances."

"When the act or omission complained of is not in itself a distinct wrong, and can only become a wrong to any particular individual through consequences resulting therefrom, this consequence must not only be shown, but it must be so connected, by averment and evidence, with the act or omission, as to appear to have resulted therefrom, according to the ordinary course of events, as a proximate result of a sufficient cause." Cooley, Torts, 74.

By remote cause is intended that which may have happened, and yet no injury have occurred, notwithstanding that no injury could have occurred if it had not happened. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 33 Md. 542; Troy v. Cape Fear & Y. Valley R. Co. 99 N. C. 298, 6 Am. St. Rep. 521, 6 S. E. 77. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Washington v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 17 W. Va. 190, this court has said: "The cause of an injury, in the contemplation of law, is that which immediately produces it as its natural consequence; and therefore, if a party be guilty of an act of negligence which would naturally produce an injury to another, but, before such injury actually results, a third person does some act which is the immediate cause of the injury, such third person is alone responsible therefor, and the original party is in no degree responsible therefor, though the injury could never have occurred but for his negligence. The causal connection between the first act of negligence and the injury is broken by the intervention of the act of a responsible party, which act is in law regarded as the sole cause of the injury according to the maxim, In jure non remota causa sed proxima spectatur." See also Fawcett v. Pittsburg, C. & St. L. R. Co. 24 W. Va. 755.

In Schwartz v. Shull, 45 W. Va. 405, 31 S. E. 914, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 496, it is held that "the proximate cause of an injury is the last negligent act contributing thereto, and without which such injury would not have resulted." In that case an instruction was held erroneous which told the jury that if it believed from the evidence the defendant was negligent, and such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, it must find for the plaintiff, although it believed that another person's negligence intervened between the negligence of the defendant and the injury.

In Risque v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 104 Va. 476, 51 S. E. 730, it was held that if a railroad company delivers, on a siding, to a company operating an iron furnace, cars without brakes or with unsound brakes, in consequence of which defect a servant of the receiving company is injured, his remedy is against the latter, and not against the railway company. The court held the ore company liable, because it permitted the use of the car when it knew, or by inspection could readily have ascertained, the car's defective condition, in either of which events it should have declined to accept it, or to permit its employees to use it, or have repaired the defect.

But, in contravention of the principles announced by the authorities cited, plaintiff relies on Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 136; Seale v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 65 Tex. 274, 57 Am. Rep. 602; Hughes v. McDonough, 43 N. J. L. 459, 39 Am. Rep. 603; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Reaney, 42 Md. 117, and other cases, the facts of which materially differ from those found in the case now under review.

The facts of the Lane Case may be stated as a fair illustration of the facts of each of the other cases. There the defendant company carelessly left, in a public street, a truck so unskillfully loaded that the shipment of loose iron could easily be dislodged, and, in falling, result in injury to persons using the highway. A child climbed on the truck and dislodged the iron and caused it to fall on and injure another child attracted by the first, and at whose invitation he approached the truck. But, even under these facts, the court said that if the plaintiff actively participated in the dislodgment of the iron, or approached the truck as actor for the purpose of encouraging his associate, he could not recover damages for the injury, unless he went there attracted by curiosity or upon invitation, and was in the exercise of due care; and further that "in an action to recover for . . . defendants' negligence, to which the fault of another person contributed, the defendants' liability is not affected by the fact that the fault of such person was not negligence, but voluntary wrongdoing, if it was conduct which they should have apprehended and provided against." This case, when properly analyzed, does not conflict with the general trend of other authorities heretofore cited by us.

In the Texas case, a locomotive of the railroad company, by the emission of sparks, ignited combustible material which the company permitted to accumulate on its right of way, and from which, when ignited, a strong wind caused the fire to spread in the direction of property belonging to the plaintiff, whose daughter's clothing caught fire while she was engaged in an effort to save his property, thus inflicting injuries from which she died. But the court said: "If, subsequently to the original wrongful or negligent act, a new cause has intervened, of itself sufficient to stand as the cause of the misfortune, the former must be considered as too remote. The original wrongful or negligent act will not be regarded as the proximate cause, where any new agency, not within the reasonable contemplation of the original wrongdoer, has intervened to bring about the injury;" but "where, however, the intervening cause and its probable or reasonable consequences are such as could reasonably have been anticipated by the original wrongdoer, the causal connection between the original wrongful act and the subsequent injury is not broken, and an action may lie therefor." This holding, in view of the facts, does not contravene the rule we have announced.

In the Hughes Case, plaintiff was a blacksmith, and skilfully shod a horse. Defendant, in order to produce the belief in the mind of the owner "that the work of the plaintiff was badly done, privily loosened such shoe," and drove a nail in horse's foot, whereby plaintiff lost the custom of the owner. "The contention was that the wrong was done to Van Riper [the owner]; that it was his horse whose shoe was loosened, and whose foot was pricked, and that the immediate injury and damage were to him; and that, consequently the damages of the plaintiff were too remote to be made the basis of a legal claim." But the court said: "The illegal act of the defendant had a close causal connection with the hurt done to the plaintiff, and such hurt was the natural and almost direct product of such cause. Such harmful result was sure to follow, in the usual course of things, from the specified malfeasance. The defendant is conclusively chargeable with the knowledge of this injurious effect of his conduct, for such effect was almost certain to follow from such conduct, without the occurrence of any extraordinary event, or the help of any extraneous cause. The act had a twofold injurious aspect. It was calculated to injure both Van Riper and the plaintiff; and, as each was directly damaged, I can perceive no reason why each could not repair his losses by an action."

In the Reaney Case, the last point in the syllabus shows, without a statement of the facts, the inapplicability to the facts of this case. It is: "Whoever does a wrongful act is answerable for all the consequences that may ensue in the ordinary and natural course of events, though such consequences be immediately and directly brought about by intervening causes, if those intervening causes were set in motion by the original wrongdoer."

An examination of other cases cited by plaintiff will show a tendency to support, rather than to contravene, the principles announced by the authorities cited in support of the finding on this review.

Our conclusion, therefore, is to reverse the judgment of the Circuit Court, set aside the verdict of the jury, and enter a nil capiat, the latter because from the proof it clearly appears that plaintiff has no cause of action against the defendant.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

PACIFIC PACKING COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
BRADSTREET COMPANY et al., Respts.

(25 Idaho, 696, 139 Pac. 1007.)

Libel — report by mercantile agency — suit against corporation.

1. It is libelous per se for a mercantile agency falsely to report in writing to its customers that a business corporation has been sued for "money advanced" in an amount in excess of its capital.

Same — privilege — mercantile reports.

2. Reports by a mercantile agency to its customers, as to the financial standing of a business corporation, are not privileged communications.

(February 17, 1914.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Ada County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for the publication of an alleged libel. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — Libel and slander: stating that one has been sued or judgment recovered against him.

Generally, as to injury in business or professional relations from libel and slander, including charges affecting financial standing, see Index to L.R.A. Notes, "Libel & Slander," §§ 14, 16, and 17.

As to measure of damages for libel or slander reflecting on integrity or responsibility of merchant, see note to Wolkowsky v. Garfunkel, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 351.

And as to report of mercantile agency as a privileged communication, see notes in 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 452, and 2 B. R. C. 215.

In Harman v. Delany, 2 Strange, 898, it was said: "The law has always been very tender of the reputation of tradesmen, and therefore words spoken of them in the way of their trade will bear an action, that will not be actionable in the case of another person; and if bare words are so, it will be stronger in the case of a libel in a public newspaper, which is so diffusive."

It has been said with reference to the publication by a commercial agency to its subscribers that a tradesman has been sued, that the rule is that, if the statement is untrue and is published owing to negligence, it may give rise to an action, but there must be actual injury shown. Giacona & Son v. Bradstreet Co. 48 La. Ann. 1191, 20 So. 706. The court apparently regarded a publication in this instance, that a firm had been sued, whereas in fact a suit was brought against one member only of the firm, as not libelous per se.

A distinction has been made between the false publication that a judgment has been recovered against a merchant, and a statement that his property has been taken in attachment, the court, while conceding that the former publication might not be libelous, holding that the latter was. McKenzie v. Denver Times Pub. Co. 3 Colo. App. 554, 34 Pac. 577, a case sufficiently set forth in PACIFIC PACKING CO. v. BRADSTREET CO.

A publication by a mercantile agency to its subscribers, under the heading "Writs and Summonses," of the following words:

Messrs. Wood & Driscoll, for appellant:
The words are not privileged by reason of the fact that they are the communication of a mercantile agency to its patrons.

Macintosh v. Dunn, 99 L. T. N. S. 64, 2 B. R. C. 203, [1908] A. C. 390, 77 L. J. P. C. N. S. 113, 24 Times L. R. 705, 52 Sol. Jo. 580; Douglass v. Daisley, 57 L.R.A. 475, 52 C. C. A. 324, 114 Fed. 628; 25 Cyc. 468.

Messrs. Richards & Haga and McKee F. Morrow, for respondents:

An article written of and concerning a corporation is not libelous per se unless the necessary result of the publication of the language used, without proof of extrinsic facts, is to affect the financial stand-

"Defendant. Lion Brewing Co. et al., Plaintiff. Mara, John Andrew. Foreclosure of mortgage," when the brewing company was in fact joined in the action only because it held a second mortgage upon the property, has been held libelous as implying that the company's property was mortgaged, and that it was unable or unwilling to satisfy the debt, and was about to be deprived of its property on that account. Lion Brewing Co. v. Bradstreet Co. 9 B. C. 435.

A publication in a trade journal as to a brickmaker, that he is in the hands of the sheriff, has been held libelous per se. Hermann v. Bradstreet Co. 19 Mo. App. 227.

But in Woodruff v. Bradstreet Co. 116 N. Y. 217, 5 L.R.A. 555, 22 N. E. 354, it was held that the publication by a commercial agency that a judgment for $4,000 had been recovered against a brick manufacturer was not libelous per se, so as to entitle the latter to recover for its publication without proof of special damages.

It was also held in Woodruff v. Bradstreet Co. supra, that the question whether the publication was libelous per se was one of law for the court; and that this rule was not affected by the fact that the publication was by a commercial agency engaged in collecting information as to the financial standing of persons engaged in business, although its apparent authenticity might therefore be greater.

In holding the publication not libelous per se, the court in Woodruff v. Bradstreet Co. supra, said: "The recovery of a judgment does not necessarily import conceded default in payment of a debt. It is a matter of frequent observation that controversies arising apparently out of an honest difference of opinion go into the courts for determination. Litigation also not infrequently comes from causes in which is involved no personal credit or default. There is nothing in the defendant's report to indicate that the judgment was produced by any cause prejudicial to the credit of the plaintiff, and there is no presumption in that respect upon the subject in aid of the action. There is nothing for the consideration of the jury bearing upon the question whether the publication was ing of the corporation, and cause it pecuniary loss.

libelous; and we think the trial court properly held, as matter of law, that it was not such per se."

A false publication by a commercial agency to its subscribers, that a judgment for $129 had been recovered against a merchant, was held libelous in Bradstreet Co. v. Oswald, 96 Ga. 396, 23 S. E. 423, where, however, special damages were alleged. The declaration did not allege malice, but since special damages resulting from the negligence of the defendant were alleged, the court said the defendant would be liable for actual damage though not guilty of an evil design.

In Hayes v. Press Co. 127 Pa. 642, 5 L.R.A. 643, 14 Am. St. Rep. 874, 18 Atl. 331, where, in connection with the publication of a notice that judgment had been entered against a hotel proprietor, a paper published the heading "Hotel Proprietors Embarrassed," the court said: "It was the common right of anyone to publish the fact that a judgment . . . had been entered against the plaintiff substantially as shown by the record of the court; but it was neither the right nor the privilege of the defendant . . . to publish in connection with the declaration, in the form of a headline or otherwise, that the defendants in the judgment were embarrassed."

A false statement concerning a brewer that he "was in a sponging house for debt within the last fortnight" has been held slanderous, without proof of special damage. Jones v. Littler, 7 Mees. & W. 422. It was said that the imputation of insolvency must be injurious, for if a tradesman is incapable of paying all his debts, whether in or out of trade, his credit as a tradesman must be injured.

In Loftus v. Bennett, 68 App. Div. 128, 74 N. Y. Supp. 290, a publication in a newspaper regarding a merchant was regarded as libelous per se, but the publication included, in addition to a statement that an attachment had been procured against a merchant and that his stores were in the hands of the sheriff, other allegations, such as that "a remarkable condition of affairs" was disclosed, and also a distinct charge of swindling.

Also, in Beardsley v. Tappan, 1 Blatchf. 588, Fed. Cas. No. 1,188, a statement regarding a merchant which was held defamatory included, besides the allegation that he had been sued, other apparently libelous matter.

Where a commercial agency published a statement that a judgment for $360 had been recovered against a grocer, whereas in fact a verdict for this amount had been rendered against him, but the judgment subsequently entered thereon was reversed, the trial court in Hessel v. Bradstreet Co. 141 Pa. 501, 21 Atl. 659, instructed the jury that if the publication was made maliciously with the intention to injure the merchant in his business, the agency was liable, but that if the publication was not made maliciously, but pursuant to what the agency considered to be its duty, erroneously supposing that a verdict was equivalent to a judgment, it was not liable. On appeal, the judgment was affirmed, only questions as to admission of evidence, however, being considered.

In Stubbs v. Russell [1913] A. C. 386, it was held that the publication in a trade paper of an extract from the court records, under a column entitled "Extracts from the Court Books of Decrees in absence in the small debt courts," of a decree against a merchant, accompanied by a note that "the following extracts from the court books have been received since our last issue . . . It is probable that some of the decrees have been sisted, settled, or paid; and in no case does publication of the decree imply inability to pay on the part of anyone named, or anything more than the fact that the entry published appeared in the court books," was not libelous as inferring that the merchant was unable to pay his debts. It was said that an injurious inference might no doubt have been drawn if inability to pay a just debt were the only reason which could account for such a decree; but that it might happen from a variety of causes consistent with solvency, and that a publication is not libelous because one out of various possible inferences from the facts which it states might be injurious while others are harmless; also that the test was not whether some people might put a harmful meaning upon the words, however strained or unlikely that construction might be. The court distinguished the case of Crabbe v. Stubbs, 22 Rettie, 860, holding to the contrary, on the ground that the explanatory statement was lacking in the latter case.

It was held also in Stubbs v. Russell, supra, that the question whether the publication was capable of the libelous inference alleged was one for the court, and should not be submitted to the jury; as, when read in connection with the explanatory note, the alleged libelous imputation was not a reasonable construction.

I. s. O. p., Oct. 13," was held to support an innuendo that on the date the paper was published there was an unsatisfied judgment against the plaintiff in the county court for the amount named, which had been obtained on the date indicated in the statement, and that the plaintiff was unable to satisfy the judgment, and was a person unwilling or unable to pay his debts, and was therefore libelous, the judgment having in fact been satisfied.

And in M'Nally v. Oldham, 16 Ir. C. L. Rep. 298, it was held that it was no defense to an action for libel for publishing in a paper called "The Black List" the record of a judgment obtained a week previous against a trader, meaning that the judgment was an existing liability against him, that the court record showed the judgment as unsatisfied, when in fact it had been paid where the trader sustained special damages from the false publication. The court, while admitting the right to publish the court record of a judgment, took the position that the publisher did so at his peril if he represented the judgment as still outstanding when in fact it had been paid, and the fact that the record did not show the satisfaction was not a justification; so that although there was no actual malice, the publisher was liable for actual damages. It was said that "a judgment may be obtained against a trader in an action which he resists because he thinks the demand ill founded; but the effect would be different if it appeared that he allowed the demand to remain unpaid after his liability to it was decided, and a judgment obtained."

But it has been held that it is not libelous per se of the maker of a note, though he is engaged in business, for its holder to cause a trustee in a trust deed held as security for the note, to give notice of the sale of the property for nonpayment, although in fact the note has been paid.

The complaint alleges the corporate existence of the plaintiff and defendant, and that it was duly authorized to conduct business in the state of Idaho, and that it was engaged in business in Ada, Canyon, and Washington counties; and alleged that the defendant the Bradstreet Company was engaged in the state of Idaho and in the counties of Ada, Canyon, and Washington, in furnishing for a valuable consideration reports and information concerning the credit and financial standing and rating of business men and corporations engaged in business and commercial transactions, and it is alleged that Leslie L. Long was its managing officer, agent, and representative in the state of Idaho.

Paragraph 5, 7, & 8, and a part of 9, are as follows:

"That, acting as such agent, and in the scope of his employment as such agent for the said defendant the Bradstreet Company, and in behalf of the Bradstreet Company, and in the transaction of the aforesaid business of the said defendant the Bradstreet Company, the said defendant Long, on or about the 23d day of September, 1912, maliciously, wantonly, recklessly, and well knowing the premises, did write, compose, and publish in the aforesaid counties of Ada, Canyon, and Washington, in the state of Idaho, to its patrons, and among the said growers and packers of fruit in said counties, whose names are unknown to plaintiff, concerning and in reference to this plaintiff and the credit, financial, and business standing of this plaintiff, certain words in writing, and plaintiff is informed and believes, and hence, on information and belief, alleges, that the tenor of the said words was as follows, to wit: The Pacific Packing Company has been sued in the superior court of Los Angeles county, California, by the Pacific Fruit Auction Company for the sum of $230,000 for money advanced, and the plaintiff alleges that the said words were read by the said patrons, and the said growers and packers of fruit. . . .

"Plaintiff further alleges that the defendant Leslie L. Long and the said defendant the Bradstreet Company meant to convey and communicate to the said third parties to whom the words hereinbefore set forth were published, that the plaintiff was not financially sound, solvent, and responsible, and was not able to pay all its financial obligations, and was not worthy of credit; and that the said words were so understood by the said parties to whom they were published. . . .

"Plaintiff alleges that the said words were false; and plaintiff further alleges that the plaintiff is, and at all times herein mentioned was, financially sound, solvent, and responsible, and that the plaintiff is, and at all times herein mentioned was, able to pay its financial obligations, and the plaintiff, at all times herein mentioned, was worthy of credit.

"That, prior to the publication of the words set forth in paragraph 5, the plaintiff corporation was engaged in the business of marketing fruit in Ada, Canyon, and Washington counties, Idaho, as the agent of such growers and packers of fruit in the said counties as desired to employ the plaintiff; that the fruit packing and marketing season of 1912 was the first season in which the plaintiff company had been engaged in the said business in the aforesaid counties, and, in preparation for the transaction of its business for the said season and the introduction of its business in the new field, consisting of the counties aforesaid, plaintiff had advertised its said business extensively in the said counties, and had sent its agents among the said growers and packers of fruit in said counties, to solicit business and establish the reputation and good will of its said business and, as a result of plaintiff company's said efforts, and prior to the said publication, the plaintiff company had created a valuable asset for itself in the form of good will for itself among the growers and packers of fruit in said counties, and in the form of a good reputation for solvency and financial reliability among said growers and packers."

It is claimed by the appellant that a publication which is made "maliciously, wantonly, and recklessly, and which is false and untrue," stating and charging that an individual or company "has been sued in the superior court of Los Angeles county of California, by the Pacific Fruit Auction Company in the sum of $230,000 for money advanced," is of itself actionable, and that it is the duty of the court to take judicial knowledge of the fact that such a statement has the direct effect of injuring and damaging the individual or corporation concerning which it is published. The respondent, on the other hand, insists, and the trial court agreed with it, that such a publication is not per se libelous, and that no recovery could be had without alleging special damages. Respondent cites many authorities in support of its contention, among which the following are the most important: Newbold v. J. M. Bradstreet & Son, 57 Md. 38, 40 Am. Rep. 426; Fry v. McCord, 95 Tenn. 678, 33 S. W. 568; Memphis Teleph. Co. v. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 76 C. C. A. 436, 145 Fed. 904;

Warner Instrument Co. v. Ingersoll (C. C.) 157 Fed. 311; Kemble & Mills v. Kaighn, 131 App. Div. 63, 115 N. Y. Supp. 809; Bodine v. Times-Journal Pub. Co. 26 Okla. 135, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 147, 110 Pac. 1096; N. S. Sherman Mach. Co. v. Dun, 28 Okla. 447, 114 Pac. 617; Bradstreet Co. v. Oswald, 96 Ga. 396, 23 S. E. 423; Victor Safe & Lock Co. v. Deright 77 C. C. A. 437, 147 Fed. 211, 8 Ann. Cas. 809; 25 Cyc. 337.

The general purport of the foregoing authorities is stated by the text of the last citation (25 Cyc. 337), as follows: "Every wilful and unauthorized imputation, spoken, written, or printed, which imputes to a merchant, manufacturer, or other business man, conduct which is injurious to his character and standing as a merchant, manufacturer, or business man, is libelous or slanderous as the case may be. But to be actionable without proof of special damages, the words must contain an imputation such as is necessarily hurtful in its effect upon plaintiff's business, and must touch him in his special trade or occupation. . . . The law carefully guards the credit of merchants, traders, and business men, and oral or written words imputing to them insolvency, bankruptcy, or want of credit are actionable per se the rule applying to anyone to whom credit is important in the prosecution of his business. . . . The words, to be actionable per se, must in their common and ordinary meaning necessarily impute insolvency or want of credit. Thus, it is not actionable to say of a merchant that he has been sued, that judgment has been recovered against him, that he has sold or mortgaged his property, or that he has refused to pay a certain promissory note."

Appellant opens the argument in his brief on the sufficiency of the allegations of damages by the following statement: "There is no dispute between the parties as to the general rule on this subject in this class of actions, namely, that, where the words are libelous per se, no damages need be alleged, but where not libelous per se, special damages must be alleged and proven," and in support of this contention cites Dunn v. Maier, 27 C. C. A. 100, 52 U. S. App. 381, 82 Fed. 169, in which it is said: "The question presented for consideration is whether the words used in the publication are libelous per se. If they are, the uniform current of authority authorizes the recovery of general damages, and no special damage need be averred. If, however, the words published are not actionable per se, it was incumbent on the defendants in error to make the necessary averments of special damage to warrant a recovery." 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Appellant bases his argument in favor of the sufficiency of the complaint upon two grounds: First, that the language charged is libelous per se, and therefore actionable, without alleging anything other than general damages; and, second, he contends that, if not libelous per se, "the complaint does sufficiently allege special damages." In support of appellant's contention, counsel cite the following authorities: 25 Cyc. 326; Odgers, Libel & Slander, p. 66; McKenzie v. Denver Times Pub. Co. 3 Colo. App. 554, 34 Pac. 577; Hayes v. Press Co. 127 Pa. 642, 5 L.R.A. 643, 14 Am. St. Rep. 874, 18 Atl. 331; Smith v. Bradstreet Co. 63 S. C. 525, 41 S. E. 763; Sewall v. Catlin, 3 Wend. 292; Maldonado & Co. v. Yglesias, 154 App. Div. 520, 139 N. Y. Supp. 102; Minter v. Bradstreet Co. 174 Mo. 444, 73 S. W. 668; Evans v. Harries, 1 Hurlst. & N. 251, 26 L. J. Exch. N. S. 31; Ratcliffe v. Evans, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 535, [1892] 2 Q. B. 524, 40 Week. Rep. 578, 66 L. T. N. S. 794, 56 J. P. 837; Weiss v. Whittemore, 28 Mich. 366; Trenton Mut. L. & F. Ins. Co. v. Perrine, 23 N. J. L. 402, 57 Am. Dec. 400.

In McKenzie v. Denver Times Pub. Co. supra, the publication was as follows: "Business changes. McKenzie Lumber Company, Denver, attached." The court, in considering the question as to whether this was actionable per se, said: "To say that a judgment has been recovered against a man, without more, suggests no impugnement of his solvency or his integrity; and the plain sense of the words cannot be enlarged by innuendo. In this case, however, the words clearly imply embarrassment in the plaintiffs' partnership business. They will bear no other construction. If they convey the truth, there must have been a suit against the firm; the suit must have been brought upon an alleged firm liability, and the property of the firm must have been taken in attachment. Not only is suspicion cast upon the solvency or integrity of the firm, but its property, which, together with its reputation, is the foundation upon which its credit rests, is said to be in the custody of an officer. . . . The words are clearly actionable, and, for the purpose of maintaining the suit, it was unnecessary to allege or prove special damages." The other authorities above cited support the holding in the Times Pub. Co. Case.

It certainly seems that the publication of a false report that a company with but $50,000 capital stock has been sued for $230,000 on account of "money advanced" can have no other effect than that of casting doubt and suspicion on the financial standing and integrity of such company, and would undoubtedly tend to injure its business. It is clear to us that, under the liberal rule of pleading adopted by our Code, the allegations of the complaint under consideration are sufficient to put the defendant on its defense. The proofs as to the amount and nature of the damages sustained will be quite another thing. The plaintiff will have to make its proofs sufficient to satisfy court and jury.

As for the contention that these reports on the financial standing of business concerns are privileged, we are unable to give to such a doctrine the sanction of the court. We agree that some courts have so held, but we do not believe it to be a sound or just rule, and it would certainly be demoralizing to business and open a ready and safe way for the unscrupulous, the blackmailer, or grafter, to ruin the business standing and credit of an individual or corporation at pleasure and without recourse. The only safe and just rule, either in law or morals, is the one that exacts truthfulness in business as well as elsewhere, and places a penalty upon falsehood, making it dangerous for a mercantile, commercial, or any other agency to sell and traffic falsehood and misrepresentation about the standing and credit of men or corporations. The company that goes into the business of selling news or reports about others should assume the responsibility for its acts, and must be sure that it is peddling the truth. There cannot be two standards of right nor two brands of truth, one for moralizing, and one for business. The law ought to look with a stern, cold eye upon the liar, whether he be incorporated or just an everyday man. If a mercantile agency can safely make false reports about the financial standing and credit of the citizen, and destroy his business, it can then take the next step with equal impunity and destroy his reputation, leaving him shorn and helpless.

As recently as 1908, in the case of Macintosh v. Dun [1908] A. C. 390, 2 B. R. C. 203, on appeal from the high court of Australia, the privy council of England, speaking through Lord Macnaghten on the alleged privileged character of mercantile reports on the standings of business and commercial institutions, said: "Is it in the interest of the community, is it for the welfare of society, that the protection which the law throws around communications made in legitimate self-defense, or from a bona fide sense of duty, should be extended to communications made from motives of self-interest by persons who trade for profit in the characters of other people? The trade is a peculiar one; still there seems to be much competition for it; and in this trade, as in most others, success will attend the exertions of those who give the best value for money, and probe most thoroughly the matter placed in their hands. There is no reason to suppose that the defendants generally have acted otherwise than cautiously and discreetly. But information such as that which they offer for sale may be obtained in many ways, not all of them deserving of commendation. It may be extorted from the person whose character is in question, through fear of misrepresentation or misconception if he remains silent. It may be gathered from gossip. It may be picked up from discharged servants. It may be betrayed by disloyal employees. It is only right that those who engage in such a business, touching so closely very dangerous ground, should take the consequences if they overstep the law." The doctrine there advanced is wholesome, and ought to apply here.

We think the complaint in this case is sufficient to put the defendant on its defense.

The demurrer should have been overruled, and the defendant should be required to answer on the merits. Costs awarded to appellant.

Mr. J. M. Challiss also for appellant.

Messrs. Angevine, Cubbison, & Holt for appellee.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case forty-six special questions were prepared to be submitted to the jury; to thirty-one of the questions, the counsel for the parties, by agreement, appended answers, and fifteen questions were submitted to be answered by the jury, the foreman affixing his signature to each question so off and is ignorant of the fact that it is not leaving the station.

If a passenger, without objection by the railroad company, alights from a mixed train about 1,500 feet from the station, at a point where passengers are customarily discharged from such trains, and proceeds to the station house to inquire for a telegram, he is still a passenger; but if he has no business at the station, and alights merely to loaf in the yards, he is not a passenger. Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Coggins, 32 C. C. A. 1, 60 U. S. App. 140, 88 Fed. 455, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 534.

b. Duty and liability of carrier.

1. In general.

Where a through passenger who has left the train temporarily at an intermediate station attempts, at a proper time and place, to re-enter the train, the railroad owes her such care as very prudent and competent persons would use under the circumstances; and, in an action by such passenger for personal injury, an instruction to find for her if the jerk which shook her from the train as she was boarding it constituted negligence was proper. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Humphreys, supra.

The duty to use the utmost care and diligence is imposed upon a railroad with respect to a passenger who, having temporarily left his train, is making his way across intervening tracks to an eating station provided by the railroad for its passengers. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Shean, 18 Colo. 368, 20 L.R.A. 729, 33 Pac. 108.

So, the utmost care and diligence are due from a steamship company to a passenger who leaves the steamer temporarily at an intermediate port for the purpose of getting his breakfast. Dodge v. Boston & B. S. S. Co. 148 Mass. 207, 2 L.R.A. 83, 12 Am. St. Rep. 541, 19 N. E. 373, 3 Am. Neg. Cas. 843.

And it is held in Keokuk Northern Line Packet Co. v. True, 88 Ill. 608, 2 Am. Neg. Cas. 617, that a packet company is required to use the "utmost practicable care" answered. This, although novel, is regarded as good practice, as it relieves the jury from forming answers to questions of fact not really in dispute.

The undisputed and agreed facts are that appellee became a passenger upon appellant's passenger train at Kansas City, Kansas, about 4:30 P. M., November 9, 1909, with a ticket entitling him to ride to Horaniff, a station in Wyandotte county. The train arrived at the intermediate station of Bethel at from 5 to 5:08 P. M., at which place appellee desired to inquire of the station agent about a shipment of potatoes. He spoke to the conductor about this, and the conductor said, "All right." The train stopped at Bethel from thirty seconds to one minute. There was a station platform at Bethel, extending from the railroad track to the station building, about 18 feet wide and about 150 feet long. A mail sack was unloaded from the mail car of the train about 6 feet east of the west end of this platform, and lay thereon 3 or 4 feet from the train. The train was running in a westerly direction. When appellee stepped off the train he walked toward the agent, who was standing on the platform 10 or 12 feet from the train, asked the agent if the shipment of potatoes was there, and was told there was nothing there for him. In attempting to again board the train appellee stumbled and fell towards the train and on the rail, and his thumb and parts of two fingers were cut, and had to be amputated. The appellee was sixty-four years old, 6 for the safety of a passenger who temporarily leaves its steamer at an intermediate point for the transaction of business.

Regardless of its diligence and good faith, a railroad is liable for the failure to perform its contractual duty of immunity from intentional injury at the hands of its employees, to a passenger who is shot by a railroad employee while on the platform at an intermediate station at which he has alighted with the intention of returning to the train to continue his journey. Layne v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 66 W. Va. 607, 67 S. E. 1103.

A street railway owes no duty, however, to a passenger who leaves the car temporarily to stop a fight between the conductor and another passenger. Zeccardi v. Yonkers R. Co. 190 N. Y. 389, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 770, 83 N. E. 31, reversing 113 App. Div. 649, 99 N. Y. Supp. 636.

2. Duty to furnish safe means of egress and ingress.

A passenger on a boat has a right to go ashore on business at an intermediate point, and the transportation company is obliged to provide him a safe means of egress from the boat. Dice v. Willamette Transp. & Locks Co. 8 Or. 60, 34 Am. Rep. 575, 6 Am. Neg. Cas. 202.

And a railroad is liable for breach of its duty to furnish its passengers an easy and safe mode of going to and from its trains at eating stations, where an injury results from its failure to light the platforms and to inform passengers who are returning from the dining room of a change in the location of their train. Peniston v. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. 34 La. Ann. 777, 44 Am. Rep. 444, 3 Am. Neg. Cas. 517.

But where a steamship company has provided a safe and convenient place for landing passengers, it is not bound to provide for the safety of a passenger who attempts to land at another place in disobedience of the regulations of the company. Dodge v. Boston & B. S. S. Co. 148 Mass. 207, 2 L.R.A. 83, 12 Am. St. Rep. 541, 19 N. E. 373, 3 Am. Neg. Cas. 843. 61 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Watson v. Oxanna Land Co. 92 Ala. 320, 8 So. 770, was an action by a passenger who was injured by stepping into a hole in a bridge as he was returning to the train, which he had temporarily left to go to a hotel used as an eating house for passengers. The railroad was held liable, no question being raised, however, concerning the passenger's right to leave his train.

In Clusman v. Long Island R. Co. 9 Hun, 618, affirmed without opinion in 73 N. Y. 606, the railroad was held liable for injuries to a passenger who alighted from his train temporarily, and was injured while on the station platform on his way to the railroad office to send a telegram. Inasmuch as the status of the passenger is not discussed, it seems that the liability of the railroad is based upon the general duty owed to anyone coming upon the premises to send a message.

3. Duty to warn and wait for passenger.

It is the duty of a railroad to give a reasonable time to board a train after giving the signal to start, and to use the utmost care in operating the train on behalf of a passenger who has left it temporarily at an intermediate station to procure the lunch which is customarily furnished passengers at that place. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Gray, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 71 S. W. 316.

And where a train is started too soon after the conductor's call to get aboard to permit a passenger who has alighted for exercise to get on before it starts, the railroad is guilty of negligence. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Mayfield, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 415, 56 S. W. 942.

Where a railroad knows that a passenger has temporarily alighted upon the station platform with the intent of resuming his journey, it is negligent and liable for the natural consequences of its act in starting the train without giving him reasonable warning and opportunity for getting on. Gannon v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 141 Iowa, 37, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1061, 117 N. W. 966.

Thus, where one who boards a train with-feet and 2 inches tall, weighed 225 pounds, and was receiving a salary of $65 per month. The jury returned a general verdict in favor of appellee, and assessed his damages at $2,500. Judgment was rendered for that amount and costs.

The jury, in answer to special questions, found that appellee alighted from the train immediately after it stopped; that darkness was approaching at the time; that appellee was from 8 to 10 feet from the train when it started to go on, and that he moved rapidly towards it for the purpose of again boarding it; that there was nothing to prevent him from seeing the mail sack if he had looked for it; that the train had moved 30 feet from where it had stopped, and was moving 4 miles per hour when appellee attempted to board it; that appellee attempted to board the train at the front end of the rear passenger car; that appellee had hold of the hand rail of the car when he fell, but stumbling caused him to get an insecure hold; that appellee stumbled over the mail sack when he started for the train; that the conductor knew appellee was attempting to board the train when he fell, and knew this when he heard footsteps behind him; that when appellee was talking to the station agent, the agent was standing east of the mail sack; that appellee took hold of the hand rails of the car in attempting to board the train immediately south of the west end of the depot.

Two questions were involved in the case: First, was the railroad company guilty of out a ticket is directed by the conductor to pay his fare to the next station, and to get off there and purchase a ticket for the remainder of his journey, and is told that he will have time to get back on the train, the company is negligent in not holding the train long enough for him to purchase his ticket and get back on. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Germany, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 56 S. W. 586.

It is the duty of a railroad to exercise reasonable care in holding a train a reasonable time for a passenger who has left it at an eating station; and an instruction that there is no obligation to hold the train for the passenger to purchase cigars is improper because it does not take into account the duty of the company to hold the train a reasonable time after passengers are warned to get aboard. Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. Hickey, 81 Ark. 579, 99 S. W. 839.

But, although a railroad permits passengers to alight at an intermediate station for the purpose of refreshment, it is not thereby put under the obligation of warning them and giving them time to return to the train regardless of their distance therefrom. Larson v. Chicago, M. & P. S. R. Co. 31 S. D. 512, 141 N. W. 353.

And an inquiry on the part of a passenger as to the length of time the train stops at an intermediate station is not notice to the conductor that he intends to alight temporarily at such station, and no obligation is imposed upon the railroad to hold the train for the length of time stated in the answer to the inquiry. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Foreman, 73 Tex. 311, 15 Am. St. Rep. 785, 11 S. W. 326, 6 Am. Neg. Cas. 580.

In Texas Trunk R. Co. v. Mullins, — Tex. App. —, 18 S. W. 790, an action by a passenger who was left at an eating station by reason of his train leaving sooner than was announced, the court, without stating all the evidence, held that it was not sufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff.

c. Contributory negligence of passenger.

that, where a train stops at a station for dinner, one who, after returning to the coach after dinner, goes out upon the station platform, is negligent in so doing. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Coulson, 8 Kan. App. 4, 54 Pac. 2, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 629.

Neither is a passenger negligent in leaving his train temporarily to purchase a cigar at a point where passengers are invited to leave the train for refreshments; nor is he negligent in standing on the platform near his train upon his return. Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. v. Riley, 39 Ind. 568.

One who leaves his train temporarily, and is crossing intervening tracks on his way to an eating house provided for passengers, may rely upon the railroad to perform its duty, and is not negligent in failing to look and listen. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Shean, 18 Colo. 368, 20 L.R.A. 729, 33 Pac. 108.

A passenger taking exercise upon the platform at an intermediate station is not conclusively negligent in attempting to mount the steps of the train after it has started, where he does so with the assistance and approval of a railroad employee. Gannon v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 141 Iowa, 37, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1061, 117 N. W. 966.

But a passenger who leaves his train at a switch near a station to converse with a friend is guilty of contributory negligence in trying to board the train after it is in motion, where the danger in such act is known to him; and he cannot excuse himself by showing the brakeman's invitation to get on, where it is extended before the train starts. Texas Midland R. Co. v. Ellison, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 172, 87 S. W. 213.

In Krieg v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 4 Walk. (Pa.) 268, the court sustains the charge of the lower court that one who alights from his train at an intermediate station for refreshments, and afterward, while in search of a water-closet, walks around the guard rail at the end of the station platform, is guilty of negligence.

negligence which caused or contributed to the injury to the appellee? Second, was the appellee guilty of contributory negligence? The general verdict in favor of appellee is, in effect, a decision in his favor upon both of these questions, if such verdict is supported by competent evidence. Each is a question of fact for the jury, and compels an affirmance of the judgment if, as aforesaid, the evidence is sufficient, and unless the jury has made a special finding of fact inconsistent with the general verdict, which special finding is supported by competent evidence.

Numerous objections are made to the instructions given by the court, and especially to instructions Nos. 7 and 16. Instruction No. 7, although requiring a high degree of diligence, is practically in accord with the decisions of this and many other courts as to the duty of the railroad company in safeguarding its passengers, and the rule should not be relaxed as to passengers while on trains.

Instruction No. 7 reads: "The jury are instructed, as a matter of law, that it is the duty of a railroad company to use the highest degree of care and caution consistent with the practical operation of the road, to provide for the safety and security of the passenger while being transported, and by the 'highest degree of care,' as used in this instruction, is meant that the railroad company, as a common carrier of passengers, is required to do all that human care, vigilance, and foresight can reasonably do,

III. Alighting at points other than regular stations.

a. Continuation of relationship of carrier and passenger.

A passenger upon the platform of a crowded street car does not cease to be such by momentarily stepping to the ground to enable other passengers to leave the car. Tompkins v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 201 Mass. 114, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1063, 131 Am. St. Rep. 392, 87 N. E. 488.

Where a shipper of live stock who is a passenger in the caboose of the train carrying the stock leaves the train temporarily, at the conductor's request, to go forward to assist in saving his stock, which has been placed in a hazardous position by a wreck, he does not thereby lose his rights as passenger. Austin v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 149 Mo. App. 397, 130 S. W. 385.

So, where a train stopped to permit another train to pass at a place which was not a regular station, but which was designated as "Rockway Junction" on the signboard, one who, becoming sick, and being unable to procure water on the train, alighted temporarily to get a drink, could not be held as a matter of law to have abandoned his status of passenger. Wandell v. Corbin, 49 Hun, 608, 1 N. Y. Supp. 795.

It is held in Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Cooper, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 42, 20 S. W. 990, 6 Am. Neg. Cas. 624, that one who alights temporarily at a flag station where the train has stopped to take water does not come within the rule "holding that, when the train stops elsewhere than at a station, as at a water tank or upon a side track, when the stop is made for the purposes of the railroad alone, and the passenger leaves the cars, he acts at his peril, and that his own negligence will prevent recovery" for injuries sustained while in such position.

And one who temporarily leaves a train upon a switch at a station does not lose his character as passenger. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Sattler, 64 Neb. 639, 57 L.R.A. 890, 97 Am. St. Rep. 666, 90 N. W. 649. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

However, it is held in De Kay v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 41 Minn. 178, 4 L.R.A. 632, 16 Am. St. Rep. 687, 43 N. W. 182, 4 Am. Neg. Cas. 233, that one who leaves his train temporarily at an intermediate station and remains there until the train has moved onto a siding at the station does no illegal act, but he surrenders his status as a passenger with the right of resuming it by returning to his place on the train.

See, in connection with the cases immediately preceding, Texas Midland R. Co. v. Ellison, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 172, 87 S. W. 213, supra, II. a.

One who leaves his train temporarily while it is standing upon a side track does no illegal act, but he surrenders his status as passenger with the right of resuming it by returning to his place in the train. State v. Grank Trunk R. Co. 58 Me. 176, 4 Am. Rep. 258.

"As to a through train, carrying only through passengers, the passenger who leaves the train without the knowledge, consent, or invitation of the company, at an intermediate station at which the train stops only for some purpose in connection with its management and operation, as for the purpose of taking water or coal, and not to receive or discharge passengers, must be deemed to have abandoned his relation as a passenger, and to take upon himself for the time being all risks incident to his movements." Lemery v. Great Northern R. Co. 83 Minn. 47, 85 N. W. 908.

One who alights from a street car just before it reaches the stables loses his status as passenger in spite of his intention of returning and resuming his place in the car before the horses have been changed, where the conductor is not apprised that his leaving is temporary. Central R. Co. v. Peacock, 69 Md. 257, 9 Am. St. Rep. 425, 14 Atl. 709.

b. Duty and liability of carrier.

1. In general.

Where a conductor invites a passenger to leave his train temporarily to assist with a in view of the character and mode of conveyance adopted, to prevent accidents to passengers; and this rule of law is applicable to all cases where the relation of passenger and carrier exists."

A passenger on a moving train is in the custody of the railroad company and its employees. He is helpless to avert any of the many dangers to which he is exposed. His utmost effort in safeguarding himself is to refrain from any act that increases his peril. On a platform, however, he has full control of his own movements; he is generally free to observe his surroundings, and may generally avoid coming in collision with any object which may cause him injury. We think instruction No. 15 correctly instructed the jury that at the time wreck, the railroad owes the latter the duty to exercise such a high degree of foresight and prudence as would be used by very cautious, prudent, and competent persons under similar circumstances; and evidence that such a passenger alighted upon a high, narrow embankment covered with ice, without warning from the conductor, is sufficient to warrant a finding of negligence. Austin v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 149 Mo. App. 397, 130 S. W. 385.

And where the conductor consents to the passenger alighting from the train while it is standing upon a side track, the carrier is bound to observe the highest degree of care possible to see that the passenger is not in the act of boarding the car, before starting the train. Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. Jung, 161 Ala. 461, 49 So. 434, 18 Ann. Cas. 557.

And the railroad is liable for injuries inflicted upon one who gives up his rights as passenger by leaving the train temporarily at a switch, if the injuries are the result of negligence on the part of the railroad. State v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 58 Me. 176, 4 Am. Rep. 258.

In Pitcher v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 55 Hun, 604, 8 N. Y. Supp. 389, an action for injuries caused by the sudden starting of a train which plaintiff was trying to board, where it appeared that he had returned in twenty-five minutes to the train upon which he was a passenger, accompanying stock, and which he had left at the invitation of the conductor, who said he would have forty-five minutes for supper, and where there was evidence that the engineer saw him apparently coming to his car for the purpose of getting board, a nonsuit was reversed on the ground that the negligence of the railroad should be considered by the jury.

2. Duty to furnish safe means of egress and ingress.

Where a train is stopped at night for the purpose of permitting another train to pass by, the railroad does not owe the duty of safe egress and ingress to one who of the accident appellee was a passenger, and entitled to the care of a passenger.

It is claimed in the petition that it was dark at the depot platform at the time of the accident, yet the evidence indicates, and the jury found in its special findings Nos. 25 and 28, as follows:

"Q. 25. Was it light at the time plaintiff was injured? A. Approaching darkness."

"Q. 28. What was there to have prevented him from seeing said mail sack if he had looked? A. Nothing if he had looked for it."

It was the duty of the appellee to exercise reasonable care for his own protection, as well as it was the duty of the railroad company to protect him from injury. From leaves the car and walks into an open cattle guard. Frost v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 10 Allen, 387, 87 Am. Dec. 668, 3 Am. Neg. Cas. 759.

And, as to passengers who alight temporarily from a through train which stops at an intermediate station only for some purpose connected with its operation, it is not negligence for the railroad to fail to exercise vigilance as to the proper construction and lighting of the station platform. Lemery v. Great Northern R. Co. 83 Minn. 47, 85 N. W. 908.

So, it is held, in De Kay v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 41 Minn. 178, 4 L.R.A. 632, 16 Am. St. Rep. 687, 43 N. W. 182, 4 Am. Neg. Cas. 233, that, while a railroad is bound to use reasonable diligence to avoid exposing to any unnecessary dangers those temporarily leaving a train standing upon a side track at a station, it is not bound to make the side track as safe a place of egress and ingress as a station platform.

3. Duty to warn and wait for passenger.

Where a passenger, without objection from the conductor, who knows thereof, alights at a point between stations to go ahead to view a wreck which is obstructing the track, the action of the conductor in starting the train without giving him timely warning is such negligence as will sustain a recovery. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Roundtree, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 25 S. W. 989.

c. Contributory negligence of passenger.

A passenger who temporarily leaves his train standing upon a side track at a station is guilty of contributory negligence where, in crossing an intervening track to return to the train, he fails to exercise reasonable care to avoid injury from passing trains. De Kay v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 41 Minn. 178, 4 L.R.A. 32, 16 Am. St. Rep. 687, 43 N. W. 182, 4 Am. Neg. Cas. 233.

One voluntarily becoming a passenger on the two findings of the jury it is evident that if he had looked where he was going, he would have seen the mail sack, and it is a fair presumption that if he had seen the mail sack, he would not have stumbled over it. He did stumble over it, and it follows as a reasonable presumption that he did not look, did not see it, and did not exercise reasonable care to avoid injury to himself. On the cross-examination of the appellee as a witness, numerous questions were asked as to whether he looked on the platform in going to take the train, to each of which he gave an evasive answer, evidently to avoid saying whether he did or did not see the mail sack. Finally the a street car so crowded that he is compelled to ride in the vestibule, with knowledge of a rule that persons riding upon platforms do so at their own risk, assumes the risk of injury by having the car negligently started before he resumes a safe position after being compelled temporarily to alight to enable other persons to leave the car. Tompkins v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 201 Mass. 114, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1063, 131 Am. St. Rep. 392, 87 N. E. 488.

And a passenger who alights temporarily from a train upon a switch at a station must assume all ordinary risks incident to his action, inasmuch as such a place is not intended for the discharge of passengers. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Sattler, 64 Neb. 636, 57 L.R.A. 890, 97 Am. St. Rep. 666, 90 N. W. 649.

IV. Alighting at point other than regular station, believing it to be regular intermediate station.

a. Continuation of relationship of carrier and passenger.

Where a passenger alights at an intermediate point other than a regular station, as the result of a mistake induced by the action of railroad employees, it seems that, since he intends no act which will cause his rights as passenger to cease, he must be still considered as a passenger, irrespective of the fact that he alights at a place where he might not otherwise retain his rights as such.

In an action for damages by one who stepped from a train standing upon a trestle, in reliance upon the action of the porter in calling the name of an intermediate station just before the train stopped, it is said: "A passenger is not required to remain upon a train from the starting point to the point of destination, and permitted to alight at an intermediate station only for some purpose connected with his journey. Getting off at intermediate stations from motives of either business or curiosity has been held not to deprive one of his character as a passenger, or of his right to precautions for his safety as such. . . . We conceive the correct rule to be that he remains a passenger on getting off at intermediate stations so long as his object in doing so is not inconsistent with the character of passenger." Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Overfield, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 440, 47 S. W. 684, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 102.

Thus, it is held in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Glossup, 88 Ark. 226, 114 S. W. 247, that where an intermediate station is 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

called and the train stops upon a trestle, one who steps off intending to go forward to the next coach to get a seat is still a passenger.

And a passenger who alights from his train at a water tank, upon the conductor's representation that it is a certain station and that he will have time for lunch, does not lose his character as passenger. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Price, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 210, 106 S. W. 700.

b. Duty and liability of carrier.

Where a conductor represents that a water tank is a certain station, and tells a passenger that he will have time to get lunch, it is his duty, in the exercise of care for the passenger's safety, to delay the train for the passenger's return in accordance with his representation. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Price, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 210, 106 S. W. 700.

And it is held in Watters v. Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. 239 Pa. 492, 86 Atl. 1021, that where a passenger falls through a trestle at a water tank in attempting to alight from his train, temporarily at a stop, following the announcement of an intermediate station by a trainman, he is entitled to recover for a breach of the protection due him as a passenger.

And in Foley v. Detroit & M. R. Co. — Mich. —, 146 N. W. 186, where a passenger who had left his train at an intermediate station under the false impression that it was his destination attempted to board it again, it was held that the railroad company owed him the same duty which it owed to any passenger who left the train temporarily at an intermediate station.

c. Contributory negligence of passenger.

A passenger who leaves his train at an intermediate station, believing it to be his destination, is under the obligation of using the same care for his own safety in boarding the train as any other passenger who leaves his train temporarily at an intermediate station. Foley v. Detroit & M. R. Co. — Mich. —, 146 N. W. 186.

It cannot be said as a matter of law that a passenger who alights and goes in search of food at a water tank upon the representation of the conductor that it is a certain station, and that he will have time to do so, is negligent in attempting to board his train as it moves off without warning and without waiting the length of time represented. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Price, supra.

question was asked him, "You weren't paying any attention to anything that was on the ground?" (Evidently meaning the platform, as he was being interrogated about going on the platform.) He answered, "I did not look to see what was there."

The answer to special question No. 28, by the jury, indicates that appellee did not look, and did not see the mail sack on the platform. If he did not, he was guilty of contributory negligence. It was his duty to take all reasonable precautions to avoid any obstructions that might be upon the platform. It is a matter of common knowledge that baggage trucks, mail sacks, and sometimes other obstacles are necessarily for a time upon depot platforms, and it is the duty of the passenger having to pass thereupon to use his senses, especially his sense of sight, to prevent contact therewith, and to save himself from injury. The special finding of the jury, in effect, finds the appellee guilty of contributory negligence, and such special finding controls the general verdict, which should have been in favor of the appellant.

The judgment is reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to render judgment for the defendant.

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Monroe County sustaining a demurrer to and dismissing the petition in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have resulted from defendant's breach of a parol contract of a lease of land for one year. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Allen Sandidge, Sherman Spear, and Porter & Sandidge for appellants.

Messrs. Baird & Richardson for appellee.

Clay, C., filed the following opinion:

Plaintiffs, W. H. Boone and J. T. Coe, brought this action against defendant, J. F. Coe, to recover certain damages, alleged to have resulted from defendant's breach of a parol contract of lease for one year to commence at a future date. It appears from the petition that the defendant was the owner of a large and valuable farm in Ford county, Texas. Plaintiffs were farmers, and were living with their families in Monroe county, Kentucky. In the fall of 1909 defendant made a verbal contract with plaintiffs, whereby he rented to them his farm in Texas for a period of twelve months, to commence from the date of plaintiffs' arrival at defendant's farm. Defendant agreed that if plaintiffs would leave their said homes and businesses in Kentucky, and with their families, horses, and wagons, move to defendant's farm in Texas, and take charge of, manage, and cultivate same in wheat, corn, and cotton for the twelve months next following plaintiffs' arrival at said farm, the defendant would have a dwelling completed 1018, and Hinkly v. Freick, — N. J. —, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 90 Atl. 1108, involving the question as to the governing law relating to the admissibility of parol evidence of a contemporaneous transaction as affecting a written contract.

The difficulty not infrequently encountered in determining the value of precedents on questions in relation to conflict of laws, arising from the coincidence of the situs of different elements of the contract, is espe-

on said farm and ready for occupancy upon their arrival which dwelling plaintiffs would occupy as a residence during the period of said tenancy. Defendant also agreed that he would furnish necessary material at a convenient place on said farm out of which to erect a good and commodious stock and grain barn, to be used by plaintiffs. The petition further alleges that plaintiffs were to cultivate certain portions of the farm, and were to receive certain portions of the crops raised, and that plaintiffs, in conformity with their said agreement, did move from Kentucky to the farm in Texas, and carried with them their families, wagons, horses, and camping outfit, and in going to Texas they traveled for a period of fifty-five days. It is also charged that defendant broke his contract in that he failed to have ready and completed on the farm a dwelling house in which plaintiffs and their families could move, and also failed to furnish the necessary material for the erection of a suitable barn; that on December 6th defendant refused to permit plaintiffs to occupy the house and premises, and failed and refused to permit them to cultivate the land or any part thereof; that on the — day of December, 1909, they started for their home in Kentucky, and arrived there after traveling for a period of four days. It is charged that plaintiffs spent in going to Texas, in cash, the sum of $150; that the loss of time to plaintiffs and their teams in making the trip to Texcially troublesome as regards the particular question now under consideration. For example, a contract, though made in another state, may relate to real property situated in the state in which the action is brought, and if the law of the latter state is applied, it is not always clear whether the decision was upon the ground that the lex fori, as such, or the lex rei sitæ, as such, governs. Even if the court employs the phrase lex fori or the phrase lex rei sitæ to describe the governing law, the coincidence nevertheless somewhat impairs the value of the decision as a precedent for the purposes of another case involving an action in one state on a contract in relation to land in another.

As between law of forum and substantive law.

It will be observed that, though the land to which the contract involved in BOONE v. COE related was in Texas, the court applied the Kentucky statute of frauds, providing that "no action shall be brought" on a parol contract for the sale or leasing of real estate, upon the ground that the statute relates to the remedy or mode of procedure. From the citation of Kleeman v. Collins, 9 Bush, 460, in support of its decision, it is to be inferred that the court recognizes the distinction originally made in Leroux v. Brown, 12 C. B. 801, 22 L. J. C. P. N. S. 1, 16 Jur. 1021, 1 Week. Rep. 22, discussed in the earlier notes, based upon the difference in phraseology between the 4th and 17th sections of the original statute of frauds, and the statutes modeled thereon, in describing the consequences of the failure to reduce the contract to writing. The earlier notes show the reasoning upon which the distinction rests, and the extent to which it has been adopted or repudiated in cases dealing with conflict of laws.

The distinction was also recognized in Exchange Bank v. McMillan, 76 S. C. 561, 57 S. E. 630, holding that the South Carolina statute providing that "no action shall 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

be maintained" to charge one upon a ratification, not in writing, of a promise made during infancy, governed in an action in that state upon a contract made in another state. The court suggested that even if the mode of enforcing a contract were to be regarded as part of its obligation, comity must yield to the express provision of the statute. As to the latter ground, see note in 64 L.R.A. page 120.

In Daniels v. Rogers, 108 App. Div. 333, 96 N. Y. Supp. 642, it was held that a provision in the Texas statute that "no action shall be brought in any of the courts . . . upon any contract for the sale of real estate, unless in writing," did not render a parol contract void, and the inhibition referred simply to the courts of Texas, and did not preclude a suit in New York for the specific performance of a contract for the purchase of land in Texas. It does not appear where the contract was made.

In Reilly v. Steinhart, 161 App. Div. 242, 146 N. Y. Supp. 534, an action in New York on a contract or option made in Cuba with reference to real and personal property there situated, failure to "protocolize" the contract as required by the law of Cuba was held fatal to the action, upon the ground that, both as a question of law, and according to the testimony of an expert witness, the failure to protocolize went not merely to the evidence of the contract, but to its sufficiency, and therefore was substantive, and not remedial merely.

In Marvel v. Marvel, 70 Neb. 498, 113 Am. St. Rep. 792, 97 N. W. 640, a suit in Nebraska to establish a parol trust in land in Illinois, the agreement or transaction relied on having been made in Illinois, the Nebraska statute of frauds, requiring an express trust to be evidenced by writing, was applied, with the result of defeating the action, upon the ground that the statute does not strike at the contract or transaction itself, but at the manner and method of proving it, and that the proof must conform to the law of the state where the

as was reasonably worth $8 a day for a period of fifty-five days, or the sum of $440; that the loss of time to them and their teams during the period they remained in Texas was $8 a day for twenty-two days, or $176; that they paid out in actual cash for transportation for themselves, families, and teams from Texas to Kentucky the sum of $211.80; that the loss of time to them and their teams in making the last-named trip was reasonably worth the sum of $100; that in abandoning and giving up their homes and businesses in Kentucky, they had been damaged in the sum of $150, making a total damage of $1,387.80, for which judgment was asked. Defendant's demurrer to the petition was sustained and the petition dismissed. Plaintiffs appeal.

Under the rule in force in this state, the statute of frauds relates to the remedy or mode of procedure, and not to the validity of the contract. Though the land is located in Texas, the parol contract of lease was made here, and here it is sought to enforce it. If unenforceable under our statute, it cannot be enforced here. Kleeman v. Collins, 9 Bush, 460. If the statute requires the contract to be in writing, and the petition does not allege it to be in writing, defense may be presented by demurrer. Bull v. McCrea, 8 B. Mon. 423; Smith v. Fah, 15 B. Mon. 446; Smith v. Theobald, 80 Ky. 141, 5 S. W. 304.

The statute of frauds (§ 470, subsecs.

action is tried. The court cited Leroux v. Brown, and apparently approved the distinction there made between the substantive and remedial form of the different provisions. But even if the distinction based upon differences in phraseology between the 4th and 17th sections of the original statute were to be repudiated, and both provisions held to be substantive, and not remedial, it would seem that a provision not cast in the form of either of those sections, but in the form that the contract or trust must be "evidenced" in writing, might still be regarded as remedial, and so applicable to foreign transactions.

In C. W. Rantoul Co. v. Claremont Paper Co. 116 C. C. A. 125, 196 Fed. 305, an action commenced in the Federal court for the district of New Hampshire, the court said that as to the statute of frauds a number of decisions of the courts of New Hampshire had been cited; and there was no doubt, at least with reference to the sale of goods, that any question arising under the statute of frauds, as well as any question arising under the general statute of limitations, is to be settled by the law of the forum. The contract in this case, however, was held to be one for the manufacture of goods, and not of sale, and therefore not within statute. The opinion does not cite the New Hampshire cases referred to, nor show the form of the New Hampshire statute of frauds in relation to the sale of goods. It may be noted, however, that contracts for the sale of goods were covered by the 17th section of the original statute of fraud, which, unlike the 4th section, was substantive and not remedial in form; and therefore, according to the distinction referred to, would not apply to a foreign contract. However, as shown in the earlier notes, some cases take the view that the statute of frauds whatever its form is remedial, and not substantive.

And so, in Buhl v. Stephens, 84 Fed. 922, holding the statute of frauds of the forum as to contracts not to be performed within a year applicable to a contract to be performed in another state, although valid by the law of that state, the court apparently rejected the distinction made in Leroux v. Brown, based on differences of phraseology between the 4th and 17th sections of the original statute of frauds, and took the view that both sections are remedial, and not substantive. The court cited with approval the case of Heaton v. Eldridge, 50 Ohio St. 87, 36 L.R.A. 817, 60 Am. St. Rep. 737, 46 N. E. 638 (set out at page 119 of the note in 64 L.R.A.). Assuming that the local statute of frauds with reference to contracts not to be performed within a year followed the form of the 4th section of the original statute, providing that "no action shall be brought," the actual result in the Buhl Case was not different from what it would have been if the distinction had been recognized. It will be noted that the same observation applies to the Heaton Case.

(It may be observed that some courts of high authority, in cases not involving conflict of laws, have repudiated the distinction based upon differences in phraseology between the 4th and 17th sections, and have in effect characterized both sections as remedial rather than substantive. Thus, Lord Blackburn in Maddison v. Alderson, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 488, a case not involving conflict of laws, said: "I think it is now finally settled that the true construction of the statute of frauds, both the 4th and 17th sections, is not to render the contracts within them void, still less, illegal, but is to render the kind of evidence required indispensable, when it is sought to enforce the contract." And this language is quoted with approval in Maloughney v. Crowe, 26 Ont. L. Rep. 579, also a case not involving any question as to conflict of laws.)

In Fruit Dispatch Co. v. Gilinsky, 84 Neb. 821, 122 N. W. 45, an action in Nebraska for the purchase price of a carload of bananas, it was stated in the fourth syllabus by the court, that "where the Iowa statute of frauds is pleaded in Nebraska to defeat an Iowa contract, the law of that state controls as to such defense." Upon a rehearing (85 Neb. 475, 123 N. W. 1018) the decision was placed upon the ground that the case was tried below on the theory

6 and 7, Kentucky Statutes) provides as follows: "No action shall be brought to charge any person: 6. Upon any contract for the sale of real estate, or any lease thereof, for longer term than one year; nor 7. Upon any agreement which is not to be performed within one year from the making thereof, unless the promise, contract, agreement, representation, assurance, or ratification, or some memorandum or note thereof, be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by his authorized agent; but the consideration need not be expressed in the writing; it may be proved when necessary, or disproved by parol or other evidence." A parol lease of land for one year, to commence at a future date, is within the statute. Greenwood v. Strother, 91 Ky. 482, 16 S. W. 138.

The question sharply presented is: May plaintiffs recover for expenses incurred and time lost on the faith of a contract that is unenforceable under the statute of frauds?

In the case of Hurley v. Woodsides, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1073, 54 S. W. 8, Woodsides made a parol lease with Hurley for 25 acres of timber land for a period of five years. Under the contract Hurley was to clear 5 acres of the land in the winter of 1897 and 1898, 10 acres in the winter of 1898 and 1899, and 10 acres in the winter of 1899 and 1900, and was to have free use of the land so cleared up for three years thereafter. Woodsides agreed to erect a that the transaction was controlled by the law of Iowa, and that nowhere in the record was there evidence that the defendant presented the Nebraska statute of frauds as a defense. The court added that the Nebraska statute of frauds was immaterial in view of the defendant's conduct in the trial court; that whether the Iowa statute should control, had defendant below insisted upon the protection of the Nebraska statute, was immaterial and would not be determined. It will be noted, however, that, assuming that the Nebraska and Iowa statutes in relation to the sale of goods follow the form of the 17th section of the original statute, the result in this case would follow either from the adoption of the distinction made in Leroux v. Brown, supra, or from the repudiation of that distinction and the adoption of the view that the statute, regardless of the form in which it is expressed, is in effect substantive, and not remedial.

The same observation applies to Brockman Commission Co. v. Kilbourne, 111 Mo. App. 542, 86 S. W. 275, holding that the Missouri statute of frauds is not applicable to a contract in Illinois for the sale of butter to be delivered in that state, and to Jones v. National Cotton Oil Co. 31 Tex. Civ. App. 420, 72 S. W. 248, in which the court applied the law of Arkansas, where the contract for the sale of goods was made and to be performed, declaring that no contract for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise for the price of $30 or upward "shall be binding" unless in writing, notwithstanding that the contract would have been valid if made in Texas.

Upon the assumption that, in the three cases just cited, the statute of the forum in relation to sales of goods follows the form of the 17th section of the original statute, i. e., is substantive in form, the only theory upon which the lex fori could have been applied would have been that (suggested in the Buhl Case) which not only repudiates the distinction based upon the difference between the 4th and 17th sections, but adopts the theory that both provisions, regardless of form, are essentially remedial, and not substantive; or else the theory that the enforcement of the contract would be contrary to the public policy of the forum. The latter ground is one rarely taken with regard to the statute of frauds; but see Emery v. Burbank, 163 Mass. 326, 28 L.R.A. 57, 47 Am. St. Rep. 456, 39 N. E. 1026 (discussed in note in 64 L.R.A. at page 120).

As between law of place where contract is made and that of place where it is performable.

Supplementing note in 64 L.R.A. 122.

As shown in the note just referred to, the majority of the cases in which it has been held or assumed that the lex fori as such did not control have held that the statute of the state where the contract was made, rather than that of the place where it was to be performed, governs in case of a conflict between the two in relation to matters comprehended by the statute of frauds.

In the subsequent case of D. Canale & Co. v. Pauly, 155 Wis. 541, 145 N. W. 372, the majority of the court took the position that the law of Tennessee, where the contract for the sale of goods was made, rather than the law of Wisconsin, where the goods were to be delivered, controlled, and accordingly held that a contract made in Tennessee for the sale of goods to be delivered in Wisconsin was governed by the law of Tennessee, by which it was valid, rather than by the law of Wisconsin, by which it would have been invalid because not in writing. Both majority and dissenting opinions seem to have regarded the intention of the parties as the ultimate criterion. The majority opinion held that the presumption that the parties intended to contract with reference to the law of the place of performance was overcome in this instance by other circumstances, including the circumstance that the contract was valid by the law of the place where made, but invalid by the law of the place of performance. The court below held that the law of Wisconsin governed, and it is stated dwelling house, smoke house, kitchen, and stable on the leased premises for Hurley's occupancy, and was to furnish a team of oxen with which to break up the land as soon as it was cleared. He was also to remove the logs lying upon the land at the time of the lease, and to erect a tobacco barn for Hurley's use. Moreover, it was a part of the agreement that the contract was to be put in writing. Relying upon Woodside's promise to do so, Hurley moved his personal effects into an old house located upon the land, which he was to occupy until the new house was finished, and gave up the premises previously occupied by him. After such removal Woodside denied that he had agreed to furnish the cattle to break up the land or to remove the logs or to erect a tobacco barn, and refused to sign a contract embracing these stipulations. This refusal necessitated Hurley's abandonment of the leased premises. Alleging that as a result of Woodside's failure to carry out the contract, he had been damaged in the sum of $100, the cost of removing his effects, $50 for time lost in hunting up another place, $200 in prospective profits which he would have realized by reason of his bargain, and $300 by reason of having been induced to surrender the premises formerly occupied by him, Hurley brought suit against Woodside to recover the aforesaid item of damages, aggregating the sum of $650. The trial court sustained a demurrer to the petition, and the petition was dismissed. On in the majority opinion that, had the trial judge determined the intention as a matter of fact from an evidentiary standpoint, instead of disposing of the case upon the ground that, since the place of performance was Wisconsin, as matter of law the contract was a Wisconsin contract, his decision might not have been disturbed; but that, looking at the matter without the aid of an initial finding, the evidentiary circumstances, inconsistent with the presumption arising from the agreed place of performance, clearly overcame the latter; and it was so held notwithstanding the finding that the parties contemplated that the oral agreement would be reduced to writing.

While the scope of the present note precludes a discussion of the point, it may be doubted whether the question as to the governing law ought to have been referred to the intention of the parties, since the statute of frauds, if it does not relate to the remedy or procedure,—and the court seems to have assumed that the lex fori as such did not govern,—relates to the formal validity of the contract; and, as elsewhere pointed out, the better view seems to be that matters that pertain to the preliminary question whether the parties have been brought into contractual relations, including the question of the capacity of the parties and the formal validity of the contract, do not fall within the general principle which, as to many matters, accepts the intention of the parties as the criterion of the governing law. See in this connection, discussion in the note to Mayer v. Roche, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 764, on "Conflict of laws as to capacity of married woman to contract." See also Wharton, Conf. L. 3d ed. §§ 427e, 427k.

In Garnes v. Frazier, — Ky. —, 118 S. E. 998, an action based on a contract for services not to be performed within a year, the court said that the fact that the contract was made in West Virginia could not prevent the application of the Kentucky statute of frauds, as it was admitted that the contract was to be performed in Kentucky. The court added that if it were not true that the laws of Kentucky would govern the rights of the parties under the 61 L.R.A.(N.S.) contract, it is not sufficiently alleged in the petition that the contract is not within the statute of frauds. The court does not suggest that the law of Kentucky should be applied as the lex fori; but it would seem, in view of the other Kentucky cases, that the decision might have been put upon that ground, assuming that the Kentucky statute in relation to contracts not to be performed within a year follows the form of the 4th section and declares that "no action shall be brought."

As between law of place where contract is made and that of place where property is situated.

It should be noted that the question as to the governing law as between the law of the place where the contract is made as such, and that of the place where the property is situated as such, presupposes or assumes that the law of the forum as such does not control; the question as between the lex fori and the lex rei sitæ being treated under the heading, "As between the law of forum and substantive law." As stated at page 123 of the note in 64 L.R.A., most of the cases cited in that and the earlier note, in which there was an actual conflict between the lex loci contractus and the lex rei sitæ have held, without reference to the particular question involved or to the character of the action, that a contract relating to real property is governed by the statute of frauds of the place where the property is situated, rather than by the statute of frauds of the place where the contract is made (assuming, of course, that the lex fori does not control).

So, in the subsequent case of Meylink v. Rhea, 123 Iowa, 310, 98 N. W. 779, it was held that a contract for the conveyance of real property is governed by the lex rei sitæ, rather than by the law of the place where the contract was made. In this case the suit was for specific performance of a contract made in South Dakota for the conveyance of land in Iowa. While the court said that the South Dakota statute strikes at the contract itself, and renders it void, and that under the law of Iowa the quesappeal here the judgment was affirmed. After setting out the statute of frauds, the court said: "Under this provision of the statute the alleged verbal contract was not binding or enforceable upon the parties thereto, for the reason that it was a contract for the lease of real estate for a longer term than one year, and was an agreement which was not to be performed within one year from the making thereof; and, as the contract itself was not enforceable between the parties, no action for damages for refusing to execute it or to reduce it to writing can be maintained, as 'it would leave but little, if anything, of the statute of frauds, to hold that a party might be mulcted in damages for refusing to execute in writing a verbal agreement which, unless in writing, is invalid under the statute of frauds.' Chase v. Fitz, 132 Mass. 361; Lawrence v. Chase, 54 Me. 196."

In the case of Brumley v. Broyles, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 830, 58 S. W. 984, it was held that a tenant with a parol agreement for a lease for another year, which was within the statute of frauds, could not recover as damages for breach of the contract the loss sustained by him in making preparations for raising a crop.

In the case of King v. Cheatham, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 1176, 104 S. W. 751, King sued upon a writing signed by himself alone, in which he bound himself to buy from Cheatham certain trees standing on her land, to be severed in the future. It appears that he cut some 263 trees from the land before he was ousted. He asked damages for his labor and profit. There was a judgment below for defendant. On appeal the judgment was affirmed. In discussing the validity of the contract and the right of plaintiff to recover damages thereon, the court said: "The statute merely withholds a right of action upon them as against the party who has not signed them. The prohibition of the statute must reach the spirit of its purpose. As a suit to recover damages for the breach of such a contract would be an indirect enforcement, such actions are held to be within the inhibition of the statute. McC Campbell v. McC Campbell, 5 Litt. (Ky.) 92, 15 Am. Dec. 48; Brumley v. Broyles, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 830, 58 S. W. 984. Nor does part performance of the party signing affect the matter. Hunter v. Simrall, 5 Litt. (Ky.) 62; Hambell v. Hamilton, 3 Dana, 501; Montague v. Garrett, 3 Bush, 297; Mannen v. Bradberry, 81 Ky. 153; Graves County Water Co. v. Ligon, 112 Ky. 775, 66 S. W. 725. Although a recovery of purchase money paid on such contract may be recovered if the party not bound refused to execute it, that is not in any sense an action upon the contract, but is for money had and received tion is one of evidence, and the statute does not apply where, as in the case at bar, the purchase money or some portion thereof has been received by the vendor, yet the decision is expressly referred to the rule that the validity of transfers of real estate is determined by the lex rei sitæ, and is not upon the ground that the lex fori as such governs, although in this case the lex rei sitæ and lex fori were, of course, coincident.

In Boone v. Cox, the result is not attributable to the predominance of the lex loci contractus over the lex rei sitæ, but to the view that the local statute relates to the remedy or procedure.

As pointed out in the note in 64 L.R.A. 124, there is a serious question whether the general rule that contracts relating to real property are governed by the lex rei sitæ is applicable to the exclusion of the lex loci contractus and the lex loci solutionis in case of executory contracts in relation to real property or contracts that only collaterally relate to real property. See generally as to this question, Wharton, Confli. L. 3d ed. § 276d.

In Callaway v. Prettyman, 218 Pa. 293, 67 Atl. 418, it was held that the New Jersey statute requiring contracts of employment of brokers for the sale of real estate to be in writing did not apply to a contract made in Pennsylvania with reference to land in New Jersey, upon the ground 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that the matter related to the formalities of the contract, and was governed by the lex loci contractus.

So, in the syllabus by the court in Horton v. Morton & Co. 13 Ga. App. 469, 79 S. E. 371, it is stated that the contract to pay commissions for the sale of real estate, upon which the suit was brought, was made and was to be performed within the state of Georgia; hence, its validity, form, and effect were to be controlled by the law of Georgia. It does not appear where the real estate to which the contract related was situated, though it would seem that unless it were situated in another state, there would have been no question as to conflict of laws.

As previously shown, the decision in Exchange Bank v. McMillan, 76 S. C. 561, 57 S. E. 630, applying the law of South Carolina to a contract made in Georgia relating to land in South Carolina, was not attributable to the predominance of the lex rei sitæ over the lex loci contractus.

In Howell v. North, 93 Neb. 505, 140 N. W. 779, the law of Colorado by which a contract for the payment of commissions to a broker for the sale of land in that state was valid, although the amount of the commissions was not named in the writing, was applied upon the ground that the land was situated in Colorado and the contract was to be performed in that state.

for which the consideration has failed, and for which the law implies a promise to repay. But nothing was paid by appellant as consideration on this contract."

The same doctrine is applied in the case of Greenwood v. Strother, supra. Indeed, it is the general rule that damages cannot be recovered for violation of a contract within the statute of frauds. Alabama Mineral Land Co. v. Jackson, 121 Ala. 172, 77 Am. St. Rep. 46, 25 So. 709; Dunphy v. Ryan, 116 U. S. 497, 29 L. ed. 703, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 486; Franklin v. Matoa Gold Min. Co. 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 381, 86 C. C. A. 145, 158 Fed. 941, 14 Ann. Cas. 302.

To this general rule there are certain well-recognized exceptions. Thus, in Speers v. Sewell, 4 Bush, 239; Myles v. Myles, 6 Bush, 237; Usher v. Flood, 83 Ky. 552; Thomas v. Feese, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 206, 51 S. W. 150; Story v. Story, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1731, 61 S. W. 279; Doty v. Doty, 118 Ky. 204, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 713, 80 S. W. 803, 4 Ann. Cas. 1064, and in a number of other cases, it has been held that, where services have been rendered during the life of another, on the promise that the person rendering the service should receive at the death of the person served a legacy, and the contract so made is within the statute of frauds, a reasonable compensation may be recovered for the services actually rendered. It has also been held that the vendee of land under a parol contract is entitled to recover any portion of the purchase money he may have paid, and is also entitled to compensation for improvements. Fox v. Longly, 1 A. K. Marsh. 388; McCracken v. Sanders, 4 Bibb, 511; Grimes v. Shrieve, 6 T. B. Mon. 557; Dean v. Cassidy, 88 Ky. 572, 11 S. W. 601.

And under a contract for personal services within the statute, an action may be maintained on a quantum meruit. Kleeman v. Collins, 9 Bush, 460; Myers v. Korb, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 163, 50 S. W. 1108. The doctrine of these cases proceeds upon the theory that the defendant has actually received some benefits from the acts of part performance, and the law therefore implies a promise to pay. In 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 836, the rule is thus stated: "Although part performance by one of the parties to a contract within the statute of frauds will not, at law, entitle such party to recover upon the contract itself, he may nevertheless recover for money paid by him, or property delivered, or services rendered, in accordance with and upon the faith of the contract. The law will raise an implied promise on the part of the other party to pay for what has been done in the way of part performance. But this right of recovery is not absolute. The plaintiff is entitled to compensation only under such circumstances as would warrant a recovery in case there was no express contract; and hence it must appear that the defendant has actually received, or will receive, some benefit from the acts of part performance. It is immaterial that the plaintiff may have suffered a loss because he is unable to enforce his contract."

In Browne on Statute of Frauds, § 118a, the rule is announced in the following language: "The rule that where one person pays money or performs services for another upon a contract void under the statute of frauds, he may recover the money upon a count for money paid, or recover for the services upon a quantum meruit, applies only to cases where the defendant has received and holds the money paid or the benefit of the services rendered. It does not apply to cases of money paid by the plaintiff to a third person in execution of a verbal contract between the plaintiff and defendant, such as by the statute of frauds must be in writing."

The foregoing rule is supported by the following cases: Kimmins v. Oldham, 27 W. Va. 265; Emery v. Smith, 46 N. H. 151; Marcy v. Marcy, 9 Allen, 8; Pierce v. Paine, 28 Vt. 34; Hambell v. Hamilton, 3 Dana, 501; Montague v. Garnett, 3 Bush, 297; Mannen v. Bradberry, 81 Ky. 153.

In the case under consideration the plaintiffs merely sustained a loss. Defendant received no benefit. Had he received a benefit, the law would imply an obligation to pay therefor. Having received no benefit, no obligation to pay is implied. The statute says that the contract of defendant made with plaintiffs is unenforceable. Defendant therefore had the legal right to decline to carry it out. To require him to pay plaintiffs for losses and expenses incurred on the faith of the contract, without any benefit accruing to him, would, in effect, uphold a contract upon which the statute expressly declares no action shall be brought. The statute was enacted for the purpose of preventing frauds and perjuries. That it is a valuable statute is shown by the fact that similar statutes are in force in practically all, if not all, of the states of the Union. Being a valuable statute, the purpose of the lawmakers in its enactment should not be defeated by permitting recoveries in cases to which its provisions were intended to apply.

The contrary rule was announced by this court in the case of McDaniel v. Hutcherson, 136 Ky. 412, 124 S. W. 384. There the plaintiff lived in the state of Illinois. The defendant owned a farm in Mercer county, Kentucky. The defendant agreed with plaintiff that if plaintiff and his family would come to Kentucky and live with defendant, the defendant would furnish the plaintiff a home during defendant's life, and upon his death would give plaintiff his farm. It was held that, although the contract was within the statute of frauds, plaintiff could recover his reasonable expenses in moving to Kentucky, and reasonable compensation for loss sustained in giving up his business elsewhere. Upon reconsideration of the question involved, we conclude that the doctrine announced in that case is not in accord with the weight of authority, and should be no longer adhered to. It is therefore overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

WILL HEMPHILL, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF TEXAS.

(— Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 165 S. W. 462.)

Trial — instruction — weight of evidence.

1. An instruction that there is evidence that prosecutrix failed to recognize accused on the night of an alleged offense. and, if she stated next morning on seeing him that he was the person who committed the crime, this cannot be considered as evidence of guilt, but might be considered in determining the weight to be given to the testimony of prosecutrix, is not erroneous as being on the weight of the evidence.

Appeal — argument to jury — justification of conviction of innocent persons.

2. A statement by the prosecuting attorney in a rape case, that unless the jury assessed the death penalty, the people would take the law into their own hands in the future; that "if you turn the defendant loose, you cannot blame the people for taking the law into their own hands," and that it would be much worse than convicting an innocent man, to turn this defendant loose and then in a week or two for him to rape one of your wives, sisters, or daughters, is reversible error.

On Motion for Rehearing.

Same — attacking bystander's bill of exceptions.

3. A bill of exceptions attested by bystanders, as provided by statute, upon the refusal of the judge to do so because he does not remember the facts set out, which is not contested in the trial court, cannot be contested upon affidavit in support of a motion for rehearing in the appellate court.

Note. — Argument by prosecuting attorney that an acquittal would encourage lynch law as ground for reversal.

For a general discussion as to reversal of conviction because of the unfair or irrelevant argument or statement of facts by a prosecuting attorney, see People v. Fielding, 46 L.R.A. 641, and note thereto.

Reference by counsel for the state in a criminal prosecution to the probability of an acquittal encouraging lynch law is universally condemned by the courts, and, when it is permitted to go unrebuked by the trial court, is generally regarded as ground for reversal, as was the case in HEMPHILL v. STATE. In the few cases where the appellate court merely condemned the use of such argument without reversing the judgment, they apparently regarded the remarks as not being actually prejudicial to defendant. In some cases the courts have regarded such argument as so highly prejudicial as to require reversal though the remarks were promptly condemned and the jury instructed to disregard them.

In State v. Hess, 240 Mo. 147, 144 S. W. 489, the court said: "To hold up before a jury the horrors of mob law is not a proper method of securing verdicts of conviction. Juries should convict on evidence that crimes have been committed, and not through a fear that all law will be set aside and a reign of anarchy substituted." 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In State v. Busse, 127 Iowa, 318, 100 N. W. 536, where counsel for the state told of a case in another state where a member of the jury which acquitted defendant afterward took part in lynching him, the court said: "We do not think counsel intended to impress upon the jurors the possibility of a lynching in case they should acquit, but enough was said to suggest to them that an acquittal might create such a feeling of condemnation in the public mind as to produce a like result. What its influence upon the jury might have been we cannot say, but it needs no argument or citation of authority to show that jurors should not consider such matters, or that the prosecution should never, directly or indirectly, suggest the thought to them; and this is especially true in cases calculated to arouse public excitement and indignation. While we would not consider it necessary to reverse this case on account thereof, we see no justification or excuse for the statement, and cannot refrain from this criticism of it."

In Ferguson v. State, 49 Ind. 33, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 582, it was held that remarks of the prosecuting attorney that murders were frequent in the community, that vigilance committees and mobs had formed because of the lax administration of the laws, and that the jury should make an example of defendant, were improper, and where the court, upon objection being made, in-

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Guadalupe County convicting him of rape. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. E. Short for appellant.

Messrs. Lester Holt, E. T. Simmang, and C. E. Lane, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Davidson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This negro was convicted and given the death penalty for rape on a woman whose age is shown by the testimony to be fifty-six years.

stead of rebuking the counsel and telling him to keep his argument within the facts and the evidence, overruled the objection and said within the hearing of the jury that such matters were proper to be commented upon, the judgment of conviction was reversed.

In State v. Jackson, 95 Mo. 623, 8 S. W. 749, where the prosecuting attorney in his closing argument said, "Escape of criminals at the hands of juries brings on lynch law," a majority of the court, after discussing cases which were reversed because the prosecuting attorney urged conviction on the ground that, if the jury did err that way, the appellate court would correct the error, said: "The only difference between the case referred to and the one at bar is that in the former an attempt was made to induce the jury to find a verdict of guilty upon the ground that, if they committed any error, it would be corrected by an appellate court, while here a similar attempt was made to induce a verdict of guilty by an intimation, amounting almost to a covert threat, that, if they failed to find a verdict of guilty, their error would be corrected by an outside tribunal acting independently of and in defiance of all law. Language fails to express in terms sufficiently strong the condemnation which should always promptly attend the utterance of such unworthy words when a human being is on trial for his life before a tribunal organized for the purpose, and for the sole purpose, of administering the law," and held that the remark concerning lynch law was ground for reversal.

In Thompson v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 472, 26 S. W. 987, it was held that a remark of counsel assisting the prosecution, that "the friends of the prosecutrix had not in their anger taken the law in their own hands and lynched or applied the torch to defendant, therefore the life of this demon of human flesh on trial should pay the penalty," was ground for reversal.

In Fredrickson v. State, 44 Tex. Crim. Rep. 288, 70 S. W. 754, a prosecution for rape, the court reversed a conviction because the prosecuting attorney said to the jury: "There are many communities and counties where this negro would have already been mobbed, but the good people of this community have chosen to let the law 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

After giving an account of her trip leaving her residence in search of a horse that she wanted, supposed to be somewhere around the neighborhood or close by, prosecutrix says she met a negro, and told about his movements; that he passed her a time or two.

We quote her testimony in this connection from the record:

I went up there to the west fence, and I looked around, and then I started back and was picking flowers and looking at the flowers, and all of a sudden the same negro I met on the road was in the pas-take its course, and they expect you to give the defendant the highest penalty," the court saying it was a menace and threat to the jury that should not have been permitted.

In Parker v. State, 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 526, 67 S. W. 121, a conviction for cattle theft was reversed because of the failure of the trial court to direct the jury to disregard the argument of the district attorney in saying: "Gentlemen of the jury, we have what is known as 'mob law' in this country, and in my mind the failure to enforce the law is the cause of mob law. Sometimes jurors acquit a defendant who is guilty, and when the evidence shows he is guilty; and before they get out of the courtyard they say that the reason we have mob law in this country is because the officers fail to enforce the law. And I want to tell you that it is my opinion that it is the failure of the juries to enforce the law and do their duty that causes mob law, and not the officers. The officers in this case have done their duty, and the evidence shows that the defendant is guilty, and if you turn this defendant loose, I don't want you to be going around here telling that the officers have not done their duty, and that is the cause of mob law, when it is you."

In Smith v. State, 44 Tex. Crim. Rep. 137, 100 Am. St. Rep. 849, 68 S. W. 995, a prosecution for statutory rape in which the prosecutor in making his closing speech said: "This is the most horrible crime so far as my long experience at the bar has brought to my attention. I am surprised that this case was ever brought here; and it ought not to have been brought here; that while I do not believe in mob law as a rule, yet in a case like this the law ceased to be a virtue. I will be doing my duty as a citizen and a father if I can induce this jury to hang defendant as high as Haman, and then go to my home and tell my wife what I have done, and hear her remark, 'Well done, thou good and faithful servant; you have performed your duty,'" the court held that it was ground for reversal, though the court had reprimanded him and instructed the jury to disregard the remarks.

ture. I could see him very plain in the face. He was about as far as from here to that second window there from me; and, when I saw the same negro that I had met on the road, I got so scared I turned around. I didn't want to meet him, and I turned around and went to the fence, and when I was at the fence I looked back, and he still was after me, and then I went under the fence, and then I thought, "What shall I do?" and then I thought that I had talked about that horse two times with him, so he might want nothing else only he might want some money out of me for bringing that horse, and I didn't want to show how scared I was, and so I came back and asked him what he wanted, and he didn't say anything. So I offered him a dollar and a half if he brings my horse back. He didn't say anything about that. He didn't say a word to that, and he came to me and grabbed me on my arm, and then he said something what he wanted. I didn't know what it was. I told him, "I don't know what that is," and then he said it again, and then I thought what it was, and I said, "Oh, God! what do you want with an old woman like I am?" Then he caught me on my neck, and I cried out, and then I asked him to let me go, and he said, "No," and when he said, "No," I got so scared and I was so excited that I was half dead, and that is nearly all I can tell you. Then I closed my eyes, and he dragged me in some bushes and some trees.

Q. Just state to the jury what he did then.

A. I don't know. I couldn't tell you very plain, because I was so excited. I was nervous, I don't know what—

Q. You will have to state just exactly what he did.

A. When I felt him I got unconscious.

Q. What do you mean by "feeling." Just tell these gentlemen here.

A. I can't tell that; no, I can't. I could tell it to women, but I can't tell it to men.

Q. After he grabbed hold of you, you say he dragged you a piece from the fence. Now just state to the jury whether or not he threw you down.

A. I don't know. When he caught me on my arm and said, "No," then I lost all control over me. I thought he would first assault me and then he would kill me too. I lost all my nerves and everything. When I looked up again he was gone already. He was going toward the south and had gone a good piece when I opened my eyes. When I regained control over myself, I was lying on my back and my dress was up.

Rep. 5. where, on the trial of a negro for wife murder, the prosecuting attorney said: "Gentlemen of the jury, if you don't hang this negro, we will have such scenes as we are going to have at Lancing," and it was shown that at the time a negro rapist was about to be, and shortly afterward was, burned by a mob at the place mentioned, a near-by town, and that the jury were aware of what was taking place there, the court held that it was ground for reversal, though the court had promptly admonished the attorney and instructed the jury to disregard the statement.

In Turner v. State, 4 Lea, 206, the attorney general in his closing argument said that there was a regular band of thieves in the neighborhood, that defendant was one of them, and that unless the jury would convict the defendant, he would not blame the people for taking the law into their own hands. The court reversed the judgment because of these remarks generally, but it does not appear whether the court would have reversed the case because of the remark in regard to mob law, had it stood alone without the statement in regard to defendant being one of a band of thieves, as to which there had been no evidence introduced. The court did say, however, that the implied threat of mob violence was improper, and should not have been permitted by the court, whether objection was made thereto or not.

court said that remarks of the attorney general that "if the juries don't punish crime, the people will rise up and should rise up and punish it," were very reprehensible, and the court ought to have rebuked him in the presence of the jury; but that they did not think it would justify the granting of a new trial. The court said, however, that the defendant had no ground for complaint against the verdict as it was a merciful one, and the facts warranted a much severer punishment than was imposed.

In Northington v. State, 14 Lea, 424, the court discusses the two preceding cases and says that the principle deducible is that while a suggestion as to what the people might do in case of failure to convict is not reversible, though highly reprehensible, yet a statement of facts in relation to the defendant, affecting the issue and tending to influence the minds of the jury, when not in proof, is sufficient ground for reversal. This statement, however, is dictum as to references to mob violence, no such remarks being involved in the case, and there is but little in the cases referred to upon which to base it.

In State v. Cook, 132 Mo. App. 167, 112 S. W. 710, a prosecution of a negro for carrying concealed weapons, the prosecuting attorney said: "What causes white people to rise in a mob in a community? It's a white jury backing up a burly negro in such offenses as packing a pistol. The experience you all have had is that such

Q. Just state to the jury whether or not he actually had intercourse with you?

A. Yes, he did.

Q. Are you positive of that?

A. Yes, he did. I felt him. It sure went through me, and then I was gone, and after I got up everything was in my clothes. I felt him and it was in my clothes. After I came to myself, I saw him going off south, and then I got up and went to the gate of the pasture where I had come in. I did not give him my consent or permission to do anything like that; and I couldn't get away from him. I was too scared. I was shivering. I couldn't lift my arm or nothing. I couldn't do it. I didn't have the strength to get away.

This is perhaps enough of the testimony in regard to the immediate facts, and in fact it is about the substance in the concrete. This is the language of the alleged outraged woman. Shortly after she says this occurred, she passed one neighbor's house whom she said was not at home, and reached another neighbor's residence and told at that house that she had been assaulted by a negro. There is evidence going to show that appellant was in the neighborhood and could have had the opportunity. For instance, he had gone from his residence up to an uncle's to get a horse; that he went to the residence of this uncle, got his horse, and returned home. The distance between the two places was about 4 miles. Upon his return home, approximately about 3 o'clock, he hitched his horse to a buggy, and he and his wife went to visit her father's, some 8 or 9 miles away. The evidence shows that he reached that place about 4 o'clock, perhaps a little after. Defendant testified in his own behalf that he went to his uncle's after the horse, and returned home, and hitched the horse to a buggy, and he and his wife went to her father's on an invitation that day received through the mail. It was shown by his employer he received the invitation through the mail. The employer testified to that, and defendant, having no horse, went to his uncle's after a horse for the purpose of this visit. One or two witnesses in an indirect, rather indefinite, way, gave evidence tending to show that they saw defendant between his home and the residence of his uncle; but, as that is not a disputed point, it is unnecessary to mention this testimony. Of course, he traveled the distance from his house to his uncle's and back in getting the horse, and to this he himself testifies, and in fact dives as this defendant was running causes the mobs." The court characterized the remark as very objectionable and prejudicial, but refused to reverse conviction because, while defendant's counsel objected to the remark, the record failed to show what ruling, if any, the court made upon it.

In State v. Petit, 119 La. 1013, 44 So. 848, where counsel for a negro accused of assault with intent to rape a white woman argued that defendant was not guilty because he had not been lynched, and the state's attorney in reply pointed out that, inasmuch as there was no longer negro domination, there was no necessity for lynching, the court said: "While this discussion of matters outside of the record was highly improper, and should have been, in its inception, repressed by the trial judge, we fail to perceive in the remarks of the district attorney any appeal to racial prejudice for the purpose of influencing the jury. We may add that this inference is re-enforced by the fact that the verdict acquitted the accused of the crime of criminal assault as charged in the indictment."

In State v. Mircovich, 35 Nev. 485, 130 Pac. 765, it was held that it was not error for the district attorney to quote and comment upon the testimony of a witness, implying that the witness thought accused should have been lynched, which testimony was brought out by defendant's attorney on cross-examination apparently to show the animosity of the witness. The court 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

said, however, that if such testimony had been introduced by the state and commented upon by the district attorney, the situation would have been different.

Sanders v. People, 124 Ill. 218, 16 N. E. 81, which has been cited as supporting the proposition that a reference to the possibility of mob violence as the result of acquittal, while improper, is not reversible error, was a prosecution for perjury, and the reference was to the destruction of a courthouse in another state a number of years previously as illustrating the effect of public indignation when aroused by the unjust escape of criminals through perjured evidence, so it is apparent that the appeal to the jury was as to the necessity for a fearless enforcement of the law generally, and that the reference to mob violence could not possibly be construed into a suggestion that an acquittal of the prisoner on trial was liable to arouse such violence.

In Jackson v. State, 136 Ala. 22, 34 So. 188, which was a trial of a negro for participating with a mob in hanging a negro murderer, a statement by the state's attorney that "mob law must be stopped. If a crowd of negroes take a negro out and hang him, and if the jury acquit the defendant where they have evidence to convict him, as they have in this case, then, the first thing you know, they will be taking a white man out and hanging him," was held not to exceed the bounds of legitimate argument.

there is no question about that matter. He denies the whole transaction testified by the prosecutrix. He says he did not have intercourse with her; he did not see her under the circumstances and at the place that she mentions. He proves an alibi, and in fact he denies the matter from every standpoint of his testimony. He also testifies that while he was going back from his uncle's he met another negro who was riding a similarly colored horse to his, except that negro's horse had some white in his face, or bald-faced. So he puts this negro in the neighborhood with practically the same opportunity that he (the defendant) had, or as the witnesses' testimony goes to show that he had.

This matter occurred on Saturday. Appellant reached his father-in-law's house something like 4 o'clock in the evening Saturday, and Sunday morning before day, about 4 o'clock, he was arrested and carried into the presence of prosecutrix. She declined to recognize him and gave her reasons why. She says: "I remember them bringing the defendant to my house that night, and I examined him closely and had him to take off his coat and stand up, and I said at that time it was the figure and the color of the man that assaulted me, but he didn't have his hat on, so I said he didn't look that way that night. I said I couldn't state that he was the man. I said the other man's face was more round, but I told them it was the figure of the man and it was the color. I didn't say that the man that assaulted me was taller than the defendant. I said the face looked different to me then; but at night I couldn't see; my eyes are not good." On the next morning she took another look at him and recognized the defendant as being the man. In connection with her failing to recognize him definitely at night, and her recognition of him the following day, there was quite a lot of questions asked and answers elicited. He did not have his hat on at night was one of the main reasons why she says she failed to recognize him, and he did have on his hat the next day.

Appellant reserved a lot of bills of exception. He excepted to the following charge: "There is evidence before you to the effect that the witness Annie Dittmar stated, when the defendant was carried before her on the night of the alleged rape, that the defendant was not the person who raped her, and if there is evidence before you that the next day, with the defendant before her, she stated that he was the person who committed the rape, you are instructed that you must not consider the latter statement of said witness as evidence tending to show the alleged guilt of the defendant, but you may consider it for what you may think it worth, in determining the weight to be given the testimony of the said Annie Dittmar as a witness in this cause upon that point." Various objections were urged to this charge; among others, that it is on the weight of evidence, etc. We are of opinion the charge is upon the weight of evidence. It selects out the fact that, on the morning after she had failed to recognize the defendant the previous night, she did recognize him on the following morning and so testified before the jury. Now the court instructed the jury they could not consider this as any evidence of guilt, but they could give it what credit they thought it was worth in passing on the credibility of the prosecutrix upon that particular point. What point? Evidently the identification of the defendant the next morning when he was brought before her. Appellant had introduced evidence tending to show that she did not recognize him the previous night. The state met this to some extent at least, or sought to do so, by showing she did recognize him the next day in the daylight. Her testimony was not attacked as to her recognition of him in the daytime. She had been to some extent attacked by showing that she failed to recognize the negro the night before. The fact that she testified to identify the next morning was a circumstance in the case and evidently used by the jury against the defendant. The court undertook to limit this in passing on the weight of her testimony upon the question of identity. This was a charge, it occurs to us, on the facts on a particular question, one phase of the evidence culled from the other testimony, and called direct attention to the jury, and they were told they might consider that testimony upon the question of identity. Identity was one of the crucial points of the case; it was the point about which the issue of this case hung. The old woman identifying the defendant as best she could, and he denying his presence at the time and place, and proved by facts and circumstances, and his own positive testimony, and that of his wife, that he was at a different place. If the old woman was certain of her identity of the man, then the case was made out, or at least it was cogent evidence going to show that he was the man who had outraged her. If she was not correct about this, then in that event appellant may not have been the man. So it will be seen that one of the crucial questions and points in this case was the identity of this defendant as being the man whom the old woman says outraged her person. It occurs to us this was not introduced to attack her credibility, but to corroborate. Had the charge limited the question of credibility to failure to recognize, there might have been no error. As given, the charge virtually instructs the jury that the "next morning" identification of defendant corroborated prosecutrix's evidence on trial.

Another bill of exceptions recites that the prosecuting attorney in his closing argument to the jury continually referred to mob violence in such cases, and repeatedly held up before the jury and threatened them with the statement that, unless they assessed the death penalty in this case, then the people would take the law in their own hands in the future, and that such rape fiends as the defendant would be dealt with at the hands of a mob; and then the prosecuting attorney, Mr. Holt, made use of such expressions as the following, over the protest of the defendant: "It is true that the people often take the law in their own hands and mob persons that commit rape, and I want to tell you why that is true. Such attorneys as Mr. Short, who represents the defendant, pull the wool over the eyes of a jury and get them to return a verdict of not guilty. I tell you that, if you turn this defendant loose, then you cannot blame the people for taking the law in their own hands. Mr. Short has tried to frighten you with a picture of a scaffold; but, gentlemen, do not allow yourselves to become frightened. It would be much worse than convicting an innocent man for you to turn this defendant loose, and then in a week or two for him to rape one of your wives, sisters, or daughters." This argument and the like expressions of the district attorney were promptly objected to by the defendant through his counsel, and the court was requested to stop the district attorney from using such expressions, and to instruct the jury not to consider such argument, because the same were highly inflammatory and reasonably calculated to prejudice the minds of the jury against the defendant. The court signs the bill with this qualification: "This bill is disallowed. The court cannot recall the argument of the district attorney, but at no time was the court called upon to stop him, or requested to instruct the jury not to consider such argument."

Then follows an approval by bystanders of the bill:

We, the undersigned citizens of the state of Texas, hereby attest that we are fully informed and understand the contents of the foregoing bill of exceptions; that we were bystanders in the court, and present 61 L.R.A.(N.S.)

when the matters related in said bill of exceptions occurred, and we are fully cognizant of said matters, and the said bill of exceptions, which the judge presiding at said trial has refused to sign, is correct, and truly presents the facts as they really transpired. This was properly sworn to before the clerk of the district court. This bill seems to be in compliance with the statute; it was in no way contested. The statute provides means and methods by which a contest may be had under such circumstances, but it was not had in this case. We therefore take the bill as we find it. Of course, such speeches, arguments, and remarks as are found in this bill of exceptions ought not to occur. The defendant's life, if it is to be taken, should be taken under the forms and solemnities of the law. Rape is considered by our people, we may be justified in saying, as one of the heinous crimes, and one which seems to excite our people sometimes beyond the bounds of reason, eventuating in the fury of mob violence even to burning at the stake. Therefore the prosecution and the court should look well that the feelings of the "people" should not be dragged into the courts and before juries in trial of cases under charges of rape. Here was a negro charged with rape upon an elderly white woman. The passions of the mob feeling were held up by the prosecution in his speech before the jury, and the jury urged to convict this man to prevent mob law, and he appealed to the jury, if they should turn this defendant loose, they could not blame the people from taking the law into their own hands. Taking the law into their own hands about what, and against whom? Against the negro if he was acquitted, or against the jury for acquitting him. The juries are not to try the accused and hang him to keep mobs from hanging them or him. If the accused in a capital case is to forfeit his life, it should be done under the most solemn forms of the law. The court room and the courthouse and the judicial system are organized, not to convict upon mob law or by mob violence, but to convict under the due process of law guaranteed by the Constitution and laws of our country. No man's life, liberty, or property shall be taken except under due process of the law of the land. This is one of the solemn guarantees reserved in the Bill of Rights. We call especial attention to this sentence: "It would be much worse than convicting an innocent man for you to turn this defendant loose," etc. We do not know of a worse condition that could possibly arise in a civilized community and in the enlightened jurisprudence of this country than the proposition to convict an innocent man rather than turn this defendant loose. If he should be innocent, then under this statement of the district attorney it would be better to convict him than to turn him loose for fear that in a week or two one of the wives, daughters, or sisters of some jurymen might be insulted. Expressions like this should not be indulged in a court room, and should not be approved by either the trial or appellate court. The courts of this country cannot subscribe as a part of its jurisprudence that it is better to convict an innocent man than to return a verdict of not guilty against an accused person. In other words, apply that directly to this case: It would be worse to turn this defendant loose for fear he might ravish somebody else than it would be to convict him though he be innocent. If prosecuting officers will continue to make such appeals and to use such arguments, if they be arguments, before a jury, it will be the duty of this court at all times under such circumstances to reverse the judgment, and see that the accused is convicted only under the due process of the law of the land. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 475, 26 S. W. 987; Conn v. State, 11 Tex. App. 400; and other cases cited by Mr. Branch.

The judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded.

Harper, J., and Prendergast, P. J.:

We do not think any error is shown in the charge of the court, and if error, it would be error in favor of the defendant; but agree to the reversal of the case solely on the remarks of the district attorney.

A motion for rehearing having been filed, Davidson, J., on February 4, 1914, handed down the following additional opinion:

The state has filed a motion for rehearing, and attaches a lot of affidavits attacking a bill of exceptions found in the record. It is unnecessary to repeat this bill of exceptions, as it is fully set out and discussed in the original opinion. We are of opinion there is no such merit in the motion for rehearing as would authorize or require this court to change its ruling. The affidavits attached to the motion for new trial cannot be considered. This is an appellate court, and matters of the character of L.R.A. (N.S.)

ter sought to be brought in review before this court are dehors the record and not permissible. This has been the rule in Texas, and was thoroughly gone over in the opinion by Judge Harper in Pye v. State. — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 154 S. W. 222. The Pye Case has been followed in several subsequent decisions, some of which have been rendered at the present term of the court.

We are of opinion that the bill of exceptions is sufficient to present the question set forth and contained in it. The bill of exceptions was presented to the judge, and he refused it, stating that he did not know what the remarks of the district attorney were, but that he knew the matter was not called to his attention. Based on this refusal, appellant proved up his bill by bystanders. This was in accordance with the statute. It was filed within the thirty days allowed by law. There was no contest over it, and no attempt to contest it in the court below. That contest is sought to be made here by the affidavits connected with the motion for rehearing. This bill of exceptions is within the provisions of the statute, and is almost, if not identically, the same question decided in Johnson v. State, 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 298, 59 S. W. 898, in an opinion by Judge Brooks. See also Branch's Crim. Law, § 52, for other cases.

The motion for rehearing is overruled.

MANZA MATSUDA, Respt.,

v.

JENNIE H. HAMMOND, Doing Business as Hammond & Company, et al., Appts.

Appeal — exclusion of evidence — error.

1. Exclusion of evidence that after an assault and the starting away of the assailant, the victim picked up a rack containing a small roll of wrapping paper, in an action to recover damages for the assault, is not reversible error, although the act might be regarded as res gestæ.

Note. — Liability of master for assault by servant or agent in collecting debts.

The master's liability in such circumstances depends upon familiar question whether the servant while making the assault was acting within the scope of his employment.

The seller of goods is not liable for an assault by its instalment collector while attempting to seize the goods, where he was instructed not to take goods when pay-

Trial — remittitur — permitting verdict to stand.

2. The court may permit a verdict to stand on condition of a remittitur, although it finds that it is the result of passion or prejudice, if such finding is based entirely on the amount of the verdict.

Master and servant — assault on customer — liability.

3. A merchant is not liable for the act of his general manager authorized to collect for goods sold, or settle for goods taken wrongfully, in assaulting a customer to whom he has gone to collect for goods which he claims were taken by the customer, contrary to the contention of the latter, unless he ratifies the act or retained the manager in his employ with knowledge that he was likely to commit it.

ment of instalments was refused. Fineran v. Singer Mfg. Co. 20 App. Div. 574, 47 N. Y. Supp. 284.

And the same is true where he is instructed not to take the goods without the purchaser's consent, and the assault is committed in an attempt to seize them without such consent. McGrath v. Michaels, 80 App. Div. 458, 81 N. Y. Supp. 109.

Likewise, where the collector had instructions, if he failed to get the amount due, to report to the employer the reasons for the debtor's failure to pay, and the assault was committed in seizing the goods. Murphy v. Buckley Newhall Co. 151 App. Div. 520, 136 N. Y. Supp. 309.

So, a driver of a beer wagon, who is authorized to deliver beer for cash only, and who is himself charged with the price of any that is delivered without receiving cash, but who, after making a delivery without obtaining payment, endeavors to collect it the next day from the employee of the customer, upon whom he makes an assault in the endeavor to collect the money, is not in so doing acting within the scope of his employment, and does not thereby render his employer liable for the assault. McDermott v. American Brewing Co. 105 La. Ann. 124, 52 L.R.A. 684, 83 Am. St. Rep. 225, 29 So. 498.

Likewise, the master has been held not liable, because the servant was not acting within the scope of his authority, where a collector beat a third person to whom the debtor referred him as having witnessed payment in full (Callahan v. Hyland, 59 Ill. App. 347); and where a lock keeper, before demanding tolls, assaulted a boat owner under the pretext that they had not been paid (Ware v. Barataria & L. Canal Co. 15 La. 169, 35 Am. Dec. 180).

In Hamberg v. Singer Mfg. Co. 2 N. Y. Supp. 185, a complaint against a master for assault by his instalment collector, following an altercation concerning nonpayment, was held insufficient for want of an allegation that the assault was committed for the purpose of forwarding the master's interest and carrying out the work which 51 L.R.A. APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pierce County in plaintiff's favor in an action to recover damages for an assault and battery. Affirmed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frank H. Kelley and Ralph Woods, for appellants:

There was no evidence that Bell had authority to use unlawful or forceful methods to make collections, and certainly no authority to punish by personal assault one of appellant's debtors who refused to pay. Unless Bell has such authority, appellant is not responsible for his act.

In Baylis v. Schwalbach-Cyclé Co. 38 N. Y. S. R. 492, 14 N. Y. Supp. 933, the court said that it matters not that the servant exceeded his powers, and that he did an act that the master was not authorized to do, so long as he acted in the line of his duty, or, being engaged in the master's service, attempted to perform a duty which pertained, or which he thought pertained, to that service. The court held that the owner of a cycle store might be found liable for assault by a person at the time in charge of the store, upon one to whom a hirer of a cycle turned the same over to use and return to the store, and who, because unable to pay the full charge for rental, was subjected to the assault.

In Bergman v. Hendrickson, 106 Wis. 434, 80 Am. St. Rep. 47, 82 N. W. 304, involving an action against a saloon keeper for assault by a bartender upon the plaintiff, who refused to pay for drinks which he had ordered, the court, while in effect conceding that no recovery could be had if the assault was personal to the bartender, because committed solely in resentment of a vile epithet applied to him by the plaintiff,—held that if the assault was committed for the purpose of collecting payment for the liquor, the bartender was within the scope of his employment. The court said: "It was his method of performing the duty delegated to him, and, although the method may not have been either expressly authorized or even contemplated,—nay, although it may have been expressly prohibited,—yet the master is liable for the damages caused thereby, provided he has intrusted to the servant the duty he was attempting to perform." It was contended that, although the bartender may have been acting within the scope of his duties, the master was not liable if the plaintiff, by words or acts, conducted himself in such an improper manner as was calculated to arouse and bring on a personal altercation with the bartender, and that the assault complained of was wholly or in part the result of such misbehavior on the plaintiff's part. But the trial court refused a requested instruction to that effect, and charged, on the contrary, that if the bartender was impelled to the assault, whatever words may have passed, by a purpose to enforce payment of the liquor bill that he was trying to collect, and committed the assault as incidental to such efforts, plaintiff should recover. In upholding this charge, the court said that the rule thus laid down by the trial court is sanctioned by the authorities, and that the exception thereto, involved in the defendant's contention, in the case of misconduct or verbal provocation on the part of the plaintiff, is nowhere recognized. "Such an exception," said the court, "would ignore the principle on which the liability is founded, namely, that the tortious act of the servant, when within the scope of his duty, is the act of the master himself. That being the principle, the tort, when so committed by the servant, can be justified on no grounds less cogent than those which would serve as justification of the same act if committed by the master."

Collette v. Rebori, 107 Mo. App. 711, 82 S. W. 552, is sufficiently set out in MATSUDA v. HAMMOND.

The appellant Bell was her manager, and at the time of the assault had full charge of her business; Mrs. Hammond then being away from Tacoma on a visit to the eastern states. The respondent conducted a fruit and vegetable stall in the Tacoma public market. He traded somewhat extensively at Mrs. Hammond's place of business, always paying cash for the produce purchased. He was at her place of business on the evening preceding the day of the assault making certain purchases, and when he left the appellant Bell conceived the idea that he had carried away a crate of strawberries for which he had not paid. Bell told one of the delivery men to call upon the respondent on his return that evening and demand payment for the crate. The delivery man on his return reported that he was not able to collect the amount demanded, as the respondent denied taking the berries. The appellant Bell on the next day went himself to the respondent's place of business and demanded that the respondent pay for the berries, telling him that if he did not pay for them at once he would have him arrested for larceny. The respondent again denied taking the berries, and during the altercation which followed Bell became abusive, whereupon the respondent told him to go away. Bell then struck him in the face with his fist, breaking his nose, and causing it to bleed somewhat freely. After striking the blow, Bell immediately left the place, going back to his employer's place of business. The injury caused the respondent some suffering, kept him away from his place of business for some three weeks, and left his nose deformed. On the trial of the action the jury returned a verdict in the respondent's favor for the sum of $556. A motion for a new trial was filed, on the hearing of which the court held the verdict excessive, and gave the respondent an option to take a judgment for $400 or submit to a new trial, reciting in its order that the verdict "appeared to have been given under the influence of passion and prejudice." The respondent accepted the first alternative, and judgment was entered in his favor for $400 against both appellants.

The appellants first assign that the court erred in the exclusion of evidence. A witness on behalf of the appellants testified that, after Bell had struck the respondent, the respondent picked up a paper rack on which there was a small roll of wrapping paper, when he was seized by someone standing near. On motion of the respondent, this evidence was withdrawn from the jury on the ground of immateriality. The appellants argue that it was a part of the res gestæ, and hence its exclusion is error under all circumstances. But the rule is not thus broad. While matters pertaining to the res gestæ are usually admissible, they must bear some material relation to the principal fact in question before it is error to exclude them. When they are not closely related, the court may exercise a discretion in their admission or exclusion, and its ruling will be reviewed for error only when it is evident that its ruling has operated to the prejudice of the complaining party. Under the facts disclosed by the record, we are unable to say that the court did not properly exercise its discretion in this instance. Prior to the commission of the act attempted to be shown, the assault and battery had been completed, and the appellant had started away from the scene. The respondent's subsequent conduct could hardly be so closely related to the principal question in issue as to make its exclusion reversible error.

It is next assigned that the court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict after it found that the verdict appeared to have been entered under the influence of passion and prejudice. Unquestionably, the court could, without committing reversible error, have set the verdict aside and granted a new trial for the reason assigned, but under our practice it was not compulsory upon it to do so. From the order as a whole it is evident that the judge was led to the belief expressed in the order solely because of the size of the verdict, as he found no fault with the conclusion of the jury that the respondent was entitled under the evidence to some recovery. It was therefore within his province either to grant a new trial unconditionally, or to grant it on the condition that the respondent refused to accept a judgment in such sum as he conceived the jury were warranted in finding as compensation for the injury. In so far therefore as the judgment affects the appellant Bell, we find no reversible error in the record.

On behalf of the appellant Hammond, the additional contention is made that the appellant Bell, when he assaulted and beat the respondent, was not acting within the scope of his authority. This contention we think is well founded. The authority of Bell as shown in the record was to act as general manager of Mrs. Hammond's business. This grant of authority would unquestionably authorize Bell to make collections for goods sold from her place of business, and to exact settlements for goods wrongfully taken therefrom, but it would not, without something more, render her liable for unlawful acts of Bell committed while making such collections or settlements. An employer is liable for the unlawful and criminal acts of his employee only when he directly authorizes them, or ratifies them when committed, or, perhaps, continues an employee in his employment after he has knowledge that the employee has committed, or is liable to commit, unlawful acts while in the pursuit of his employer's business. The liability does not arise from a mere contract of employment to do a legitimate and lawful act.

In Johanson v. Pioneer Fuel Co. 72 Minn. 405, 75 N. W. 719, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 409, the corporation owned a coal dock in the city of Duluth, where it stored, cared for, and handled coal, which, in the course of its business, it sold to its customers. It employed a person to attend to its business at the dock, and the employee sold a ton of coal to a purchaser who took a part of it away at two different times. When the purchaser returned for the remainder, the employee charged him with having procured larger sacks than he had at first used, and of wrongfully attempting thereby to obtain more coal than he was entitled to. This the purchaser denied, whereupon the employee became enraged and assaulted and beat the purchaser. The assault and beating were held to be an independent tort on the part of the employee, not within the scope of his employment, and one for which the employer was not liable. In the course of the opinion the court said: "The time and place of the transaction in this case do not constitute the test of the master's liability. In order to hold the master liable, the act causing the injury must pertain to the duties which the servant was employed to perform. When the relation of master and servant ceases, all liability for the act of the persons employed ceases also. Wood, Mast. & S. 538. And the test of liability of the master depends upon the question whether the injury was committed by the authority of the master, expressly conferred or fairly implied from the nature of the employment and the duties incident to it. Id. 535. We hold that the assault by McKee upon plaintiff was an independent tort, for which the Pioneer Fuel Company was in no way liable; that the bald statement in the complaint that it was done by the servant while in the course of his employment is not, taken in connection with the other facts stated in the complaint, sufficient to charge the master. Campbell v. Northern P. R. Co. 51 Minn. 488, 53 N. W. 768."

In Collette v. Rebori, 107 Mo. App. 711, 82 S. W. 552, Rebori employed one Sansone as his agent for collecting bills. An account against Collette which Collette disputed was given him to collect. In endeavoring to make the collection, the agent got into an altercation with the debtor, during the course of which he assaulted and beat him. It was held that the employer 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

was not liable; the court saying: "The best considered cases hold that the master is liable to third persons for the negligent, fraudulent, or tortious acts of his agent or servant when it is shown that the agent or servant was acting within the scope of his employment, and that the act complained of was done as a means or for the purpose of doing the work assigned him by the master. To assault and beat a debtor is not a recognized or usual means resorted to for the collection of a debt, nor is it one likely to bring about a settlement of a disputed account. The evidence shows that, when plaintiff returned to the store for the purpose (as he says) of amicably settling the disputed account, and made known to Sansone his purpose, Sansone did not take up the settlement of the account with him, but without the least provocation assaulted and beat him, not for the purpose of settling or collecting the account, but to gratify his private malice against the plaintiff. He was not therefore about his master's business nor acting within the scope of any authority delegated to him by defendant. For these reasons the rule of respondent superior does not apply." To the same effect are the cases of Meehan v. Morewood, 52 Hun, 566, 5 N. Y. Supp. 710; Lytle v. Crescent News & Hotel Co. 27 Tex. Civ. App. 530, 66 S. W. 240; Murphy v. Buckley Newhall Co. 151 App. Div. 520, 136 N. Y. Supp. 309; Brown v. Boston Ice Co. 178 Mass. 108, 86 Am. St. Rep. 469, 59 N. E. 644. See also from this court, Thorburn v. Smith, 10 Wash. 482, 39 Pac. 124; Linck v. Matheson, 63 Wash. 593, 116 Pac. 282.

Cases cited from this and other courts, holding common carriers liable for assaults committed upon the persons of passengers by the carrier's employees while in the course of transportation, rest on a different principle, and are not in point. Carriers owe to their passengers the nondelegable duty of protecting them not only from assaults by their own employees, but from the assaults of persons generally. The rule rests upon principles of public policy, not on the relation of employer and employee. On the same principle, our own case of Chase v. Knabel, 46 Wash. 488, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1155, 90 Pac. 642, is distinguished from the case at bar.

The cases cited holding an employer liable for the acts of an agent employed to retake articles sold on conditional bills of sale, which have not been paid for according to the contract of sale, are not so easily distinguished on principle. The liability seems to be made to rest on the peculiar character of the employment, which from its nature is liable to create disputes and consequent breaches of the peace. But without specially reviewing the cases, we think they may be regarded as exceptions to the general rule announced, rather than as establishing a contrary rule.

The judgment is affirmed as to the appellant Bell, and reversed and remanded, with instructions to dismiss as to the appellant Hammond.

FILIPPO POGGI, Appt.,

v.

C. A. SCOTT.

(— Cal. —, 139 Pac. 815.)

Trover — mistake as to value of property — effect on liability.

That a purchaser of property who, upon taking possession, disposed of barrels of a tenant found on the premises, thought they were mere rubbish, does not relieve him from liability for the full amount of loss in case they were in fact filled with valuable material.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a nonsuit granted by the Superior Court for San Diego County in an action brought to recover damages for alleged unlawful conversion of wine. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. S. Torrance for appellant.

Messrs. Haines & Haines for respondent.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff sued to recover from defendant the sum of $2,000 damages suffered by him by reason of the unlawful conversion, by defendant, of some 200 barrels of plaintiff's wine. A nonsuit was granted upon the ground that plaintiff had failed to prove a sufficient case for the jury, and from the judgment which followed he appeals.

The primary and essential consideration therefore is, What facts did plaintiff by his evidence establish? He showed that his wine was stored in barrels in the cellar of a building situated at Twelfth and K streets in the city of San Diego. There were about 210 barrels of wine, and some empty barrels. He rented the whole building from Judge Mouser, the agent of the owner, but used only the cellar. Subsequently Judge Mouser leased the whole building to the Sanitary Laundry Company, and thereafter the plaintiff paid rent for the use of the cellar to the laundry company. He was a stockholder in the laundry company, and the laundry company was paying dividends. In practice the laundry company deducted the amount of the rent from the dividends due to plaintiff upon his stock. The wine was stored in a room in the cellar, which room plaintiff kept locked. The empty barrels were near the door, the filled barrels in tiers along the wall. Plaintiff lived in the country, visited San Diego about twice a month, and upon the occasion of each visit looked after his wine. Once a year he racked it off. It was sound wine, seven years old, and of the value alleged. During the tenancy of the Sanitary Laundry Company Judge Mouser sold the property to the defendant Scott. Mr. Scott was informed of the tenancy of the laundry company at the time of the sale, and also of the fact that plaintiff was a subtenant of the laundry company, paying rent to it for the use of the cellar. "It is my recollection," testifies Judge Mouser, "that I informed Mr. Scott that Mr. Poggi was occupying those basement rooms and had been paying the laundry company $2, and that he could have the rent from August 1, 1908." Poggi was not informed of this change in ownership. In due course the laundry company vacated the premises, Poggi's wine remained in the cellar, and he, himself, knowing nothing of the change of ownership, understood that he was liable for his rent of $2 per month to Judge Mouser. In November, 1909, Mr. Daneri, a friend of plaintiff's, phoned to him at the latter's home, about 15 miles from San Diego, asking him if he still owned the wine, and telling him that it was being carted off,

Note. — While it seems to be well settled that the essence of conversion is the wrongful deprivation of an owner of his property (38 Cyc. 2007), and that, as stated in POGGI v. SCOTT, "neither good nor bad faith, neither care nor negligence, neither knowledge nor ignorance, are of the gist of the action" (see also 38 Cyc. 2011), no case has been found, aside from POGGI v. SCOTT, upon the question of mistake as to the character or value of property, as affecting liability for the conversion thereof. Upon this point, however, the decision in POGGI v. SCOTT seems clearly to be correct, under the general rules above stated, as no mistake of this kind could have any bearing upon the primary question as to the owner's wrongful deprivation of his property, which renders the wrongdoer liable in trover for the conversion thereof.

and that it would be better for him to come to town and see about it. Poggi came to town the next day, found that his wine had been carried away, and went immediately to Judge Mouser to ask about it. Then for the first time he knew, being informed by Judge Mouser, that the latter no longer had any connection with the property, and that it had been sold to the defendant. Plaintiff immediately called upon defendant, and was by him told that he knew nothing about the wine, but that he had sold some old barrels in the cellar. It appears that a fraud and theft had been perpetrated in the following manner, and this is the testimony of the defendant: Two Italians, Bernardini and Ricci, called upon him and told him that there were some empty barrels in the cellar of his laundry building which they desired to buy. Scott replied that he did not know that there were any barrels there, and made an appointment with them to visit the place the next day. He did so, meeting Bernardini alone. Bernardini took him to where the barrels were stored. There was no lock on the door, and exposed to view were a number of broken barrels, "back further were some more barrels, apparently whole. I went back and tapped them, and so far as I could discover they were empty." He told Bernardini that he knew nothing of the value of the barrels, and asked what they were worth. Bernardini said they were worth $10 or $15. He regarded the barrels as old junk, and told him that he would sell them for $15, provided Bernardini would clean the whole cellar out. "I said, further, that I would sell him those barrels for $15, but if anything should be in the barrels, the trade should be different, to which Mr. Bernardini consented." "The thought just came in my mind that possibly upon going into the thing there might be something there, and, there being anything in them, you would not expect to sell them at that price,—that was all, and he so understood." Bernardini and his companions carted off the wine in barrels and shipped it away. They were arrested, and it was upon their preliminary examination that defendant gave the testimony above referred to and quoted from. This, with sufficient detail, presents the case of the plaintiff.

In support of the nonsuit respondent argues that Scott thought he was disposing of so much junk or rubbish in the form of barrels; that therefore he cannot be held for the conversion of full barrels of wine, or for the value of wine in barrels. Further it is said that it is fallacious to argue that the loss of the wine was the consequence of any act of Scott, or that any act of Scott produced it, or that there was any chain of connection, broken or unbroken, between Scott's act and the injury to Poggi, or that the loss to Poggi of his wine was the result, proximate or otherwise, of any act of Scott, or that Scott's act caused it in any sense at all.

If respondent's premises, as here stated, are correct, the conclusion of his nonliability is unassailable. But are they correct? The foundation for the action of conversion rests neither in the knowledge nor the intent of the defendant. It rests upon the unwarranted interference by defendant with the dominion over the property of the plaintiff, from which injury to the latter results. Therefore neither good nor bad faith, neither care nor negligence, neither knowledge nor ignorance, are of the gist of the action. "The plaintiff's right of redress no longer depends upon his showing, in any way, that the defendant did the act in question from wrongful motives, or, generally speaking, even intentionally; and hence the want of such motives, or of intention, is no defense. Nor, indeed, is negligence any necessary part of the case. Here, then, is a class of cases in which the tort consists in the breach of what may be called an absolute duty; the act itself (in some cases it must have caused damage) is unlawful and redressible as a tort. 1 Bigelow, Torts, p. 6. And says Judge Coolcy (Cubit v. O'Dett, 51 Mich. 347, 16 N. W. 679): "Absence of bad faith can never excuse a trespass, though the existence of bad faith may sometimes aggravate it. Everyone must be sure of his legal right when he invades the possession of another." And without further quotation, reference may be made to 1 Street, Foundations of Legal Liability, pp. 231 et seq.; 38 Cyc. 2015; Horton v. Jack, 4 Cal. Unrep. 758, 37 Pac. 653, s. c. 126 Cal. 526, 58 Pac. 1051; Budd v. Multnomah Street R. Co. 12 Or. 271, 33 Am. Rep. 355, 7 Pac. 99; Bolling v. Kirby, 24 Am. St. Rep. 795, Prof. Freeman's note; Isle Royale Min. Co. v. Hertin, 37 Mich. 332, 26 Am. Rep. 520; Galvin v. Bacon, 11 Me. 28, 25 Am. Dec. 258; Donahue v. Shippee, 15 R. I. 453, 8 Atl. 541; Hobart v. Hagget, 12 Me. 67, 28 Am. Dec. 159; Davis v. Tacoma R. & Power Co. 35 Wash. 203, 66 L.R.A. 802, 77 Pac. 209, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 621; Cook v. Monroe, 45 Neb. 349, 63 N. W. 800; Gibbs v. Chase, 10 Mass. 128.

In consonance with the principles of law thus declared, no question can arise of the defendant's responsibility under the evidence. Conceding all that may be argued as to the absence of improper motives on the part of the defendant, the all-important fact yet remains, under his own testimony, that he sold barrels that did not belong to him, and which did with their contents belong to the plaintiff. That he did not know that the barrels contained wine did not excuse his conduct. He had no legal right to sell the barrels whether or not they contained wine. He was exercising an unjustifiable and unwarranted dominion and control over the property of another, and from his acts great loss resulted to that other. If he did not, in fact, know that the barrels contained wine, at least his suspicions were aroused that they were not empty, as is evidenced by his statement to Bernardini that if the barrels were not empty and did contain something, they would make a different bargain. And while the conduct of the defendant as thus established was sufficient to make him liable for this tortious act of dominion over the property of another, there is the added fact in the testimony of Judge Mouser that the defendant was informed by him of the tenancy of plaintiff and ownership of the barrels and of the wine, and that they were in the cellar of the building which defendant had purchased.

An appellate court is always reluctant to review evidence the primary duty of weighing which rests with a jury. It does so only, as here, under compulsion. The views which it is forced to express are not to be taken as conveying anything beyond what the necessities of the consideration require. So here, those views are to be considered as expressing merely this court's conviction that the evidence offered by plaintiff demanded the consideration of the case by the jury, and that the trial court was therefore in error in withholding that consideration from the jury and in granting a nonsuit.

The judgment appealed from is therefore reversed.

I. Introductory.

The fundamental rule on this subject is that the proof of the execution of a will does not depend upon the memory of the subscribing witnesses.

And it is a general rule that the validity of the execution of a will may be shown by other evidence than that of the subscribing witnesses.

In Illinois, however, the peculiar statute is construed as limiting the evidence allowable in the probate court to that of the subscribing witnesses, unless they are dead or their testimony cannot be procured.

This note does not deal with the questions as to what the statutory requirements are, or from what definitely proven circumstances their observance may be inferred. It is intended to include only cases where the attempt to prove execution encounters imperfect or erroneous memory on the part of the subscribing witnesses. Thus, the general questions of presumption omnia esse rite acta where there is or where there is not an attestation clause are not here generally discussed. It is, of course, often difficult to draw the line between lack of memory and failure to observe the facts of execution as they occur, and some cases may be included which involve failure of observation rather than of memory.

The arrangement of many cases under what is hardly more than a single legal proposition is necessarily arbitrary. Almost every probate case involving defective recollection has several features or elements bearing more or less upon the result, and it is often difficult to say which of several features of a case has had the greatest influence in the decision.

Cases where the statute does not require that the will be witnessed are excluded, as are also cases concerning lost or destroyed wills.

For proof of signature of a testator by a mark where the subscribing witnesses are forgetful, see note to Wienecke v. Arbin, 44 L.R.A. 145; as to necessity of attestation clause to will, see the note to Mead v. Presbyterian Church, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 255; as to necessity of procuring deposition 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

of attesting witnesses to will, who are beyond the jurisdiction of the court, see note to Wells v. Thompson, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 722; as to necessity that witnesses see testator sign or that they see his signature, see note to Dougherty v. Crandall, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 161; for the question whether the competency of an attesting witness to a will is to be determined as of the time of attestation or of probate, see note to Bruce v. Shuler, 35 L.R.A. N.S.) 686.

I. General rule.

As heretofore stated, the fundamental rule on this subject is that the proof of the execution of a will does not depend upon the memory of the subscribing witnesses.

"The law does not allow proof of the valid execution and attestation of a will to be defeated at the time of probate by the failure of the memory on the part of any of the subscribing witnesses." Gillis v. Gillis, 96 Ga. 1, 30 L.R.A. 143, 51 Am. St. Rep. 121, 23 S. E. 107.

"Where there is good reason to suppose the will has been duly executed, and that no fraud or want of testamentary capacity existed at the time it was made, justice to the dead as well as to the living requires that the declared wishes of the testator should not be defeated by the imperfect recollections of the attesting witnesses; or by reason of their deaths or removal beyond the jurisdiction of the state. It is for this reason that the most liberal presumption in favor of the due execution of wills are sanctioned by courts of justice, where, from lapse of time or otherwise, it may be impossible to give positive evidence on the subject. A will may therefore be sustained even in opposition to the positive testimony of one or more of the subscribing witnesses who, either mistakenly or corruptly, swear that the formalities required by the statute were not complied with, if from other testimony in the case the court or jury is satisfied that the contrary was the fact. And where any of the witnesses are dead, or in such a situation that their testimony can-

It was incumbent upon appellant to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, certain facts, before he could avoid the will on the ground of undue influence.

The alleged confidential relations existing between the testator and Mr. Price did not give rise to a fiduciary relation between them.

Snodgrass v. Smith, 42 Colo. 60, 94 Pac. 312, 15 Ann. Cas. 548.

When there is nothing in the evidence offered to show that the devisee suggested the making of the will, or did anything to bring about its execution, it is irrelevant to the issue of undue influence.

Bauchens v. Davis, 229 Ill. 557, 82 N. E. 365.

It will be presumed that a testator has not be obtained, proof of their signatures as received as secondary evidence of the acts to which they have attested by subscribing the will as witnesses to the execution thereof. The same rule is frequently applied to the case of a subscribing witness who is called and sworn, but who, from defect of memory, has no recollection of the transaction except that his signature to the will is genuine." Jauncey v. Thorne, 2 Barb. Ch. 40, 45 Am. Dec. 424. The court here is speaking generally. There was in the case an attestation clause, which, however, omitted the request, but there seems to have been ample proof by all the subscribing witnesses of the request.

That this rule has been long recognized is shown in Dayrell v. Glascock, Skinner, 113, where the report of the case is as follows: "At a trial at bar, it was ruled per Holt, Chief Justice, that if there are three subscribing witnesses to a will, this is sufficient within the statute of frauds and perjuries, though, upon the trial, one of them would not swear that he saw the testator seal and publish his will; for otherwise it would be in the power of a third person to defeat the will of the deceased, and therefore, if it be proved to be his hand, and that he set it as a witness to the will, it is sufficient to satisfy the statute."

There is no rule of law which makes the probate of a will depend upon the recollection or veracity of the subscribing witnesses. Abbott v. Abbott, 41 Mich. 540, 2 N. W. 810.

In Pearson v. Wightman, 1 Mill, Const. 336, 12 Am. Dec. 636, the court recognized the principle of proving the handwriting of a witness, even though he denied his signature and the handwriting, but reversed a judgment for a will nine years old, sending the case back for a new trial, on the ground that there was not sufficient testimony as to the handwriting, there being none as to that of one of the witnesses who denied his signature.

The provision as to the forgetfulness of subscribing witnesses to a will in the New York Code of Civil Procedure (§ 2620) does not seem to have added anything to the pre-existing common law of the subject.

Thus, in Wright's Estate, 67 How. Pr. 117, the court states that the provision of the Code does not materially differ from that contained in chap. 460 of the Laws of 1837. But the provision as to forgetfulness was not in the earlier statute. This Code provision (§ 2620, in part) is as follows: "If all the subscribing witnesses to a written will are, or if a subscribing witness, whose testimony is required, is dead, or incompetent, by reason of lunacy or otherwise, to testify or unable to testify; or if such a subscribing witness is absent from the state, or if such subscribing witness has forgotten the occurrence, or testifies against the execution of the will; the will may nevertheless be established, upon proof of the handwriting of the testator, and of the subscribing witnesses, and also of such other circumstances, as would be sufficient to prove the will upon the trial of an action."

The witnesses need not all remember.

Where there was some contradiction, owing to lack of recollection or to perversion of the facts, it was held that it is not necessary that the facts be testified to by both of the attesting witnesses. Cheatham v. Hatcher, 30 Gratt. 56, 32 Am. Rep. 650.

Thus, in Welch v. Welch, 9 Rich. L. 133, where one of the witnesses did not remember some of the necessary formalities of the execution, five years before, the court, in holding that the will was properly proved by the other two attesting witnesses, and that it was not necessary that they should all recollect, said: "It cannot be maintained as a sound legal proposition that each witness must recollect and prove the fact of signature or testator's acknowledgment. Such a principle would place the validity of wills on a very precarious basis, depending mainly on the selection of persons of retentive memories. The guard which the statute seeks to throw around the testator by requiring at least three witnesses, on such a view, would greatly multiply the hazard of disappointment, and yet more startling is the idea that such defect can only be supplied by testimony derived otherwise than just cause for making the disposition of his property he does.

Meeker v. Meeker, 75 Ill. 260.

In the absence of other competent proof of undue influence, the inequality of a testamentary disposition cannot be urged as proof of undue influence.

Rutherford v. Morris, 77 Ill. 397.

A person can dispose of his property by will as he may chose, if he be of sound mind and memory.

There must be some testimony, either direct or circumstantial, to show that undue influence not only existed, but that it was exercised with respect to the making of the will.

Musser, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By this appeal it is sought to reverse a judgment of the district court admitting from the remaining subscribing witnesses. It is supposed a less stringent rule would amount to a virtual repeal of the statute, when a single witness might alone establish a will. To sustain the proposition contended for would to my mind subvert the plainest rules of evidence. The dishonesty of a witness, the casualty of death, as well as the frailty of memory, would then become not only a serious, but often an insurmountable, obstacle in offering the required proof." There was here testimony confirming the fact that the paper propounded was according to the testator's previously expressed wishes, but the report is silent as to any attestation clause. This case is cited in Gable v. Rauch, 50 S. C. 95, 27 S. E. 555.

So, in Jesse v. Parker, 6 Gratt. 57, 52 Am. Dec. 102, the court, in approving a verdict of the jury for the will where there was some failure of recollection, but more a difference of observation, the testimony of the witnesses being reasonably clear, said: "The court is further of opinion that, although there must be satisfactory proof that every statutory provision has been complied with in order to establish a will, the law does not prescribe the mode of proof; nor that the will shall be proved, as well as attested, by a specified number of witnesses. If such proof were to be required from each subscribing witness, the validity of wills would be made to depend upon the memory and good faith of a witness, and not upon reasonable proof that all the requirements of the statute had in fact been complied with." In this case the will and the signature of the testator, and the signatures of the three attesting witnesses, were all written by the testator's physician, who was one of the witnesses; whether there was an attestation clause does not appear.

In Re Higgins, 94 N. Y. 554, where the court seems to have considered that the testimony of each witness was sufficient, and where there was an attestation clause, it was said: "The authorities are numerous which sustain the position that where one witness testifies positively to the due execution of a will, the want of memory of another cannot overcome the positive testimony, and the proof will be regarded as sufficient."

Other testimony than that of subscribing witnesses.

For cases under the Illinois statute, see infra, III.

It is not intended here to do more than illustrate the rule that the validity of the execution of a will may be shown by other evidence than that of the attesting witnesses.

The testimony of another person present on the execution of a will may cure deficiencies or contradictions due to lack of clear recollection on the part of the subscribing witnesses. Gillis v. Gillis, 96 Cal. 1, 30 L.R.A. 143, 51 Am. St. Rep. 121, 23 S. E. 107, infra, XI; Montgomery v. Perkins, 2 Met. (Ky.) 448, 74 Am. Dec. 411, infra, XII.; Tappen v. Davidson, 27 N. J. Eq. 459, infra, VI. a; also the following cases, infra, X.: Bloom v. Terwilliger, 7 N. J. Eq. 221, 78 Atl. 742; Re Voorhis, 125 N. Y. 765, 26 N. E. 935; Bennett v. Sharp, Jur. N. S. 456.

Thus, wills have been admitted where the evidence of a nonsubscribing witness present at the execution has supplied the want of proof, due wholly or in part to defective recollection of subscribing witnesses,— —where one witness was dead, another without the state, and the third did not remember the performance of all the requirements in the execution of a holographic will two or three years old, having an attestation clause, Barnewall v. Murrell, 108 Ala. 366, 18 So. 831;

—where the surviving subscribing witness remembered nothing of the matter four years afterward, but proved the signature to the attestation clause of both witnesses, Miller v. Van Dyk, — N. J. —, 9 Atl. 372;

—where one of the subscribing witnesses had forgotten what had occurred, at least as to the declaration and requests of the testator (the report is silent as to any attestation clause). Thompson v. Seastedt, 6 to probate a paper writing purporting to be the last will of George Strachan Carey. The judgment of the district court was a result of an appeal from the county court, where the writing had been admitted to probate as a will. The date of the purported will was February 26, 1900, and the subscribing witnesses fixed the time that they signed the paper at about that date.

The appellant calls attention to §§ 4653 and 4670, Mills's Anno. Stat. 1st ed. The 1st section is as follows: "All wills, by which any lands, tenements, hereditaments, annuities (or) rents are devised, shall be reduced to writing, and signed by the testator or testatrix or by some one in his or her presence, and by his and (or) her direction, and attested in the presence of the testator or testatrix, by two or more credible witnesses." This section appears as § 2 of chapter 90, Rev. Stat. 1868; § 2789, Gen. Laws 1877; § 3482, Gen. Stat. 1883. In 1903, the law with reference to wills was revised, and the substance of that section now appears in Rev. Stat. 1908, § 7071, as follows: "All wills by which any property, real or personal, is devised or bequeathed, shall be reduced to writing and signed by the testator, or by some one in his presence and by his direction, and attested in the presence of the testator, by two or more credible witnesses." Section 4670, Mills's Anno. Stat. 1st ed. is as follows: "If, upon the hearing of such proof, it shall satisfactorily appear by the testimony of two or more of the subscribing witnesses to such

Thomp. & C. 78, also reported briefly in 3 Ilun, 395;

—where one subscribing witness to a recent will having an attestation clause testified positively that the witnesses signed before the testator, and the other was hazy on the matter, perhaps having an impression to the same effect, and the scrivener, who was not a subscribing witness, testified positively that the testator signed first, Re Lewis, 51 Wis. 101, 7 N. W. 829;

—where one of the subscribing witnesses to a will two years old, having a full attestation clause, did not recall any declarations or request by the testator to him, but admitted that he was asked to sign by the person who superintended the execution, who testified fully as to the requirements, and who was experienced in such matters. Re Johnson, 7 Misc. 220, 27 N. Y. Supp. 649.

The same was held in the case of a will two or three years old, with a full attestation clause, where there was distinct testimony by the executor, an experienced person, that all the legal requirements were observed, and particularly that the testator signed before the witnesses, although one subscribing witness, after stating that the testator signed after him, appeared to have doubt on the subject, and said that he might be mistaken, and the other subscribing witness did not remember that the testator signed last, and stated in the course of his examination that he, the witness, was the last one who signed. Rugg v. Rugg, 83 N. Y. 592.

In Re Schweigert, 17 Misc. 186, 40 N. Y. Supp. 979, a will was admitted to probate seventeen years after its date, where the experienced scrivener had no recollection of the execution, but knew the handwriting of the witnesses, and was willing, from his manner of doing business, to swear that the attestation clause was read over to the witnesses in presence of the testator, although such clause did not state that the will was signed in the presence of the witnesses, one of whom stated that, to the best of his recollection, such signing took place, but the other did not testify as to any 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) declaration or signing by the testator, but thought a part of the will was read over.

In Re Langtry, 1 Silv. Sup. Ct. 524, 5 N. Y. Supp. 501, a sixteen-year-old will was held properly admitted to probate although the subscribing witnesses did not remember distinctly that the testator acknowledged his signature, but the scrivener testified that he did so, and the attestation clause so stated, and the surrogate was of the opinion that the paper was so folded that the witnesses must have seen the attestation clause and the signature of the testator, which unquestionably was upon the instrument when they signed.

In Bayliss v. Sayer, 3 Notes of Cases, 22, it was held that a will having the usual attestation clause had been properly proved, although the subscribing witnesses thought that the testator signed after they did, where a third person testified that the testator signed before the witnesses, and that one of the witnesses had made a remark as to the necessity for it, as the court might consider all the circumstances, rather than trust to the recollection of the witnesses upward of a year and a half after the execution of the will.

In Meurer's Will, 44 Wis. 392, 28 Am. Rep. 591, it was held that a will which had a full attestation clause was shown to have been sufficiently executed where, so far as can be gathered from the confused report of the case, the two subscribing witnesses did not remember or did not testify to matters supplied by the testimony of nonattesting witnesses who were present.

In Hall v. Hall, 38 Ala. 131, where it was held proper to take the testimony of the scrivener, who was present at the execution, as to the identity of the will, the court said: "The law makes two subscribing witnesses indispensable to the formal execution of a will; but it by no means follows that the testimony of these witnesses is the only evidence by which the due execution of the will can be established. On the contrary, it is laid down as undoubted law that if, will, that they were present and saw the testator sign such will, and attested the same at his request, or that he acknowledged the same to be his last will, and that they believe the testator to be of sound mind and memory at the time of signing and acknowledging the same, the court shall admit the same to probate and record; provided, that no proof of fraud, compulsion or other improper conduct be exhibited, which, in the opinion of the court, shall be deemed sufficient to invalidate or destroy the same, and every will, testament or codicil, when thus proven, shall be recorded by the clerk of the county court, in a book to be provided by him for that purpose, and shall be good and available in law, for the granting, conveying and assuring the lands, from forgetfulness, the subscribing witnesses should fail to prove the formal execution of the will, other evidence is admissible to supply the deficiency; or if the subscribing witnesses all swear that the will was not duly executed, they may be contradicted, and the will supported by other witnesses or by circumstances." Quoted in Barnewall v. Murrell, 108 Ala. 366, 18 So. 831.

In Haynes v. Haynes, 33 Ohio St. 598, 31 Am. Rep. 579, where the probate was reversed on another ground, the court said: "That, while the due execution of a will cannot be assumed in the face of positive evidence to the contrary, merely because it has been signed and attested in due form, yet mere failure of the attesting witnesses, or their denial of the facts, will not defeat it, if it can be established by other evidence. Neither failure of memory, nor the corrupt or false swearing of attesting witnesses, will be allowed to defeat the will, if its due execution can be shown by other testimony." See also Hildreth v. Marshall, 51 N. J. Eq. 241, 27 Atl. 465, infra, V.

In Hopf v. State, 72 Tex. 281, 10 S. W. 589, the court, in affirming the receipt of evidence of a nonsubscribing witness who was present on the execution of a will a few months old, said: "The statute further provides the mode of proof when all the subscribing witnesses are dead, or when the will was wholly written by the testator, but none of the statutory provisions on the subject forbid the introduction of other than the statutory proof; and cases may arise in which it would be the duty of a court to probate a will even in opposition to the testimony of the subscribing witnesses. If, from defect of memory or from corrupt purpose, subscribing witnesses should be unable or unwilling to testify to the facts bearing on the due execution of a will, this ought not to be permitted to defeat the will, if other evidence admissible under the ordinary rules of law to establish facts be introduced sufficient to satisfy the court 'that the testator executed the will with the formalities and solemnities and under the circumstances required by law to make a valid will.'" tenements and hereditaments, annuities, rents, goods and chattels therein and thereby given, granted and bequeathed." That section appeared in chapter 90, Rev. Stat. 1868, as § 19, § 2806, Gen. Laws 1877, § 3499, Gen. Stat. 1883, and with some verbal modifications, not important in the case, it now appears as § 7088, Rev. Stat. 1908.

The appellant first contends that the paper writing in question was not executed or proven as provided by these statutes. He intimates that the evidence of one of the subscribing witnesses shows affirmatively that the signature of the testator was not on the paper writing at the time they signed it as witnesses. This cannot be said to be a correct statement of the result of —distinction between absence of facts and absence of memory.

Where there is no lack of memory the testimony of a third person supplying almost every deficiency in the testimony of the attesting witnesses, together with an attestation clause not read to or by them, will not overbear the clear recollection of the witnesses. Re Hitchler, 25 Misc. 365, 55 N. Y. Supp. 642.

III. Rule under Illinois statute.

In Illinois the statute provides that the will shall be sufficiently proved if "attested in the presence of the testator or testatrix by two or more credible witnesses, two of whom declaring on oath or affirmative before the county court of the proper county that they were present," etc. This is held to confine the testimony in the county (or probate) court, as to execution, to that of the attesting witnesses, but if the probate is refused, on an appeal the will may be proved by any evidence competent to prove a will in chancery.

In Kaul v. Lyman, 259 Ill. 30, 102 N. E. 212, where one of the witnesses testified to the matters of the execution and the other witness recollected nothing about it, it was held that the probate court, being confined to the testimony of subscribing witnesses, properly refused to admit the will, but that the appellate court, having the power to hear other testimony, had properly admitted the will to probate, receiving evidence of persons not present at the execution. There was here no attestation clause, but the word "witness" was written just before the signature of each witness.

Cases subject to the statutory requirement

The cases here cited are those where there was a probate of the will in the county court, and an affirmance on appeal, and consequently they were subject to the requirement of the statute as construed.

The cases are confusing and apparently contradictory on the question of the amount the testimony. The only inference that can be drawn from the testimony of each of the subscribing witnesses is that at the time they testified they did not remember whether the signature of the testator was there or not when they affixed their signatures. They did not testify that it was there, neither did they testify that it was not there. Accepting this as the effect of their testimony, we understand the position of the appellant to be that such testimony was not sufficient to admit the will to probate. His position, as stated in the language of the brief, is as follows: "The primary contention upon which our arguments will rest as to this branch of the case is that, in order that the paper writing here under consideration may be held to constitute a legal will, it must be established by legal proofs that the signature of George Strachan Carey was affixed thereto at the time the attesting witnesses affixed their signatures thereto, or before the attesting witnesses separated on the occasion of the alleged execution of the paper as a will."

The deceased was a bachelor and lived alone on and operated a large ranch in Adams county. Each of the subscribing witnesses testified that about the date of the paper writing, to wit, February 26, 1900, they were present with Mr. Carey in the kitchen of his ranch house. Mr. Carey went into another room and returned with pen and ink and the paper in question in his hand, and told them that it was his last will, and requested them to sign it as wit-of proof required in the probate court where there is a lack of memory on the part of the subscribing witnesses. In Greene v. Hitchcock, infra, and (obiter) in Kaul v. Lyman, supra, it seems to be held that the county court should refuse probate unless two subscribing witnesses remember the observance of the legal requirements. The contrary seems to be held in Canatsey v. Canatsey, infra, and (obiter) in Hill v. Kehr, infra.

In Greene v. Hitchcock, 222 Ill. 216, 78 N. E. 614, where the county court admitted a will having a full attestation clause, one of the witnesses having testified fully as to the requirements of the statute, while the other witnesses could not remember the occasion of signing, it was held by the supreme court to be error under the statute to admit in evidence his answer to the effect that he would not have signed the will had not the requirements of the law, with which he was familiar, been complied with, as this answer could not supply the statutory requirements.

But in Canatsey v. Canatsey, 130 Ill. 397, 22 N. E. 595, a will signed by mark, and having an attestation clause, was held sufficiently proved where one of the witnesses testified to the legal facts, but was a little uncertain as to his memory, and the other witness, an experienced man, did not remember the transaction, but stated that he had never witnessed a will except when he was duly requested, and it was duly signed and acknowledged. The lawyer who drew the will testified that he signed it for the testator.

And in Hill v. Kehr, 228 Ill. 204, 119 Am. St. Rep. 425, 81 N. E. 848, where the testimony of one witness covered the statutory requirements, but the testimony of the other witness was indefinite as to some of them, and he had not heard nor read the attestation clause, it seems that the court would have affirmed the decree of probate as far as the execution of the will was concerned, if there had not been doubt expressed by the witness, or lack of knowledge, as to the sanity of the testatrix.

the opinion in RE CAREY, it was held that the will was sufficiently proved although the surviving attesting witness did not remember whether she saw the signature of the testator upon the instrument or not, she having testified that he did not sign it in her presence, or to that effect, but that he acknowledged it to be his will and requested her and the other witnesses to sign, which they did in his presence. The court stated that there was a presumption that the testator had signed the will, arising from his declaration that it was his will and his request to the witnesses to sign it, and that there was proof that the signature to the will was his, and that the two subscribing witnesses signed the attestation clause in his presence, and that there was thus a prima facie case in favor of due execution. The attestation clause in this case consisted of the words "written, signed, and sealed in the presence of."

Cases not limited by the statute.

The cases here cited are those where probate was refused in the county or probate court, and therefore the circuit court on appeal was not limited by the statute. See statement at the beginning of the subdivision.

In Crowley v. Crowley, 80 Ill. 469, infra, a will was rejected, both in the county court and on appeal, where both the witnesses signed by mark, and they could not identify the paper as the one which they had signed, and neither of them was satisfied as to the sanity of the testator or his soundness of mind, although the scrivener testified that the testator was of sound mind, and that he executed the will in the presence of the attesting witnesses, the court holding that, although in this case the testimony was not limited by law to that of the attesting witnesses "the law is imperative that there must be the concurring evidence of two witnesses to authorize probate of the will;" but this quotation is probably no longer the law in Illinois.

In Thompson v. Owen 174 Ill. 229, 45 L.R.A. 682 51 N. E. 1046, it was held to nesses, which they did in the presence of Mr. Carey and each other. They both testified that they believed Mr. Carey was of sound mind and memory at that time. One of the witnesses, Mr. Patterson, testified that Mr. Carey sat down at the table and got up and requested them to sign it. As said before, each of the witnesses testified that he did not remember whether the signature of Mr. Carey was there or not at the time they signed it. The signature could have been seen by them at the time, if it was there. The testimony showed that the body of the writing, as well as Mr. Carey's signature thereto, was in the handwriting of Mr. Carey. Mr. Carey died in November, 1908. After his death, the writing was found in his ranch house, among his personal effects, inclosed in a sealed envelope on which was written, in the handwriting of Mr. Carey, a direction that it was to be sent to a named attorney in Denver. The trial at which the subscribing witnesses testified occurred in the district court in September, 1909, nearly ten years after they had written their names on the paper. The testimony, as stated above, was not contradicted in any way.

The witnesses did not see Mr. Carey sign the paper. The evidence shows a sufficient acknowledgment of it as the last will of the testator, if it was a will at the time the witnesses subscribed their names thereon. The question is: Was the evidence, in the absence of anything to the contrary, sufficient to establish that the signature of be error for the circuit court on appeal to reject as incompetent the recitals of a full attestation clause, when the witnesses remembered nothing of the transaction, but identified their signatures, there being also proven the signature of the testator, the preparation of the will, and its delivery by the testator to the custodian, who produced it. The court distinguished Crowley v. Crowley, supra, on the ground that there was no attestation clause in that case, and concluded that other Illinois cases referred to were not contrary to the decision in the Thompson Case; but it would seem that this case gives a different idea to the meaning of the statute than what had theretofore prevailed.

In Re Kohley, 200 Ill. 189, 65 N. E. 699, the court declined to disturb the judgment of the circuit court ordering probate, which had been refused by the county court, where the lawyer who drew the will, who was not a subscribing witness, testified fully to all the necessary facts, and the attestation clause was in due form, although one of the attesting witnesses testified that he had practically no recollection of the occurrence except that he was called into the office of lawyers to witness a will, and understood that the paper was a will of the testatrix, and the other witness, the partner of the lawyer who drew the will, testified that the testatrix did not sign in his presence, and that she said nothing and did not do anything to acknowledge the paper, and that there was not a word spoken when the other witness signed. The court pointed out that the evidence of the subscribing witnesses alone was not sufficient, but that the failure of a witness to remember would not destroy the presumption arising from the attestation clause.

In Mead v. Presbyterian Church, 229 Ill. 526, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 255, 82 N. E. 371, 11 Ann. Cas. 426, it was held that a will should be admitted to probate where one of the witnesses remembered only that he signed the will at the request of the testatrix at a certain place, and the other witness did not remember the facts of the execution. It was shown by nonsubscribing witnesses that the testator was of sound mind and memory, that his signature was genuine, that the instrument was holographic, and that it was signed by the two subscribing witnesses as witnesses. In the margin opposite the signatures of the witnesses was the word "witnesses" written by the testatrix, and after the name of the first witness was the word "witness" in his handwriting, and after the name of the other witness were ditto marks. The court said: "It has . . . been held that where the instrument offered for probate bears the genuine signature of the testator, and is properly witnessed, it is entitled to be admitted to probate if the attestation clause recites all the facts necessary to a legal execution of the will, although the subscribing witnesses are unable to recollect that all the formalities prescribed by the statute and recited in the attestation clause were actually complied with. Thompson v. Owen, supra. Gould v. Chicago Theological Seminary, 154 Ill. 282, 59 N. E. 536; Hobart v. Hobart, supra. . . . In this case, while there was no attestation clause attached to the instrument reciting all the acts necessary to be done that the will might be legally executed, we think the evidence found in this record clearly supplies the presumption arising from the presence of an attestation clause."

IV. Some witnesses dead or absent.

There are many cases where wills have been admitted where some of the witnesses were dead or absent, and some or all of those testifying were deficient in recollection of the circumstances. (The reference following the citation is to the subdivisions where the case is set out.)

Barnewall v. Murrell, 108 Ala. 366, 18 So. 831, supra, II.; Gillis v. Gillis, 96 Ga. 1, 30 L.R.A. 143, 51 Am. St. Rep. 121, 23 S. E. 107, infra, XI.; Pate v. Joe, 3 J. J. Marsh. 113, infra, XI.; Welty v. Welty, 8 Md. 15, infra, V.; Eliot v. Eliot, 10 Allen, 357, infra, VII.; Hennes v. Huston, 81 Minn. 30, 83 N. W. 439, infra, VI. 1.; Fatheree v. Lawrence, 33 Miss. 585, infra, the testator was on the paper at that time, for there is no evidence that it was placed thereon by the testator after the witnesses had signed it and before they separated? This question has not been heretofore determined by this court.

In Hobart v. Hobart, 154 Ill. 610, 45 Am. St. Rep. 151, 39 N. E. 581, it is pointed out that some local statutes, particularly in New York, require that there must be an acknowledgment of his signature by the testator, while, in Illinois, it was sufficient when the witnesses did not see him sign the paper that the testator acknowledged the will to be his act and deed, and the court was inclined to think that decisions from those states that require an acknowledgment of the signature were not applicable in Illinois. This difference in statutes is pointed out in Schouler on Wills, § 321, where the author states that one line of statute expression follows the old English statute of frauds, which made the will the subject of acknowledgment, while the other follows the statute of Victoria, which made the signature the subject of acknowledgment, and it is said that when the statute makes the signature, and not the will, the subject of acknowledgment, a stricter rule of construction has been adopted.

The appellant, in his brief, admits that under the old statute of frauds a more liberal construction was adopted than under the Victorian statute. It must be borne in mind that our statute requires the will, and not the signature, to be the subject of

Thus, wills have been held sufficiently proved where the surviving subscribing witness——remembered nothing of the circumstances about twenty years afterwards, but was positive that he would not have signed unless he had known that every part of the full attestation clause was true, Wright's Estate, 67 How. Pr. 117, 2 Dem. 482;

—identified his signatures to a will and codicil sixteen and eighteen years old, with full attestation clauses, but remembered only that the testatrix asked him to witness her will, the court assuming that the deceased witness to both papers, who was a lawyer, had superintended the execution of both, Re Brissell, 16 App. Div. 137, 45 N. Y. Supp. 122;

—Eight years after execution, recollected that the other witness stated in the presence of the testator that the paper they were to sign was a codicil, and that he asked him to sign the testator's codicil, and there was nothing to rebut the prima facie case made by the attestation clause, Elkinton v. Brick, 44 N. J. Eq. 154, 1 L.R.A. 161, 15 Atl. 391.

it was held that a will was sufficiently proved where the surviving subscribing witness twelve years after did not recollect that the testatrix signed the will in the presence of the subscribing witnesses, or acknowledged her signature in their presence, or that she declared to them that the instrument was her will, or that she requested the deponent to sign his name as a witness. There was no attestation clause, but the last clause of the will read as follows: "In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal in the presence of John Heard and —, who I request to sign their names hereto as subscribing witnesses." Heard was the deceased witness.

In Mock v. Garson, 84 App. Div. 65, 82 N. Y. Supp. 310, the court declined to set aside the verdict of a jury sustaining a will eleven years old, where the surviving subscribing witness had very deficient recollection on the subject, and the weight of the testimony seemed to show that the name of the deceased witness was in the same handwriting as the name of the surviving witness, who, upon the probate some time before the trial, had sworn to the statutory requirements. The instrument was "drawn" by the testator, who knew the formalities of due execution, but we are not informed whether there was any attestation clause.

In Re Gillmor, 117 Wis. 302, 94 N. W. 32, the court approved the probate of a will with a full attestation clause where one of the subscribing witnesses was dead and the testimony of the other was indefinite. The surviving witness was inclined to think that he signed before the testator signed, but he said, eleven years afterward at the time of the probate, that there was nothing which enabled him to state the order of the signing except that, having drawn the will and the form for execution, and with pen in hand, he would naturally sign his name before turning over the papers to the other parties. It does not appear that he was a lawyer.

In the insufficiently reported case of Barnes v. Barnes, 66 Me. 286, the court declined to disturb the verdict of the jury in favor of a will over eight years old, with acknowledgment. Our statute does not say that the will shall be acknowledged to be the act and deed of the testator, as in Illinois, but simply that he shall acknowledge it to be his last will. In the face of these differences as to construction in the two lines of statutes, our legislature adopted a statute expression more in conformity with the old statute of frauds than with the Victorian statute. Our statute is the guide that our courts have as to the legislative intent in his state. It must have been intended thereby that the courts of this state should adopt a construction in harmony with that adopted under similar statute expressions by other courts, rather than a construction adopted under essentially different statutes.

a full attestation clause, where one of the witnesses was dead, and the other two were nonresidents of the state, and one of them testified that he never signed a will unless it was in the presence of the other subscribing witnesses and of the testator and at his request, and that he was satisfied this was no exception to the usual course, although he had no distinct recollection of the matter. One of the witnesses was a lawyer, but whether he was the one who testified does not appear.

In Pate v. Joe, 3 J. J. Marsh. 113, it was held that a will about twenty-five years old was sufficiently proved where it was witnessed by A, B, and C, and it was proven that the will and the signature of the testator were in the handwriting of B, who was dead, and that the signature of C was in the handwriting of A, who was her husband. A had no recollection whatever of the circumstances, but stated that it was his habit never to witness any instrument without seeing the party who executed it make his signature, or hearing him acknowledge the instrument; that he would not have put his wife's name to the paper without her consent, and that sometimes, as he believed, he signed her name to papers as a witness. C stated that she could write her name, but the signature was not hers, and that she had no recollection whatever of the execution of the instrument, or of having authorized her husband to sign her name as a witness. The report is silent as to any attestation clause.

In Butcher v. Butcher, 21 Colo. App. 416, 122 Pac. 397, it was held that the statement of the only surviving witness that he signed the full attestation clause would be sufficient to show that he and the other subscribing witness signed it in the presence of the testator, he testifying to the other matters therein. In this case the testimony was taken by deposition, and there is not any reference as to want of recollection. The will was twenty-seven years old.

But a will was rejected in Jackson ex dem. LeGrange v. LeGrange, 19 Johns. 386, 10 Am. Dec. 237, where in ejectment a will twenty-five years old that had never been

It appears to us that the authorities upon which the appellant relies have reference to statutes wherein the signature, and not the will, is the subject of attestation and acknowledgment. Such cases can be authority here only by way of analogy, and when the facts are analogous also. His principal cases are from New York, where it seems the statute has particular reference to the signature of a testator.

In Re Mackay, 110 N. Y. 611, 1 L.R.A. 491, 6 Am. St. Rep. 409, 18 N. E. 433, the testator told the subscribing witnesses that the paper was his will. He handed it to them so folded that they could see no part of the writing except the attestation clause. They did not see either his signature or his seal. The direct evidence was that the wit-proved before a surrogate was sought to be offered, and one of the witnesses was dead, one resided in the state, but was not called, and the third proved the signature of the dead witness and his own signature, but said that he had never known the testator, and had no recollection of anything about the paper. It does not appear whether there was any attestation clause or not.

V. Lapse of time.

While, of course, the lapse of time is a material element in weighing the testimony of witnesses to wills, the courts in practice seem ready to consider that defects of recollection are frequent, even a short time after the execution.

Thus, there are examples of such defective recollection where the evidence was taken shortly after the date of the will. Re Lewis, 51 Wis. 101, 7 N. W. 829, supra, II.; Re Jones, 85 N. Y. Supp. 294, infra, VI. b; Cooper v. Bockett, 3 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 648, 2 Notes of Cases, 391, infra, VIII.; Newhouse v. Godwin, 17 Barb. 236, infra, XII.; see also Re Gahagan, — N. J. —, 89 Atl. 771, infra, VI.

So, where the time between the date of the will and the taking of the testimony was only a few months (Robbins v. Robbins, 50 N. J. Eq. 742, 26 Atl. 673, infra; Young v. Barner, 27 Gratt. 96, infra, VII.; Chambers v. Queen's Proctor, 2 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 415, infra, VI. a; Re Attridge, 6 Notes of Cases, 597, infra, VII.; Gregory v. Dyke, 4 Notes of Cases, 620, infra, VI. a); or where it was less than a year (Re Carey, 24 App. Div. 531, 49 N. Y. Supp. 32, infra; Swain v. Edmunds, 54 N. J. Eq. 438, 37 Atl. 1117, infra, VII.; Woolley v. Woolley, 95 N. Y. 231, infra, X.); or about a year (Re Stockwell, 17 Misc. 108, 40 N. Y. Supp. 734, infra, VII.; Neiheisel v. Toerge, 4 Redf. 328, infra, X.; Walsh v. Walsh, 4 Redf. 165, infra, X.; Wright v. Rogers, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 678, 38 L. J. Prob. N. S. 67, 21 L. T. N. S. 156, 17 Week. Rep. 833, infra, X.).

nesses did not see the signature, and could not see it. At the close of the opinion it is said: "The formalities prescribed by the statute are safeguards thrown around the testator to prevent fraud and imposition. To this end the witnesses should either see the testator subscribe his name, or he should, the signature being visible to him and to them, acknowledge it to be his signature." If the paper had been so placed that the witnesses could have seen the signature, and ten years thereafter they testified that they could not remember whether the testator's name was there or not, but that they could remember that he told them that it was his will and wanted them to witness his signature, the facts would be analogous to the facts here; but the case does not inform us what the court would have done under the changed circumstances.

In Lewis v. Lewis, 13 Barb. 17, on page 25, the paper was so folded that the witnesses could not see the signature if it was there. The court bore down on the fact that the attestation and acknowledgment of the signature were required by the statute. If the facts had been that the paper was so placed that the signature could have been seen, but the witnesses did not remember whether it was there or not, the opinion does not disclose what the result would have been. The court, however, says: "The law of evidence, in its application to the proof of the several facts which, united, constitute a valid will, is the same as it is in its application to the proof of any other

Probate was sustained of a will a few months old with a full attestation clause, where one of the subscribing witnesses, the testator's physician, did not recollect anything about the declaration, while testifying as to other matters; and the other subscribing witness, who was the lawyer who drew the will, testified to its due execution. Robbins v. Robbins, 50 N. J. Eq. 742, 28 Atl. 673, where the court concluded that, notwithstanding the comparatively short time, the witness had forgotten.

In Re Carey, 24 App. Div. 531, 49 N. Y. Supp. 32, affirming 14 Misc. 486, 36 N. Y. Supp. 817, the court, in affirming the holographic will of an experienced testator, having a full attestation clause, concluded that a subscribing witness had forgotten the details of the execution of the will, less than a year old, he being a very busy man, who had forgotten entirely that he was a witness to the testator's will until the fact was stated to him. This witness testified that there was no publication in his presence by the testator, who was deaf, but that the other subscribing witness had said in a low tone that the paper was the testator's will; the witness was contradicted as to the tone of voice, and it was shown that the deafness of the testator was not great, and the other witness testified to the due execution of the will.

In Hildreth v. Marshall, 51 N. J. Eq. 241, 27 Atl. 465, the court stated in effect, as to the execution of a will less than a year old, that the vague uncertainty of the testimony of the subscribing witnesses was not sufficient to overcome the testimony of an interested person, together with the attestation clause; but the instrument was rejected on the ground of fraud.

But the court may not think that the witnesses' omissions to state certain formalities are due to forgetfulness when the will was executed only three months before. See Wilson v. Hetterick, 2 Bradf. 427, infra, VI. b.

And in Ludlow v. Ludlow, 36 N. J. Eq. 597, it was apparently held that there was no failure of memory in the case, where the will was three years old.

See also for definiteness of recollection six years after execution, Re Simmons, 30 N. Y. S. R. 446, 9 N. Y. Supp. 352, infra, VI. b.

And absence of the recollection of the performance of certain formalities ten or more than ten years before does not necessarily mean that such formalities have been performed and forgotten. See Re De Haas, 9 App. Div. 561, 41 N. Y. Supp. 696, infra, VI. a.; Re Berdan, 65 N. J. Eq. 681, 55 Atl. 728. See also Adams v. Rodman, 102 Wis. 456, 78 N. W. 588, 759, infra, X.

By way of illustration, it may be stated here that wills with a full attestation clause have been admitted to probate where——ten years after the execution, the recollection of one of the witnesses was somewhat faint as to certain circumstances, Van Hooser v. Van Hooser, 1 Redf. 365; —fifteen or sixteen years after execution, the witnesses did not recollect the fact of publication and of request to sign, and the will was executed under the supervision of the attorney, although he was not allowed to testify, Re Sears, 33 Misc. 141, 68 N. Y. Supp. 363; .

—eight years after execution, one of the witnesses to the will of a solicitor testified to the effect that the testator signed before both of the attesting witnesses, but the court attached little weight to his evidence, and the other witness swore that not only did the deceased not sign in his presence, but that the signature was not on the paper at all when the witness signed,—the court considering that it could not rely on the memory of the last witness, O'Meagher v. O'Meagher, Ir. L. R. 11 Eq. 117.

A will ten years old was admitted in Re Boardman, 46 N. Y. S. R. 444, 20 N. Y. Supp. 60, where one of the subscribing witnesses was explicit in testifying that the testator signed the will in their presence, while the other had no definite recollection, but an impression that it was not signed by the testator in their presence, and that he did not observe the testator's signature. This witness had written the date of the will immediately preceding the signature of the testator, and the court thought that fact. The evidence may be direct and positive, or it may be circumstantial, and presumptive; for the law of evidence in regard to wills, as well as in regard to deeds and documentary proof generally, must have reference to the casualties of human life and the infirmities of human memory."

This is a general declaration of law that is applicable here, in view of the fact, that the subscribing witnesses could not remember, after ten years, whether Mr. Carey's signature was on the will when they signed it. In the case of Sears v. Sears, 77 Ohio St. 104, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 353, 82 N. E. 1067, 11 Ann. Cas. 1008, it appears that the statute required that the will should be signed by the testator at the end thereof. At the end of the will, before the attestation clause, he would have noticed the omission of the testator's signature had there been any omission, and that he had forgotten the details. The report is silent as to any attestation clause.

It was held that a will forty years old with a full attestation clause was sufficiently proven where two of the three witnesses were dead, and the third witness testified that the testator asked him to come to his house and witness his will, and he proved his signature to the instrument, but stated that the testator did not sign it in his presence, that this was the only occasion on which he had ever witnessed a document for the testator, that to the best of his knowledge when he signed his name the testator and one of the other witnesses were present, but that he had no recollection that the other witness had signed at the same time. Welty v. Welty, 8 Md. 15.

In Jauncey v. Thorne, 2 Barb. Ch. 40, 45 Am. Dec. 424, the court sustained a will made ten years before probate, where, of the three witnesses to the will, one recollected that the statutory formalities had been performed, another did not remember that he knew that the paper was a will, or that the testator said that it was, and the third was not sure that the testator's signature was on the paper, but believed that the testator had said it was a will. The attestation clause was incomplete as to a requirement not in controversy, but the court apparently did not place much weight upon it one way or the other.

In Cheaney v. Arnold, 18 Barb. 434, affirmed in 15 N. Y. 345, 69 Am. Dec. 609, it was held that a will twenty-five years old was sufficiently proved where one witness was dead, another was about ninety years old, nearly blind, and testified that he wrote the will according to the directions of the testator and read it over to him as he wrote it, that the witnesses subscribed their names in the presence of the testator and in the presence of each other, and the third witness, who was fifteen or sixteen years old at the time of the execution of the will, recollected that he signed his name thereto, that the other witnesses also signed their appeared a blank space where the name should have been written. It was not there. The only place where the name did appear was in the attestation clause. Under such a statute and such a state of facts, the court held that the will was not properly executed. Other cases cited could be analyzed to show such a difference in statutes or in facts as to render them inapplicable to the case at bar. On the other hand, in Orser v. Orser, 24 N. Y. 51, in a case where one of the subscribing witnesses was dead and the other could not remember that the decedent declared the instrument to be his will or acknowledged his signature, the court said: "The result of the authorities upon the probate of wills is that the question of the due execution of a will is to names as witnesses in his presence and at the same time, that the other surviving witness asked him to sign the will in the presence of the testator, and that he understood that the instrument was a will, but he imperfectly recollected what occurred. There was an attestation clause which omitted that the witnesses signed at the request of the testator, but the court does not refer expressly to this.

In Re Duffy, 127 App. Div. 174, 111 N. Y. Supp. 491, reversing 51 Misc. 543, 101 N. Y. Supp. 974, the appellate court refused to subscribe to the doctrine that witnesses could not remember what occurred at the execution of a will thirty years before, and reversed the decision of the surrogate denying probate, and directed that a trial be had before a jury. The testimony of the witnesses satisfied the statutory requirements, and one of them was the lawyer who drew the will, which contained the usual attestation clause, but the surrogate had taken the view that the witnesses could not remember the circumstances after thirty years, and therefore they could not recollect at all.

In Allaire v. Allaire, 37 N. J. L. 312, affirmed in 39 N. J. L. 113, where one of the witnesses, eight years after the will was executed, remembered practically nothing about it except that he signed his name to some document for the testator, and nine years later, on another examination, he remembered fully the circumstances, the court was of the opinion that his early forgetfulness was of little impeaching value as against his later recollection, he having stated that, by reason of litigation over the matter, he had recurred to it often and his memory had been refreshed.

Reference may here be made for convenience to the approximate time which had elapsed between the date of the will and the examination of witnesses in various cases throughout this note, viz.—

—between one and two years, Bayliss v. Sayer, 3 Notes of Cases, 22, infra, VI. a; Cregreen v. Willoughby, 6 Jur. N. S. 590, infra, XIII.; Leech v. Bates, 6 Notes of Cases, 699, infra, VI. a; see also Wyma be determined, like any other fact, in view of all the legitimate evidence in the case; and that no controlling effect is to be given to the testimony of the subscribing witnesses. Their direct participation in the transaction must, of course, give great weight to their testimony; but it is liable to be rebutted by other evidence, either direct or circumstantial: A will, duly attested upon its face, the signatures to which are all genuine, may be admitted to probate, although none of the subscribing witnesses are able to swear, from recollection, that the formalities required by the statute were complied with; and even although some of them should swear positively that they were not, if the other evidence warrants the inference that they were."

In Schouler on Wills, § 322, it is said that the result of the cases under the statute of Victoria, as to whether the testator's signature was on the will when it was produced to the witnesses for their attestation, appears to be: "That in the absence of direct evidence on the point one way or the other, the court may, independently of any positive evidence, investigate the circumstances of the case, and may form its own opinion from these circumstances and from the appearance of the document itself, whether the name of the testator was or was not upon it (or rather might not have been seen), at the time of the attestation. But the court should mainly consider whether the witnesses did not see, or at least have an opportunity of seeing, the tes-

VI. Where there is an attestation clause.

a. In general.

This note does not deal with the general question of the effect of or presumption tator's signature when they attested; for, if they did not, it is immaterial that the signature was actually there, but hidden from them." It would appear from this that in the circumstances of this case the will would be sufficiently proven under the Victorian statute, or a statute essentially like it.

The opinion in Re Shapter, 35 Colo. 578, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 575, 117 Am. St. Rep. 216, 85 Pac. 688, shows that circumstances surrounding the execution of a will may be appealed to. In the face of that decision, we do not go astray in saying that in a case like the present, where, owing to the failure of the memory of the subscribing witnesses, after the lapse of a long time, it was impossible to obtain direct testimony that Mr. Carey's signature was on the paper when the witnesses signed it, circumstances may be resorted to to supply whatever deficiency there was in that particular. Mr. Carey came into the room where the witnesses were, with pen, ink, and the paper in his hand, sat down for a moment at the table, arose, and, handing the pen to the first witness, said it was his will and asked them to sign it. What did he sit at the table for with a pen in his hand but to sign the paper? If it was his will, it was not his completed will until he had signed it, and his declaration that it was his will at that time and under such circumstances indicated that he had completed his part, and that he wanted the witnesses to attest it as completed. The usual order of signatures from a full attestation clause, while the weight of such presumption is present in most of the cases of defective memory where there is such a clause. In this subdivision the clause is supposed to be complete, at least in so far as concerns matters in doubt or controversy, and those cases dealt with at length in this subdivision are merely selected cases. At the end of this subdivision, reference is made to other cases on the subject in other subdivisions of this note.

Effect of the clause as evidence.

In Allaire v. Allaire, 37 N. J. L. 312, affirmed in 39 N. J. L. 113, the court said, there being a full attestation clause, "if the attesting witnesses, when called, admit their signatures, but through defect of memory, or for any other reason, fail to testify to the due execution of the will, it may be established on the presumption arising from the form of the attesting clause, unless there be affirmative evidence given to disprove its statements." See also Peebles v. Case, 2 Bradf. 226, infra, XIII.

In Mundy v. Mundy, 15 N. J. Eq. 290, the court said: "Mrs. Manning has a distinct recollection of the fact of her witnessing the will, but a very imperfect and confused recollection of the particulars of the transaction. In attempting to call them to remembrance, and to give them in detail, she is led into some contradictions, which afforded counsel some room for argument that the statute had not been complied with. The will has the attesting clause, which, if true, shows that all the requirements of the law were fulfilled. Although the witnesses may have forgotten whether they were all present and saw the testator sign the will, or whether he made any publication or declaration of it, the instrument ought not to be rejected on account of such mere want of recollection. The attestation clause, with the signatures of the witnesses, is prima facie evidence of the facts stated in it."

It was held to be error to decline to instruct the jury that, inasmuch as the at-testation clause to the paper propounded was in due form, a presumption that it was duly executed as a will arose, where, of the three witnesses, one testified on interrogatories to the necessary facts, one remembered nothing about the execution, and the third testified that he signed the paper at the request of the last-mentioned witness, but did not know its character and was unable to state whether or not the testator was present. Underwood v. Thurman, 111 Ga. 325, 36 S. E. 788.

That an attestation clause affords as much proof of execution in the presence of a living witness as in the presence of one since deceased was held in Orser v. Orser, 24 N. Y. 51, where the appellate court set aside the finding of a jury against the will for misdirection. The surviving witness was unable to remember any declaration or acknowledgment, but admitted that he heard some conversation between the testator and the other witness, who was an experienced scrivener, which he could not remember. The trial judge was asked to instruct the jury that they might infer from the testimony of the witness as to the conversation between the other witness and the testator, taken in connection with the certificate of attestation and the other facts found in the case, that the words of that conversation contained the necessary acknowledgment and request by the testator; but the judge, while so charging so far as related to the deceased witness, refused to do so as to the surviving witness. The appellate court held that there was no ground for distinction, and that so far as the certificate was evidence at all, it furnished as much proof that the will was executed in presence of the living witness, as in the presence of the deceased witness, as he certified that the instrument was declared to "us" by the testator.

Illustrations.

Wills with attestation clauses have been admitted to probate in cases of defective recollection of one or more of the attesting witnesses—

—where the only witness found was un-in such cases is for the testator to sign first and then the witnesses. It is said in Allen v. Griffin, 69 Wis. 529, 533, 35 N. W. 21, 22: "We think, in the absence of clear proof that the witness or witnesses signed before the signing of the testator, it should be presumed that the testator signed first. This would be the usual order of signature."

While it is not necessary that the testator sign before the witnesses, yet the usual order is that he do so. So that, in the absence of anything to the contrary, it appears from the testimony that when Mr. Carey sat down at the table with a pen in his hand, he signed the will and after him the witnesses. In Hobart v. Hobart, 154 Ill. 610, 45 Am. St. Rep. 151, 39 N. E. 581, it appeared that the statute made the able to state, fifteen years after execution, that he saw the testatrix sign her name, or that he even saw her signature upon the will, Hennes v. Huston, 81 Minn. 30, 83 N. W. 439;

—where, twenty-two or twenty-three years after execution, one witness was dead, a second had no recollection about it, and the third, while remembering some of the circumstances, was confused in her recollection and stated that the testator did not say anything when he signed, Mundy v. Mundy, supra;

—where one witness could not be found, the second had forgotten the circumstances of the execution, and the third testified to the due execution and stated that the testatrix's husband read aloud the attestation clause in the presence of the three witnesses before they signed as witnesses, Re Townley, 1 Connoly, 400, 4 N. Y. Supp. 455;

—where, seven years after the execution of the holographic will of a solicitor, one of the witnesses was dead, and, although there was no break or crowding in the attestation clause, the surviving witness testified that there was nothing on the paper that he could see when he signed except the signature of the testator and of the other witness, who signed at the same time, Lloyd v. Roberts, 12 Moore, P. C. C. 158;

—where the witnesses to a will six years old verified their signatures, but had no recollection of attesting the instrument, O'Hagan's Will, 73 Wis. 78, 9 Am. St. Rep. 763, 40 N. W. 649;

—where the recollection of some of the witnesses to a will twenty-nine years old was deficient, Hanley v. Kraftczyk, 119 Wis. 352, 96 N. W. 820;

—where there were some absences of recollection and some discrepancies in the testimony of the attesting witnesses to instruments one and two years old, Leech v. Bates, 6 Notes of Cases, 699;

—where there was doubt or want of recollection of one of the witnesses to a will two or three years old, McCurdy v. Neall, 42 N. J. Eq. 333, 7 Atl. 566 (not necessary to decision);

—where, eight years after the date of a will the subject of attestation and acknowledgment. One of the subscribing witnesses was dead. The other testified that the deceased witness was her husband; that the testator and his wife brought the will to her house. It was not stated that the testator had signed it, and she could not remember whether his signature was there or not. He declared it was his will and asked the witness to sign it. The court said: "While it is true that the witness cannot remember seeing the signature, yet she cannot say positively that she did not see it. It is clear, however, that the testator produced before the subscribing witnesses an instrument in writing which he stated to be his will, and asked them to sign it as witnesses. A will must be re-will, one of the witnesses testified fully as to its due execution, and the other two witnesses did not remember whether the testator or his son-in-law asked them to sign, one of them having a vague recollection that it was the son-in-law, Nelson v. McGiffert, 3 Barb. Ch. 158, 49 Am. Dec. 170;

—where the witnesses, sixteen years afterward, did not remember any declaration or request, Re Sears, 33 Misc. 141, 68 N. Y. Supp. 363;

—where, a few months after the execution of the will of a barrister, two of the witnesses testified that the will was not signed in their presence, while a third stated that it was so signed, Chambers v. Queen's Proctor, 2 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 415;

—where one of the witnesses thought that the other witness did not see the testator sign the will, but the second witness positively testified to the contrary, Farley v. Farley, 50 N. J. Eq. 434, 26 Atl. 178;

—where, ten years after execution, one witness thought he saw the testator sign, but was not certain, and the other witness had no recollection of seeing him write, the court holding that signing or acknowledgment might be presumed, Butler v. Benson, 1 Barb. 526;

—where one witness testified fully as to the execution according to the statutory requirements, and the other did not recollect that the testatrix signed the will, or that he saw her signature, and denied without qualification that the signature of the testatrix was upon the paper witnessed by him, Re Bernsee, 141 N. Y. 389, 36 N. E. 314, cited in Re Buel, 44 App. Div. 4, 60 N. Y. Supp. 385;

—where one of the witnesses to a will on a blank, the written art being in the testator's handwriting, testified sufficiently, but the other witness denied the declaration and request and stated that he did not know whether the testator's signature was on the paper at the time but that he did know it was a will, Re Bassett, 84 Misc. 656, 146 N. Y. Supp. 842;

—where both of the witnesses to a codicil two years old testified, before seeing the paper, that they signed before the testatrix, duced to writing, and signed by the testator, or by someone in his presence and under his direction. The words, 'said will,' in § 2, refer back to a will reduced to writing and signed. An instrument not in writing and not signed is not a will. When the testator called the paper his will, it will be presumed, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that he had signed it, inasmuch as a signature was necessary to justify him in calling it a will. Included in the declaration of the testator to the witnesses that the paper was his will was the further declaration that he had signed it. Where the testator declares to the witnesses that the instrument is his will, or requests them to attest his will, such declaration or request implies that the same has been signed by him. Nickerson v. Buck, 12 Cush. 332. In the latter case it was said: 'The request to these witnesses to attest his will was quite enough to authorize the inference that he had executed a paper as a will, and was equivalent to his acknowledgment that he had signed some paper as a will.' The fact that a testator seeks the attestation of witnesses, and gives directions to them as to signing their names, furnishes strong presumptive proof that he had signed the will. Dewey v. Dewey, 1 Met. 349, 35 Am. Dec. 367. Where a testator took a paper from his desk, and asked a witness to sign it, and pointed out the place where he wished him to put his name, and the witness did so, not knowing what the paper was, and not noticing the signa-but after seeing it one of them testified that she saw the testatrix sign before the witnesses did, and the other witness seemed to adhere to her former opinion, but in such a manner as to enable the court to think that her recollection was loose, Brenchley v. Still, 2 Rob. Eccl. Rep. 162;

—where, four years after execution, a witness testified that she did not see the testatrix sign the paper or declare it to be her will, although she heard the other subscribing witness ask the testatrix whether she did acknowledge it, and the other witness, who was the lawyer who drew the will, testified as to its due execution, Re Bedell, 2 Connolly, 328, 12 N. Y. Supp. 96, (where the attestation clause contained, besides the usual words, the statement that "she at the time of making such subscription acknowledged that she made the same");

—where the testimony taken two years after execution was not very satisfactory as to seeing the testator sign and as to the acknowledgment and declaration, and the attestation clause was complete in these respects, Peck v. Cary, 27 N. Y. 9, 84 Am. Dec. 220 (where it was claimed in a dissenting opinion that the witnesses remembered what had occurred);

—where the due execution of a holographic will a few months old was proved by one of the subscribing witnesses, though the other, an heir and next of kin, testified that he did not know, when signing, what the instrument was, and the attestation clause was "signed, sealed, and published by the said testament [sic] to be his testament in the presence of," Bogart's Estate, 6 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 128, affirming 4 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 441;

—where the recollection of the witnesses to a holographic will a few months old was incomplete, and they testified that the will was not signed in their presence, the attestation clause being "Signed and Published by the Above Nam John Thompson Our presene," Gregory v. Dyke, 4 Notes of Cases, 620;

—where the witnesses did not remember the act of publication, nor whether they knew from the act of publication the testamentary nature of an instrument executed a few days before testator's death, Re Gahagan, — N. J. —, 89 Atl. 771;

—where, on cross-examination, the recollection of the witnesses to a will two years old signed by mark was insufficient as to some of the requirements, but one of the witnesses stated that he read over the attestation clause aloud to the other witness in the hearing and presence of the testatrix, Re Engler, 56 Misc. 218, 107 N. Y. Supp. 222;

—where the witnesses were unable to say, when examined five years after execution, that they signed as witnesses at the request of the testatrix, or that she at that time declared the instrument to be her will, it being undisputed that they were requested by someone to become witnesses to a will, and that they attended on the occasion of the execution of the will in pursuance of such request, Brown v. Clark, 77 N. Y. 369 (where the question was probably not necessary to the decision of the case);

—where, two years after execution, one witness remembered nothing about the matter, a second witness stated that he and the first witness had signed at the request and in the presence of the testator, who told them it was his will, but that he saw no writing upon it, and the third witness, whose name was last in order, testified to all the legal requirements as to the witnessing by himself alone, except that the testator did not sign or acknowledge his signature in the presence of the witness, Dewey v. Dewey, 1 Met. 349, 35 Am. Dec. 367;

—where the subscribing witnesses were at first inclined to think that they signed at a certain desk where the testatrix could not have seen them, instead of at a certain table where she could have done so, but later were uncertain, and two other witnesses testified that the subscribing witnesses signed at the table, and a third that they signed at the desk, the court considering that the presumption from the attestation clause had not been overcome, Tappen v. Davidson, 27 N. J. Eq. 459, reversing decree refusing probate; ture on the paper, it was held that there was a good attestation of the will. Ela v. Edwards, 16 Gray, 91."

In Mead v. Presbyterian Church, 229 Ill. 526, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 255, 82 N. E. 371, 11 Ann. Cas. 426, there was no attestation clause to the will, but the name of the testator and of the two witnesses appeared at the end, as is precisely the case here. Boswell, one of the subscribing witnesses, identified his signature as such witness, and said that he had no recollection of the transaction. The other witness, Paul, identified his signature and testified that he signed the instrument at the request of the testator, but had no recollection of anything that was said at the time he signed the instrument, or whether the other witness was present or not. The court held that the evidence was sufficient to admit the will to probate. The instrument was in the handwriting of the testator. It was found among his private papers after his death, duly signed and witnessed. And the court said there was "nothing lacking in the evidence to show a legal execution of the will, save that the attesting witnesses, by lapse of time, could not recollect the facts surrounding the execution of the instrument by Mead Holmes as his last will and testament. To lay down as a rule of law that the failure of the attesting witnesses to recollect all the facts surrounding the execution of a will would defeat its probate would be, in many instances, to defeat the probate of wills where there is —where both of the subscribing witnesses to a will which, so far as reported, was about three years old, testified that they were not present at the execution of the will, and that they did not sign the attestation clause, and their signatures were proved by experts, Re Cottrell, 95 N. Y. 329;

—where, three years after the execution, one of the subscribing witnesses stated that the paper offered was a forgery, and that the paper she witnessed at the time alleged was a different paper, and the other witness stated that the will offered was executed at a time different from that alleged, Keating v. Brooks, 4 Notes of Cases, 253.

See also as admitting a will with a full attestation clause where there was a deficiency of memory or recollection, Hunn v. Case, 1 Redf. 307, where the facts are obscurely reported.

In Theological Seminary v. Calhoun, 25 N. Y. 422, it was held to be error to refuse to admit the will to probate, when one of the subscribing witnesses testified that it was duly executed and that the testator had told the other witness that the document was his will and explained it to her at length, and such other witness testified that the declaration and explanation were made to her by the first witness, but whether he read the attestation clause to her or not she did not remember, that the testator was quite deaf, and that she did not think he heard all that the first witness said to her, and that he did not state to her that the document was his will.

In Wright v. Sanderson, L. R. 9 Prob. Div. 149, 53 L. J. Prob. N. S. 49, 50 L. T. N. S. 769, 32 Week. Rep. 560, 48 J. P. 180, the court refused to reverse a decree of probate of a holographic codicil with an attestation clause, where above the clause the testator had signed and the witnesses had also signed below the word "witness," and on the next page the testator had again signed at the right of the attestation clause and the witnesses had signed at the foot of that clause, but four years afterward recollected nothing except the request for them to sign and making their signatures, and could not testify that they saw any signature of the testator on the paper, or that they read any writing upon it at all.

In Taylor v. Brodhead, 5 Redf. 624, it was said that the attestation clause, together with the positive testimony of one witness, was sufficient in case of lack of recollection of the other witness, who did not remember that the attestation clause was read over.

Rejection of will with attestation clause.

A full attestation clause will be overborne by countervailing facts. Adams v. Rodman, 102 Wis. 456, 78 N. W. 588, 759, infra, X.; Re Berdan, 65 N. J. Eq. 681, 55 Atl. 728, infra, VIII.; Lewis v. Lewis, 11 N. Y. 220, infra, this subdivision. See also cases infra, b.

"Where the memory of witnesses is at fault in establishing a real or necessary incident attending the formal execution of a will, the attestation clause comes to the support of its validity, and the law will presume a due execution from the recitation of the requisite facts therein, or even without it, upon the hypothesis that the requirements of the law have been duly observed. . . . But it is not effective as against positive and convincing proof to the contrary." Mendenhall's Will, 43 Or. 542, 72 Pac. 318, 73 Pac. 1033 (will about three years old).

In Re Solomon, 145 N. Y. Supp. 528, the court said: "In this proceeding, unfortunately, as I believe, the testimony of the attesting witnesses of a noncompliance with the statute of wills is too positive to be overcome by a presumption from the very full certificate of attestation contradicting the attesting witnesses. Had the witnesses admitted a loss of memory, I should have presumed for the will despite their testimony; but the cross-examination only made them the more positive that they remembered all that took place. What took place, according to them, defeats probate."

In Lewis v. Lewis, 11 N. Y. 220, the court declined to reverse the decision of the surrogate refusing to admit to probate a will no reasonable question but that they were executed by the testator or testatrix with all the formalities required by law, which is in conflict with the decisions of this and many other courts of last resort."

What the appellant desires this court to say is that, although the subscribing witnesses testified directly to all the requirements of the statute for the attestation and acknowledgment of the will, except as to the presence of Mr. Carey's signature thereon at the time they signed it, the will was not proven to have been duly executed. Such an announcement as that would result in the overthrow of most of the wills that are made, and would be almost a deprivation of the statutory right to make a will.

containing a full attestation clause, where one of the subscribing witnesses testified to the witnessing of the instrument by himself and the other subscribing witness, and said that the paper was so folded that it could not be seen whether there was any signature of the testator, and that the testator had said: "I declare the within to be my free will and deed," and had asked them to sign it, and the other witness remembered nothing about the execution except that he had witnessed the paper in the testator's office, and his recollection was that the testator had asked him to sign it.

In Re De Haas, 9 App. Div. 561, 41 N. Y. Supp. 696, the court reversed the decree of the surrogate admitting the will to probate, and ordered a new trial before a jury, where the two surviving witnesses could not remember whether the testator had signed in the presence of the witnesses, or had acknowledged his signature to them, but one of them testified that the testator read over the attestation clause to him, which stated that the will was signed in the presence of the subscribing witnesses. Probably the reason of the decision in this case is that, while the events were then ten years old, the two surviving witnesses testified with some clearness as to what had occurred.

And see as to will signed by a mark, Worden v. Van Gieson, 6 Dem. 237, infra, XII., and compare Re Kane, 2 Connolly, 249, 20 N. Y. Supp. 123, infra, XII.

An attestation clause may not always be sufficient to insure probate where there is an absence of direct proof of due execution. Woolley v. Woolley, 95 N. Y. 231, infra, X.

In Hopper's Will, Tucker, 378, a will about two years old with a full attestation clause was rejected on the ground that the testator did not declare it to be his will to the subscribing witnesses, who, while somewhat doubtful in their recollection, all had the idea that he did tell them it was his will. The surrogate apparently was governed by evidence showing that they subsequently had made statements not in accord with their testimony, and he apparently 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

It is plain therefore that the proponents, by evidence direct and circumstantial, made prima facie proof of the due attestation and acknowledgment of the will in question, and, as there was no evidence in the case to in any manner overcome the prima facie proof, the evidence was conclusive.

This conclusion also disposes of objections made to instructions given and refused, and relating to this branch of the case, for under the evidence the jury could not have found otherwise than that the will was executed and proven as the statute requires.

In the will, the testator, Mr. Carey, gave $500 to a friend and the remainder of his property to Richard Price, the proponent and appellee, and it was expressly stated in the will that it was made to prevent any arrived at the conclusion that they did not recollect any declaration.

A proponent cannot expect that the attestation clause will cover lapse of memory of the witnesses or reconcile contradictions in their testimony as to the method of execution when the instrument is on its face defectively executed. Re Kunkler, 147 N. Y. Supp. 1094.

property from going to the testator's brother, the contestant and appellant.

The issue of want of mental capacity of the testator was raised. This issue was submitted to the jury and found against the contestant. The issue of undue influence was also raised, and on this issue the court instructed the jury to find for the proponent, and against the contestant. Error is assigned on this direction of the court. In a will contest, as in ordinary civil actions, the court may direct a verdict when the facts require it. Re Shell, 28 Colo. 167, 53 L.R.A. 387, 89 Am. St. Rep. 181, 63 Pac. 413. All that the evidence discloses as to influence exerted by Price is that Price transacted considerable business for the testator during many years of their acquaintance, especially in selling cattle. They lived some distance apart. Price and the testator visited each other's home frequently and were warm personal friends. Aside from this, there is utter want of testimony that Price influenced the making of the will. It is claimed that this established a fiduciary relation between them. This claim cannot be sustained. The direct opposite was held in Snodgrass v. Smith, 42 Colo. 60, 94 Pac. 312, 15 Ann. Cas. 548, where it was said: "It is not true, as contestant says, that the fact that proponent was the cousin and friend, the nurse and business partner, of testatrix, gave rise to a fiduciary relation between them. The contrary has been expressly ruled." There

b. Where clause is not read.

Where the proof is clear and positive that the attestation clause was not read to or by the witnesses, it carries no proof of the recitals therein.

Thus, in Re Shaffer, 2 How. Pr. N. S. 494, probate was refused of a will probably about three years old, where one of the subscribing witnesses testified that he did not read the attestation clause, did not know the paper was a will, and thought he must have remembered it if the testatrix had so informed him, and the other subscribing witness remembered nothing. There was also the testimony of an unattesting witness, but it was not sufficient to satisfy the court.

So, probate was revoked in Re Simmons, 30 N. Y. S. R. 446, 9 N. Y. Supp. 352, where the witnesses were definite in testifying about six years after execution, and their testimony showed that some of the requirements were omitted, and that the attestation clause was not read to or by them or its substance stated to them, and that they did not know its contents.

Similarly, in Brinckerhoff v. Remsen, 8 Paige, 488, the court reversed the decision of the surrogate admitting to probate a will five or six years old, which contained a complete attestation clause, where one of the witnesses testified that no part of the paper was read by the witnesses except the last line of the attestation clause, and that there was no statement made that the instrument was a will, although the witnesses testified that the decedent signed the paper in their presence, and that they signed at her request, and that she acknowledged it to be her hand and seal for the purpose therein expressed, as one of the witnesses put it, or to be her signature for the uses and purposes therein mentioned, as the other seems to have put it.

In Croft v. Croft, 11 Jur. N. S. 183, 4 Swabey & T. 10, 34 L. J. Prob. N. S. 44, 11 L. T. N. S. 781, 13 Week. Rep. 526, it was held that a will could not be admitted to probate where the attestation clause was not read by the witnesses, and each witness denied the presence of the other; each denied that he saw the testator sign or that he saw his signature or that the testator acknowledged his signature; one testified that the paper was so folded that he could see nothing, and that he was asked to sign it; the other testified that he was asked to sign the testator's will.

In McCord v. Lounsbury, 5 Dem. 68, the surrogate declined to admit to probate a will on a printed blank, where the attestation clause was not read to or by the subscribing witnesses, where one of the witnesses testified positively that all that occurred was that the testator signed the paper, and that she and the other witness then signed as witnesses, and the other subscribing witness, whose memory was not very clear, testified that the scrivener asked him to sign, which he did, and the other witness signed after him. The scrivener, who was not an attesting witness, testified that the statutory requirements were carried out.

In Wilson v. Hetterick, 2 Bradf. 427, the surrogate rejected a will three months old, where one of the witnesses testified that he read the last two words of the attestation clause, to wit, "attesting witnesses," and both of the witnesses recollected the matter with considerable clearness, and stated that the testator asked them to witness an instrument in writing, and on being pressed they said that they did not recollect that he said it was a will, — they did not remember that he used any such expression.

A presumption as to the facts in the attestation clause having been performed is destroyed when the signature of the deceased and the clause itself are concealed from the

is no evidence whatever, circumstantial or otherwise, that Price unduly influenced the making of the will. The fact that he and the testator were friends, and that he showed some acts of neighborly kindness towards and transacted business for the testator, no doubt influenced the latter to make Price his legatee. It cannot be expected that a man will leave his property to another not related to him by ties of blood and family, unless that other has shown friendliness toward him and a disposition to help him when in need. Such kindness, friendliness, and disposition cannot be said to be undue influence.

It is said in the brief that the disposition of the testator's property was unnatural and capricious, and that this was a fact to be considered on the question of undue influence. The testator had left his home in England about forty years before his death, and during all that time had been separated from his brother and had no communication with him. During the nine or ten years that intervened between the making of the will and his death, the testator told several people that he had made a will leaving his property to Price. He told some of them that he did not want his brother to have any of his property.

knowledge and observation of the attesting witnesses. Lewis v. Lewis, 13 Barb. 17, affirmed in 11 N. Y. 220, where the testimony of the witnesses taken about two years after execution was reasonably clear so far as it went.

In Connery v. Connery, 166 Mich. 601, 132 N. W. 448, it was held that the positive statement of the witness that he never read the attestation clause or knew its contents overcame any presumption, and that it was error to instruct the jury that it was not important that the witness did not recollect that the testatrix was present when he signed, and that there was a presumption that the witness signed it in the manner in which the attestation clause stated that he had signed it; the court considered that the matter was one for the jury, and seemed to doubt whether there was any presumption except in uncontested cases.

Where there is no lack of memory, and there is no dispute that the attestation clause was not read to or by the witnesses, their clear recollection will not be overborne by that clause and by the testimony of a third person supplying almost every deficiency in the testimony of the attesting witnesses. Re Hitchler, 25 Misc. 365, 55 N. Y. Supp. 642.

But probate will not always be refused where there is a lack of direct evidence, although an attesting witness testifies that he did not read the attestation clause (Re Jones, 85 N. Y. Supp. 294), or although the evidence is that the paper was so folded that the witnesses could not see the clause (Thomson v. Hall, 2 Rob. Eccl. Rep. 426).

Thus, the surrogate's refusal of probate was reversed, the court deciding that enough was proved to show a legal declaration although the attestation clause was not read to two of the three witnesses and the surrogate thought that their testimony negatived it as to the declaration, but that as to the third witness there had been a good execution. Re Balmforth, 60 Misc. 492, 113 N. Y. Supp. 934.

In Re Jones, supra, in admitting a recently dated will where the testimony of the subscribing witnesses was somewhat contradictory, and it was doubtful whether either of them had read the attestation clause, and one of them denied doing it, the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

court said: "When the statements of two subscribing witnesses are at variance in respect to some of the essential facts, admitting that each intends to be truthful, courts will not presume that the testimony which would go to avoid the instrument shall be accepted against that of the other, which proves it, unless there is sustaining evidence showing that the instrument itself was the result of fraud or imposition upon the testator. I am convinced that Mrs. O'Neill's recollection of the facts is to be trusted on the points in which she and Carpenter disagree. With a full attestation clause, if any presumption arises, it is in favor of due execution, even though the event was of recent occurrence."

In Thomson v. Hall, supra, a holographic will of one educated for the law was admitted to probate where the testimony, taken two years after the execution, was to the effect that the paper was so folded that the witnesses could not see the attestation clause; that while they saw the testator write something on the instrument as he entered the room, they did not know whether it was his signature or not; and there seems to have been no evidence of any declaration on his part. The court seems to have been of the opinion that the two attesting witnesses and a third witness were suffering from imperfect recollection.

VII. Absence of attestation clause.

This note does not discuss the general question of the result and effect of, or presumption from, the absence of any attestation clause. For necessity of attestation clause to will, see note to Mead v. Presbyterian Church, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 255.

A review of the probate of wills without attestation clauses must necessarily be incomplete on account of the considerable number of cases in which the report gives no information as to whether there is or is not such clause on the will. There are comparatively few cases of lack of recollection by subscribing witnesses where the absence of an attestation clause is an important element of the case as reported. A few cases of defective attestation clauses are cited under this subdivision, and some others will be found under VI. a, supra.

because, as he said, his brother had done him a great wrong. He also stated that he knew the Prices would take care of him in his old age when he needed care.

Under such circumstances, it was certainly not capricious or unnatural for him to make the will as he did. There is in this state a statute giving the right to make wills, as well as a statute of descent and distribution. People are given their choice of these statutes. The testator, in this case, chose to avail himself of his right to make a will. Neither courts nor juries ought to deprive a man of that right simply because he may dispose of his property in a manner not satisfactory to them.

On the whole record, it appears plainly that this will was the free and voluntary act of George Strachan Carey, and that he did precisely what he wanted to do without any undue influence whatever, and no other conclusion can be drawn from the testimony. Under such circumstances, the court was right in directing the jury as it did on the question of undue influence. Perceiving no prejudicial error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

As heretofore suggested, this note does not deal with the general question whether, in the absence of an attestation clause, there is or is not any presumption that omnia rite esse acta, and there seem to be few cases within our subject which discuss the question.

In Deupree v. Deupree, 45 Ga. 415, where the will was about seven years old, it was held that from the signature of the testator and the attestation of the witnesses, without reference to an attestation clause, the presumption of proper execution of the will arises where the witnesses do not distinctly remember. The failure to recollect was on the point as to whether the testator was present when the witnesses signed, and it was held that this was a question to be submitted to the jury.

See also in this connection in this subdivision Young v. Barner; Vinnicombe v. Butler; and Leach's Goods; and compare Re Beggans, infra, this subdivision.

Probate has been granted of wills without attestation clauses—

—where the only surviving witness testified definitely as to all the requirements except the declaration, as to the words of 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

which she was not certain, but to her best recollection the testatrix made a statement about it, Vernon v. Vernon, 69 N. J. Eq. 759, 61 Atl. 409; —where the testimony of one witness to a holographic will about two years old was sufficient, but that of the other was deficient, Re Eldred, 109 App. Div. 777, 96 N. Y. Supp. 435;

—where one of the witnesses to a holographic will deposed that he saw the testatrix sign the will in the presence of himself and the other witness, the other witness not recollecting whether the testatrix signed her name in his presence or not, Hare's Goods, 3 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 54;

—where the will was not signed in the presence of the witnesses, and none of them could recollect whether the signature of the testator was upon it when they signed, although there were only a few months between the execution and the probate, Re Attridge, 6 Notes of Cases, 597;

—where one of the witnesses to a will about a year old testified that she did not think she saw the signature of the testator when she signed, and the position of the two signatures on the paper was such that she must have seen it, the court holding that she was mistaken, Re Stockwell, 17 Misc. 108, 40 N. Y. Supp. 734.

On the other hand, probate was denied of a will about six years old without an attestation clause, where one of the witnesses testified positively that there was no declaration that the paper was a will, and that he did not know it was such when he witnessed it, and the other witness testified she was satisfied that it was a will, but could not recall whether she got this idea from anything said by the testatrix at the time, or from something that the testatrix had told her before of her intention to make a will. Newton's Will, Tucker, 349.

Partial or defective attestation clauses.

There is some difference of opinion in the courts as to the effect of defective attestation clauses.

In Young v. Barner, 27 Gratt, 96, where the only attestation clause was the words, "In presence of," and there was doubt as to whether a certain one of the attesting witnesses had signed in the presence of the testatrix, the court, in pronouncing for the will, which was only four months old, said: "If the witnesses to the will are dead, or if there is a failure of recollection on their part, the court will often presume (the will being in other respects regular) that the requirements of the statute have been complied with in the formal execution of the instrument."

In Vinnicombe v. Butler, 10 Jur. N. S. 1109, probate was granted of a will seven years old which had no attestation clause, where each of the witnesses had signed at the right of a separate clause, which read in each case, "Witness this my hand." Three of the witnesses did not recollect any circumstances whatever attending the execution, and the fourth, while stating that the testatrix signed in her presence, thought that she herself had signed before the testatrix, but was not sure of it. The court said: "The principle, Omnia rite esse acta, as regards presence, applies with more or less force, according to the circumstances of each case. Where a regular attestation clause is found, the court may presume that all things were done in accordance with its terms, and the mere failure of memory of the witnesses will go for nothing. If there be no attestation clause, or it does not express that the will was executed in accordance with the requirements of the statute, the principle will not apply with the same force. I cannot, looking at the manner and form in which this paper was signed, presume that the testatrix was acquainted with what the law required. On the other hand, it will be the desire of the court not to allow a will to be defeated, where, from the lapse of time and failure of memory, it cannot be proved that the prescribed order of the signatures has been followed; it will be still more reluctant to pronounce against a will, if it be proved that the signature of the deceased has been really attached, and that the parties attended as witnesses at her request."

And in Leach's Goods, 12 Jur. 381, where the attestation clause is reported as "not being sufficiently full," and the witnesses did not remember whether they were both present when the will was executed, six years before, the court held that the presumption was in favor of due execution, and pronounced for the will.

So, wills have been admitted to probate—

—where there was no attestation clause except the word "witness," and the witnesses were unable, three years later, to recollect whether or not the signature of the testator was upon the instrument when they signed it, Gwillim v. Gwillim, 3 Swabey & T. 200, 29 L. J. Prob. N. S. 31; see also Mead v. Presbyterian Church and Kaul v. Lyman, supra, III.;

—where there was no attestation clause except the word "witness," although the surviving witness, while testifying as to the other requirements sixteen years afterward, stated that, as he remembered, the testatrix and he were the only persons present at the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

time, and that the signatures of the other two witnesses were not subscribed in his presence, but that he remembered that he made a suggestion to the deceased at the time he signed the will that another witness ought to be present, Thomas's Goods, 1 Swabey & T. 255, 28 L. J. Prob. N. S. 33, 5 Jur. N. S. 104, 7 Week. Rep. 270;

—where the only attestation clause was "Witnesses at signing," and one of the attesting witnesses testified to the statutory requirements, while the other stated that certain of them were not observed, she being interested in a book at the time, and not paying much attention, Swain v. Edmunds, 53 N. J. Eq. 142, 32 Atl. 369, affirmed in 54 N. J. Eq. 438, 37 Atl. 1117.

See also RE CAREY, where the only attestation clause was "Witnessed by."

Similarly, in Eliot v. Eliot, 10 Allen, 357, the court affirmed a decree of probate of a will twelve years old, which, after the death of the testator, was found in the probate court signed by the testator, and following his signature were the words "Witness to signature," with the names of three witnesses, one of them being dead and his signature being admitted, although the other two did not recollect the testator or any of the circumstances, but each testified respectively that his own signature was genuine, and that he had no doubt that the testator signed or acknowledged the will in his presence.

In Burgoyne v. Showler, 1 Rob. Eccl. Rep. 5, a will four and a half years old was admitted to probate, where the attestation clause was defective as to the signature of the testator being made or acknowledged in the presence of both witnesses, present at the same time, and the witnesses did not remember the presence of each other, and one of them did not recollect seeing the testator sign.

On the other hand, it was held in Re Beggans, 68 N. J. Eq. 572, 59 Atl. 874, that an imperfect attestation clause raises no presumption as to the facts not stated in it; and where the attestation clause did not state that the witnesses signed in the presence of the testatrix and they both testified that they signed in an adjoining room, and, according to the testimony of one of them, they signed in such a position that the testatrix could have seen them, and, according to the testimony of the other, in such a position that the testatrix could not have seen them, it was held that the presumption which arose from their signing in the next room, that the testatrix could not have seen them sign, was not rebutted, and the will was refused probate on this ground, and on the further ground that the witnesses were diametrically opposed in their testimony as to whether they signed before or after the testatrix.

In Ludlow v. Ludlow, 36 N. J. Eq. 597, where the will was about three years old, it was held that a defective attestation clause, together with clear testimony of two of the attesting witnesses, as to what did occur, which was insufficient as to some of the requirements, was not enough to prove the will, although the third attesting witness had made a formal affidavit before the surrogate of the statutory requirements. Here there seems to have been no failure of memory.

It may be noted that in Dean v. Dean, 27 Vt. 746, where the court declined to set aside a verdict for the will, there seems to have been evidence as to the matter omitted from the attestation clause.

VIII. Holographic wills.

Cases are excluded where the statutes do not require witnesses to holographic wills. Generally, as to necessity of witnesses to holographic wills, see note to La Rue v. Lee, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 968.

That a will is holographic makes for the validity of its execution.

Thus, that the will is holographic is a favorable element for its probate in case of the forgetfulness of the subscribing witnesses. Barnwall v. Murrell, 108 Ala. 366, 18 So. 831, supra, II.

See also in this connection, Re Carey, 24 App. Div. 531, 49 N. Y. Supp. 32, supra, V.; Bogert's Estate, 6 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 128, supra, VI. a; Re Hunt, 110 N. Y. 278, 18 N. E. 106, infra, XI.; Lloyd v. Roberts, 12 Moore, P. C. C. 138, the same; Gregory v. Dyke, 4 Notes of Cases, 620 the same; Wright v. Sanderson, L. R. 9 Prob. Div. 149, 53 L. J. Prob. N. S. 49, 50 L. T. N. S. 769, 32 Week. Rep. 560, 48 J. P. 180, the same; Thomson v. Hall, 2 Rob. Eccl. Rep. 426, supra, VI. b; Hare's Goods, 3 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 54, supra, VII.; RE CAREY.

Thus, holographic wills have been admitted in the absence of complete recollection of the witnesses—

—where the testimony of one witness was sufficient, and that of the other was deficient, and there was no attestation clause, Re Eldred, 109 App. Div. 777, 96 N. Y. Supp. 435, where the will was about two years old;

—where the will was written on a printed form, and one witness testified sufficiently, but was contradicted by the other witness, whose memory the surrogate considered to be at fault, Re Stillman, 2 Connolly, 207, 9 N. Y. Supp. 446, where nothing is reported as to any attestation clause;

—where the only surviving witness had no recollection of the execution, from twenty-seven to thirty years afterward, but was satisfied that he must have been asked to sign, as he would not otherwise have signed, Verdier v. Verdier, 8 Rich. L. 135, where nothing is reported as to any attestation clause.

In Cooper v. Bockett, 3 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 648, the court admitted to probate a recent holographic will, where the only attestation clause was the words, "Witnesses to the said will," and the testimony indicated that the testator signed after the witnesses, and one of the attesting witnesses swore that the two witnesses signed the paper by the direction of the deceased, who then took the pen and wrote, and, when he had done so, said: "This is my name in your presence;" that he did not see all that the testator wrote, but he saw him make the large "R" of his name. The second witness deposed in effect that she and the other witness signed the will by the desire of the deceased, who then wrote something, but what she could not say, and said: "This is my will and my name in your presence." It would appear from the appearance of the instrument, the latter part of which was given in the report, that the testimony of the first witness was correct, but the court considered that it was a case of defective recollection, though only a short time had passed between execution and probate.

It may be noted that in Re Akers, 74 App. Div. 461, 77 N. Y. Supp. 643, affirmed in 173 N. Y. 620, 66 N. E. 1103, the question seems to have been one not of want of recollection, but of the sufficiency of the facts recollected.

Holographic wills with attestation clauses.

Holographic wills with full attestation clauses have been admitted to probate—

—where the testimony of the witnesses about two years after execution was quite insufficient as to the statutory requirements, Re Sanderson, 9 Misc. 574, 30 N. Y. Supp. 848;

—where the only surviving witness testified as follows, referring to his signature: "I should think I should call it mine; it is my handwriting; I have no recollection whatever of signing this will, or having it brought there, or of anything in relation to it," the court considering that, from the wording of the instrument and the mode of its execution, it was evident that the testator was familiar with the execution of wills, Lawrence v. Norton, 30 How. Pr. 232, 45 Barb. 448, reversing Tucker, 243;

—where the only surviving attesting witness of a will remembered eleven years afterward that the testator had sent for him, and when he arrived informed him that he wished him to witness his will, and leaving the room came back later with a document which the witness signed, and which was the will, and he did not recollect anything further, except that the other witness was present at the time, but it was his opinion that the testator did not sign the instrument while he was there, Norton v. Norton, 2 Redf. 6;

—where a codicil eight years old, with an attestation clause, took all the space to the bottom of the page, and the witnesses had signed on the opposite page under the word "witness," and they recollected absolutely nothing whatever about the transaction, but identified their signatures, Woodhouse v. Balfour, L. R. 13 Prob. Div. 2, 57 L. J. Prob. N. S. 22, 58 L. T. N. S. 59, 36 Week. Rep. 368, 52 J. P. 7;

—where the witnesses to a will seven years old, on a printed blank, testified that the attestation clause was read over before they signed, and one of them had no recollection about having seen the testator sign, or whether his signature was upon the paper when the witnesses signed, and the other witness thought that he saw the signature of the testator, and stated that he would not have signed if he had not seen the testator sign, but he did not recollect that he saw him sign, Re Wilcox, 37 N. Y. S. R. 462, 14 N. Y. Supp. 109, directing probate to issue and reversing a decree refusing probate;

—where the only signature of the testatrix was in the attestation clause, and the surviving subscribing witness, four years afterward, recollected only signing her name just after the deceased witness had written his, and at his request, he stating it was the testatrix's will, and she "thought" the testatrix was in the room, Torre's Goods, 8 Jur. N. S. 494;

—where one of the subscribing witnesses to the will of an experienced testator had but a faint recollection of the matter, and the other denied the presence of his co-witness, but his memory was shown to be unreliable in that he stated that he had witnessed no other will, although it appeared that he had witnessed an earlier will of the same testator, witnessed also by the same co-witness and another person, Reeves v. Lindsay, Ir. Rep. 3 Eq. 309;

—where, upon probate of a lawyer's (holographic) will, twenty months old, having a full attestation clause, two of the three witnesses deposed to its due execution, and a year or more thereafter they testified, denying most of the statutory requirements (nothing being reported as to the third witness), Wyman v. Wyman, 118 App. Div. 109, 103 N. Y. Supp. 64, affirmed in 197 N. Y. 524, 90 N. E. 1167; see also 118 App. Div. 116, 103 N. Y. Supp. 69.

The court considered it of particular value that the attestation clause was in the handwriting of the testator, as showing that he knew the statutory requirements, in Re Alpaugh, 23 N. J. Eq. 507, where the decree of probate of a holographic will with a full attestation clause was affirmed. The witnesses testified that the testator, after his name was signed to the will, took it in his hands and declared it to be his last will, and asked them to sign as witnesses, but none of them testified that he saw the testator sign it, or that he acknowledged the signature. The court stated that if the attesting witnesses had testified that they did not recollect whether the will was signed in their presence, the effect would be the same.

In Re Claffin, 73 Vt. 129, 87 Am. St. Rep. 693, 50 Atl. 815, it was held to be error to direct a verdict against the holographic will of an experienced testator with a full attestation clause, where six years had elapsed between the execution and the trial, although one of the subscribing witnesses could recollect nothing about the matter, and the testimony of the other subscribing witnesses fell short of showing due execution. This case again came before the court after another trial resulting in a decision against the will in 75 Vt. 19, 58 L.R.A. 261, 52 Atl. 1053, which decision was again reversed, but on other grounds, the court pointing out that it was important and proper to show that the testator knew how wills ought to be executed.

In Re Sizer, 129 App. Div. 7, 113 N. Y. Supp. 210, affirmed in 195 N. Y. 528, 88 N. E. 772, it was held that a holographic will on a printed blank, with an attestation clause, was sufficiently proved although two of the subscribing witnesses testified about eight and one-half years after execution that they had no recollection of anything about it, and the third witness testified that, at the request of the testator, he went to his store to witness his signature, and there signed a paper under the names of the two preceding witnesses; that he did not know what the paper was, and that the testator did not say; that he saw one of the witnesses in the back part of the store, but not the other. The court seemed to consider that, as two witnesses were all that were required, practically the only question in the case was whether the testimony of the last witness was sufficient to offset the presumption of the attestation clause as to the two who had forgotten.

In Colyer's Goods, L. R. 14 Prob. Div. 48, 60 L. T. N. S. 368, 37 Week. Rep. 272, 53 J. P. 134, the court admitted to probate a holographic will ending (apparently) as follows: "Signed, sealed and delivered by the aforesaid John Colyer, in the presence of," and signed to the right of a line by the testator, and to the left of the line by the two witnesses, although neither of them could give any positive testimony as to the circumstances of execution. One of them had a slight recollection of the testator's asking him to sign his name to the document, and the other said that the deceased was frequently in the habit of asking him to attest his signature to documents, but that he had no special recollection of this document, nor did he remember ever being told that he was witnessing a will.

In Blake v. Knight, 3 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 547, the court admitted to probate the holographic will of an experienced testator, with a particularly full attestation clause, although the witnesses, three and one-half years after execution, would not swear positively that the deceased's name was or was not at the bottom of the will when they signed it as witnesses. The court stated that it could not safely trust to the memory of witnesses under such circumstances. It must attend to the facts of the case, and say whether it was satisfied that the name of the deceased was written to the will when the witnesses signed it, and whether it was signed in their presence or signed beforehand and acknowledged in their presence. It may be stated that the court's summary of the evidence of the witnesses would seem to make their evidence less positive as to the omission of the requirements than is suggested by the report of their evidence.

W. 506, the decision rejecting a holographic will was reversed, although the attesting witnesses, five years after execution, were not certain as to the declaration or whether the will was signed by the testator when they signed, and the attestation clause, though imperfect, included the statement "signed and acknowledged by the above testator in the presence of us." The court considered that from previous conversations with the testator the witnesses understood that the paper was his will, and that they were requested to attest it as such.

In Adams v. Fields, 21 Vt. 258, where the will was held sufficiently proved, the point of the case was that the testator, having written out a will entirely in his own handwriting, with a full attestation clause, had not signed it, and the court held that this was sufficient, he having begun the will with his name. At the hearing nine years after execution, one of the witnesses testified as to the declaration by the testator and as to the execution by the witnesses, but the testimony of the other two witnesses tended to prove that they never signed the instrument and were never requested to sign it; proof was given of their signatures, but the court does not refer to the discrepancy in the testimony of the witnesses.

But a holographic will will be rejected if the court is not satisfied as to the completeness of its execution.

Thus, probate was denied of a holographic will eleven years old, with a full attestation clause, although there were various mistakes in the testimony of one of the subscribing witnesses, indicating lapses of memory in some matters not here referred to, where each of the witnesses, while stating that he signed at the testator's request to witness his will, said that he did not see anything on the paper, that the testator did not sign in his presence nor acknowledge any signature, and that there was not anyone present besides himself and the testator. Re Berdan, 65 N. J. Eq. 681, 55 Atl. 728, where one of the witnesses stated that the paper was folded.

In Pennant v. Kingscote, 3 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 642, the court declined to admit to probate a holographic will, where one attesting witness testified that he wrote the words, "signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of us," that he then signed it, and that his co-witness signed next, and the testatrix after them; the other witness was quite certain that the testatrix did not sign at all in his presence. The court said: "There are no circumstances of which I can give the party propounding the will the benefit, so as to pronounce for a due execution."

IX. Experience of testator.

An important element in enabling the court to find the requisite facts of execution of a will in spite of the fault of memory of the subscribing witnesses is the experience of the testator. Thus, it makes for the sufficiency of the execution of his will 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that the testator knew the legal requirements. Re Alpaugh, 23 N. J. Eq. 507; Re Claflin, 73 Vt. 129, 87 Am. St. Rep. 693, 50 Atl. 815; Chambers v. Queen's Proctor, 2 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 415; Blake v. Knight, 3 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 547; Thomson v. Hall, 2 Rob. Eccl. Rep. 426; O'Meagher v. O'Meagher, Ir. L. R. 11 Eq. 117; Reeves v. Lindsay, Ir. Rep. 3 Eq. 309; Re Carey, 24 App. Div. 531, 49 N. Y. Supp. 32, affirming 14 Misc. 486, 36 N. Y. Supp. 817; Mock v. Garson, 84 App. Div. 65, 82 N. Y. Supp. 310; Wyman v. Wyman, 118 App. Div. 109, 103 N. Y. Supp. 64, affirmed in 197 N. Y. 524, 90 N. E. 1167, see also 118 App. Div. 116, 103 N. Y. Supp. 69; Re Nelson, 43 N. Y. S. R. 30, 16 N. Y. Supp. 690; Re Boardman, 46 N. Y. S. R. 444, 20 N. Y. Supp. 60.

See also cases cited supra, VIII.

In Mock v. Garson, supra, the court said in sustaining a will where the testator knew the legal requirements: "Where there is no question of mental incapacity or of undue influence, and the person supervising the execution of the will is familiar with the requirements of the statute pertaining to such execution, and a long time has gone by since the transaction, and the witnesses do not appreciate just what each step in these requirements signifies, and their testimony at most is an absence of recollection as to some of the features, rigid, explicit proof may not be required. A substantial compliance with the requisites attending execution must be adhered to, but the desire to carry out the wishes of a competent testator often induces the courts to abate somewhat from positive proof in such a case, where the inference is fairly deducible that the will was duly executed, but the subscribing witnesses, by reason of a failure of recollection, do not explicitly testify in full measure to every detail." We are not informed as to whether there was any attestation clause.

In Re Nelson, 43 N. Y. S. R. 30, 16 N. Y. Supp. 690, a will thirteen years old was admitted to probate, where the testator and a deceased subscribing witness were both lawyers of experience, although the attestation clause omitted the request of the testator and the only surviving witness testified that the testator did not ask him to sign the will, but that the other subscribing witness read over the attestation clause to him in the testator's presence and asked him to sign. The court considered that the defect in the attestation clause was fully supplied by sufficient proof.

In Re Boardman, 46 N. Y. S. R. 444, 20 N. Y. Supp. 60, where there seems to have been no evidence that the testator had signed a codicil in the presence of the witnesses, or had acknowledged his signature, the court considered that, inasmuch as it appeared from the ink that all signatures to it were made at the same time, the codicil should be admitted to probate, the testator being a man who knew how to execute a will, as appeared, said the court, from the care in which the will itself was executed. The report is silent as to any attestation clause.

Conversely, the inexperience of the testator may be an obstacle to the granting of probate. Re Shaffer, 2 How. Pr. N. S. 494, where there was lack of evidence of any declaration.

X. Presence of attorney or experienced scrivener as a subscribing witness or otherwise.

The presence of an attorney or other experienced scrivener at the execution of a will, whether as a witness or not, is a cogent fact in favor of probate, where there is a failure of proof by the subscribing witnesses.

Presence of experienced person.

The presence of an experienced person makes for the probate of a will with a full attestation clause, although he is not a subscribing witness, and does not testify. Walsh v. Walsh, 4 Redf. 165; Re Rounds, 7 N. Y. S. R. 730; Re Klinzner, 71 Misc. 620, 130 N. Y. Supp. 1059; Re Walker, 67 Misc. 6, 124 N. Y. Supp. 615; Re Sears, 33 Misc. 141, 68 N. Y. Supp. 363.

Thus, a will about a year old, with a full attestation clause, was admitted, it being shown that a lawyer superintended the execution, although the testimony of one of the witnesses showed a lack of recollection as to some of the formalities, and the testimony of the other witness did not show that the testator requested the witnesses to sign, where both of the witnesses, however, testified that the lawyer asked the testator some questions about the will. Walsh v. Walsh, 4 Redf. 165.

Similarly, the court admitted to probate a will nine years old, with a full attestation clause, which was executed in the presence of a scrivener who was familiar with the execution of wills. Re Rounds, 7 N. Y. S. R. 730, where one of the subscribing witnesses testified that from his recollection the testator or the draughtsman declared the instrument to be the testator's last will and testament, although the other witness was quite positively of the impression that no declaration was made.

In Re Klinzner, 71 Misc. 620, 130 N. Y. Supp. 1059, a case hardly within the scope of the note, as the question was particularly whether the testator, who signed by mark, understood the instrument, which had a full attestation clause, the court, in granting probate about a year after execution, considered that the presence of the lawyer who drew the will, upon its execution, afforded some presumption of regularity although the lawyer could not testify, not being a subscribing witness and being also a beneficiary.

The presence at the execution of a will of an experienced lawyer, who was the person who drew it, and who is the sole beneficiary thereunder, makes for the due execution of the will. Re Walker, 67 Misc. 6, 124 N. Y. Supp. 615, where a will nineteen years 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) old, with a full attestation clause, was admitted to probate, although the surviving subscribing witness could not testify as to the declaration or request of the testatrix, his testimony being to the effect that she said nothing at all to him or in his presence, and that her husband, who drew the will, had requested him to witness the testatrix's signature. The court considered that the witness was unreliable in memory, as some of his testimony showed.

Experienced nonsubscribing witness.

A fortiori it makes for the probate of a will when an experienced person testifies for the due execution of a will with an attestation clause, although he is not a subscribing witness. See the following cases supra, II.: Rugg v. Rugg, 83 N. Y. 592; Re Johnson, 7 Misc. 220, 27 N. Y. Supp. 649.

Thus, a will six years old with the usual attestation clause was admitted where the counsel testified to the publication, which was the only point in question, and one of the subscribing witnesses testified that when he signed, either the testatrix or her counsel stated it was her last will, and the other that before he signed the counsel asked the testatrix if she wished these gentlemen to witness her will, and she said "Yes." Re Voorhis, 125 N. Y. 765, 26 N. E. 935.

For a case admitting a will with a defective attestation clause, where the scrivener had forgotten the circumstances, see Re Schweigert, supra, II.

Experienced subscribing witness.

Where the lawyer who draws a will with a full attestation clause is a subscribing witness thereto, his testimony showing the performance of the requisite formalities of execution will in general prevail, notwithstanding the forgetfulness or even unfavorable testimony of a lay witness.

Thus, wills have been admitted in these circumstances where the other attesting witnesses—

—did not recollect whether the testator or some other person asked him to sign, Rogers v. Diamond, 13 Ark. 474;

—was somewhat lazy and doubtful about some of the requirements three years after execution, Weir v. Fitzgerald, 2 Bradf. 42;

—who was the testator's physician, did not recollect anything about the declaration, although it was but a few months since the execution of the instrument, Robbins v. Robbins, 50 N. J. Eq. 742, 26 Atl. 673;

—did not remember seeing the testator sign, although she testified that the attestation clause was read in her presence, and when the will was first offered she had made the usual affidavit stating the performance of the requisite formalities of execution, including that she saw the testator sign, Re Skinner, 40 Or. 571, 62 Pac. 523, 67 Pac. 951; —testified so doubtfully eleven years after execution, as to throw doubt on the entire matter, Re Sandmann, — N. J. —, 68 Atl. 754; —was generally forgetful or preverse, seven years after execution, and stated that no one asked her to witness the will, Re Frey, 2 Connoly, 70, 7 N. Y. Supp. 330;

—stated, about two years after execution, that the will was not signed by the testator in his presence, Gove v. Gawen, 3 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 151 (where this fact in the case appears only in the headnote);

—testified, apparently about four years after execution, that she did not see the testatrix sign or hear her declare the instrument to be her will, although she heard the lawyer ask the question whether she acknowledged the instrument to be her will, Re Bedell, 2 Connoly, 328, 12 N. Y. Supp. 98 (where the attestation clause contained, in addition to the usual words, the statement, "she at the time of making such subscription acknowledged that she made the same");

—differed somewhat from the lawyer as to details, and also testified positively that the will was signed before the witness came into the room, in contradiction to the testimony of the lawyer and to the statement of the attestation clause, Neiheisel v. Toerge, 4 Redf. 328 (where the will was about a year old).

In Egan v. Pease, 4 Dem. 301, the will was admitted to probate where the lawyer who drew the will was one of the witnesses and testified fully as to its due execution, and stated that the attestation clause, which was full, was read over in the presence of the testatrix and of all the subscribing witnesses, although the other witnesses testified that the decedent made no declaration in their presence that the instrument was a will, and that they did not know it was a will.

It is error to disregard the testimony for the will of the attesting witnesses, one of whom was the lawyer who drew it, because the execution was thirty years past. Re Duffy, 127 App. Div. 174, 111 N. Y. Supp. 491, supra, V.

We are not informed as to whether there was an attestation clause in Re Babcock, 42 Misc. 235, 86 N. Y. Supp. 670, where a will sixteen years old was admitted where the lawyer who drew it, and who was one of the attesting witnesses, testified as to its due execution, and the other attesting witness failed to recollect the legal formalities, and apparently denied the observance of at least some of them.

So, we are not informed whether there was an attestation clause in Bennett v. Sharp, 1 Jur. N. S. 456, where the will was admitted to probate although both the attesting witnesses testified that the testator did not acknowledge the instrument in their presence, and they did not remember that she signed in their presence, but the scrivener, a solicitor, testified to all the facts of execution required by the statute, and to the signing by the testatrix in the presence of the attesting witnesses.

witness was the scrivener of the will which was admitted in Humphrey's Will, Tucker, 142, where of the three witnesses one was a lawyer and testified fully as to the circumstances, and the other two witnesses were ladies, who stated that the testatrix requested them to witness the execution of an instrument to be by her executed, and that they did sign their names to it, but they did not remember that anything else took place. The attestation clause certified that the will was signed and declared by the testatrix as for a last will and testament in the witnesses' presence. The court said: "As I have before had occasion to remark, the presence and agency of a respectable member of the legal profession, at the time of the execution of a will, adds greatly to the presumption of due execution."

In Allen v. Griffin, 69 Wis. 529, 35 N. W. 21, the court said in holding that, in the absence of clear proof that the witness or witnesses signed before the signing of the testator, it should be presumed that the testator signed first: "There is no question in this case, upon the testimony, but that the writing to which the witnesses affixed their signatures was intended by the deceased to be her will. This is fully established by the evidence of Hall, who drew the instrument and witnessed the same; and this fact would not be more clearly established had the other witness, Hattie Wyman, been able to testify that the deceased asked her to sign as a witness to her will. Her memory of that fact would not be as satisfactory as the evidence of the man who was called upon to draw the instrument, and had full knowledge of its contents, and of the purposes for which it was made." Few of the facts are here reported; it is not stated whether the scrivener was a lawyer, and it seems to be suggested that if there was any attestation clause it was not a complete one.

The forgetfulness, however, may be that of the scrivener, and the will may be admitted over his negative testimony.

Thus, in Bloom v. Terwilliger, 78 N. J. Eq. 221, 78 Atl. 742, a will with a perfect attestation clause was admitted, although the scrivener, who was one of the attesting witnesses and had had some experience in drawing wills, testified that no declaration was made by the testator. The other attesting witness testified that the attestation clause was either read or its purport stated at the time, and the chief beneficiary under the will, while testifying at first that she could not remember whether any declaration was made, later, after an appeal had been taken and the case was reopened, testified that a declaration was made. The court was satisfied that the beneficiary was a truthful person, and that the scrivener had forgotten the circumstances.

That an inexperienced lawyer may not be a useful witness to a will is shown in Woolley v. Woolley, 95 N. Y. 231, where the probate was reversed of a codicil containing a full attestation clause, which was executed less than a year before it was offerred for probate. The witnesses both testified that they signed at the request of the testatrix, and one of them stated that the testatrix did not acknowledge the paper to be a codicil, and that the witness did not remember seeing her sign the paper or saying anything about it, and the other witness, a lawyer of two or three years' standing, said that he did not see the testatrix sign the paper, and did not think that she acknowledged it to him; that he presumed that the attestation clause was there when he signed it, and that he knew that it was not customary for the witness to state his residence except in the case of a will. The court said: "Here there was not even the presumption that is sometimes indulged in from the fact that the will was drawn by a lawyer, and executed under his supervision, for this codicil bears internal evidence that it was not drawn by a lawyer; and while Van De Water was a lawyer, he was simply called upon to witness the instrument; and it can be inferred that he knew that it was of testamentary character only from the simple fact that he wrote his place of residence after his signature."

Where experienced subscribing witness has died.

Where a deceased witness was a person of experience this, with a full attestation clause, may overcome the forgetfulness of the surviving witness as to the requirements. Orser v. Orser, 24 N. Y. 51, supra, VI. a; Re Brissell, 16 App. Div. 137, 45 N. Y. Supp. 122; Webb v. Dye, 18 W. Va. 376. See also Re Nelson, 43 N. Y. S. R. 30, 16 N. Y. Supp. 690, supra, IX. See also, where testator signed by mark. Re Kane, 2 Connoly, 249, 20 N. Y. Supp. 123, infra, XII.; and compare with it Worden v. Van Gieson, 6 Dem. 237, infra, XII.

Thus, probate was sustained of a will and codicil sixteen and eighteen years old, both having full attestation clauses and the same witnesses, where the surviving witness identified his signature and remembered only that the testatrix asked him to witness her will, and the deceased witness was a lawyer, the court assuming that he superintended the execution of the two instruments. Re Brissell, 16 App. Div. 137, 45 N. Y. Supp. 122.

So, in Webb v. Dye, 18 W. Va. 376, supra, the court declined to disturb a verdict for a will dated eighteen years before, containing a full attestation clause, where one of the subscribing witnesses, who was an experienced scrivener, was deceased, although the surviving witness testified that he did not know what the paper was, that he did not read the attestation clause, that he signed at the request of the testator, and thought the signature of the other attesting witness was upon it, that he looked to see what names were on it and saw the scroll, but not the name of the testator, and, on being recalled, he said he did not recollect that he saw the name of the testator on the paper.

In Wright v. Rogers, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 678, 38 L. J. Prob. N. S. 67, 21 L. T. N. S. 156, 17 Week. Rep. 833, the court declined to revoke the probate of a will with a full attestation clause, witnessed by an attorney and his clerk, where probate had been granted it seems upon an affidavit signed by the attorney, which had been filled out on a printed form by the clerk, and showed the due execution of the will. At the time of the proceeding for revocation, the attorney was dead, and the clerk testified, about a year after execution, that the attestation by the attorney and himself was not made until after they had left the testator's house and returned to the attorney's office, but the court declined to give credence to the testimony of the clerk, who, however, seems to have been clear enough in recollection.

In the insufficiently reported case of Adams v. Rodman, 102 Wis. 456, 78 N. W. 588, 759, the court, while refusing to set aside the finding of a jury against a will fifteen years old, where a deceased witness had been a lawyer of large experience, said: "The fact that the attesting clause states that the witnesses signed the instrument in the presence of the testator raises a strong presumption that they did so sign, and such presumption should prevail unless overcome by clear and satisfactory evidence. True, also, the fact that R. R. Menzie was a lawyer of large experience in his profession is a strong circumstance in support of the truth of the attesting clause signed by him." One of the surviving witnesses was also a lawyer, possibly a clerk of the deceased witness, and it seems that there may have been some question as to the memory of the surviving witnesses, both of whom testified in contradiction to part of the attestation clause.

XI. Habit of witness.

It is, of course, familiar practice for lawyers, as witnesses to wills, who have forgotten the circumstances or some of them, generally to state their belief and conviction that they would not have signed had not all the legal requirements been observed. And witnesses to wills generally, who do not remember all the circumstances, often state their habit not to sign instruments unless the maker has signed or acknowledged in their presence, etc. See, in general, Hughes v. Hughes, 31 Ala. 519, infra, XII.; Pate v. Joe, 3 J. J. Marsh. 113, supra, IV.; Barnes v. Barnes, 66 Me. 286; Rolla v. Wright, 2 Dem. 482, 67 How. Pr. 117, supra, IV.; Butler v. Benson, 1 Barb. 526, supra, VI. a. See also for a case of an experienced scrivener, Re Schweigert, 17 Misc. 186, 40 N. Y. Supp. 979, supra, II.

In Lawyer v. Smith, 8 Mich. 411, 77 Am. Dec. 460, it was held that it was proper evidence for the jury as to the execution of a will thirty-two years old, with a full attestation clause, that a witness thereto.

who did not recollect having seen the testatrix sign, said that he had no doubt that she signed it, that he had never witnessed an instrument in that form without knowing what it was, and that he had no doubt that the persons whose names appeared on the will were present at the time it was executed.

In Re Kellum, 52 N. Y. 517, the court sustained the probate of a will eleven years old, although there was no recollection as to its execution on the part of either of the witnesses, one of whom was an experienced lawyer, who had drawn the will, and who stated that he was careful always to have wills executed according to the statute, and testified positively to all of the required facts, basing his statement upon the attestation clause and circumstances which he did recollect, and his uniform custom in transacting such business; the other witness was a clerk of the draftsman.

In Craig v. Craig, 156 Mo. 358, 56 S. W. 1097, it was held that the will was sufficiently proved where one of the witnesses testified fully as to the statutory execution including the signing by both the witnesses, and the other witness, while not remembering the testator, said he had witnessed a number of wills and in case of any will that he had signed the question had been asked of the testator whether the witnesses should sign in his presence. It does not appear whether there was an attestation clause or not.

Similarly, the will was held sufficiently proved in Gwinn v. Radford, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 137, where one of the witnesses testified as to its due execution, and the other witness did not recollect having witnessed the paper, but identified his signature and testified that he had a distinct recollection of having witnessed one paper for the testator, and a faint recollection of having witnessed another, and that it was his invariable habit not to attest an instrument as a witness unless it was acknowledged by the person executing it. Nothing appears as to any attestation clause.

Similarly, in Re Pepoon, 91 N. Y. 255, the court sustained the probate of a will about fourteen years old, with a full attestation clause, where one of the witnesses testified, after reading the attestation clause, that the testatrix must have declared the instrument to be her will and signature, but he had no recollection of being requested to sign as a witness, but later he said that he must have read the clause, and that he must have been asked to sign, stating that he never signed anything without reading it and would not have signed unless the things stated had been done. The other witness had only a vague impression of the testatrix being one day at the office where he was employed and of her signing and his witnessing the will, but stated that he had the habit of not signing any document without reading it, and thought he must have read the attestation clause, and he had no doubt that what was stated therein had occurred.

In Re Hunt, 110 N. Y. 278, 18 N. E. 106, affirming 42 Hun, 434, a holographic will was ordered to be admitted to probate, and the decision of the surrogate reversed, where it is stated that the recollection of the two witnesses was imperfect, but each testified that the circumstances must have been as stated in the attestation clause or he would not have signed it. This case is unsatisfactory on account of the insufficient reporting of the facts, particularly as the attestation clause omitted the statement that the witnesses signed at the request of the testator, and this omission is not discussed in the opinion of the court of appeals or in that of the general term.

XII. Signature by mark.

For the general subject of proof of signatures to will by mark, when attesting witnesses are dead or cannot remember the transaction, see note to Wienecke v. Arbin, 44 L.R.A. 142. It is not intended to include here other cases than those in which the defective memory of witnesses is concerned.

Generally speaking, there does not seem to be any difference in legal principle, in cases of defective memory of subscribing witnesses, between wills signed by mark and those signed by name.

In Fatherce v. Lawrence, 33 Miss. 585, it was held that probate was properly granted to a will signed by a mark and attested by two witnesses (father and son) under the word "test," where the survivor of the witnesses twenty-two years after the date of the will did not recollect any of the circumstances except that he had written the will, that the testatrix had been ill at his father's house, and he thought the will had been then prepared. He further proved the signatures of his father and himself as witnesses, and stated that the signature of the testatrix was in his handwriting, that he did not think he would have signed as a witness if the paper had not been legally executed, but was not certain he knew what was necessary to a legal execution. The same witness had made an affidavit twenty-two years before, when the will was first offered for probate (the other subscribing witness being dead at that time), as to its execution, which omitted to state that the witnesses signed in the presence of the testatrix, but the court considered that this omission did not prove that the affidavit stated all the facts of the execution.

In Clarke v. Dunnivant, 10 Leigh, 14, the court approved the probate of a will signed by the testator's mark, where one of the witnesses testified to most, if not all, of the requirements, and thought that he signed the testator's name, although the other witnesses, while testifying that they were at the house of the testator upon the occasion, did not remember anything about the making of the will, which was done eight years before their testimony was taken. The only attestation clause was the words "signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of."

It may be noted that in Hughes v. Hughes, 31 Ala. 519, upon a contest as to probate of a will on account of undue influence, fraud, etc., it was held to be error to exclude from the jury evidence of a former will twelve years old, having three witnesses, and of its execution, when the evidence of its execution consisted of the testimony by one of such witnesses that this former will was in the witness's handwriting, that he did not remember anything about it except that he supposed that the testator did sign with a mark, as he had been a paralytic, and that he himself would not have signed the will as a witness unless the testator had declared it to be his will. Nothing appears about the other witnesses nor as to any attestation clause.

In Howard's Will, 5 T. B. Mon. 199, 17 Am. Dec. 60, a will nineteen years old, signed by a mark, was admitted to probate where the statute required two witnesses, and two of the witnesses testified that it was signed by all of the witnesses in the same room with the testator, but after the third witness had testified that he signed it in an adjoining room, one of the first witnesses was re-examined and expressed doubt as to which of the rooms was the one in which he had signed. The report of the case is silent as to any attestation clause.

It may be noted that in Re McCabe, 75 Misc. 35, 134 N. Y. Supp. 682, where the statute required two witnesses, a will signed by mark was admitted to probate where two of the three witnesses satisfactorily showed the statutory requirements, and the third had forgotten almost every essential about the execution. Nothing is reported as to an attestation clause.

Where there is a full attestation clause.

In Newhouse v. Godwin, 17 Barb. 236, where a decree rejecting a recent will signed by mark and having a full attestation clause was affirmed on another ground, the court, after referring to the sufficient testimony of one witness, a lawyer's clerk, said obiter: "The other subscribing witness does not recollect hearing the testator declare that the paper to which he had made his mark was his last will and testament, or request anyone to sign his name as a witness. But the nonrecollection of this witness cannot overthrow, or balance, the affirmative and positive evidence of one who seems to have been more attentive, and to have a better memory."

Wills signed by mark and having a full attestation clause have been admitted to probate—

—where the witnesses testified sufficiently on direct examination, but on cross-examination their recollection, two years after execution, proved to be insufficient as to some of the statutory requirements, Re Engler, 56 Misc. 218, 107 N. Y. Supp. 222, where one of the witnesses testified that he read the attestation clause aloud to the other witness in the hearing of the testatrix;

—where the will was drawn by a deceased

witness, who was an experienced scrivener, and the surviving witness testified that he signed before the testatrix signed, his want of recollection being suggested by his further statement that he signed after the other witness, whereas the ocular evidence upon the face of the will indicated the contrary. Re Kane, 2 Connoly, 249, 20 N. Y. Supp. 123.

See also as to presumption from presence upon the execution of the will, of the lawyer who drew it, where the will was signed by mark, Re Klinzner, 71 Misc. 620, 130 N. Y. Supp. 1059. supra, X.

In Dack v. Dack, 19 Hun, 630, the court reversed the decision of the surrogate refusing probate of a codicil three years old, signed with a mark and having a full attestation clause, where one of the subscribing witnesses testified to the declaration, although the other two, one of which was the scrivener, could not testify to any declaration. This case was reversed in 84 N. Y. 663, upon a question of undue influence, the court approving the decision as far as the execution of the codicil was concerned.

In Grant's Will, 149 Wis. 330, 135 N. W. 833, it was held that a will signed by testatrix's mark, and having a full attestation clause, was sufficiently proved, where it was a joint will of testatrix and her husband, of which, as the will of her husband, she had acted as executrix for twenty years. One of the witnesses, an experienced scrivener who drew the will, was dead; another witness, eighty years old, had no recollection of the transaction and was not even sure of his signature, which was proved to be genuine; he was positive that he had never been in the house of testatrix's husband, where if ever, the will was executed: the third witness testified that he was called to that house to witness the will, and did so, but that neither the testator nor the testatrix signed the will in his presence, and that the scrivener did not sign as a witness while he was there, and that the other witness was not in the house while he remained there. There was other evidence that the testator and testatrix and the three witnesses were all together in the house shortly after the will was executed.

But in Worden v. Van Gieson, 6 Dem. 237, the surrogate declined to admit to probate a will which was signed by a mark and had a full attestation clause, where one of the subscribing witnesses, the lawyer who drew it and superintended its execution, was dead, and the other subscribing witness, twelve years after the execution of the will, was either afflicted with a defective memory or had an inclination to appear in that condition. The surrogate considered that, under § 2620 of the Code of Civil Procedure, there being no third persons present to identify the mark of the testatrix, and no way of proving handwriting, as provided by the statute, he was constrained to refuse probate. This decision was affirmed in 47 Hun, 5, on the ground that the witness, while stating that the testatrix had declared the instrument to be her will, said further that he did not see her sign it, and she never told him she had signed it. (For a discussion indicating that the surrogate's decision in this case, so far as it turned on the necessity of proof of mark by two witnesses, is no longer authority, see the aforesaid note in 44 L.R.A. 144.)

In Jenkins's Will, 43 Wis. 610, where a decree denying probate was reversed, we are not informed whether or not the conflict in testimony three years after execution indicated any want of recollection.

Witnesses signing by mark.

For the general subject of attesting will by mark, see note to Re Guilfoyle, 22 L.R.A. 372.

In Morris v. Kniffin, 37 Barb. 336, it was held in an ejectment case that there should have been submitted to the jury the question of the validity of the execution of a will with a full attestation clause, where the only surviving witness had made his mark as a witness and recollected practically nothing about the execution except that he was present at the testator's house on a visit at the time the will was drawn, and that he and the other subscribing witness went into the room where the testator lay in bed, it seems, after the will was drawn. There was some other evidence in the case, but not of the execution. The trial was from one to three years after the date of the will.

A will twenty-three years old, having a full attestation clause, was held sufficiently proved where, of the three witnesses, one was dead, one proved the due execution of the will, and the third, who attested by his mark, did not remember having attested to the will and had no recollection of the transaction. Gillis v. Gillis, 96 Ga. 1, 30 L.R.A. 143, 51 Am. St. Rep. 121, 23 S. E. 107, where it was held that this decision was not against the Georgia statute providing that "a witness may attest by his mark, provided he can swear to the same," as this statute strictly relates to the competency of a witness attesting by his mark at the time that he did attest, and does not relate to the time of proving the will, under the general rule that the competency of witnesses is to be determined at the time of attestation, and not at the time of probate, as in this case the witness might have died or become blind or insane. There was also evidence of a nonsubscribing witness who was present, the report not stating her testimony.

Reference may be made in this connection to Montgomery v. Perkins, 2 Met. (Ky.) 448, 74 Am. Dec. 419, where it was held that a will was sufficiently proved where the two subscribing witnesses testified that the scrivener signed their names as witnesses, they holding the pen, as neither of them could write, but they could not identify the paper propounded, and on hearing it read over thought that one of its provisions was different from that of the paper which they had witnessed, and the scrivener testified that he wrote the paper, and identified it as the paper which was witnessed in the manner already stated. Nothing is reported as to an attestation clause.

XIII. Miscellaneous.

Where the requirements of the statute have been substantially met, discrepancies in the testimony of the attesting witnesses as to the time and place of execution will be disregarded. Re Dake, 98 App. Div. 629, 90 N. Y. Supp. 213, where the probate of two codicils more than five years old, with attestation clauses, was sustained.

In Lambert v. Cooper, 29 Gratt. 61, the court approved the verdict of the jury for the will where the scrivener, who was the executor and one of the attesting witnesses, proved the due execution of it, and two other attesting witnesses testified that the will was not duly executed. The report is silent as to any attestation clause.

A will about eighteen months old was held sufficiently proved where it concluded, "In witness thereof, I place my signature in the presence of two witnesses," and one of the witnesses testified that the testator signed in the presence of both the witnesses, although the other witness could not say whether the testator signed it before the witness entered the room, but stated that the testator did not call attention to his signature. Cregreen v. Willoughby, 6 Jur. N. S. 590.

In Nicholson v. Myers, 3 Dem. 193, the surrogate considered that the circumstances involved a request on the part of the testatrix, although the attestation clause omitted this requirement, where the testimony of the only surviving witness, taken thirty years after the execution of the will, was that he signed the instrument, that he saw the testatrix sign it, and saw it signed by the other subscribing witness; that he had an indistinct recollection that the testatrix signed at a stand in a room, and that when she had signed she yielded her seat to one of the witnesses, who signed and then surrendered his place to the other witness.

In Re Nussbaum, 144 N. Y. Supp. 443, the will was admitted to probate where the witnessing by the two witnesses was at different times, and the testimony of the witness who signed first was satisfactory, and the other stated that the testator presented the paper writing proceeded on, and said to him, "Sign it; one name is on it, and that is my testament;" that he could not remember exactly whether he saw testator's name on the paper when he signed it, but he believed there were then two names there. Nothing is reported as to any attestation clause.

In Ex parte Brock, 37 S. C. 348, 16 S. E. 38, the probate was affirmed of a will executed fifteen years before, where the attesting witnesses did not seem to have been clear as to their having signed in the presence of the testator or of each other. The appellate court, in approving the instructions to the jury, said: "These instructions practically amounted to this, that where a paper propounded as a will is shown to have been signed by the alleged testator, and by the requisite number of subscribing witnesses, in the absence of any satisfactory evidence to the contrary, the presumption is that all the other formalities have been complied with. This, we think, is good law, and any other rule would render it impossible to prove a will where the subscribing witnesses were dead or their testimony was not attainable." We are not informed whether there was an attestation clause.

In Peebles v. Case, 2 Bradf. 226, two wills were offered, both bearing the same date, two or three years before, both signed by the same witnesses. Both witnesses positively identified and remembered the execution of will No. 2, one of them positively denied his signature to will No. 1, and the other said he had no recollection of anything about it, and if he ever signed it, it was not as witnessing a will. The surrogate took evidence of some collateral facts, seems to have considered that both wills were genuine, and said in admitting will No. 1 to probate: "When the witnesses to a will are dead, or have forgotten the circumstances of the execution, the performance of the formalities required by statute may, after proof of their signatures and that of the testator, be inferred or presumed from the recitals of the testatum clause. . . . On the supposition that Parsons and Smith have lost all recollection of the transaction, the court, if satisfied from other evidence that they did in fact witness the will, may admit it to probate."

In Reeve v. Crosby, 3 Redf. 74, where it seems that three instruments were admitted to probate, and that at least one of them had an attestation clause, some of the subscribing witnesses did not clearly recollect, four years after the execution, that all the formalities had been performed, while others did so, and the court considered that the proof was sufficient without the evidence of the testator's counsel, who, however, testified.

(October 6, 1913.)

ERROR to the District Court for Denver County to review a judgment dismissing a writ of certiorari to review the action of the State Board of Medical Examiners in revoking the license of defendant to practise medicine. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Roy E. Dickerson, for plaintiff in error:

The right to labor and its fruit is a natural right which may not unreasonably be interfered with.

Note. — Grounds for revoking physician's license.

The purpose of this note is to review the recent cases passing on the above question. For a discussion of the earlier cases involving this subject, see the notes to Macomber v. State Bd. of Health, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 585; Munk v. Frink, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 439; State Medical Board v. McCray, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 783; and Richardson v. Simpson, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 911.

The license of a physician is a valuable privilege, and perhaps a property right which is protected at least by such safeguards as the legislature has thrown around it. State ex rel. Spriggs v. Robinson, 253 Mo. 271, 161 S. W. 1169.

The right to regulate the practice of medicine, being the regulation of the natural right to labor, must find authority, if any, within that power of the state which protects the public health, welfare, and safety.

Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 32 L. ed. 623, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 231; State v. Gardner, 58 Ohio St. 599, 41 L.R.A. 689, 65 Am. St. Rep. 785, 51 N. E. 136; State v. Gravett, 65 Ohio St. 289, 55 L.R.A. 791, 87 Am. St. Rep. 605, 62 N. E. 325.

The legislature may control the practice of medicine. Such enactments emanate from that branch of the police power having to do with the protection of public health.

If the power is exercised for the purpose of protecting the public health it must be exercised so as to prevent injury to the public through the ignorance, incapacity, incompetency or unfitness of those holding themselves out to the public as qualified to minister to the ailments to which mankind is heir.

The rights of a physician who has been admitted to practise are recognized as val-

In construing Kentucky Statutes, § 2615, providing that the board of health may suspend or revoke a physician's license, (1) for the presentation to the board of any license which was illegally or fraudulently obtained, or the practice of fraud in passing an examination; (2) for the commission of a criminal abortion, or conviction of a felony involving moral turpitude; (3) for chronic or persistent inebriety, or addiction to a drug habit to an extent which disqualifies him to practise with safety to the people; (4) or for other grossly unprofessional or dishonorable conduct of a character likely to deceive or defraud the public,—the last clause is to be read in connection with those preceding, and means that the unprofessional, dishonorable conduct intended is other than that specified in the preceding clauses, and when so construed it erects a definite standard by which professional conduct may be measured, and is a valid exercise of the police power. Forman v. State Bd. of Health, 157 Ky. App. 123, 162 S. W. 796.

It is not an offense involving moral turpitude for a physician to aid another in conducting a medical institute under a corporate name, and to practise medicine for the corporation in its name for hire, and such acts constitute no ground for revoking a license under Kentucky Statutes, § 2615. Ibid.

And although a physician may violate the professional code by advertising, his act will not constitute a ground for revoking his license, unless his conduct is dishonorable, fraudulent, and involves moral turpitude within the contemplation of the above statute. Ibid.

And the fact that a physician advertises that he can cure a certain disease does not 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

constitute a ground for suspension if he is sincere in his belief that he can do so, but if he knows the advertisement to be false, and thus deceives the public, he is guilty of fraudulent, dishonorable, and unprofessional conduct involving moral turpitude. Ibid.

Whether his acts are sincere or fraudulent and done for the purpose of defrauding the public is a question to be decided by the state board of health. Ibid.

The proceedings of such board are not judicial, but are purely administrative; and it cannot act arbitrarily, but must act upon reasonable grounds and in compliance with the statute, and if it acts arbitrarily the courts will intervene to protect private rights. Ibid.

Conduct that is dishonorable, unprofessional, fraudulent, and involving moral turpitude, within the meaning of Kentucky Statutes, § 2615, is stated by a charge that the physician aided a corporation by which he was employed, to obtain money from persons by fraudulent pretenses, in pretending that he could cure diseases that were incurable, and guarantying to cure all diseases, and aided in publishing to the world an untrue statement that the corporation possessed an electrical apparatus which was the only one in the country, by which various diseases could be cured. Ibid.

A statute authorizing the board of health to revoke licenses of physicians who are guilty of unprofessional or dishonorable conduct, and providing that habitual drunkenness, drug habit, or excessive use of narcotics, producing criminal abortion, or soliciting patronage by agents, shall be deemed unprofessional and dishonorable conduct within the meaning of the statute, but providing that these specifications are uable rights not to be disturbed or forfeited without due process of law.

Matthews v. Murphy, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 750, 54 L.R.A. 415, 63 S. W. 785; Smith v. State Medical Examiners, 140 Iowa, 66, 117 N. W. 1116; People use of State Bd. of Health v. McCoy, 125 Ill. 289, 17 N. E. 786; Mathews v. Hedlund, 82 Neb. 825, 119 N. W. 17.

If it is the advertisement itself which is objectionable it is equally so whether inspired by physician or layman, and the physician alone must not be penalized for the act. This is class legislation of the plainest kind.

Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 49 L. ed. 169, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 18; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; Wagner v. Milwaukee County, 112 Wis. 601, 88 N. Farr*, 46 Colo. 365, 104 Pac. 401; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. May, 194 U. S. 267, 48 L. ed. 971, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 638; Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. p. 561; Ruhrstrat v. People, 185 Ill. 133, 49 L.R.A. 181, 76 Am. St. Rep. 30, 57 N. E. 41, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 453; Eden v. People, 161 Ill. 206, 32 L.R.A. 659, 52 Am. St. Rep. 365, 43 N. E. 1108; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 67 Ill. 37, 16 Am. Rep. 611.

The act is unconstitutional because it not intended to exclude all other acts for which licenses may be revoked, is highly penal, and must be treated as a penal law. State ex rel. Spriggs v. Robinson, 253 Mo. 271, 161 S. W. 1169.

And under such statute no one can be held to have violated its provisions unless his act comes within both the letter and the spirit of the law. Ibid.

And a mere willingness to commit the crime of abortion does not constitute a ground for revoking a license under such statute, since the indicated specification of matters constituting grounds for revocation grow out of intentional affirmative acts, and the general specification following is directed solely against certain undesignated acts, not against evil thoughts and a willingness to perform wrongful acts. Ibid.

And under such statute the conviction and suspension of a physician cannot be sustained upon evidence that he inserted an advertisement in a newspaper, giving his name, and stating that his practice was limited to diseases of women and surgery, or upon the evidence of another physician to the effect that several physicians had told him that the licentiate bore the reputation of being a criminal abortionist. Ibid.

The statute involved in this case was held not to be invalid on the ground that the general specification therein authorized the board of health to determine what should discriminate between resident and nonresident physicians.

Mr. Charles L. Dickerson also for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Harry E. Kelly and Charles H. Haines, for defendants in error:

A statute which authorizes the revocation of a license to practise medicine, on the ground that the licentiate has caused the publication and circulation of an advertisement relative to diseases of the sexual organs, is not unconstitutional.

State ex rel. Powell v. State Medical Examining Board, 32 Minn. 324, 50 Am. Rep. 575, 20 N. W. 238; State ex rel. Feller v. State Medical Examiners 34 Minn. 391, 26 N. W. 125; Meffert v. State, Bd. of Medical Registration (Meffert v. Packer) 66 Kan. 710, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 811, 72 Pac. 249, affirmed in 195 U. S. 625, 49 L. ed. 350, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 790; Aiton v. Medical Examiners, 13 Ariz. 354, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 114 Pac. 962; State ex rel. Hathaway v. State Bd. of Health, 103 Mo. 22, 15 S. W. 322; *State Medical Board v. A license to practise medicine is not a constitute dishonorable and unprofessional conduct, and thereby vested it with legislative functions in violation of § 1, arts. 3 and 4 of the Constitution. Ibid.

And it was held that if these constitutional provisions were suspended, and the board of health given power to legislate, where it did not appear, in a case in which the revocation of a physician's license was sought on the ground that he offered to commit an abortion, that the board, prior to the institution of the proceeding, even enacted a law making this a ground for revoking licenses, a revocation could not be had on this ground, since the board would be subject to the constitutional provision forbidding the enactment of retrospective laws. Ibid.

In Graeb v. State Medical Examiners, — Colo. —, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1063, — Pac. —, where the State Board of Medical Examiners, which was the only authority presented upon the question, admitted that consumption, the disease there relied upon, or any other disease, was not manifestly incurable, it was held that a statute authorizing the revocation of a physician's license for obtaining a fee "on the representation that a manifestly incurable disease can be cured," was void because of insufficiency and uncertainty, since there is no such thing as a manifestly incurable disease.

State v. Edmunds, 127 Iowa, 333, 101 N. W. 431.

Scott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 15th day of March, 1906, a complaint was filed with the State Board of Medical Examiners, charging M. S. Chenoweth, duly licensed to practise medicine under the laws of the state, with publishing in the Rocky Mountain News, a newspaper published in the city of Denver, an advertisement relative to a disease and diseases of the sexual organs. This was under § 6068, Revised Stat. 1908, authorizing the State Board of Medical Examiners to refuse to grant, or to revoke, a license to practise medicine in this state upon the ground, among others given in the statute, of "causing the publication and circulation of an advertisement relative to any disease of the sexual organs."

The advertisements complained of are not set out in the complaint nor in the abstract of record, but there are newspaper clippings attached to the transcript of record which we assume to be the advertisements offered in evidence. A hearing was had on this complaint by the State Board of Medical Examiners, and the license of Dr. Chenoweth revoked. A writ of certiorari was issued out of the district court, and upon a hearing before that court this writ was dismissed, from which ruling of the court the plaintiff in error brings the case here for review. The question as to whether certiorari is the proper remedy in this case is not raised or presented, and we are not to be understood as passing upon that question.

The record discloses that the medical board preserved no testimony, and we are left to the minutes of that body alone for information as to what occurred at the hearing upon the complaint filed. There were others tried at the same hearing, but other final disposition was made as to these cases, and the plaintiff in error alone is now complaining.

The minutes of the board disclose the presence of Dr. Chenoweth at the hearing and his admission of responsibility for the publication by the Scott Medical Company and the Dr. Myers Medical Company, both of which companies he apparently controls. Also a resolution by the board revoking his license to practise medicine because of the fact of such publications alone.

It has been held by this court that the inquiry upon certiorari is limited to whether the court below exceeded its jurisdiction or greatly abused its discretion. People ex rel. Burchinell v. District Ct. 22 Colo. 422, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

45 Pac. 402. Also that the object of the proceeding is to correct errors of law apparent from admitted or established facts, and not to settle those which are disputed. People ex rel. Hallett v. Arapahoe County, 27 Colo. 86, 59 Pac. 733. Further, that in Colorado there are two different proceedings by certiorari: One to review the action of an inferior tribunal or board of officers; the other to secure the trial de novo of causes previously heard by justices of the peace. Small v. Bischelberger, 7 Colo. 563, 4 Pac. 1195.

The question, then, to be determined in this case is whether the Board of Medical Examiners was without jurisdiction, exceeded its jurisdiction, or greatly abused its discretion, and, in this instance, is the statute, in so far as it relates to the particular ground for revocation, in violation of the constitutional rights of the plaintiff in error? There is no question but that the defendant caused the publication of the advertisements. There can be no reasonable question under the decisions of the courts of this state and the law generally but that, under the police power inherent in the state, the legislature may enact reasonable regulations for the examination and registration of physicians, in the practice of medicine and surgery, and that such statutes violate neither the Federal nor the state Constitutions.

Neither does the authority of the legislature end with declaring what qualifications he who enters upon the practice of that profession shall possess. "As it has plenary power over the whole subject, it alone must be the judge of what is expedient, both as to the qualifications required and as to the method of ascertaining those qualifications. The only limit to the legislative power in prescribing conditions to the right to practise is that they shall be reasonable, and whether they are reasonable the courts must judge." 30 Cyc. 1548.

That the state may create a board of experts authorized to examine and grant such licenses and to hear and determine any complaint made against any person holding a physicians' license, and in a proper case to revoke the same, is equally well settled. It is also true that, while the power of a board so created is in the nature of a quasi judicial power, yet it is not such a power as cannot be granted by the legislature. Therefore the only limit of the legislature in this respect is that it shall provide reasonable regulation. But the right is one of regulation only, and must be found in the power of the state to provide for the general welfare of its people. The power of the legislature, however, is not such as may unreasonably interfere with the undoubted right of every citizen to follow any lawful calling, business, or profession he may choose, subject only to reasonable regulation; for the right to labor and to receive the fruits of such labor is a natural and inherent right always protected by the Constitution.

The statutory ground in this case is "causing the publication and circulation of an advertisement relative to any disease of the sexual organs." The only statute of similar import brought to our attention is that of Nebraska (§ 4327, Neb. Comp. Stat.). In that statute, however, is found the qualifying words, "tending to injure the morals of the public." In the statute under consideration, the mere publication of the advertisement, regardless of its tendency, is sufficient to authorize the revocation of the license, and it must be presumed that the action of the board was based solely upon the fact of the publication, as it was authorized to do by the language of the statute. Under this statute, then, no matter how harmless or innocent may be the publication, nor what may be the chasteness of its language, nor the utter absence of any tendency to injure the morals of the public, yet the very fact of the publication of the advertisement is sufficient to take from a physician his license and the right to practise his profession. If this is to be justified under the statute, then the very basis upon which rest such statutes of regulation must be ignored. For such legislation is justified only upon the ground of police power and as tending to promote the public health, morals, safety, or general welfare.

"The police power is limited to enactments which have reference to the public health or comfort, the safety, or welfare, of society. Laws which impose penalties on persons and interfere with the personal liberty of the citizen cannot be constitutionally enacted, unless the public health, comfort, safety, or welfare demands their enactment. It is for the legislature to determine when an exigency exists for the exercise of this power, but what are the subjects of its exercise is clearly a judicial question. The exercise of legislative discretion is not subject to review by the courts when measures adopted by the legislature are calculated to protect the public health and secure the public comfort, safety, or welfare; but the measure so adopted must have some relation to the ends thus specified. Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 29 L.R.A. 79, 46 Am. St. Rep. 315, 40 N. E. 454. The legislature has no power, under the guise of police regulations, to arbitrarily invade the personal rights and personal liberty of the individual citizen. Its determination upon this question is not final or conclusive. If 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) it pass an act ostensibly in the exercise of the police power, but which in fact interferes unnecessarily with the personal liberty of the citizen, the courts have a right to examine the act and see whether it relates to the objects which the exercise of the police power is designed to secure, and whether it is appropriate for the promotion of such objects. When the police power is exerted for the purpose of regulating a useful business or occupation and the mode in which that business may be carried on or advertised, the legislature is not the exclusive judge as to what is a reasonable and just restraint upon the constitutional right of the citizen to pursue his calling and to exercise his own judgment as to the manner of conducting it. The general right of every person to pursue any calling, and to do so in his own way, provided that he does not encroach upon the rights of others, cannot be taken away from him by legislative enactment. Tiedeman, Pol. Power, § 3; Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 108, 50 Am. Rep. 636; People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 389, 4 Am. St. Rep. 465, 17 N. E. 343; Cook, Const. It is not material for the purpose of this case to determine whether the right to practise medicine be classed as a property right, as contended by the plaintiff in error, or as a mere privilege, as insisted by the board, for it must be conceded that it is a valuable right. The right to practise medicine in respect to its value is no different from the right to practise law, and of this Mr. Justice Field said in Ex parte Wall, 107 U. S. 265, 27 L. ed. 552, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 569: "To disbar an attorney is to inflict upon him a punishment of the severest character. He is admitted to the bar only after years of study. The profession may be to him the source of great emolument. If possessed of fair learning and ability, he may reasonably expect to receive from his practice an income of several thousand dollars a year,—equal to that derived from a capital of one or more hundred thousand dollars. To disbar him having such a practice is equivalent to depriving him of this capital. It would often entail poverty upon himself and destitution upon his family. Surely the tremendous power of inflicting such a punishment should never be permitted to be exercised unless absolutely necessary to protect the court and the public from one shown by the clearest legal proof to be unfit to be a member of an honorable profession."

Advertisements by physicians may be regarded by certain members of the profession, as contrary to professional ethics, but with that legislatures and courts may not be concerned. The legislature has no power to confer the authority upon a Board of Medical Examiners to deny to a physician the right to advertise his business.

Many statutes relating to the powers and duties of boards of medical examiners fix as cause for the revocation of a physician's certificate to practise medicine such as "unprofessional and dishonorable conduct," "grossly immoral and unprofessional conduct," etc. These statutes have been generally sustained by the courts. State ex rel. Powell v. State Medical Examining Board, 32 Minn. 324, 50 Am. Rep. 575, 20 N. W. 238, id. 34 Minn. 391, 26 N. W. 125; Meffert v. State Bd. of Medical Registration (Meffert v. Packer) 66 Kan. 710, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 811, 72 Pac. 247; Meffert v. Packer, 195 U. S. 625, 49 L. ed. 350, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 790; Aiton v. Medical Examiners, 13 Ariz. 354, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 114 Pac. 962; State ex rel. Hathaway v. State Bd. of Health, 103 Mo. 22, 15 S. W. 322; Kennedy v. State Bd. of Registration, 145 Mich. 241, 108 N. W. 730, 9 Ann. Cas. 125. But these cases sustain such statutes upon the ground of public welfare and public morals. For it is as essential that a licensed physician shall be possessed of professional honor as that the applicant for such license shall possess such qualifications. In the first one of these cases cited by counsel for the board in this case, it was said: "We will add, as our construction of the words 'unprofessional or dishonorable conduct,' as used in § 9, that we do not think that the legislature contemplated matters of merely professional ethics, but that the term 'unprofessional' was used convertibly with 'dishonorable.' The meaning may be expressed by using the conjunctive and in place of the disjunctive or. Wert v. Clutter, 37 Ohio St. 347, 350; Weston v. Loyhed, 30 Minn. 221, 14 N. W. 892." And in Meffert v. State Bd. of Medical Registration, supra, the court said: "It is subversive of the morals of the people and degrading to the medical profession for the state to clothe a grossly immoral man with authority to enter the homes of her citizens in the capacity of a physician."

Doubtless a physician might publish an advertisement which would in itself be so grossly immoral as to constitute dishonorable conduct. But our statute contains no such ground as a cause for revocation; neither is it contended or charged that either of the publications complained of were of any such character or had such tendency. The character of the advertisement is simply charged in the language of the statute as "relative to a disease of the sexual organs."

While we may not in this case enter into a consideration of the evidence, yet as illustrating the soundness of our conclusions, we note that the "Myers Medical Company" advertisement, and one for publication of which the license of Chenoweth was revoked upon the hearing, does not include the word "sexual," and contains no fairly inferred reference to a disease of the sexual organs. The only language in such advertisement that can be said to state or refer to any disease whatsoever is as follows: "We treat and cure catarrh and stomach troubles, nervous diseases, kidney, bladder troubles, heart diseases, diseases of the stomach and bowels, piles, fistula and rectal diseases, female complaints, diseases of women and children, rickets, spinal troubles, skin diseases, deafness, asthma, bronchial and lung troubles, consumption in the first stages, rheumatism, hay fever, neuralgia, hysteria, eye and ear diseases, goitre or big neck, la grippe, blood diseases, scrofula, and all forms of nervous and chronic diseases (that are curable)." Certainly there can be found nothing in this to justify the charge of an offense against the public morals. This but illustrates the settled principle of the law that such regulation statutes, to be justified, must be based upon the theory of protection of the public interest, the public morals, or the public welfare.

The "Scott Medical Company" advertisement does not use the term "sexual organs," but, in addition to the naming of diseases in no sense sexual, recites: "We successfully treat weakness, partial or complete loss, lack of power and strength, complicated and special disorders of men only." These terms do not refer specifically to diseases of the sexual organs. They may possibly refer to resultant effects of diseases of the sexual organs but just as possible to be produced from other causes. Hence to sustain the statute we must construe a publication relating to a condition which may or may not have been the resultant effect of a disease of the sexual organs, as being within its purview.

Then, how can such an advertisement be reasonably said to injuriously affect the public morals? Such a contention is both prudish and absurd. We can but take notice of the trend of the times and of the fact that societies and large numbers of respectable and moral people, including physicians, are urging that sex hygiene be taught in our public schools, in the interest of the public good and public morality. The statute does not provide that a tendency to injuriously affect the public morals or welfare shall appear as an essential fact to be considered in connection with such an advertisement. Neither does the complaint so charge. All of this tends to convey the impression that the purpose of the provision under consideration was to enforce the ethical notions of some members of a profession, rather than for the protection of the public at large.

We must not be understood as in any sense declaring for the restriction of the exercise of the police power as heretofore announced by this court, in cases where the purposes are plainly for the public good, for it is the tendency of courts to make such new and other application of this doctrine as the ever-changing conditions and protection of society may seem to require. But there is a necessary limit to the invasion of the inherent and constitutional rights of the citizen beyond which legislative restriction may not go, if stable government is to remain.

"In Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 32 L. ed. 253, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 992, 1257, the general proposition that the enjoyment by the citizen, upon terms of equality with all others in similar circumstances, of the privilege of pursuing an ordinary calling or trade, and of acquiring, holding, and selling property, is a general part of his rights of liberty, and property as guaranteed by the 14th Amendment, was assented to by the Supreme Court of the United States as embodying a sound principle of constitutional law. In the latter case it was also held that, although the power and discretion which a state legislature has in the matter of promoting the general welfare and of employing means to that end are very large, yet such power must be so exercised as not to impair the fundamental rights of life, liberty, and property." Ruhrstrat v. People, 185 Ill. 133, 49 L.R.A. 181, 76 Am. St. Rep. 30, 57 N. E. 41, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 453.

The expression in the Constitution, "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," is general in character, and includes many rights which are inherent and inalienable. Many of the rights referred to in this expression are included in the general guaranty of "liberty." The happiness here referred to may consist in many things or depend on many circumstances, but unquestionably includes the right of the citizen to follow his individual preference in the choice of occupation. Black, Const. Law, 404. For these reasons we must conclude that the provisions of the statute that a physician's license may be revoked for "causing the publication and circulation of an advertisement relative to any disease of the sexual organs" is in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution and § 3, art. 2, of our own Bill of Rights: "That all persons have certain natural, essential, and inalienable rights, among which may be reckoned the right of enjoying and defending their lives and liberties; that of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property; and of seeking and obtaining their safety and happiness." The State Medical Board may act only within its statutory authority; and, such provision of the statute being invalid, the acts of the board in this case were void.

The plaintiff in error contends also that the term, "relating to a disease of the sexual organs," as used in the statute, is so indefinite and uncertain as to make the statute inoperative and invalid for that reason. The question naturally arises as to what we are to understand by the term, "diseases of the sexual organs." To what authority are we to turn for a definition? Does this term have a common or well-understood meaning, and, if not, what authority are we to seek for a definition? Suppose that by such a statute the publication of an advertisement relating to a disease of the sexual organs was declared to be a public offense, and that thereby others than physicians might be amenable to such a penal law, which by the way is not the case, and for that reason it is likewise contended that the provision in the statute is class legislation and for such reason void, and suppose that it became necessary for the court in a given case to charge the jury as to what constitutes a "disease of the sexual organs." If the court turned to the statute, he would find no definition as in case of murder, arson, larceny, etc. If he were to search law dictionaries and law text-books, he would be equally in the dark as to a definition of the term. If he were to examine Webster, he would find no such expression; yet he must define this alleged wrongful thing to which the offensive publication relates, in order that the jury may have some notion as to whether or not the accused is guilty of committing the offense. Having exhausted lexicographers, law-writers, and court decisions without avail, he can have recourse only to his common knowledge and the definition of the words considered separately. He may have a very clear notion as to what the word "disease" means, but he cannot conceive that the use of this word, or of the specific names by which the multitude of diseases are known, the use of which names are so necessary to science and to the use of physicians and laymen alike, can be under any circumstances inherently harmful or by law made so. If he considers the word "sexual," he finds that this is defined "as relating to sex," and that it includes both sexes. If he proceeds so far as to assume that such diseases arise solely from immoral acts, he must make additional unreasonable assumption. He must assume that the advertisement relates to a disease which is the result of immoral acts, else a mere publication relating to it may not, within the range of reason, be designated an offense.

Will it be said that more than a comparatively fair proportion of the diseases of sexual organs are the result of immorality? What will be said of tuberculosis, tumors, cancerous, and other growths, constituting diseases which affect every part of the human system? It is perhaps true that venereal diseases may be definitely said to be those arising from immorality, but who will have the hardihood to say that all sexual diseases are necessarily venereal diseases? Will a court of justice sustain a conviction for an offense so abstractly named, so wholly undefined, and so uncertain of definition? Yet we are asked to sustain such a statute to the extent that a physician, who may be charged with its violation, is to be denied the right to practise his profession. Clearly the statute is so indefinite as to render it invalid for that reason alone.

Besides, the penalty provided is so grossly excessive and unconscionable as to make the statute repugnant to every sense of justice if not to render it void for such reason. Under its provision a physician who has spent many years and vast sums of money to qualify himself to practise medicine, who has spent many more years in the practice, and thereby established a reputation and a practice worth thousands of dollars to him annually, and yet if he shall publish an advertisement relating to a disease of the sexual organs, however humane may be the purpose and however innocent of wrong may be the intent, he must have all this taken from him and have the consequent ignominy and contempt heaped upon him in addition. And in his trial for the alleged offense he is to be denied the privilege of a hearing before a court of justice and the right of trial by jury. He may not have the same right that is accorded to ordinary offenders. The statute provides that "causing the publication of an advertisement relating to the sexual organs" shall be an offense only if by physicians. Any person other than a physician may publish such advertisements at will. If such publication tends to injuriously affect the public morals, it is not by reason of the fact that the publication is caused by a physician. The effect is precisely the same whoever may be the publisher. The offense, if it be one, is a public one, equally applicable to all persons.

The statute that makes the act an offense only when committed by a physician, and provides an excessive penalty in such case, is clearly discriminatory in that it applies to a class of citizens only, and for that reason alone is void.

The writer of this opinion, speaking for himself, is of the opinion that, in the interest of justice and fairness, the legislature might well provide for the right of appeal in such case to the courts where such a matter may be finally determined on its merits, as are other rights of citizens. Arbitrary and star-chamber proceedings are abhorrent to the American mind. There is no sane reason why a physician once found to be qualified in all respects to practise his profession should not be permitted to have his rights ultimately and finally determined by a court of justice.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to enter judgment directing the State Board of Medical Examiners to cancel its order revoking the license of the plaintiff in error to practise medicine in the state of Colorado and to restore to him such rights and privileges in the premises as he may have been entitled to prior to such act of revocation.

Musser, Ch. J., and Garrigues and White, JJ., concur. Bailey, Gabbert, and Hill, JJ., dissent.

Gabbert, J., dissenting:

The police power of the state may always be exercised to protect the public morals, and its exercise of this power is valid when regulations of this character tend to accomplish the purposes for which they were enacted. The statute under consideration provides that the State Board of Medical Examiners may refuse to grant or may revoke a license to practise medicine in this state for several causes, among which is "causing the publication and circulation of an advertisement relative to any disease of the sexual organs." One purpose of these regulations, and the only one necessary to consider, is to protect the public morals by prohibiting alleged physicians, who have obtained a license to practise, from publishing and circulating advertisements of a nature that would tend to injuriously affect the morals of the community where the inhibited advertisements might be circulated and read. It needs no argument to demonstrate that advertisements of the kind prohibited are unfit to find their way into homes through the medium of the press, and that to the youth of either sex, at least, they are demoralizing. It is therefore apparent that the clause of the act in question which is under consideration is a valid exercise of the police power of the state. It is also clear, if that question is before us, that the advertisements which the doctor caused to be published fall within its inhibition, for the reason that they unquestionably relate to diseases of the sexual organs and refer to that class of diseases in as unmistakable terms as though the words "sexual organs" appeared in the advertisements.

The judgment of the district court should be affirmed.

The writer is authorized to state that Mr. Justice Hill and Mr. Justice Bailey concur in this opinion.

Interest — rate in admiralty tort within state.

The interest to be allowed by the admiralty court for a tort arising within the Note. — Rate of interest allowed by admiralty court in case of marine tort as affected by place of occurrence or suit.

Cases wherein the action is brought on contracts entered into and to be performed in a given state or territory, such as The Mary N. Bourke, 76 C. C. A. 441, 145 Fed. 909, and Northern Commercial Co. v. Lindblom, 89 C. C. A. 230, 162 Fed. 250, are not included in this note. It may be added, however, that there seems to be no question but that the state or territorial rate of interest would govern in such a case. And of course the question as to whether or not interest will be allowed at all is not treated as the present note assumes that interest will be allowed, and is concerned merely as to the rate.

The early rule was that the rate of interest to be allowed in admiralty in case of a marine tort was not governed by the rate of the state where the tort was committed, or where the action is tried, except possibly as to money paid out in such a jurisdiction for repairs, but that there ought to be a uniform rate; and 6 per cent was usually awarded. The later cases, however, indicate a growing tendency to award interest according to the varying laws of the states.

But it seems safe to assume that the question is an open one until expressly passed upon by the Federal Supreme Court. To date that court has affirmed a lower 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

borders of a state is to be computed for the entire time allowed, whether before or after the final decision, at the rate fixed by the state statute for allowance on judgments.

A PPEAL by libelee from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan in favor of libellants in a suit to recover damages for a collision alleged to have been caused by the negligence of libellee. Modified and affirmed.

court decision which expressly adhered to the rule that a uniform rate should be and has been established (see Dyer v. National Steam Nav. Co. infra), and has stated that rule by way of argument (see Hemmenway v. Fisher, (infra), and, on the other hand, has modified, but without discussion, an allowance of interest so as to make the rate thereof conform to the state rate (see The New York, infra).

In fact one of the earliest expressions of opinion upon this interesting question was by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Hemmenway v. Fisher, 20 How. 255, 15 L. ed. 799. In that case Mr. Chief Justice Taney, in expressing his opinion that the rate of interest to be allowed by an admiralty court in case of a marine tort ought not to vary according to the state laws and rules, said: "There could be no reason for giving one rate of interest where a case of collision or salvage was, in the first instance, tried and decided in Louisiana, and another rate of interest where it was tried and decided in New York, or in any other state where the interest allowed by the state laws was different."

And it is upon this case that the rule of uniform rate of interest seems to be based. Thus, following the statement of Mr. Justice Taney set out supra, Blatchford, J., in The Aleppo, 7 Ben. 120, Fed. Cas. No. 158, expressly held that "in admiralty in cases of collision where interest is allowed it ought to be a uniform rate, and not one varying with the laws of the states." He also said that "such rate of interest, in collision cases tried in this court, has been and is 6 per cent, except that, on money paid out here for repairs made here, interest according to the law of this state has, in some cases, been allowed. This rate of 6 per cent was fixed at an early day, in analogy, perhaps, to the rate fixed by act of Congress as the rate on bonds for duties to the United States." And in connection with this case, see Vanderbilt v. Reynolds, 16 Blatchf. 80, Fed. Cas. No. 16,839, wherein it was stated that the rule as to interest on damages for loss caused by a collision was 7 per cent per annum on the money paid for repairs, and 6 per cent on the other damages.

And following the rule laid down in the Aleppo Case it was held in The Oregon, 89 Fed. 520, that 6 per cent was the proper rate of interest for damages arising from a marine collision.

And the Aleppo Case was again followed in Dyer v. National Steam Nav. Co. 14 Blatchf. 483, Fed. Cas. No. 4,225, affirmed on this point in 105 U. S. 24, 26 L. ed. 1001 (entitled in the official reporter, "The Scotland"), it being expressly held in the lower court that the proper rate of interest on the amount of damages for loss of a ship was 6, and not 7, per cent, and Mr. Justice Bradley, as is noted in CAMBRIA S. S. Co. v. PITTSBURG S. S. Co., saying, in writing the opinion for the United States Supreme Court, that "the rate of interest allowed, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Messrs. Frederick L. Leckie and Roscoe B. Huston for Jerrainy McIntyre.

Warrington, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The suit upon which this appeal is based grew out of a collision between the steamer Queen City and the steamer John W. Moore in the Detroit river on October 19, 1907. The final decree was entered July 25, 1912. An interlocutory degree had previously been entered, finding that the damages sustained through such collision, by the colliding steamers, by Jerrainy McIntyre, administratrix of the estate of Duncan McIntyre, deceased, and by the St. Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Company, were occasioned through the sole fault of the steamer Edward Y. Townsend, and making the usual reference to a commissioner to take proofs and ascertain and report the damages. The reasons for the finding and order of reference are stated in the opinion of Judge Denison, who presided at the trial (189 Fed. 653); and his opinion is approved and adopted.

May 17, 1912, upon exceptions to the partial report of the commissioner, the damages awarded to Jerrainy McIntyre, administratrix, were reduced by Judge Angell from $6,000 to $4,000, with interest from 6 per cent per annum, was the proper one in such a case."

So, in The Mary Eveline, 14 Blatchf. 497, Fed. Cas. No. 9,212, it was held that the court erred in allowing interest at the rate of 7 per cent on the amount of damages sustained in a marine collision, the court saying that "the rate in such cases is established in admiralty at 6 per cent" and that the point was decided "after a conference with Judge Blatchford and with his concurrence and approval."

And see the following cases wherein it was decreed without discussion that interest should or would be allowed at the rate of 6 per cent per annum: The Ocean Queen, 5 Blatchf. 493, Fed. Cas. No. 10,410, affirming Fed. Cas. No. 10,409; The Baltic, 3 Ben. 195, Fed. Cas. No. 824, wherein the court merely followed the next preceding case, saying that the proper rate of interest was 6, and not 7, per cent; The Mary J. Vaughan, 2 Ben. 47, Fed. Cas. No. 9,217, affirmed without reference to the question of interest in 14 Wall. 258, 20 L. ed. 807.

And that the rule is that the rate of interest allowed by courts of admiralty is not affected by state laws, and is usually 6 per cent, see 4 Sutherland, Damages, § 1294, p. 3795, and 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1032.

On the other hand, the court in CAMBRIA S. S. Co. v. PITTSBURG S. S. Co., after reviewing many of the foregoing authorities, refused to adopt the rule that admiralty courts should allow interest at a uniform rate, and seemingly for the first time in that date "if such course shall be deemed not inconsistent with law when the decree is entered," but without fixing the rate of interest. The remaining damages, as ultimately allowed, were fixed by stipulations, with interest from specified dates though no rate was named. In the final decree Judge Sessions fixed the rate at 6 per cent per annum from such dates "until paid." And Judge Tuttle, sitting in the same court, has since then in another case reached the conclusion that the rate allowable upon the items entering into such a decree should be

5 per cent. The Newaygo (D. C.) 205 Fed. 178. It is contended for appellant that the entire interest allowed should have been at the rate prescribed by statute of Michigan, to wit, 5 per cent per annum; while it is insisted for appellees that the usual rate allowed in cases arising in admiralty is 6 per cent per annum. Hence no question is made touching the right of the trial court either to have allowed or denied interest; and it must be conceded that it possessed a reasonable discretion in this behalf. See decisions cited in Thompson any court expressly held that in admiralty interest should be allowed in case of a marine tort arising within the border of a state at the rate established by that state. This conclusion was based in the main upon a decision of the United States Supreme Court which inferentially only supports it. The case referred to is variously reported as "The New York," "The Conemaugh," and "Union Steamboat Co. v. Erie & Western Transportation Co." It arose in the United States district court for the eastern district of Michigan (reported sub nom. The New York, 53 Fed. 553), and the record, as is stated in the CAMBRIA CASE, shows that interest was allowed on the damages as ascertained at the rate of 6 per cent. The case was then appealed to the circuit court of appeals (reported sub nom. The New York, 27 C. C. A. 154, 54 U. S. App. 248, 82 Fed. 819, rehearing denied in 30 C. C. A. 628, 56 U. S. App. 146, 86 Fed. 814), wherein the judgment of the district court was reversed for error in the determination of primary liability. The case then went to the United States Supreme Court (reported sub nom. The New York, 175 U. S. 187, 44 L. ed. 126, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67) upon writ of certiorari and was again reversed, the mandate directing that a decree be entered with interest "at the same rate per annum that decrees bear in the courts of the state of Michigan. Pursuant to this mandate the district court entered judgment (March 4, 1899) as directed, and an appeal was again taken to the circuit court of appeals (reported sub nom. The New York, 47 C. C. A. 232, 108 Fed. 102) upon the ground, among others, that the district court had erred in its decision as to which of two statutory rates of interest was applicable, but the judgment was affirmed. The case then again went to the United States Supreme Court on writ of certiorari (reported sub nom. The Conemaugh, 189 U. S. 363, under the title Union S. B. Co. v. Erie & W. Transp. Co. in 47 L. ed. 854, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 504), and the court, quoting its mandate as issued when the case was before it on the former writ of certiorari, affirmed the judgment of the lower courts. However, these decisions do not expressly discuss the question whether or not the rate of interest fixed by the Michigan statute rather than a uniform rate is the proper one in admiralty in case of marine torts, and the only force attachable thereto is 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

derived from the fact that the lower court allowed interest at 6 per cent, and the supreme court, in reversing the case, directed that the interest be computed at the Michigan statutory rate, which, as ultimately determined in the second appeal to that court, was 7 per cent.

And it is inferable from the argument and decision in Steamship Wellesley Co. v. C. A. Hooper & Co. 108 C. C. A. 71, 185 Fed. 733, where the court allowed interest at the rate (7 per cent) fixed by the law of California, that the rates of interest allowed in admiralty in case of marine tort should be determined by the rate set by the respective states, rather than by the establishment of a uniform rate.

So, in The Newaygo, 205 Fed. 178, the court, although having a contract case under consideration, questioned the authority of The Aleppo, The Oregon, and kindred cases set out supra.

The question of interest as damages was raised in Munch v. The Sucker State, Fed. Cas. No. 9,921, wherein the court allowed the cost of repairs necessitated by a collision, and, as damages for loss of service of the vessel during the time the repairs were being made, the highest rate of interest upon her value permitted in the state (Minnesota) where the cause of action arose and was tried.

But see The Rhode Island, Abb. Adm. 100, Fed. Cas. No. 11,743, affirmed in 2 Blatchf. 113, Fed. Cas. No. 11,744, wherein, as damages for loss of time consumed in making repairs, 6 per cent interest upon the value of the vessel was allowed, the court saying that such rate was "the usual rate of interest awarded by this court and the legal rate in Connecticut, where the vessel is owned."

In Thompson Towing & Wrecking Assn. v. McGregor, 124 C. C. A. 479, 207 Fed. 209, which was said in the CAMBRIA S. S. Co. CASE to rule the rate of interest that should be allowed in the latter case, the action was in admiralty to recover under the Michigan death act for wrongful death, and the question was as to whether interest should be allowed at all, and not as to what rate of interest should be allowed; and the court merely held that, since a Michigan statute was being construed, the Michigan rules should be followed, and an award of interest at 5 per cent was affirmed.

G. J. C.

Towing & Wrecking Asso. v. McGregor, 124 C. C. A. 479, 207 Fed. 209, at page 221, note, (C. C. A. 6th Cir.). Since it was determined actually to allow interest as part of the ascertained damages "until paid," it should be borne in mind that the question concerns the rate that should have been applied both before and upon the decree.

It is apparent that the question did not arise in Judge Denison's consideration of the case. And Judge Sessions appears to have fixed the rate at 6 per cent, because Judge Angell had previously allowed that rate in an unreported case; but Judge Angell seems to have entertained doubt in that case, as also in the present case, touching the allowance of a rate in excess of 5 per cent. Concededly there are admiralty decisions in which the rate of 6 per cent has been distinctly allowed from the date of loss at least until the date of decree. For example: The Aleppo, 7 Ben. 120, Fed. Cas. No. 158, decided in 1874 by Judge Blatchford, then district judge; Dyer v. National Steam Nav. Co. 14 Blatchf. 483, Fed. Cas. No. 4,225, decided in 1878 by Judge Blatchford when circuit judge; The Mary Eveline, 14 Blatchf. 497, Fed. Cas. No. 9,212, by Mr. Justice Hunt, sitting as circuit justice, decided after conference with Judge Blatchford and with his concurrence on the day following the decision in the Dyer Case; The Oregon (D. C.) 89 Fed. 520, 526. The Dyer Case, supra, with others, was appealed to the Supreme Court, and is reported in the name of The Scotland (National Steam Nav. Co. v. Dyer) 105 U. S. 24, 36, 26 L. ed. 1001, 1005, in which Mr. Justice Bradley said: "The rate of interest allowed, 6 per cent per annum, was the proper rate in such a case." Moreover, in The New York, 175 U. S. 187, 44 L. ed. 126, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67, a district court decree was involved, which had been reversed in this court (27 C. C. A. 154, 54 U. S. App. 248, 82 Fed. 819), and in which, as appears in the record of the case, Judge Swan had allowed interest on an ascertained amount of damages at the rate of 6 per cent per annum for a definite period prior to his decree. Upon reversal of the decision of this court, the district court was directed to enter a decree "in conformity with the opinion of this (the Supreme) court, with interest from July 3, 1896 (the date of the decree allowing 6 per cent interest as stated), until paid, at the same rate per annum that decrees bear in the courts of the state of Michigan." 175 U. S. at 210, 44 L. ed. 136, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 76. In the decree entered pursuant to this mandate, it appears that interest was allowed for a time anterior to the decree; but the rate was not 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

stated, and we are unable to discover it in the record. That decree, however, was affirmed by this court (47 C. C. A. 232, 108 Fed. 102) and by the Supreme Court (sub nom. The Conemaugh [Union S. B. Co. v. Erie & W. Transp. Co.] 189 U. S. 363, 47 L. ed. 854, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 504); and the only question of rate of interest expressly passed upon in these latter decisions was, Which of two different statutory rates then existing in Michigan should be allowed on the decree? and the rate of 7 per cent prescribed as to state judgments and decrees was adjudged to be applicable. It is further to be observed that no interest at all would have been recoverable upon that decree if the court had not expressly allowed it. The Scotland, 118 U. S. 507, 519, 30 L. ed. 153, 155, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1174; Hemmenway v. Fisher, 20 How. 255, 260, 15 L. ed. 799, 800; Supreme Court Rule 23, subd. 4, appendix p. 28, 222 U. S., 56 L. ed. 1301, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. xi.; Dewhurst's Supreme Court Rules, p. 122, Rule 23 as it now stands.

Now, in view of the two rates of interest thus approved in the one instance and adopted in the other by the Supreme Court, what is the duty of this court in the instant case? It may be conceded that the exercise of discretionary power was involved in both instances, that is, through the Supreme Court's approval of the discretion exercised by the court below in the first, and through the specific exercise by the Supreme Court of its own discretion in adopting the state rate in the second, instance. We are disposed to follow the course adopted in the last instance. The first instance amounts to an approval of the usual 6 per cent rate where there is no statutory rate that can reasonably be applied; while the second in effect adopts the principle of applying prescribed state rates where the conditions will admit of it. The former illustrates the ordinary conditions attending suits respecting collisions or salvage upon the high seas, and the latter the conditions usually growing out of and involved in suits with respect to similar disasters upon the internal navigable waters. It may be, as respects the latter, a rate lower than that fixed, for the decree itself was in practical effect approved with reference to the time for which interest was allowed prior to the decree; but that was due to anomalous statutory conditions then prevailing in Michigan, which (in the absence of stipulation) fixed the rate of interest at 5 per cent on all obligations other than judgments and decrees, and on the latter the rate of 7 per cent. The New York, supra, 47 C. C. A. 232, 108 Fed. 107, 110 (C. C. A. 6th C.), affirmed sub nom. The Conemaugh (Union S. B. Co. v. Erie & W.

Transp. Co.) 189 U. S. at 368, 370, 47 L. ed. 857, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 504). This anomaly has since been removed by imposing a uniform rate of 5 per cent on judgments and decrees and (where not otherwise stipulated) on all other obligations. 2 How. Anno. Stat. (Mich.) 2d ed. §§ 2869, 2873. It could rarely occur normally that a rule would be suffered to prevail which would, prior to the entering of the decree, allow one rate of interest upon its component parts, such as liquidated damages and the like, and another rate upon the decree. For that would be to affirm that the same thing should bear one rate before and another after the entry of the decree; and we do not see how anything more than the deprivation of the use of money could be involved, no matter whether it be before or after the date of the decree. It follows that there is now more reason for applying the state rate to the present decree, than there was for adopting it with respect to the decree in the case of The New York; and certainly no decision has come to our notice that would justify both ignoring the present state rate (5 per cent) as regards the decree, and sanctioning the higher rate (6 per cent) allowed below as to the time previous to the decree. Steamship Wellesley Co. v. C. A. Hooper & Co. 108 C. C. A. 71, 185 Fed. 733, 740 (C. C. A. 9th C.); The Newaygo (D. C.) 205 Fed. 178.

What we have said respecting a uniform rate of interest, both before and upon any given decree, is not affected by counsel's suggestion that it is contrary to the view expressed in Hemmenway v. Fisher, 20 How. at page 259, 15 L. ed. 799, to the effect that there is no reason for giving different rates of interest according to those fixed in the states where the cases of collision or salvage might in the first instance be tried. The view so expressed had reference to interest upon a decree, and is opposed to the principle adopted in the case of The New York, 175 U. S. at page 210, 44 L. ed. 136, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67. Further, that view is not in accord with the spirit and apparent purpose of Rule 23 of the Supreme Court, which in substance provides that, unless otherwise ordered, a decree for the payment of money in a case in chancery (a kindred although not identical subject) shall bear interest at the same rate that similar decrees bear in the courts of the state where such decree is rendered. We may observe, too, that our own Rule 26 (118 C. C. A. xix., 202 Fed. xvii.) is like this except that our rule expressly includes decrees in admiralty.

We have thus far considered only the rates of interest that have been and should be applied to ascertained damages resulting from torts which are sought to be redressed in suits in admiralty, and to decrees entered upon the amounts so found; but in principle our conclusion finds still further support, we think, in the rule that claims upon contracts entered into and to be performed in a given state with respect to a vessel or anything connected with it shall bear interest at the rate prescribed by statute in such state. The Mary N. Bourke, 76 C. C. A. 441, 145 Fed. 909, 911 (C. C. A. 2d C.). We may add that the rate of interest that should be allowed on the damages as ultimately fixed in favor of Jerrainy McIntyre, administratrix, is ruled by the decision of this court in Thompson Towing & Wrecking Asso. v. McGregor, 124 C. C. A. 479, 207 Fed. at pages 219, 220, and so must, for this additional reason, be limited to 5 per cent per annum.

It results that the rate of interest allowed by the final decree must be so modified as not in respect of any time prior to the date of the decree, or upon the decree itself, exceed the rate of 5 per cent per annum. Subject to this modification, the decree is affirmed. In view of the large amount of interest involved, the costs of this court will be divided; and the cause is remanded with direction to enter a decree accordingly.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

EMANUEL KAYSER et al., Appts.,
v.

JOHN H. VAN NEST, Respnt.

(125 Minn. 277, 146 N. W. 1091.)

Master and servant — injury by automobile.

1. Whether the owner of an automobile is liable for damages caused by negligence in driving it depends upon whether the driver was or was not the servant of the owner and engaged upon the business of the owner when the negligence occurred.

Same — liability of parent.

2. Where a parent keeps an automobile, which he authorizes a child to use for pleasure at any time, and the child operates it so negligently as to cause injury to others, it is error to rule that, as a matter of law, the parent is not responsible for such negligence.

Headnotes by TAYLOR, C.

Note. — The question of liability where automobile is being used by a member of owner's family is considered in the notes to McNeal v. McKain, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 775, and Birch v. Abercrombie, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 59.

Same — permitting passenger to drive.

3. The fact that a servant, driving his master's car upon the master's business, permits a stranger riding with him to drive it temporarily, while upon such business, does not absolve the master from responsibility.

(April 24, 1914.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the District Court for Hennepin County denying their motion for new trial in an action brought to recover damages for injuries caused by the alleged negligent driving of defendant's automobile. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John M. Rees for appellants.

Messrs. George B. Leonard and M. Rose, for respondent:

The mere fact that respondent owned the car is not sufficient to charge him with liability.

Freibaum v. Brady, 143 App. Div. 220, 128 N. Y. Supp. 121; Lotz v. Hanlon, 217 Pa. 339, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 202, 118 Am. St. Rep. 922, 66 Atl. 525, 10 Ann. Cas. 731; Lewis v. Amorous, 3 Ga. App. 50, 59 S. E. 338; Cunningham v. Castle, 127 App. Div. 580, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1057.

The mere fact that the respondent permitted another to use his car is not sufficient to charge him with liability for the negligence of the bailee.

Doran v. Thomsen, 76 N. J. L. 754, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 335, 131 Am. St. Rep. 677, 71 Atl. 296.

Taylor, C., filed the following opinion:

A collision occurred between two automobiles, and this action was brought by the owners of one to recover damages from the owner of the other. A verdict for the defendant was directed by the court, and, after a motion for a new trial had been made and denied, plaintiffs appealed.

Defendant kept his car for the use, convenience, and pleasure of himself and the members of his family. It was usually driven by his daughter, nineteen years of age, and she was authorized to use it whenever she desired to do so. On the day of the accident, she took it, and, accompanied by a younger sister, drove to the home of a relative, where they were joined by other young people. From this point the daughter permitted a cousin, then riding with them, to drive the car, and the accident is alleged to have occurred by reason of his negligence. The evidence as to such negligence was sufficient to require the submission of the case to the jury if defendant is liable therefor. The court held as a matter 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

of law that defendant was not responsible for the acts of either his daughter or her cousin at the time of the accident, and directed a verdict in his favor upon that ground.

Whether the owner of an automobile is liable for the damages caused by it which result from the negligence of the person operating it depends upon whether the person operating it was the servant of the owner and engaged upon the business of the owner at the time the negligence occurred. If he was such servant and engaged upon such business, the owner is responsible for injuries to persons or property caused by his negligence in operating it. If he was not such servant, or was not engaged upon such business, the owner is not responsible for such negligence. Sina v. Carlson, 120 Minn. 283, 139 N. W. 601; Geiss v. Twin City Taxicab Co. 120 Minn. 368, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 382, 139 N. W. 611; Meyers v. Tri-State Automobile Co. 121 Minn. 68, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 113, 140 N. W. 184; Ploetz v. Holt, 124 Minn. 169, 144 N. W. 745; McNeal v. McKain, 33 Okla. 449, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 775, 126 Pac. 742.

Defendant's daughter, while operating the car by his authority and upon his business, was defendant's servant within the meaning of the rule, and he was responsible for her acts to the same extent that he would have been responsible for the acts of any other servant. Defendant might properly make it an element of his business to provide pleasures for his family; and, as the car was intended for the use of the members of the family for purposes of pleasure as well as for other purposes, and the daughter had authority to take it and operate it for such purposes, it was at least a question for the jury whether, at the time of the accident, she was not the servant of defendant and engaged upon the business of defendant. See the cases above cited.

Defendant contends that, even if he is responsible for the acts of his daughter, he is not responsible for the acts of the third party who was operating the car at the time of the accident. The daughter remained in the car, and, although not personally operating it, had not relinquished control over it, nor turned it over to another to use for his own purposes. It was still being used in furtherance of the purpose for which she had taken it out. That the mere fact that the person authorized to operate the car permits another to operate it temporarily does not absolve the owner from responsibility, under such circumstances, has already been determined in Geiss v. Twin City Taxicab Co. 120 Minn.

368, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 382, 139 N. W. 611, and the cases there cited.

The issues should have been submitted to the jury, and the order appealed from is reversed.

NEW MEXICO SUPREME COURT.

STEPHEN CANAVAN et al., Appts.,
v.
KATE CANAVAN.

(— N. M. —, 139 Pac. 154.)

Contempt — civil.

1. The proceedings examined and held to be proceedings as for civil contempt.

Injunction — dissolution — prior violation — effect.

2. A final decree dissolves a preliminary injunction which is ancillary to the main Headnotes by PARKER, J.

Note. — Dissolution of preliminary injunction as affecting right to punish for contempt for its violation.

In general.

The general rule is, as laid down in CANAVAN v. CANAVAN, that a litigant cannot be punished as for contempt after the dissolution of a preliminary injunction, on the ground of an infringement of it while it was in force. The following additional cases announce this rule: Peck v. Yorks, 32 How. Pr. 408, quoted in CANAVAN v. CANAVAN; Taber v. Manhattan R. Co. 14 Misc. 189, 35 N. Y. Supp. 465 (affirmed in 148 N. Y. 743, 42 N. E. 1093); Moat v. Holbein, 2 Edw. Ch. 188; Jones v. Jones, 75 Wash. 50, 134 Pac. 528. And in Murad v. Thomas, 6 N. Y. S. R. 662, it was held that the discontinuance of an action wherein a temporary injunction had been granted, even if the discontinuance was after an alleged violation of the injunction, was fatal to the subsequent maintenance of contempt proceedings on account of such violation.

But there are authorities to the effect that one who violates an injunction before its dissolution may be punished as for contempt after its dissolution. Thus, in Smith v. Reno, 6 How. Pr. 124, 1 Code Rep. N. S. 405, in so holding, the court said: "It was not for him [the one enjoined] to determine whether the injunction was properly granted or not. So long as it remained an order of the court, so long he was bound to regard it. The fact that it has now been dissolved will furnish no protection to him for its violation, while it remained in force." (This case, however, although in direct conflict with, is not cited in the New York cases of Peck v. Yorks, Taber v. Manhattan R. Co. and Moat v. Holbein, all of which are set out supra.) And in Weidner v. Friedman, 126 Tenn. 677, 42 L.R.A. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) case, unless the same is specially continued by the decree, and thereafter a litigant cannot be punished as for a civil contempt for violation of the preliminary injunction prior to its dissolution.

(February 25, 1914.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for McKinley County adjudging defendant Canavan guilty of contempt for violation of a preliminary injunction in a divorce suit against him. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the former opinions.

Messrs. O. A. Spiess, E. A. Mann, and Burkhart & Coors for appellants.

Messrs. Vigil & Jamison, for appellee.

The preliminary injunction was not dissolved by the final decree.

Neisler v. Smith, 2 Ga. 265; Winship v. Clendenning, 24 Ind. 439; Shipman v. Superior Ct. — Cal. —, 12 Pac. 787; Ful-

(N.S.) 1041, 151 S. W. 56, it was held that violation of a temporary injunction should be punished as for contempt, although the bill for an injunction had been dismissed, the court saying that the dismissal of the bill would have no effect upon the contempt proceedings, as it was the duty of the defendant to obey the injunction, and the failure to do so a contempt of court; but that under the circumstances the imprisonment should be remitted.

And it has been held that a contempt proceeding for violating an injunction, if commenced before, may be continued after the injunction is dissolved. This was the rule laid down in Crook v. People, 16 Ill. 534, it being said that when the charge is made it becomes a distinct proceeding, which does not depend upon the continuance of the injunction. The court also said that an application to punish for contempt "might" be refused if made after dissolution of the injunction.

But no act of contempt occurs by doing acts prohibited by an injunction which has been dissolved previous to the doing of such acts. United States ex rel. McIntosh v. Price, 1 Alaska, 204; Ex parte Simmons, 105 Ark. 19, 150 S. W. 141; Caldwell v. Nashville Interurban R. Co. — Tenn. —, 164 S. W. 773.

And it has been held that a violation of a temporary injunction will not be punished as for contempt, where the injunction, subsequent to its violation, is dissolved because issued without jurisdiction. Old Dominion Teleg. Co. v. Powers, 140 Ala. 220, 37 So. 195, 1 Ann. Cas. 119; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cleburne Ice & Cold Storage Co. 37 Tex. Civ. App. 334, 83 S. W. 1100.

It seems that the dissolution necessary to release from punishment for contempt for violation of an injunction must have actually taken place. Thus, it has been held that reliance on a common rumor that ton v. Greacen, 44 N. J. Eq. 443, 15 Atl. 825; Worden v. Searls, 121 U. S. 14, 27, 30 L. ed. 853, 858, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 814.

If this is imprisonment for contempt in failure to comply with the final decree, it is not imprisonment for debt, and such failure is properly punishable by an attachment for contempt.

Curtis v. Gordon, 62 Vt. 340, 20 Atl. 820; Van Dyke v. Van Dyke, 125 Ga. 491, 54 S. E. 537; Gray v. Gray, 127 Ga. 345, 56 S. E. 438; Atkinson v. Southern R. Co. 114 Ga. 146, 55 L.R.A. 225, 39 S. E. 888, 11 Am. Neg. Rep. 32; Andrew v. Andrew, 62 Vt. 495, 20 Atl. 817; Scott v. Scott, 80 Kan. 489, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 132, 133 Am. St. Rep. 217, 103 Pac. 1005, 18 Ann. Cas. 564; Cavanaugh v. Cavanaugh, 106 Ill. App. 209; Shaffner v. Shaffner, 212 Ill. 492, 72 N. E. 447; Re Cave, 26 Wash. 213, 90 Am. St. Rep. 736, 66 Pac. 425; Davis v. Davis, 29 App. D. C. 258, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1071.

Mr. A. T. Hannett also for appellee.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment in a contempt proceeding. The appellant has been before the court on two former occasions. See Re Canavan, 17 N. M. 100, 130 Pac. 248, and Canavan v. Canavan, 17 N. M. 503, 131 Pac. 493. The facts sufficiently appear in those cases, and will not be here repeated. The first case was a habeas corpus proceeding upon a partial and imperfect record. It did not appear from the record in that case that the court was without jurisdiction, and we held that habeas corpus was not a proper remedy. In the second case we refused to review the judgment in the contempt proceeding, because it was rendered after the final decree in the divorce case, and was consequently not reviewable on appeal from the final decree. In this case, however, the appeal is brought directly from the judgment in the contempt proceeding. The an injunction had been dissolved will not excuse its breach so as to avoid punishment for contempt. Morris v. Hill, 28 N. J. Eq. 33. And see Murad v. Thomas, 6 N. Y. S. R. 662.

And it has been held that it is not a defense to a contempt proceeding for violation of an injunction that the injunction has been vacated by a judge who had no jurisdiction to do so. Koehler v. Farmers' & D. Nat. Bank, 25 N. Y. S. R. 222, 17 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 307, 3 Silv. Sup. Ct. 141, 6 N. Y. Supp. 470; People ex rel. Cauffman v. Van Buren, 63 Hun, 635, 44 N. Y. S. R. 820, 18 N. Y. Supp. 734.

In appeal cases.

As to effect in general of appeal from injunction upon jurisdiction of trial court to punish for contempt for its violation, see note to Barnes v. Chicago Typographical Union, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1150.

It has been held that the doing, in good faith, of an act in violation of the terms of a temporary injunction, intervening the dissolution of the injunction and the entry of an appeal with supersedeas, does not constitute contempt. Smith v. Whitfield, 8 Fla. 211, 20 So. 1012.

But a different rule seems to apply after an appeal has been perfected.

Thus, in Merrimack River Sav. Bank v. May Center, 219 U. S. 527, 55 L. ed. 320, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 295, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 513, wilful violation of a preliminary injunction pending an appeal to the United States Supreme Court from a decree dismissing the bill and discharging such injunction was held in and of itself to be a contempt of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

And it has been held that one who has been temporarily enjoined is not released from punishment for contempt of a violation of the injunction, by affirmance of a decree dismissing the bill and discharging the injunction, where the violation takes place after the affirmance, but before the issuance of the mandate, as in such case the appeal must be regarded as pending until a mandate issues, but an honest belief that there was no reason for obeying the injunction after such affirmance may reduce the punishment. Ibid.

Of course, where an injunction which has been dissolved is restored or continued during appeal from the decree, violation of the injunction pending the appeal is punishable as for a contempt. Balkum v. Harper, 60 Ala. 372; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cleburne Ice & Cold Storage Co. supra, provided the injunction was dissolved for an irregularity or for want of equity; Merrimack River Sav. Bank v. Clay Center, supra. And one who violates an injunction which has been dissolved, after appeal and the execution of a supersedeas bond and service thereof, is guilty of contempt where the service of the order of supersedeas leaves the injunction in full force. Smith v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 83 Ky. 269; Elizabethtown, L. & B. S. R. Co. v. Ashland & C. R. Co. 94 Ky. 478, 22 S. W. 855. And the same is true where the appeal from the dissolution of the injunction is with supersedeas bond (State ex rel. Carroll v. Campbell, 25 Mo. App. 635), or a "supersedeas appeal" is taken from the order dissolving an injunction (State ex rel. Barthet v. Houston, 37 La. Ann. 852).

But it has been held that an order staying the proceedings under an order dissolving the injunction restraining the taking of certain property under a certain judgment until a decision be had on an appeal from the order of dissolution did not revive the injunction so as to make a taking of the property punishable as a contempt. Weeks v. Smith, 3 Abb. Pr. 211.

G. J. C.

question now is as to whether the judgment in the contempt proceeding was erroneous.

Counsel for appellant relied upon several propositions, two of which only will be considered.

1. It is first asserted that the alleged contempt is a civil contempt. This was practically assumed in Canavan v. Canavan, supra, and is now so decided. Counsel have alleged, in support of this conclusion: First. That all of the affidavits, motions, and orders of the court in the contempt proceeding are entitled and filed in the original divorce proceeding. While this fact may not always be controlling, it is always a strong circumstance tending to show that the proceeding is civil, and not criminal. Second. Counsel urge that the form of the prayer of the plaintiff, to the effect that the court commit appellant to jail until he turns over the $19,000 decreed to the plaintiff, is controlling. This fact we deem of the highest importance and determinative of the character of the proceeding. Third. Counsel suggests that the judgment in contempt itself, in adjudging costs to the plaintiff, characterizes the proceeding as civil. It must be apparent that, if the proceeding were criminal, no costs could be awarded the plaintiff. Costs in such a case would go into the public treasury. Fourth. Counsel urges that the coercive nature of the judgment itself fixes the character of the proceeding. It clearly appears from the judgment that the object sought to be attained thereby was to secure the payment of the decree to the plaintiff. With all of these suggestions we agree, and they are undoubtedly the law on the subject. Gompers v. Buck's Stove & Range Co. 221 U. S. 418, 55 L. ed. 797, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 874, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 492.

Our own territorial court has pointed out the true rule on this subject in Costilla Land & Invest. Co. v. Allen, 15 N. M. 528, 110 Pac. 847, where it is said: "The border line between what may be termed civil and what criminal contempt is, as has been pointed out by many authorities, exceedingly indistinct and narrow, leaving it often a question of extreme refinement as to whether the act was one or the other. Of course all judgments for contempt are in a sense punitive, since the sentence imposed, even if simply to preserve private rights, and even if the so-called fine go to the litigant purely by way of reimbursement, has the effect to punish the recalcitrant, and to declare the purpose of the court that its orders shall not be trifled with. The authorities, however, draw a distinction between those contempts where the protection of the court and a vindication of its dignity are the main objects of the proceeding and those where a more effective remedy to private litigants is, after all, the purpose of what is done."

2. Counsel for appellant take the second position as follows: The injunction, for the alleged violation of which appellant was committed, was a preliminary injunction and was merged into or dissolved by the final decree of divorce which made no reference to the same; this being true, it is asserted there remains no power in the court to punish for civil contempt after merger or dissolution of the injunction, even if the same was in fact violated while it was in force.

The first half of the proposition seems to be well established, and to be uniformly recognized. Thus Mr. High states the rule as follows: "But, when the injunction is merely ancillary to the principal relief sought and is in terms granted until further order of the court, it is regarded as abrogated by the final judgment of the court granting the principal relief sought by the action and making no provision for continuing the injunction." High, Inj. 4th ed. § 1503. See also 22 Cyc. 981, where it is said: "The entry of a final decree in the injunction suit renders a temporary injunction ineffective." See also Sweeney v. Hanley, 61 C. C. A. 155, 126 Fed. 99, where in it is said: "It will be noticed that by this final decree the injunction theretofore granted was not continued in force. Upon the entry of the final decree the temporary injunction came to an end. Gardner v. Gardner, 87 N. Y. 14; Eureka Consol. Min. Co. v. Richmond Min. Co. 5 Sawy. 121, Fed. Cas. No. 4,549; 10 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 1029; Buffington v. Harvey, 95 U. S. 99, 24 L. ed. 381. A motion was subsequently made on behalf of the defendants to the suit for an order dissolving the preliminary injunction, which motion the court below denied. Whether or not it was the real reason for that action of the court, it is a sufficient reason therefore that no such injunction was then in force; it having come to an end by the entry of the final decree in the cause, making no provision for any injunction."

This must be so. The final decree always represents the determination of the court upon all the issues between parties, unless some of them are expressly reserved or excepted therefrom. It must of necessity require some special reservation, exception, or continuance of the court to preserve an anterior ancillary order in the form of an injunction issued for the purpose of preserving the status of property pendente lite.

The second half of the proposition is of more difficulty. On principle it would seem that a party to an equity proceeding, who has been enjoined from removing the estate which is the subject of litigation, from the jurisdiction, and who has violated the injunction, and who has thereby defeated his antagonist from collecting the amount of the decree which has been awarded against him, certainly should be punishable by the coercive remedy of a proceeding as for a civil contempt, until he shall pay the judgment. One's sense of right and wrong would seem to sanction the proposition. But, when examined more carefully, it would seem not to be sound. It is to be remembered that an injunction is a rule of conduct merely imposed, for the time being, upon a litigant by the properly constituted authority. But for the injunction the acts against which it is directed may be lawfully performed. If the litigant violates the injunction during its existence, he may be punished as for civil or criminal contempt, or both. But, if the injunction be dissolved, what was unlawful when it was in force, because prohibited by it, becomes lawful, and no basis remains upon which to predicate a proceeding in contempt. The principle runs through other branches of the law. For instance, if a statute prohibits the doing of any given act, the citizen may be punished for doing it so long as the statute remains in force. But if the statute be repealed, and the legislature fails to provide that the statute shall remain in force as to all prior violations of the act, that which was unlawful has become lawful, and no prosecutions can be had. While the criminal in morals is still a criminal, in legal contemplation the law has released him from his criminality. Just so with injunctions. A person violating an injunction and thereby defrauding his adversary of the fruits of his cause of action is still guilty in morals, but in legal contemplation the law has discharged him of his offense.

A different principle would seem to govern in case of criminal contempt, but we will not discuss the same; it not being involved. In actions for civil contempt the duty commanded by the injunction no longer exists after the dissolution. In order to punish for a civil contempt, it would seem that there must be a present rule of conduct subsisting and in force, together with the acts violating the same.

Comparatively little satisfactory authority is to be found on the subject. It is said in Spelling on Injunctions & Extraordinary Legal Remedies, § 1129, that this is the correct rule, and he cites one case, that of Moat v. Holbein, 2 Edw. Ch. 188. The opinion is by the vice chancellor, and is not at all satisfactory in its discussion of the 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

proposition, but it seems to be the earliest case to be found.

In Peck v. Yorks, 32 How. Pr. 408, the same doctrine is announced, and a very well-considered opinion is rendered by the court, in which it is said: "An injunction, which is but an order of the court, can have no more force or extended operation after it is set aside or modified than a statute repealed or modified, in regard to acts previously done. In either case, the rule being abolished, the infraction of it is abolished also, and nothing remains on which a conviction can be based." See also Taber v. Manhattan R. Co. 14 Misc. 189, 35 N. Y. Supp. 465, to the same effect.

In Gompers v. Buck's Stove & Range Co. supra, while the exact point was not involved which is involved here, a similar proposition was involved, and the court held that, by reason of the settlement of the main case, the ancillary proceedings by way of injunction had come to an end, and that therefore no proceedings for civil contempt could be maintained.

We therefore hold that the proceeding in this case, being a proceeding as for civil contempt, and being a proceeding for a violation of a preliminary injunction after the same had been merged and dissolved, and for acts alleged to have been committed prior to its dissolution, is not maintainable.

It follows, from what has been said, that the judgment of the court below is erroneous, and the same will be reversed, and the cause remanded to the district court, with directions to proceed in accordance with this opinion.

HORNER MILITARY SCHOOL.

(165 N. C. 564, 81 S. E. 767.)

School — expulsion of pupil — retention of tuition.

A private school the catalogue of which makes the tuition payable in advance, and provides that pupils may be expelled for breach of discipline, may, upon expelling a pupil for breach of reasonable regulations, not only retain the tuition actually paid, but compel payment of the portion due and not paid when the expulsion occurred.

(May 13, 1914.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Superior Court for Cabarrus County setting aside a verdict in his favor and granting a new trial in an action brought to recover money paid by him for the tuition and expenses of his son at defendant's school. Affirmed.

Statement by Walker, J.:

This action was brought to recover $70, money paid by the plaintiff to the defendant for the tuition and expenses of his son at the latter's school. The boy was entered January 1, 1913, for the remainder of that scholastic year, and returned for the fall term, 1913, the 1st of September. Defendant, early in September, sent a bill for the whole amount of tuition and expenses for the term, to wit, $185. Plaintiff paid $90, and failed to pay the balance due. The boy was expelled for repeated misconduct and violation of the rules and regulations of the school, about October 1, 1913. This suit was brought to recover the amount thus paid. Defendant denied liability, and set up a counterclaim for balance of the bill, less some deductions, which was $80.56, alleging, and Mr. J. C. Horner, principal of the school, testifying, that it was all payable in advance. Plaintiff tes-

General rules.

A contract for schooling for any specified period of time being entire (see 35 Cyc. 816), it seems to be well settled that, if, during the term of the contract, a pupil is properly expelled for misconduct, or unnecessarily withdraws from the school, without any fault on the part of the proprietor or master, or anyone connected with the school, the school is entitled to the whole consideration for the entire period, and may recover any portion thereof remaining unpaid; and the other party to the contract may not recover back any part of the consideration paid in advance for such period.

Thus, a parent whose son was properly expelled from a military school for hazing, about thirty days after the beginning of a term, cannot recover any portion of a sum which he paid in advance, at the beginning of the term, upon the tuition fee. Kentucky Military Institute v. Bramblet, 158 Ky. 205, 164 S. W. 808.

And a father who entered his son as a cadet in a military academy, under a contract providing that no money would be refunded in case the cadet was dismissed, cannot, upon the dismissal of his son from the academy, two months after entrance, recover any portion of the sum paid by him in advance for board, room, tuition, etc.,—being the portion of the annual charge payable on entrance,—unless the action of the superintendent of the academy in dismissing the cadet was so unreasonable or oppressive as to warrant the conclusion that he acted maliciously, unfairly, or from some improper motive. Manson v. Culver Military Academy, 141 Ill. App. 250.

So, a father who contracted with the teacher of a private school for the board and tuition of his son, and paid in advance one half of the yearly charges at the beginning of each half year,—the rules and catalogue of the school, furnished to the father, providing, to his knowledge, that no engagements were made for less than the school year, and that all payments were forfeited in case of expulsion,—cannot recover, upon the expulsion of his son for good cause, soon after the beginning of the second half year, any part of the payment made in advance for that half year. Fessman v. Seeley, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 34 S. W. 268.

And one who entered a school and paid in advance a tuition fee, in consideration of which the proprietor of the school agreed to give him instruction until he should be qualified to pass certain examinations, cannot, upon being suspended from the school for improper and insubordinate conduct, recover any portion of the fee paid. Kabus v. Seftner, 34 Misc. 538, 69 N. Y. Supp. 983.

Where a mother placed her daughter as a pupil in a boarding school for the school year, under a contract which, as contended by the school and as correctly construed, gave the officers of the school absolute discretion to determine when a pupil should be permitted to be absent; and the mother, at the end of six weeks, and after her daughter had already been allowed to spend three Sundays with her since entering the school, took her daughter away for two days without the permission of the school officers, whereupon they refused to allow the daughter to remain longer in the school unless the mother would accept their construction of the contract, above stated, with reference to absences; and the mother refused to accept this construction and took her daughter away,—she cannot recover any of the money which she advanced, under the contract, for a half-year's board and tuition for her daughter, with the provision that no deduction should be made for absence, except in case of protracted illness. Curry v. Lasell Seminary Co. 168 Mass. 7, 46 N. E. 110.

And a schoolmaster is entitled to recover from the father of a pupil the entire amount of a quarter's school fees in respect of the son, which amount was payable in advance at the beginning of the quarter, where, about three weeks after the beginning of the quarter, the father insisted on keeping his son home over night, in known violation of one of the rules of the school and in tified: "When I received the bill for a half year's payment, I knew the money would be forfeited on expulsion." Mr. Horner testified: "On page 11 of the catalogue, on Character, I find: 'We do not want vicious or habitually insubordinate boys, and if such succeed in entering they will be dismissed. Applicants are accepted with the express understanding that they will submit to our authority in every respect. A boy whose conduct is hurtful to the scholarship and morals of his associates will be expelled. The discipline is not severe, but firm and decided, and no boy will be retained who does not cheerfully comply with the rules and regulations, or whose influence is known to be injurious to the morals and scholarship of his fellows. The freedom of college life is not given, but the aim of our discipline is to teach a boy to be self-governed. The discipline at Horner's appeals to a boy's sense of manliness, and teaches him, first, self-control and obedience to order, and in turn to control and command others. Any cadet who shall disobey a command of the principal, or of any professor, instructor, or other superior officer, or behave himself in a refractory or disrespectful manner, shall be expelled, or otherwise punished.' In general, these rules have been required to be kept hanging in the rooms. In the conduct of our school we enforce our rules in the catalogue as to payments to be made in advance. I suppose for fifteen or twenty years I have been collecting a half year in advance. That was spite of the master's objection, whereupon the master properly refused to receive the pupil back into the school. Price v. Wilkins, 58 L. T. N. S. 680.

So, where a child had been placed in a day school as a boarder, and the master's charges for him had always been paid quarterly, and the child was taken ill four days after the beginning of a quarter and properly sent home by the master for his recovery, and was never sent back, or any intention manifested to put an end to the contract,—although the child was the only boarder the master had, and there was no express contract by the quarter,—the master is entitled to recover his charges for the whole quarter. Collins v. Price, 5 Bing. 132, 6 L. J. C. P. 244, 2 Moore & P. 233, 30 Revised Rep. 542.

And where the terms of a school stipulate that "a quarter's notice is required to be given before the removal of any young gentlemen from school, or to pay for a quarter," and a scholar is removed without notice, the master is entitled to recover pay for an additional quarter after his leaving, as for the things already actually furnished. Eardley v. Price, 2 Bos. & P. N. R. 333, 9 Revised Rep. 654.

Likewise, where a father, having applied for the admission of his sons into a select school, received from the proprietors and managers thereof a favorable answer and a copy of the regulations of the school, which provided for a certain charge per session in advance, and that "when the place is engaged, the session's charge is considered due, unless the boy be prevented from coming by the act of God;" and the father thereafter wrote that he gladly availed himself of the opportunity of handing over his boys to the principal of the school,—the proprietors or managers of the school are entitled to recover from the father the session's charge for the boys, although the father did not send them to this school, at all, but to another one, without notice to the proprietors of the first. Bingham v. Richardson, 30 N. C. (1 Winst. L.) 215.

And where a student entered into a contract with a corporation conducting a correspondence school, to take one of its courses of instruction, for which he was to pay a certain sum in monthly payments, but he never entered upon the studies, although the books and papers necessary for that purpose were sent to him by the company, and, after continuing the monthly payments for some time, he ceased to make them, and subsequently notified the agent of the company that he did not intend to carry out the contract,—the company is entitled to recover from him the unpaid balance of the contract price for the course. International Text-Book Co. v. Martin, 92 Neb. 430, 138 N. W. 582, on earlier appeal, 82 Neb. 403, 117 N. W. 994.

Where a father and guardian entered his son and his ward in a school, the rules of which provided that payment for board and tuition must be made quarterly in advance and that no money would be returned in case of dismissal for bad conduct, but there was no stipulation in the contract that the father and guardian should be liable, in case of such dismissal, for the whole session, or for the scholastic year, and the boys were expelled for good cause, during the first quarter,—the school is entitled to recover the amount payable in advance for the first quarter, the nonpayment of which, when the boys entered the school, was owing to the indulgence, and not the fault, of the school officers; but it cannot recover its charges for the whole session or the whole scholastic year. Horner School v. Wescott, 124 N. C. 518, 32 S. E. 885.

So, where a father entered his daughter as a resident pupil in a school at which one half of the yearly tuition fee was payable in advance, but did not, either expressly or impliedly, contract for the entire year at a certain charge, without deduction for absence or withdrawal, and the daughter, after remaining a short time in the school, was withdrawn on account of sickness, the school cannot recover from the father the whole of the yearly tuition fee, but only the amount which was payable in advance. Hartridge School v. Riordan, 112 N. Y. Supp. 1089. In this case, a judgment in favor of the school for the half stated in the catalogue. About ten years ago we changed the catalogue, and since that time we enforce the rule. I consider that the strongest discipline in the school is for a boy to have his money forfeited. It is a strong discipline over him. I have enforced the rule rigidly when a boy is expelled, that there is no deduction. We have always done that." He further testified that the boy had often committed serious offenses, when he notified him if they continued he would be expelled. "This was done at regular roll call in the presence of the students or cadets, but I made no good impression upon him, as he repeated them afterwards and ran his demerits up from 100 to 150. When demerits ran to 100, we could either whip or expel. The boy had been whipped once." He was expelled for excessive demerits,—violation of the rules. He smoked, he visited, left his room when he was required to be in it; when required in there to prepare his lessons, he would slip out; also for throwing in the assembly hall, which is a serious offense. These acts were against our rules. In ordinary practice there is no fixed amount of demerits until a student is notified. I spoke to the boy about this matter before his demerits were going up so rapidly, but he disregarded all of it. I thought his conduct was demoralizing. He wasn't preparing his lessons. I expelled him in the regular course of my school the same as I have done many times before. The bill as sent Mr. Tetter in September, 1913, was for a half year payment for the fall term. When January came around the bill was for the spring term." The witness also stated why the school was compelled to charge for the full term in advance, which was that "they had to make a very large outlay in the beginning for supplies and pay cash for them the amount being about $10,000. There was much testimony to corroborate the yearly fee, payable in advance, was affirmed,—the only contention, however, being on the part of the school, that it was entitled to the fee for the whole year, which was denied by the court.

And where a parent, upon his son's entering a military school at the beginning of a term, paid in advance about one half of the tuition for the term, and, about thirty days after the term began, the boy was expelled for hazing, the master cannot, in the absence of proof of the terms of the contract as to the time of payment of the tuition for the term, recover the balance of such tuition, on a counterclaim in an action by the parent to recover the amount which he paid in advance. Kentucky Military Institute v. Bramblet, 158 Ky. 205, 164 S. W. 808.

Special contracts.

Where, although a school catalogue states that "pupils by their presence in the school are registered for the full school year," and that "no abatement is made from these terms for any reason other than that of illness," etc., a pupil was expressly received on trial for the purpose of testing his capacity to meet the requirements of the school, and his parent's attention was not called to the catalogue regulations, and he never agreed to be bound thereby, but did pay in advance the required tuition fee and expenses for one half of the year; and, about five weeks after the beginning of the year, the oral contract actually made between the parties was terminated by the serious illness of the boy, manifested by epileptic convulsions, which disqualified him from remaining in the school, and on account of which his removal was requested by the manager,—the school is entitled only to a proportional part of the sum charged for a full year, as compensation for the time during which the boy was a pupil of the school, and the parent is entitled to recover the balance of the amount paid in advance. Chapin v. Little Blue School, 119 Me. 415, 86 Atl. 838.

And the principal of a school who contracted with a father to receive the latter's son into his family and as a pupil in his school, during a certain term; to instruct the boy in the learning and knowledge taught at the school; protect him and provide for his physical wants; and at the same time be the constant companion of his studies and recreations, in the home circle,—cannot, after he has refused to receive the boy back at his father's request, after the boy had left the home and school without the knowledge and against the will of his father, recover on a note which the father gave for the amount of the consideration for the contract, which amount was payable in advance, but for which the principal accepted the note for the convenience of the father. Starr v. Lifschitz, 40 Barb. 541. The court said: "To entitle him to that remuneration he must fulfill the contract on his part. He cannot, for some actual or supposed transgression of the boy, withdraw his care and protection, deny him the shelter and comfort of his house, and under the name or form of punishment leave him a wanderer in the public streets, without the means of subsistence. Such a mode of punishment is neither reasonable nor usual; for in many cases it would expose the health as well as the morals of the pupil to certain destruction. It is subversive of the ends and purposes of the contract; because under pretense of inflicting a salutary punishment for the reformation of the offender, it releases and relieves the person prescribing it for the time being, from his duties and obligations under the contract. In the absence of express stipulations to that effect in the contract, we think the plaintiff could not, as a punishment for a transgression of the rules witness. Plaintiff testified that he did not see the catalogue. He did not say that it was not mailed to him and received at his home, but denied merely that he had seen it, although there was circumstantial evidence that it had reached him, and he had the opportunity to read it. "I never laid my eyes on this catalogue to my knowledge. It might have come in the mail to my home. The family might have brought it down, and I might have looked at it and thought it was some old circular and destroyed it. I usually do so. I never did read it. When I received the bill for a half year's payment, I knew money would be forfeited on expulsion." He also stated that he was not notified by Mr. Horner that the money would be forfeited if his son misbehaved, nor did he agree that the money should be retained if the boy was expelled. Under the charge of the court, there was a verdict for the plaintiff, which the judge set aside upon the following grounds: (1) That he had refused the defendant's sixth prayer for instructions as follows: "If the jury believe the evidence, they should answer the first issue, 'Nothing,' and the second issue for the half annual charges for board, tuition, etc., less the $90 paid by the plaintiff, to wit, '$80.56.'" (2) That he erred in leaving it to the jury to determine "whether or not there was malice or viciousness on the part of defendant, and whether it was prompted by some other purpose than the enforcement of the regulations and good government of the school in expelling the boy of the plaintiff. There being no evidence as to what were the rules and regulations of the defendant and its motives for expelling the boy of the plaintiff for violation of the same, other than testified to by defendant's witnesses and the catalogue and cadet regulations of the defendant's school introduced by defendant, the court is of the opinion, upon the undisputed facts, that said rules and of his school or the order of his family, actually ascertained, expel the pupil from the shelter and protection of his house, or refuse to receive him back at his father's request, after he had voluntarily left, and still claim the compensation stipulated in the contract. . . . It is no answer to the evil and inevitable consequences to result from the right which the plaintiff claims to exercise, to say that the boy thus abandoned could resort, and did resort, to the shelter and protection of his father's house, only 15 miles distant. . . . The contract is entire; it cannot be separated and apportioned. . . . He was to receive the entire sum of $150 for the twenty-two weeks' board and tuition. Having refused to furnish it, he is not entitled to recover anything."

In Stewart v. Loring, 5 Allen, 306, 81 Am. Dec. 747, it was held that the proprietor of a gymnasium cannot recover on written contract to pay him a certain sum for tuition in the gymnasium for a specified period in the future, where the promisor, without any fault of his own, and solely by reason of ill health, was rendered physically incapable of attending the gymnasium as a pupil, and did not attend or receive any instruction during the period specified.

But where a father entered his son in a military school for a year, paying one half the yearly charges in cash in advance, and executing two notes for the other half, and the terms of the school catalogue, of which the father knew, provided that money advanced on account was never refunded, except in cases of severe illness, whereby the pupil withdrew from the school by the advice of a doctor of the city where the school was located,—the father cannot demand an action on the notes, nor can he recover on a counterclaim in such action any part of the cash paid, on the ground that his son withdrew from the school by reason of severe illness, where, although the son did develop a case of trachoma, which unfitted him for further attendance at school, this developed while he was at home in another city, on a temporary withdrawal for a cause which did not incapacitate him for attending school, and no doctor of the city where the school was located advised the permanent withdrawal, nor was any such doctor consulted as to such withdrawal or the necessity therefor, as required by the provisions of the catalogue. Vidor v. Peacock, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 145 S. W. 672.

Where a father placed his son in a school, with the agreement that, if and when he removed his son from the school, he would either give a term's notice, or, in default, pay to the schoolmaster an equivalent in money, and the boy was sent home by the master in consequence of a severe illness breaking out in the school, which continued during the whole of the residue of that term; and the boy was himself in poor health at the time he was sent home, and suffered a severe illness during the ensuing term, whereby he was unable to return to the school then,—the school master cannot recover against the parent as for removing the pupil without giving a term's notice, as the father did not remove his son at all from the school, or, if he did, only temporarily and during a time when he was not bound to send him back. Simeon v. Watson, 46 L. J. C. P. N. S. 679. The court, however, would not say (the question not arising here) that the father had a right, at the end of the term during the whole of which the son was away from the school on account of illness, to remove or keep him longer away from the school without giving or paying for an additional term's notice.

W. 736, 15 Ann. Cas. 401; State ex rel. Crain v. Hamilton, 42 Mo. App. 24.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a military school, and in the Horner Cadet Regulations it is provided that "any cadet who shall disobey the command of the principal or of any professor, instructor, or other superior officer, or behave himself in a refractory or disrespectful manner, shall be expelled, or otherwise punished," and in the Horner School Catalogue is the following provision: "The discipline is not severe, but firm and decided, and no boy will be retained who does not cheerfully comply with the rules and regulations, or whose influence is known to be injurious to the morals and scholarship of his fellows." There was also a rule that if a pupil received more than 100 demerits for misconduct, he would be expelled or thrashed, at the discretion of the principal. There is ample evidence in the case to show that this boy misbehaved himself frequently, ran his demerits up rapidly to 150 after he had been duly warned that if they reached 100 he would be expelled, and that he was generally unruly and refractory. The principal seems to have exercised forbearance until it ceased to be a virtue, and the boy's conduct had become so bad that it was demoralizing in its effect upon the school. Besides his personal misbehaviors he was backward in his lessons, and receiving no benefit himself, but doing much injury to others by his example. If the principal had longer submitted to this gross breach of school discipline, amounting almost to defiant insubordination, it may have done incalculable harm to the school. The defendant had the undoubted power to adopt and enforce suitable rules and regulations for the government and management of the school. 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 27, 28. They should be reasonable, and enforced for the purpose contemplated, and not maliciously or arbitrarily.

If need be, punishment for the infraction of the rules may extend to the dismissal of the pupil who violates them. 35 Cyc. 1140, 1141. The conduct of the recreant pupil may be such that his continued presence in the school for a day or an hour may be disastrous to its proper discipline, and even to the morals of his fellows, and to permit him to "run the school," instead of obeying its rules and submitting himself to the authority of his superiors, would produce insubordination, which in its turn would soon disorganize it. In such a case it seems imperative and essential to the welfare of the school that the power should reside in the teacher to suspend the offender at once from its privileges, and he must necessarily decide for himself whether the case requires that remedy, unless some other method is provided for that purpose.

This doctrine was clearly treated and formulated by the court in State ex rel. Burpee v. Burton, 45 Wis. 150, 30 Am. Rep. 706, where Judge Lyon said: "In the school, as in the family, there exist on the part of the pupils the obligations of obedience to lawful commands, subordination, civil deportment, respect for the rights of other pupils, and fidelity to duty. These obligations are inherent in any proper school system, and constitute, so to speak, the common law of the school. Every pupil is presumed to know this law, and is subject to it, whether it has or has not been reenacted by the district board in the form of written rules and regulations. Indeed it would seem impossible to frame rules which would cover all cases of insubordination and all acts of vicious tendency which the teacher is liable to encounter daily and hourly. The teacher is responsible for the discipline of his school, and for the progress, conduct, and deportment of his pupils. It is his imperative duty to maintain good order, and to require of his pupils a faithful performance of their duties. If he fails to do so, he is unfit for his position. To enable him to discharge these duties effectually, he must necessarily have the power to enforce prompt obedience to his lawful commands. For this reason the law gives him the power, in proper cases, to inflict corporal punishment upon refractory pupils. But there are cases of misconduct for which such punishment is an inadequate remedy. If the offender is incorrigible, suspension or expulsion is the only adequate remedy." The court, after an able and learned discussion of the question, concluded that the teacher has, in a proper case, the inherent power to dismiss a pupil for misconduct and infractions of the rules and regulations of the school, especially when they are repeated and persistent, so that the pupil must finally yield or the teacher's authority over him be destroyed.

"The plaintiff, by entering the defendants' school, subjected himself to their reasonable rules of discipline. The power is vested in the faculties of all schools and colleges to suppress and punish unbecoming conduct." Kabus v. Seftner, 34 Misc. 538, 69 N. Y. Supp. 983.

It appeared in Curry v. Lasell Seminary Co. 168 Mass. 7, 46 N. E. 110, that plaintiff had entered her daughter, as a pupil, at the defendant company's school, to be boarded, instructed, and cared for through the school year. The court held that if there had been no express contract, the plaintiff, by placing her daughter as a pupil in the school, would have impliedly agreed that she should obey all reasonable rules and regulations of the school. This is the duty of every pupil who attends a public school, and a parent has no right to have his child remain in the school if he persists in wilfully disregarding such reasonable rules. These important principles, so necessary to the proper regulation and to the welfare of our educational institutions, have been quite uniformly adopted by the courts. Manson v. Culver Military Academy, 141 Ill. App. 250; Fessman v. Seeley, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 30 S. W. 268; Samuel Benedict Memorial School v. Bradford, 111 Ga. 801, 36 S. E. 920; Hodgkins v. Rockport, 105 Mass. 475; Vermillion v. State, 78 Neb. 107, 110 N. W. 736, 15 Ann. Cas. 401.

In the Vermillion Case, the court said that the authorities are generally to the effect that, where a pupil is guilty of such misconduct as to interfere with the discipline and government of the school, he may be suspended or expelled, citing many cases.

In the Manson Case, supra, the court held that the only requirement necessary, so far as concerns a review by a court of justice of the manager's action in dismissing a pupil,—in that case, as here, a cadet,—is that it shall be so unreasonable and oppressive as to warrant a conclusion that it was done maliciously, unfairly, or from some improper motive, and not for the enforcement of the school's rules and regulations, and the maintenance of proper discipline.

An examination of our own cases, while they do not deal with the subject in every phase presented in this record, will show that we have substantially approved the doctrine as already stated. It is founded upon justice and common sense, and should prevail, as in no other way could our schools be successfully conducted. Horner v. Baker, 74 N. C. 65; Horner School v. Wescott, 124 N. C. 518, 32 S. E. 885. These decisions clearly recognize the principle that there is an implied promise, if it is not expressed, that the pupil who has entered the school will comply with its reasonable rules and regulations, and may be dismissed, in a proper case, for failing to do so. The school authorities, it is true, may excuse or condone the offense of the pupil, but of course are not compelled to do so, and it would often be subversive of good discipline to do so, especially in the case of an incorrigible offender. The interest of every pupil is involved in the welfare of the school, and there is no reason why its success should be imperiled by the misconduct of one of them.

Our opinion is, upon the evidence we find in the record, if believed, that plaintiff is not entitled to recover any part of the money he has paid, and that defendant is entitled to recover the balance of what would have been paid by the plaintiff but for the former's indulgence. This, we think, is settled by Horner School v. Wescott, supra; Bingham v. Richardson, 60 N. C. (1 Winst. L.) 217; and by clear implication in Horner v. Baker, supra, for we have the evidence in this case, which the court, by Chief Justice Pearson, held was lacking in that one. The court said, in Horner School v. Wescott, supra: "As it was the defendant's duty to have paid this instalment when it was due, and not the plaintiff's fault that it was not paid, it seems that defendant should not complain if he has to pay now." It is apparent, upon the evidence, that plaintiff was to pay the full amount in advance, and if he had paid it, as his contract required him to do, the defendant could have retained it. This being so, and, as said in Horner School v. Wescott, supra, he is entitled to the balance of the amount due at the beginning of the session. Fessman v. Seeley, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 30 S. W. 268.

We have discussed the case in the light of the evidence now before us. The boy was not called and examined, and, in the absence of his evidence, there is nothing to contradict the defendant's testimony as to the rules and regulations. There is strong additional evidence that plaintiff received the catalogue containing the rules. There is no evidence that defendant acted maliciously, oppressively, or unreasonably in expelling the plaintiff's son, but, on the contrary, as it now appears to us, the act was fully justified. The court was therefore right in setting aside the verdict and granting a new trial, and for the reasons given by the learned judge, which are set out in the record.

No error.

(Department No. 2.)

MINNIE HOUGH, By Guardian ad Litem, Appt.,
v.
HERMAN IDERHOFF, Respt.

(— Or. —, 139 Pac. 931.)

Rape — civil liability — effect of consent.

1. Consent by a child under the age of con-

Note. — Civil liability for intercourse with child under age of consent.

Does the maxim, Volenti non fit injuria, apply where the female gave actual consent, but was under the age of legal consent at common law or as fixed by statute embodied in the Criminal Code? This is the only question raised by the present note. The courts in every case in which they have been obliged to pass upon the question have held that it does not apply, and that one committing the crime known as statutory rape is liable in a civil action. The reasons assigned for the decisions are not entirely clear. If the general policy of the state is to maintain that all females under a 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

sent is no bar to civil liability for rape where the statute defines criminal knowledge of a child under such age as rape the same as forcible knowledge of one over such age.

Pleading — rape — charging force — reliance on statute.

2. The allegation of force and violence in a complaint seeking damages for rape on a child under the age of consent does not prevent reliance on the statute as barring the defense of consent.

(March 24, 1914.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for a criminal assault. Reversed.

Statement by Eakin, J.:

The plaintiff is the foster child of Emilie Toedtemeir, who is the guardian ad litem herein. She was born March, 1897, and at the time of the assault complained of she was thirteen years and seven months old. She by her guardian sues to recover damages for a criminal assault upon her by the defendant. The allegation, after giving the time of her birth, being "that some time during the month of October, 1910, the exact date being unknown to this plaintiff, the defendant wilfully, violently, and forcibly made an indecent assault upon plaintiff, and did then and there debauch, ravish, rape, and carnally know her at the home of the defendant in Clackamas county, Or.: that plaintiff became pregnant with child, and did on or about the 14th day of July, 1911, give birth to a living male child." The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, and a trial was had before a jury, which resulted in a verdict for the defendant, from which plaintiff appeals.

Messrs. Ditchburn & Downes for appellant.

Mr. Gilbert L. Hedges, for respondent: Consent of the female is a bar to a civil certain age shall be considered incapable of giving a legal consent to the act of sexual intercourse, even though that policy is expressed only in the Criminal Code, then it would seem quite clear that actual consent by one incapable of giving legal consent would not defeat a civil action. There would seem to be no doubt that where the female is under the common-law age of consent (that age seems to be fixed at ten years at least in the states. See 33 Cyc. 1416, reference note, 3), courts are justified in holding that her incapacity should be recognized in civil as well as criminal actions. Statutes declaring that sexual intercourse with a female under a certain age, with or without her consent, shall be rape, action for damages for rape; the maxim, Volenti non fit injuria, applies.

33 Cyc. 1521; Koenig v. Nott, 2 Hilt. 323, 8 Abb. Pr. 384; Robinson v. Musser, 78 Mo. 153; Bessler v. Stephani, 71 Ill. 400; Dickey v. McDonnell, 41 Ill. 62; Champagne v. Hamey, 189 Mo. 709, 88 S. W. 92.

Force is the gist of a civil action for damages for rape.

Koenig v. Nott, 8 Abb. Pr. 384.

The civil action for damages should not be confused with the criminal prosecution.

Goldnamer v. O'Brien, 98 Ky. 569, 36 L.R.A. 715, 56 Am. St. Rep. 379, 33 S. W. 831.

Eakin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is but one assignment of error, viz., the refusal of the court to instruct the have been generally construed as simply raising the age limit. See 33 Cyc. 1424. The courts in cases coming within the scope of the present note, have, without much discussion, apparently assumed that the age limit for consent even though fixed by the Criminal Code is to be regarded in civil actions, and that such statutes are to be regarded as declaratory of the public policy of the state for all purposes. There are, however, but few reported cases where the courts have dealt with the question. And Chand, in his Law of Consent, p. 318, § 154, points out that "the age of consent for the purpose of criminal law" need not be the same as for "civil transactions."

Also see note to Ex parte Hollopeter, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 847, as to the effect of statute fixing age of consent in defining statutory rape as determining age of consent for marriage.

The holding in HOUGH v. IDERHOFF, that the maxim is not applicable where the female is under the age of consent as fixed by the criminal statute, and that defendant is liable in a civil suit for sexual intercourse with such female even with her consent, where such act constitutes rape under the statute, is supported by Priboth v. Haveron, — Okla. —, 130 Pac. 973; and Altman v. Eckermann, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 132 S. W. 523.

In Dean v. Raplee, 145 N. Y. 319, 39 N. E. 952, where there was considerable doubt as to the fact of consent on the part of a fifteen-year-old child under the circumstances, and the defendant was held liable, the court said: "Since the amendment of the Penal Code (§ 278) by chap. 693 of the Laws of 1887, the acts charged against the defendant, when committed upon a female under sixteen years of age, would amount to rape; and while the present case must stand upon the law as it existed when the alleged assaults were made, yet the reasons which induced the legislature to change the law cannot be ignored in our review of the case. That act eliminated the question of consent or resistance from 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

jury "that if the jury should find that the plaintiff, Minnie Hough, was at the time of the alleged assault under the age of sixteen years, she was incapable of consenting,"—the court having instructed the jury directly contrary to the request, and which was duly excepted to, viz., "that if she did not resist with all the force in her command then the defendant cannot be held in damages." So that the only question is: Can a defendant be held liable in a civil action to the injured female for damages where he violated her person in case she is under the age of sixteen years and made no resistance to the assault? The trial court held that he cannot, following the maxim, Volenti non fit injuria, that an action will not lie if plaintiff consented, and nearly all the cases and text-books seem to uphold the case of an assault upon a female under that age on the trial of a criminal charge. The amendment was evidently based upon the principle that consent or nonresistance on the part of a girl of that age was not to be understood in the same way as in the case of like acts committed upon a woman of more mature years."

In Watson v. Taylor, 35 Okla. 768, 131 Pac. 922, where the case was tried upon the theory that the plaintiff, a seventeen-year-old girl, did not consent, and a verdict had been rendered in her favor, although the circumstances were such as to create doubt upon that point, the court said: "Moreover, our statute provides (§ 2353, Comp. Laws, 1909) that all that is required to constitute the crime of rape is an 'act of sexual intercourse accomplished with a female not the wife of the perpetrator.

Where the female is over the age of sixteen years and under the age of eighteen, and of previous chaste and virtuous character.' The language of the statute is clear and unambiguous. It clearly eliminates the elements of consent and resistance from the case of an assault upon the class of females therein described. Its manifest purpose is to throw a protecting mantle about the female children of this state within certain ages, which the hand of the libertine may not withdraw except at his peril. The statute in effect says that chastity is such a precious gem in the crown of maidenly graces that it cannot be stolen or removed therefrom even with the consent of the wearer, without offending the majesty of the law. To prove that the female consented will not mollify the statute, neither should it avail as a defense to a civil action for damages for an assault upon her committed in such manner and under such circumstances as to constitute rape as defined by the statute."

On the question as to effect of fact that intercourse was accomplished by force to defeat action for seduction, see note to Velthouse v. Alderink, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 587.

J. W. M.

the rule; however, the most of the reported cases were for assaults upon adults.

Our statute defines "rape:" "If any person over the age of sixteen years shall carnally know any female child under the age of sixteen years, or any person shall forcibly ravish any female, such person shall be deemed guilty of rape, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than three nor more than twenty years." L. O. L. § 1912. So that the measure of damages is the same for the offense against a child as against an adult. It will thus be seen that the legislature has defined carnal knowledge of a female under the age of sixteen years as rape whether the action be civil or criminal. The civil liability has not been defined or its elements determined in this court; but the rule was early established by the courts that the seeming acquiescence of a female of feeble mind or of tender years to an act of sexual intercourse offered no defense to an action of rape, because such a female was incapable of yielding assent from an incapacity of understanding.

Legislative assemblies applying the rule thus established have arbitrarily prescribed in many instances the age at which a female of ordinary intelligence is presumed to have attained such a degree of mental development as to be capable of assenting to the commission of the particular immoral act which, when discovered, ostracizes her from good society. State v. Lee, 33 Or. 506, 56 Pac. 415. And in State v. Sargent, 32 Or. 110, 49 Pac. 889, it is said that the law has determined that a female child under the age denominated is incapable of assenting. It is as though she had no mind upon the subject, no volition or sufficient discretion to give her consent to an act which is palpably wrong both in morals and in law. In other words, the law makes it just as much a wrong against a female infant to violate her person as a forcible ravishment against an adult female. It is a legal wrong as well as a moral one, and we can discover no reason why the perpetrator of the act should not be required to respond in damages as fully in the one case as in the other. Under our statute the maxim quoted above does not affect an infant, as the law conclusively says she can give no consent. In any event, the fact of an assault does not depend upon the amount of the resistance shown. Any violation of the person is an "assault" (Alexander v. Blodgett, 44 Vt. 476); putting his hands upon her with a view to violate her person is a "battery" (Altman v. Eckermann, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 132 S. W. 523).

conduct on the part of a person carnally assaulted short of consent is not a justification therefor. In Dean v. Raplee, 145 N. Y. 319, 39 N. E. 952, the age is not considered. Dean v. Raplee, 75 Hun, 389, 27 N. Y. Supp. 438; Palmer v. Baum, 123 Ill. App. 584. Altman v. Eckermann, supra is a strong case where it is said that the touching of her person with an intent to injure her, she being incapable of giving her consent thereto, constitutes an assault. In that case it is said that rape of a female gives her a cause of action at common law, while consent, of course, defeats the charge of rape where the party is capable of giving consent; but, the appellant herein being under the age of consent as fixed by our statute, the allegations of her petition show rape by the defendant, for which she is entitled to an action for damages. Watson v. Taylor, 35 Okla. 768, 131 Pac. 922, is another case to the same effect. See also Nyman v. Lynde, 93 Minn. 257, 101 N. W. 163.

It is urged by the defendant that the charge of the plaintiff is for an assault committed by force and violence, and by reason thereof plaintiff cannot rely upon the age-limit statute as barring the defense of consent. Without the words "violently" and "forcibly" the complaint states a complete cause of action for assault upon an infant. It shows the age and the commission of the rape as defined by the statute. The criminal liability in such a case has never been questioned, and there is good reason for construing the statute strictly against the defendant in such cases; the offense being against a child.

The judgment of the lower court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

The effect of the judgment of the law and equity court of the city of Richmond was not to deprive the plaintiff in error of his property without due process of law, and deny him the equal protection of the laws, and therefore was not in violation of § 1 of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Whittle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent failure of the city of Richmond to furnish the plaintiff with a sufficient supply of water for domestic and sanitary purposes. The defendant interposed a demurrer to the evidence, which the court sustained, and to that judgment this writ of error was granted.

In December, 1906, the city of Richmond annexed a large area of territory, in which Temple street, on which the plaintiff resides, is located. The water department at great expense laid water mains along Temple street for the convenience of citizens in that locality, even before the street had been graded. In December, 1911, after the system was installed, the board of health notified the plaintiff to connect his premises with the water main and sewer pipes, which he did in January, 1912. Experience showed that, while the pressure was sufficient to supply the plaintiff with water on the first floor of his dwelling, the quantity of water on the second floor was insufficient to flush his closet, and the original supply was so diminished from time to time, as other buildings were connected with the main, that in about one month he got no water at all for his bathroom. He thereupon reported these facts to the authorities, and suggested that his premises be connected with a standpipe intended to supply water to the inhabitants of an adjoining district; but his request was not immediately granted, the authorities assigning as the reason for their refusal that the district was growing so fast that the proposed diversion of water would render the supply inadequate for those the standpipe was originally intended to serve.

The present action was instituted on July 18, 1912. A few days later a petition signed by the plaintiff and other residents of that locality was presented to the chairman of the water committee, calling attention to the fact that the pressure was insufficient to flush second-floor closets, and requesting that action might be taken to remedy the defect. The committee immediately directed that the water main on Temple street be connected with the end of the pipe at Allen avenue and Cary street, which was done four days thereafter, and by that means the evil complained of was corrected.

It is apparent from the foregoing summary of the evidence that if we should sustain a recovery in this case it would rest solely upon the theory that the city had rendered itself liable in damages for the negligent adoption of a system of water supply for the section of the newly acquired territory wherein the plaintiff resides. That there can be no such liability under the circumstances of this case is very clear. The adoption of a plan for supplying a city, or a given section of it, with water, involves the exercise of a delegated governmental power; and an error of judgment with respect to the efficiency and adequacy of such system is not in the first instance reviewable by the courts.

On the other hand, it is equally well settled that the city is liable, in a proper case, for the negligent acts and omissions of its officers in relation to the performance of such ministerial corporate duties as may be imposed upon it by law. This line of demarcation between the nonliability and liability of a municipal corporation for official negligence is well recognized by the authorities, including the decisions of this court.

Thus, in Terry v. Richmond, 94 Va. 537, at page 544, 38 L.R.A. 834, 27 S. E. 429. Judge Riely, upon a review of the earlier decisions, observes: "A number of cases decided by this court, in which the municipality was held responsible, were cited and relied on to support the claim of liability of the city in the case at bar; but they do not support the contention of the plaintiff in error. The liability in those cases rested upon a different ground from that which underlies this case. Its solution depends upon the application of a different principle. The act of the city, which is the subject of the complaint here, was the exercise of a delegated governmental power; but it will be found upon examination that the liability in each and all of the cases referred to was based either upon a tort committed by the city itself through its officers or agents, or upon the neglect of the city to perform some ministerial and absolute . . . duty." The learned judge illustrates the general doctrine as follows: "The duty of a municipal corporation to see that its streets and sidewalks are in safe condition, and that its sewers and drains are kept in good order, and that its other like municipal obligations are cared for, is a purely ministerial and absolute corporate duty, assumed in consideration of the privileges conferred by its charter, and the law holds the municipality responsible for an injury resulting from the negligent discharge of such duty, or the negligent omission to discharge it; but exempts it from liability for the exercise of governmental or discretionary powers."

We have quoted at some length from Judge Riely's opinion, for the reason that the principles involved are lucidly stated, and have been consistently followed by this court in subsequent decisions, and also because they are conclusive of the present controversy.

In the light of the opinion of Mr. Justice Gray, in Johnston v. District of Columbia, 118 U. S. 19, 30 L. ed. 75, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 923, there can be no difficulty in appropriately classifying the case in judgment. At pages 20, 21, of 118 U. S., he says: "The duties of the municipal authorities, in adopting a general plan of drainage, and determining when and where sewers shall be built, of what size, and at what level, are of a quasi judicial nature, involving the exercise of deliberate judgment and large discretion, and depending upon considerations affecting the public health and general convenience . . . and the exercise of such judgment and discretion, in the selection and adoption of the general plan or system of drainage, is not subject to revision by a court or jury in a private action for not sufficiently draining a particular lot of land."

Judge Dillon, in the last edition of his work on Municipal Corporations, after laying down the general principle above set forth, observes: "We now add that the later cases tend strongly to establish, and may, we think, be said to establish, and in our judgment rightly to establish, that a city may be liable on the ground of negligence in respect of public sewers, solely constructed and controlled by it, where by reason of their insufficient size, clearly demonstrated by experience, they result under ordinary conditions in overflowing the private property of adjoining or connecting owners with sewage, and that the principle of exemption from liability for defect or want of efficiency of plan does not . . . extend to such a case." 4 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1739.

This very important qualification to the nonliability doctrine is founded upon common sense and considerations of sound policy, and accords with the trend of modern thought and decision.

As we have seen, the municipality, in devising plans and systems for supplying the public with water, sewerage, and the like, exercises legislative duties involving the use of judgment and discretion, and it ought not to be held liable to civil actions for defects or want of efficiency of plan, at least during the formative or experimental stage of the enterprise; yet, after the work has been completed, and experience has demonstrated that the system is inadequate and inefficient to meet requirements, or to effect the objects for which it was intended, there can be no reason to exempt the municipality from damage suffered by an individual from its continued use.

The author (Judge Dillon) in notes to § 1739, and subsequent sections, cites numerous cases to sustain the text.

In the instant case, the city with commendable promptitude took the necessary steps to furnish the plaintiff and other citizens similarly situated with additional water facilities after experience had shown the insufficiency of the original supply; and there has been nothing in connection with the discharge of its duty in that regard to subject it to a suit for damages.

We are told in the second and third assignments of error that the judgment complained of deprived the plaintiff of his property without due process of law and denied him the equal protection of the law, in violation of the 14th amendment of the Constitution of the United States and § 11, art. 1, of the Virginia Constitution; but those assignments are founded upon a misapprehension of the evidence. It is true the plaintiff expended $160 in installing fixtures on his premises, but of this property he has in no just sense been deprived. The fixtures have never been out of his ownership or possession, and through that medium at the date of the judgment he was utilizing and enjoying the ample supply of water furnished him by the city.

Upon the whole case, we find no error in the judgment of the Law and Equity Court of the City of Richmond, and it must be affirmed.

Main, J. delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding involves the right of the Western Washington Power Company, a corporation, to condemn certain lands which will be flooded by the construction of a dam in connection with the development of a hydro-electric power project on the Baker river, in Skagit county, Washington. Upon a hearing before the trial court an order of public use and necessity was entered. For the purpose of reviewing this order the cause is brought here by writ of certiorari.

It is claimed that the purpose of the condemnation was to acquire land which would enable the power company to construct a dam to the height of 224 feet above the bed of Baker river at a point known locally as "The Gorge," in section 2, township 38 north, range 8 east. The water backed up thereby would cover the lands involved herein, as well as other lands not involved in this proceeding. The total cost of completing the enterprise would be approximately $2,000,000.

To avoid confusion the parties will be referred to as petitioners and respondents, as in the superior court. On the 18th day of September, 1911, one John C. Eden entered into a written contract with Stone & Webster, a copartnership, of Boston, Massachusetts. By this contract Eden was to acquire the lands by private purchase which would be flooded by the erection of the dam, and convey them to Stone & Webster. The contract provided that, in the event the lands could not be acquired by private purchase at a reasonable price, Stone & Webster would cause a corporation to be formed with power to condemn them. The amount of the judgments and costs for the land condemned was to be deducted from the purchase price to be paid by Stone & Webster to Eden. The language of the contract covering this matter is that Stone & Webster "will form or cause to be formed a corporation with power to condemn, and will use their best efforts to effect condemnation of such lands and rights; and if such lands and rights are obtained by such condemnation proceedings the amount of the condemnation award and costs and expenses shall be deducted from the purchase price agreed on in this instrument."

In pursuance of this contract, and after a portion of the land had been acquired by Eden by purchase, and on or about the 10th day of November, 1911, the Western Washington Power Company was incorporated under the laws of the state of Maine. Subsequently it acquired the right to do business in the state of Washington. The capital stock of the corporation was $25,000, divided into 250 shares of the par value of $100 per share. One hundred ninety shares of the capital stock were subscribed and paid for by the Pacific Coast Power Company, a corporation, which had transferred all of its property to the Puget Sound Traction, Light, & Power Company. The latter corporation had assumed the obligations of the former. All of the subscribers to the capital stock, including the Puget Sound Traction, Light, & Power Company, were identified with the Stone & Webster interests.

The Western Washington Power Company, after qualifying under the laws of this state, instituted condemnation proceedings for the purpose of acquiring the property which had not been obtained by private purchase. Certain of these cases had gone to judgment. The judgments and costs of condemnation were paid by Eden.

Some claim is made in the respondents' brief that the evidence fails to show a public use, and also that the public interest will not be promoted by the prosecution of the enterprise. It will be admitted for the purposes of this opinion that the evidence was sufficient to show a public use and necessity. But the serious question is whether the petitioner is proceeding in good faith to acquire the lands for the purpose of itself developing the enterprise, or whether it does not intend when the lands are acquired to transfer them to Stone & Webster, a copartnership.

The legislature of this state has conferred the right to acquire the title to private property by the exercise of the right of eminent domain upon a corporation. It has not conferred this right upon an individual. Hence neither Eden nor Stone & Webster had the right to condemn.

The whole force and tenor of the evidence shows that the purpose of organizing the corporation and having it institute the condemnation proceedings was to acquire title to the property, and, after having done so, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to convey the same to Stone & Webster in pursuance of their contract with Eden. It must be admitted that one witness answered categorically that Stone & Webster had assigned their contract with Eden to the petitioner. None of the facts and circumstances surrounding the assignment appear. So far as the evidence goes, it may or may not have been in writing. But this single fact cannot overcome the force and effect of the testimony, which shows that the property was ultimately to be conveyed to the copartnership. It would be easy after the condemnation proceedings had been completed to reassign the contract to Stone & Webster. If the proceeding were sustained, it would enable Eden and Stone & Webster as individuals, by the intervention of the petitioner created for that purpose, to accomplish by indirection that which they could not do directly.

The right to take private property by the exercise of the power of eminent domain is a part of the sovereign power of the state. When that power was by the legislature conferred upon a corporation, a subordinate agency, it was certainly contemplated that the agency exercising the power would do so for the purpose of developing the enterprise for which the private property was taken, and not for the purpose of acquiring title to property in order that it might be transferred to a partnership which did not have the power to condemn. Courts will look to the substance of a transaction rather than to the form. It is plain that, while in form the corporation is condemning, in substance it is the individuals. This, we think, cannot be done. The legislature has not yet conferred upon individuals the right to acquire title to private property by the exercise of the right of eminent domain.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss the proceeding.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

DEWEY DEPUTY, by Next Friend,

v.

E. G. KIMMELL, Plff. in Err.

(— W. Va. —, 80 S. E. 919.)

Highway — rights of pedestrians and automobilists.

1. The rights of pedestrians and drivers of automobiles, when using streets or other public highways, are mutual, equal, and co-ordinate, except as varied by the nature of the appliance or mode of travel employed, and as long as each observes the reciprocal rights of the other, neither will be liable for any injury his use may cause.

Headnotes by LYNCH, J.

Same — care in use.

2. A person using a public highway owes the double duty to avoid danger to himself by another having an equal right to such use, and the infliction of injury upon such other person. Both must exercise that degree of care which a reasonably prudent man would exercise under the same circumstances.

Same — duty of driver of automobile.

3. Because of the character of the vehicle and the unusual dangers incident to its use, a greater degree of care is required of the operator of an automobile while on the public highway, and especially at street crossings, than is required of persons using the ordinary or less dangerous instruments of travel. He should exercise such care in respect to speed, warnings of approach, and the management of the car, as will enable him to anticipate and avoid collisions which the nature of the machine and the locality may reasonably suggest likely to occur in the absence of such precautions.

Same — duty to children.

4. The vigilance and care required of the operators of an automobile vary in respect of persons of different ages or physical conditions. He must increase his exertions in order to avoid danger to children whom he may see, or by the exercise of reasonable care should see, on or near the highway. More than ordinary care is required in such cases.

Same — obstructed view.

5. Where a wagon or other vehicle obscures or obstructs his view of a street crossing, when the presence thereon of others may reasonably be anticipated, extra vigilance and caution are required of the auto operator, in order to prevent injury to persons on such crossing.

Negligence — last clear chance.

6. The mere negligent act of one person

Note. — Reciprocal duty of operator of automobile and pedestrian to use care.

The early cases upon this question are gathered in the notes to Christy v. Elliott, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 215; McIntyre v. Orner, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1130; Gerhard v. Ford Motor Co. 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 232; Weil v. Kreutzer, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 557; Lauson v. Fond du Lac, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 40; Baker v. Close, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 487; and Minor v. Stevens, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1178, to which the present note is supplementary. It will be observed that these notes do not cover the question as to the reciprocal duty of the driver of an automobile and those working or playing in the street.

The question of the duty and liability of operators of automobiles with respect to horses encountered on the highway is covered in the note to Measer v. Bruening, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 945.

The practical importance of this subject is illustrated by the large number of cases in point that have been decided since the preparation of the note in 42 L.R.A.(N.S.), a period of a little over a year.

In general—duty of operator of car.

The driver of an automobile is bound to anticipate the presence of pedestrians upon the streets of a city or upon rural highways, as well as to exercise reasonable care that he does not injure them after he is aware of their presence. O'Dowd v. Newnham, 13 Ga. App. 220, 80 S. E. 36. The court said: "The application of this principle is qualified by the rule to which we have just referred in the first division of this opinion. The pedestrian, like the driver of an automobile, in the exercise of ordinary care for his own safety and for the safety of 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

others, is required to anticipate the presence of persons and vehicles upon the highway. But it cannot be said that the duty which is upon the pedestrian is as urgent as that devolving upon the driver of an automobile, for the foot passenger's action or inaction in the premises is far less important to the other users of the highway. The impact of the body of a pedestrian absorbed in his own meditations, upon a passer-by, might be measurably uncomfortable, but it would seldom be hazardous to either life or limb; whereas the impact of an automobile in motion while the driver is asleep might cause as certain death as if the injured person had been wilfully pursued and wantonly crushed. The pedestrian and the automobile have equal rights upon the highway, but their capacity for inflicting injury is vastly disproportioned. It follows, also, from this, that the driver of an automobile cannot be said to be using the highway within his rights, or to be in the exercise of due care, if he takes advantage of the force, weight, and power of his machine as a means of compelling pedestrians to yield to his machine superior rights upon the public highway, designed for the use of all members of the public upon equal terms. Instances are almost a matter of daily occurrence where apparently the drivers of automobiles operate their machines as if they have been granted a right of way over the public highways, and as if it is nothing more than the duty of the pedestrian to yield precedence to the automobile, and to stop and wait until the automobile has passed before attempting to proceed in crossing a street or otherwise using the highway. If there is anything in the argument of priority, man was created before the automobile, and, to paraphrase a quotation from Holy Writ, man was not created for the automobile, but the automobile was created for man. Generally, the natural in-will not excuse negligent injury to him by another. If, therefore, a person who negligently places himself in a situation of imminent danger is injured by one who by the exercise of reasonable care could have avoided such injury, the negligence of the former will not bar recovery.

Highway — duty to look and listen.

7. A person lawfully in a public highway may rely upon the exercise of reasonable care by drivers of vehicles to avoid injury. Failure to anticipate omission of such care does not render him negligent. A pedestrian is not bound, as a matter of law, to be continuously looking or listening to ascertain if automobiles or other vehicles are approaching, under penalty that, if he fails to do so and is injured, his own negligence will defeat recovery of damages sustained.

Negligence — duty of child.

8. In determining the question of contributory negligence, the conduct of children should not be judged by the same rules which govern that of adults. Ordinary caution for them is that degree of care and instinct of self-preservation will inspire in the pedestrian a due degree of caution for his own safety, when he is aware of the approach of an automobile, and this the law will require him to exercise. Sometimes the circumstances surrounding the approach of one of these vehicles of ponderous proportions inspire a terror which paralyzes the power of locomotion on the part of the traveler on foot, especially if he be a child of tender years. In such a case, the dangerous character of the instrumentality which the driver of an automobile is operating forbids the assertion that he has exercised even ordinary diligence, unless he has used every possible means to avoid injury to the pedestrian. On account of the ease with which injury can result from the slightest negligence or inattention in the operation of his machine, ordinary diligence requires that the driver of an automobile be constantly on the lookout, and that he have his machine in such condition as that it shall be under his perfect control. The pedestrian also is required to be on the lookout; but he has the right to assume that the drivers of all automobiles are on the lookout for him too, and if he is properly upon the public highway, which he is entitled to use equally with them, he has the right to assume that they are both willing and able to regard his rights. While, therefore, the law requires that a pedestrian and the driver of an automobile shall each anticipate the presence of the other upon the public highways, and that neither shall do any act likely to jeopardize the safety of the other, still, on account of the great disparity in their respective capacities to inflict injury, the exercise of ordinary diligence on the part of the pedestrian to look out for automobiles does not necessarily require as continuous caution as is requisite to enable an automobilist to fulfil the definition 'ordinary diligence' as applied to one prudence which children of the same age are accustomed to exercise under like circumstances.

Evidence — proof of facts alleged.

9. In order to recover, it is unnecessary for plaintiff to prove literally the acts of negligence averred in the declaration. If the allegations are substantially proved, this is sufficient. Hence, an instruction in an action of case for personal injury, which tells the jury that it cannot find for plaintiff unless it believes from the evidence "that the defendant was negligent in the very manner set out in the declaration," is erroneous, and should be refused.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Mineral County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

having in his charge a dangerous and death-dealing instrumentality."

It is the duty of the driver of such machines as those here considered to keep a lookout in the direction in which his car is going and turning. Eisenman v. Griffith, — Mo. App. —, 167 S. W. 1142; O'Dowd v. Newnham, supra.

And in attempting to pass over a crossing which is frequented by pedestrians, he is chargeable with the duty to look, and this duty implies also the duty to see what is in plain view, unless some reasonable explanation is presented for a failure to see, and the reasonableness of such explanation is a question for the jury. Holderman v. Witmer, — Iowa, —, 147 N. W. 927.

And if he sees a pedestrian in peril, it is his duty to immediately take all reasonable measures to avoid injuring him. Eisenman v. Griffith, supra.

In a crowded city street dictates of common prudence require that an automobile should be kept under control so as to avoid, or at least minimize, the danger of a collision with pedestrians and others. Lorah v. Rinehart, 243 Pa. 231, 89 Atl. 967.

Greater care is required of the operator of an automobile at street crossings and in the more thronged streets of a city, than in the less obstructed streets in the open or suburban parts. Grier v. Samuel, — Del. —, 86 Atl. 209.

And the operator of an automobile in the city should cause it to slow up, or stop if need be, where danger is imminent and could, by the exercise of reasonable care, be seen or known in time for him to avoid accident. Ibid.

The degree of diligence which must be exercised in a particular exigency is such as is necessary to prevent injuring others, and in considering whether the operator of an automobile exercised due diligence, or by a failure to do so is guilty of negligence.

The driver of a vehicle is bound to use

What might be due care in the management of a horse and carriage traveling along a country road affords no standard for measuring the prudence of the driver of an automobile running over the same road at high speed. Brown v. Thayer, 212 Mass. 392, 99 N. E. 237.

And in passing upon the question whether the driver of an automobile which struck a pedestrian exercised ordinary care, the jury may consider the powerful agencies placed under the control of the driver, and the disastrous consequences to other travelers if there is mismanagement. Ibid.

An automobile has no superior right to the use of a street car track as such, like the right enjoyed by street cars. Michalsky v. Putney, 51 Pa. Super. Ct. 163.

Although both pedestrians and the drivers of automobiles have the right to pass and repass, neither can so negligently exercise this right as to injure the other. Schock v. Cooling, 175 Mich. 313, 141 N. W. 675.

And it is negligence for the driver of an automobile having ample space to pass a pedestrian on a highway, to so guide his vehicle as to strike him in passing. Ibid.

The driver of an automobile has the same right to use the highway or streets of a city, as the driver of other vehicles, and like them he must exercise reasonable care and caution for the safety of others. Grier v. Samuel, supra; Goldblatt v. Broccklebank, 166 Ill. App. 315.

It is the duty of the driver of such a machine to use ordinary care in its operation, to move at a rate of speed reasonable under the circumstances, and cause it to slow up, or to stop if need be, where danger is imminent and could, by the exercise of reasonable care, be seen or known in time to avoid an accident; and greater care is required at street crossings and in the more reasonable care, and to anticipate the presence on the street of other persons having an equal right with himself to be there.

crowded streets of a city than in the less obstructed streets in the open or suburban parts. Brown v. Wilmington, — Del. —, 90 Atl. 44.

The right of the driver of an automobile and of a pedestrian in the highway must be exercised in a reasonable and careful manner so as not unreasonably to abridge or interfere with the rights of the other; both are bound to the reasonable use of all their senses for the prevention of accidents, and the exercise of all such reasonable caution as ordinarily careful and prudent persons would exercise under like circumstances. Grier v. Samuel, supra.

A duty which everyone using highways owes to others is to exercise reasonable care, and to bear in mind that he does not have the exclusive right of user, whether he be a pedestrian, rider, or driver of an automobile, and the quantum of care required is to be estimated by the particular situation. Winner v. Linton, 120 Md. 276, 87 Atl. 674.

In Brown v. Thayer, supra, where a recovery was sought for an injury to a pedestrian by an automobile, it was held that public highways are not designed or maintained as thoroughfares for racing automobiles, and that those who use them for this purpose do so at their peril.

In Mosso v. E. H. Stanton Co. 75 Wash. 220, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 134 Pac. 941, in an action by a pedestrian to recover for an injury inflicted by an automobile, it was held that where the peril of a traveler on the highway is actually discovered, and should be appreciated, by the operator of a street car or other agency of danger, a new duty arises to exercise all reasonable care to avoid injury, and that the failure to exercise such care, if it results in injury, will render the driver liable notwithstanding the continuance of the plaintiff's negligence up to the instant of the injury.

Lynch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The injury, damages for which plaintiff to exercise reasonable care to prevent collisions and accidents. Grier v. Samuel, and Brown v. Wilmington, supra.

A pedestrian and the user of an automobile have equal rights upon the public highway, and each is to use it bearing in mind the right of the other, in such a manner as not to injure the other. O'Dowd v. Newnham, supra.

The degree of care required of a pedestrian while in the street depends largely upon the place and the condition, but the degree of care required is ordinary care under the circumstances. Lewis v. Seattle Taxicab Co. 72 Wash. 320, 130 Pac. 341.

A person crossing a public street of a city is required to make reasonable use of all of his senses in order to avoid an impending danger, and if he fails to do so and is injured by reason of such failure, he is guilty of such negligence as will prevent a recovery. Grier v. Samuel, supra.

While travelers on foot passing along or crossing a public highway have the same right to use it as a vehicle of any kind, they are bound to exercise care according to the circumstances, and especially bound to the alert and watchful performance of the duty of all travelers on all highways, to look where they are going and not walk blindly into danger. Tolmie v. Woodward Taxicab Co. — Mich. —, 144 N. W. 855.

It is the duty of a foot passenger to look both ways before starting to cross a street, particularly when it is a busy thoroughfare in the heart of the business district of a large city. Davis v. John Breuner Co. — Cal. —, 140 Pac. 586.

And a pedestrian about to cross a city street must be on his guard after he starts onto the street, and must continue on the alert while crossing the entire roadway. Lorah v. Rinehart, 243 Pa. 231, 89 Atl. 967.

But pedestrians are not bound to be continually looking and listening to ascertain if automobiles are approaching, under penalty that if they fail to do this and are injured, it will be assumed from this fact alone that they were negligent. O'Dowd v. Newnham, supra.

seeks recovery by an action of trespass on the case, was inflicted by defendant in the operation of an automobile on the streets of Keyser. The car collided with plaintiff at a street crossing, and within a few feet of the curb, over which he had just stepped into the street. At that time he was ten years and six months old. In company with him were two companions, one eleven, the other nine years old. They were interested in the pictures of noted baseball players, contained in a box of candy purchased by one of them at a store near the crossing. These they were examining as they leisurely approached and entered upon the crossing at the time of the collision. Defendant drove his car along Piedmont street, and thence to the left over the cross-

The driver of an automobile has freedom of choice as to the part of the street he will drive upon, and a pedestrian may rely on the presumption that so long as he occupies one place or pursues a given course, he will not be run into, and a failure to keep a lookout for the approach of such vehicles is not necessarily a want of proper care. Lewis v. Seattle Taxicab Co. supra.

Persons alighting upon or walking across public streets where vehicles are constantly traveling to and fro must use ordinary care to see that they do not collide with or are not run over by them, and it is in turn the duty of the drivers of vehicles to exercise ordinary care to prevent any injury being caused to such foot passengers; the rights of such parties are reciprocal and equal, and neither has any right of way superior to the other. Brown v. Brashear, 22 Cal. App. 135, 133 Pac. 505.

A pedestrian who, in using a public highway, is in the exercise of due care for his own protection and for the safety of others, cannot, as matter of law, be held guilty of contributory negligence merely because he does not run to escape injury by an automobile. O'Dowd v. Newnham, supra.

Applications of general rules—speed.

The operation of an automobile at a rate of speed in excess of that prescribed by a valid municipal ordinance is negligence per se. O'Dowd v. Newnham, supra.

So, it is negligence per se for the driver of an automobile to run his machine at about twice the maximum lawful rate of speed, and to fail to sound a warning, when approaching a pedestrian, within 12 feet of an intersecting street. Hillebrant v. Manz, 71 Wash. 250, 128 Pac. 892.

And a peremptory instruction for the defendant should not be given in an action to recover for an injury to a pedestrian who was struck by an automobile immediately after jumping from a wagon and while proceeding across the street, where there is evidence that the driver of the automobile ing and into Orchard street. As the car entered on the crossing, it collided with two of the three boys, knocking plaintiff to the pavement, thereby causing the injury. The trial court entered judgment for plaintiff on the jury's findings on the facts. Hence the case is here on writ of error.

While defendant admits the collision and its resultant effect, he denies liability on the ground that but for the negligence of the plaintiff the collision would not have occurred. But the question of defendant's negligence, and that of plaintiff, if any, contributing to the injury, were submitted to the determination of the jury, and its findings cannot be disturbed except for good and sufficient cause.

Was defendant negligent? He was law-was running his machine at a rate of speed that was in excess of the limit fixed by the city ordinance, and that might be considered unreasonable and dangerous upon such a thoroughfare. Bartley v. Marino, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 158 S. W. 1156.

But the mere fact that the driver of the automobile which struck a pedestrian was violating the speed ordinance, and failed to give the proper warning of his approach, does not preclude the court from finding that the pedestrian's negligence in walking heedlessly into the street was the efficient and proximate cause of his injury, since the negligence of a plaintiff which directly contributes to the injury bars a recovery. Davis v. John Breuner Co. supra.

The right of the driver of an automobile on the street is no greater than that of a pedestrian, but their rights and duties are reciprocal, and whether, notwithstanding any previous negligence of the pedestrian in failing to look, the driver of the machine could have seen and have avoided the accident, had he been running at a reasonable rate of speed, or had he sounded his horn, is a question for the jury. Hillebrant v. Manz, supra.

A motion to nonsuit is properly refused where there is proof that the defendant's automobile was being propelled through a thickly populated public street at a high rate of speed, and that the plaintiff, a child seven years of age, who was then crossing the street, was run into and dragged a distance of about 8 or 10 feet. Lewis v. National Cash Register Co. 84 N. J. L. 598, 87 Atl. 345.

And in Lorah v. Rinehart, supra, it was held that the question whether, considering the congested condition of the city streets, the defendant's automobile, which, according to the testimony, was proceeding from 12 to 15 miles an hour, was being run at a negligent rate of speed, was properly left to the jury.

And in Yarbrough v. Carter, — Ala. —, 60 So. 833, the evidence in an action to recover for injuries to a pedestrian who was run into by an automobile was held sufficient to carry the case to the jury 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

fully on the public highway. It was open alike to him and to the plaintiff. Their rights thereon were mutual and co-ordinate. The rights of the one were not superior to the rights of the other. Highways are constructed and maintained at public expense for public use by all persons alike, without limitation or restriction, save only that the use must conform to the well-established rules and regulations prescribed by law.

That the use of automobiles on the highways for business or recreation is lawful is no longer open to question. Such use involves only the application of a new appliance and mode of travel, rather than any new legal principle. It does not exclude or seriously interfere with the original modes in which the highways were used, but simon the question of the defendant's negligence, where there was evidence tending to show that the defendant's automobile, running at between 25 and 40 miles an hour, struck the plaintiff, and that no signals were given of the approach of the machine.

So, in an action against the owners of two automobiles to recover for the death of one pedestrian and injury to another, the question of negligence on the part of the drivers of the machines is for the jury, where there is evidence that just before the accident the pedestrians were walking along the extreme right of the street: that a buggy drawn by a horse was a little distance in advance of them and between them and the left-hand side of the street: that the automobiles were approaching from the rear and were racing; that the first warning of their approach was given by the blowing of the horn on the leading machine: that the pedestrians heard it and turned and saw the approaching automobiles; that the deceased and the injured pedestrian leaped toward the left and were struck by one of the machines, which also collided with the buggy, and which, with its emergency brake set, continued on its course for 80 feet. Brown v. Thayer, 212 Mass. 392, 99 N. E. 237.

And in an action to recover for an injury to a pedestrian struck by an automobile while crossing a street, the question of the speed of the machine and the negligence of the operator is for the jury, where the plaintiff's evidence tends to show that the injury occurred on a dark rainy night, and that the machine struck him immediately after he saw it, knocking him down and proceeding a distance of 12½ feet after the collision, while the defendant's testimony was to the effect that his machine was going only about 2 miles an hour, and that he stopped his car before reaching the plaintiff, and did not strike him, but that he fell before the car reached him, and the injury resulted from such fall. Bachelder v. Morgan, — Ala. —, 60 So. 815.

And in an action to recover for the death of a person killed by an automobile while ply adds another use in furtherance of the general object for which they were dedicated. But new appliances and modes of travel must be exercised with due regard for the rights of others using the highways, "and as long as such care is exercised, the owners will not be liable for any injury their use may cause." Berry, Automobiles, § 115, and numerous cases cited.

So that, in whatever manner or for whatever lawful purpose one uses a public highway, he owes a double duty: (1) To avoid danger to himself by another having the right to such use, and (2) to avoid infliction of an injury upon such other person. Both must exercise such care as reasonably prudent persons would exercise under the same circumstances and conditions, crossing a street, the case is properly submitted to the jury and a verdict for the plaintiff justified, where there is evidence that the automobile was proceeding at a rate of from 15 to 45 miles per hour, and that no signal of its approach was given; that the deceased alighted from a street car nearly opposite his home at a regular stopping place; that as he alighted he faced in the direction from which the automobile approached, but that it was not in sight; that he spoke to a person on a wagon and proceeded across the tracks; that he saw the automobile and made motions toward it immediately before he was struck; that it carried him a distance of about 95 feet; and there is further evidence that such an automobile going at the rate of 15 miles an hour, could be stopped within 20 or 30 feet, and when going at the rate of 35 miles an hour, could be stopped within 75 feet. Michalsky v. Putney, 51 Pa. Super. Ct. 163.

And in a similar action, where there is evidence that although the brakes were applied, the machine which injured the pedestrian traveled more than 70 feet up a slight grade after the collision, notwithstanding there is no evidence to show within what distance the car or a similar one might be stopped, it is a question for the jury at what speed the car was proceeding, and it is improper for the court to say, as a matter of law, that it was not exceeding a certain speed. Ackerman v. Stacey, 157 App. Div. 835, 143 N. Y. Supp. 227.

And in Goldblatt v. Brocklebank, 166 Ill. App. 315, the evidence was held sufficient to show that the automobile which struck the plaintiff while he was crossing the street diagonally was recklessly and carelessly driven at an unlawful and dangerous speed, and that the driver failed to blow his horn or give any signal as he approached the crossing where the accident occurred.

If the servant of a city at the time of an accident was operating its police patrol wagon at a high and dangerous rate of speed, when considered with regard to the place and circumstances, and failed to give 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

in order to avoid being injured or causing injury. Indiana Springs Co. v. Brown, 165 Ind. 465, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 238, 74 N. E. 615, 6 Ann. Cas. 656, 18 Am. Neg. Rep. 392; Hall v. Compton, 130 Mo. App. 675, 108 S. W. 1122; 28 Cyc. 27, 29; Berry, Automobiles, §§ 128, 150, 163, 171, 173; Huddy, Automobiles, §§ 84, 95, 99, 101; Babbitt, Motor Vehicles, § 913.

But what may be due and reasonable care in the use of a highway under some circumstances may be negligence under others. No inflexible rule applicable alike to all cases has been or can be definitely stated. Each case must be determined upon its own peculiar facts. The degree of care varies, also, to some extent with the character of the vehicle. There is an obvious difference the plaintiff, who was walking along the highway, timely warning of its approach, and the plaintiff was free from negligence that contributed to the accident, the servant of the city was negligent, and it is liable for the injury. Brown v. Wilmington, — Del. —, 90 Atl. 44.

In an action to recover for an injury received by a pedestrian run into by an automobile, it is proper to allow the jury to take into consideration, in judging the speed of the car, the distance which the machine traveled before it came to a stop after the collision. Lorah v. Rinehart, supra.

In an action by a pedestrian who was struck by an automobile, in which the driver is charged with wantonly and wilfully injuring the plaintiff, an ordinance of the city prohibiting the running of automobiles in excess of a certain speed is admissible in connection with evidence that the defendant was violating the speed laws, and in connection with other facts and circumstances to be considered in determining whether the wrongful act complained of was wanton or wilful, although there is no count claiming damages for violation of the ordinance, and although a violation of such ordinance is simple negligence only. Yarbrough v. Carter, — Ala. —, 60 So. 833.

A charge in an action to recover for an injury to a pedestrian struck by an automobile, that unless the jury found that the operator of the automobile was guilty of negligence which proximately caused the injury, they should find for the defendant, and that if they believed the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence, or his injuries to be the result of an unavoidable accident, no recovery could be had, was sufficiently favorable to the defendant where contributory negligence was not pleaded, and there was evidence that the defendant's automobile was running at an unlawful rate of speed, which directly caused the accident. Bartley v. Marino, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 158 S. W. 1156.

The failure of the plaintiff in an action brought to recover for an injury received through being run into by an automobile, in that respect between the use and operation of a road wagon and an automobile. The latter has weight and power, and also greater capacity of speed and agility in its movements. It responds more readily to the will of the operator. Therefore "the operator must enlarge to a commensurate extent the degree of vigilance and care necessary to avoid injuries which the use of his vehicle has made more imminent." Berry, Automobiles, § 119. "Moving quietly as it does, without the noise which accompanies the movements of a street car or other ordinary heavy vehicle, it is necessary that caution should be continuously exercised to avoid collisions with pedestrians unaware of its approach. The speed should be limited, warnings of approach given, and skill and care in its management so exercised as to anticipate such collisions as the nature of the machine and the locality might suggest as liable to occur in the absence of such precautions." Id. §§ 124, 154; Huddy, Automobiles, § 95.

On this subject the observations of the court in Irwin v. Judge, 81 Conn. 492, 71 Atl. 572, are pertinent: "To persons riding along or crossing our public roads, and especially our city streets, the rapidly moving automobile is a constant source of danger. Their great weight, speed power, and resulting momentum render the consequences of a collision with them much more serious than with ordinary carriages moving at even a higher rate of speed, and it is much more difficult to avoid, and much to prove that the defendant was running his machine at a high rate of speed, does not constitute a fatal variance from a statement charging the defendant "with recklessly, carelessly, and negligently operating and running his machine at a high rate of speed, contrary to the laws of the commonwealth," and a recovery may be had where there is evidence of the defendant's negligent operation of the machine. Dougherty v. Davis, 51 Pa. Super. Ct. 229.

Supplementing note in 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 489.

In Clark v. General Motor Car Co. — Mo. App. —, 160 S. W. 578, the court stated that there was no statutory rule requiring the driver of an automobile to sound his horn or give other alarm on approaching a crossing of a public street, and that therefore the obligation of the law was the same as that imposed at common law, except for the fact that the statute required the exercise of a high degree of care on the part of automobilists at all times.

Since an automobile driver is bound to use a degree of reasonable care proportionate to the danger of the instrumentality which he is operating, and is bound, when traversing a much frequented street, to anticipate the presence of other persons having an equal right, proof in an action to recover for the death of a pedestrian who was struck by an automobile, that the machine was suddenly turned from the course it was taking and collided with the deceased, to whom no signal of warning was given by the driver, it appearing undisputed that the pedestrian exercised due care, is sufficient to authorize a finding that the driver's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, and to render instructions upon the subject of contributory negligence unnecessary. O'Dowd v. Newnham, — Ga. App. —, 80 S. E. 36.

S. W. 498, the evidence in an action to recover for an injury sustained through being run into by an automobile was held insufficient to establish negligence on the part of the defendant in failing to use proper care to control his machine, or to give any signal or warning, or in running his machine at a high rate of speed, where it tended to show that the machine stopped within 15 feet of the place of collision, it appearing from the plaintiff's evidence that he was running behind a street car, tampering with the drawbar pin, and suddenly darted, or ran to a place, in front of the automobile so close to it that the accident was unavoidable.

Where a statute requires the driver of an automobile, upon approaching a horse or a person walking, to give a reasonable warning of his approach, but does not say what the warning shall be, it is improper to extend the meaning of the statute and instruct that the driver should sound his horn or give reasonable notice with some other signal device, where there is evidence that the operator of the machine, upon approaching a child on the highway, shouted to attract the latter's attention. Shaw v. Corrington, 171 Ill. App. 232.

Whether the use of a gong, a horn, or other warning to pedestrians is necessary in the exercise of due diligence by the driver of an automobile, or whether the failure to give these or other cautionary signals is negligence, are questions for the jury in an action to recover for the death of a pedestrian struck by an automobile, and a charge is therefore properly refused that "there is no law requiring the operator of an automobile, while properly using the streets, to sound a gong, blow a horn, or give other warning to pedestrians of its approach." O'Dowd v. Newnham, supra.

An instruction in an action to recover for an injury sustained by being run into by an automobile, that if the jury finds that the driver's omission to sound his horn was such conduct under the circumstances as would not have characterized a reasonably prudent person's act under similar circumstances to avoid injuries to persons in more confusing to attempt to avoid, the rapidly moving automobile than the street railway car, which has a fixed and known direction and course upon its tracks. While owners of automobiles have the right to drive them upon public streets, yet the proper protection of the equal rights of all to use the highways necessarily requires the adoption of different regulations for the different methods of such use, and what may be a safe rate of speed at which to ride a bicycle or drive a horse may be an unreasonably rapid rate at which to drive an automobile in the same place. For the reasons stated, and others which might be given, the driving of an automobile at a high rate of speed through city streets, at times when and places where other vehicles are constantly passing, and men, women, and children are liable to be crossing, or around corners at the intersection of streets, or in passing by street cars from which passengers have just alighted, or may be about to alight, or in other similar places and situations where people are liable to fail to observe an approaching automobile . . . [the driver] is bound to take notice of the peculiar danger of collisions in such places. He cannot secure immunity from liability by merely sounding his automobile horn. He must run his car only at such speed as will enable him to timely stop it to avoid collisions. If he fails to do so, he is responsible for the damage he thereby causes." See also Tudor v. Bowen, 152 N. C. 441, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 804, 136 Am. St. Rep.

the street, and if they further find that his failure caused the injury to the plaintiff, a recovery by the latter should be allowed, does not conform to a charge in the petition that the chauffeur omitted to sound his horn when he either saw the plaintiff, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have done so, and is prejudicial in that it permits a recovery for the mere failure to sound a horn or give a warning, although the chauffeur neither saw, nor by the exercise of due care might have seen, the person crossing the street. Clark v. General Motor Car Co. supra.

In an action to recover for injuries received by a pedestrian through being run into by an automobile, where the lamps on the machine were not lighted, on the issue as to whether or not it was after nightfall when the accident occurred, evidence that other automobiles met before the accident had their lights burning, and that lights were lighted in the village when the plaintiff arrived there shortly afterward, is admissible as bearing on the question whether it was light or dark at the time. *Schock v. Cases involving the conduct of persons about to cross a railroad track at grade are to be distinguished from those involving the conduct of a pedestrian about to cross a street, since a railroad track is a place of known danger, and a train cannot turn aside, which is not true as to vehicles proceeding along the highway. Goldblatt v. Brocklebank, 166 Ill. App. 315.

The rule applicable to steam railroad crossings is relaxed at the usual street crossings, and a pedestrian is not required, as matter of law, to look both ways and listen, but is required only to exercise such reasonable care as the case requires. *Jessen v. 60 So. 815, where a recovery was sought by a pedestrian who was struck by an automobile when crossing the street, there was held to be nothing in the disputed facts which, among other things, involved the speed of the machine and the manner in which the plaintiff carried an umbrella, which took the case out of the operation of the general rule that negligence is not imputed, as a matter of law, to persons crossing a street at a regular crossing without stopping, looking, and listening for automobiles or other vehicles.

The duty of exercising ordinary care to avoid injury to pedestrians who are in plain sight for at least 400 feet rests upon the drivers of automobiles approaching from the rear. Brown v. Thayer, 212 Mass. 392, 99 N. E. 237.

A person has a right to alight from a moving wagon which is proceeding along the center of a street, and go to either side, exercising a proper degree of care for his own safety, and the driver of an automobile owes him the duty of exercising ordinary care to avoid striking him, and it would be erroneous to say that the driver owed no such duty until he actually discovered the pedestrian, since this would be treating the latter as an intruder and a trespasser in the street. Bartley v. Marino, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 158 S. W. 1150.

And in Mosso v. E. H. Stanton Co. 75 Wash. 220, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 134 Pac. 941, in an action to recover for an injury inflicted by an automobile on a pedestrian while crossing the street, it was held that the failure of the driver of an automobile to keep a vigilant lookout is negligence in any event, entailing a liability for injury proximately resulting therefrom.

A pedestrian who is struck by an automobile while diagonally crossing the street is not negligent as a matter of law in failing to be continuously looking, after he starts to cross the street, to see if auto-

The vigilance and care required vary, also, in respect of persons of different ages or physical conditions. The operator of an automobile must increase his exertions in order to avert danger to children whom he may see, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence and attention can or should see, on or near the highway. Their lack of capacity to apprehend and guard against danger makes such care and caution necessary. Thies v. Thomas, 77 N. Y. Supp. 276; Buscher v. New York Transp. Co. 125 App. Div. 493, 94 N. Y. Supp. 798, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 575; McDonald v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 80 App. Div. 233, 5 N. Y. Supp. 577; Huddy, Automobiles, § 81. In the first case cited the essence of the holding is that one in charge of an automobile is required to exercise more than ordinary care to avoid injury to children whom he meets in a public thoroughfare. Gross v. Foster, 134 App. Div. 243, 113 N. Y. Supp. 889; Berry, Automobiles, § 155.

But it is said defendant complied with all the conditions thus prescribed, and that notwithstanding the cautious and prudent operation of the car, he could not avert the mobiles are approaching behind him, especially where he is impeded by a sack of grain upon his shoulder. Mosso v. E. H. Stanton Co. supra.

The presumption arising from the testimony of the plaintiff in an action to recover for the death of a pedestrian who was struck by an automobile, that the latter was in the exercise of ordinary care, is overcome by testimony showing that the lights on the defendant's automobile were burning brightly, and that the deceased came out of a vacant lot and either ran or walked across the sidewalk to the street, and in front of the machine, in such a direction that its lights were plainly visible if he had been looking in the direction he was going, and that there was no crossing for pedestrians at the point where the accident occurred. Carlin v. Clark, 172 Ill. App. 240.

In an action to recover for injuries to a pedestrian who was struck by an automobile while attempting to cross the street, negligence on the part of the driver of the machine is established where he testified that there was rain on his wind shield so that he could not see through it, that he looked around it when about 30 feet distant from the point of contact and saw the pedestrian, and sounded his horn, and that the pedestrian stopped, and he did not again see him until his machine was practically upon him, there being evidence by the person struck that he did not stop and that he heard no horn or other warning given, and it appearing that the accident happened after dark, but at a point where the street was well lighted. Chase v. Seattle Taxicab & Transfer Co. — Wash. —, 139 Pac. 499.

And where the person in control of an automobile, by keeping a reasonably careful lookout commensurate with the dangerous character of the agency and the nature of the locality, could have discovered and have appreciated a traveler's perilous situation in time, by the exercise of reasonable care, to avoid injuring him, and injury results from the failure to keep such lookout and to exercise such care, then the last clear chance rule applies regardless of the 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

traveler's prior negligence, if that negligence has terminated or culminated in a situation of peril from which the exercise of ordinary care on his part would not thereafter extricate him, and the last phase applies whenever injury results from new negligence, or from a continuance of the driver's negligence after that of the traveler has ceased. Mosso v. E. H. Stanton Co. supra.

In Mosso v. E. H. Stanton Co. supra, in an action to recover for an injury sustained by a pedestrian while diagonally crossing the street, the court instructed that even though the jury found that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in not seeing the defendant's automobile approaching, yet he could recover if the driver of the automobile actually saw him, or if, by keeping a reasonably vigilant lookout, could have seen his exposed condition, in time to have avoided the injury by the exercise of reasonable care, and negligently failed to exercise such reasonable care; and by another instruction it stated that if the plaintiff was walking diagonally across the street, and at the same time the defendant's automobile was being driven by his servant in the plaintiff's direction, and the driver saw, or by the exercise of reasonable care and caution could have seen, the plaintiff in season to have stopped the automobile, altered his course, or in some way avoided the accident, but carelessly and negligently permitted the automobile to run against the plaintiff and injure him, the defendant would be liable. The reference in the first instruction to the plaintiff's negligence as "contributory" was held inaccurate and confusing as connected with the rule of last clear chance, and it was held that both instructions should have been qualified so as to have embodied the thought that if it was found that the plaintiff's negligence had prior to the instant of the injury, terminated or culminated in placing him in such a situation of danger that the exercise of ordinary care on his part alone would not thereafter have avoided injury without the co-operation of care on the driver's part, and that if the latter, by keeping a reasonably vigilant lookout, could have appreciat-collision. That he had control of the car, that it was moving at moderate speed (varying, according to the estimate by himself, from 8 to 10 miles an hour), and that he repeatedly gave warning of the car's approach to the crossing,—though in conflict with the evidence adduced by the plaintiff,—may be conceded, and yet, under the principles announced by the authorities cited, defendant may have been negligent to such a degree as to warrant the verdict and judgment of which he complains. He admits that, at a distance of 68 feet from the place of collision, he saw plaintiff and his companions near the crossing, and leisurely approaching it from the opposite direction. He saw them; they did not see him or his car. He then knew, and they did not know, that he intended to drive the car onto Orchard street, or that he would necessarily pass them while on the crossing. Even had they heard the signals, if given, they may have thought he would continue his course up Piedmont street,—as in fact his course seemed to be, according to testimony not contradicted. He could also observe, and perhaps did observe, their inattention to the approach of the car, thus evidently demanding greater care on his part to avoid injuring them.

That defendant was driving the car at a greater rate of speed than he seemed willing to admit appears from a reasonable interpretation of his testimony. The accident occurred after 5 o'clock P. M. He was on his way to keep a 5 o'clock engagement, ed the plaintiff's danger in time to have avoided the injury by the exercise of reasonable care, and he negligently failed in these regards, then the plaintiff's prior negligence would not preclude him from recovering.

But the instructions, in so far as they stated the rule as to the actual discovery of peril, were held to be correct.

—looked, but did not see.

The failure of a pedestrian to use reasonable care is established in an action to recover for an injury resulting from being run into by an automobile, where his testimony shows that he was a man of mature years, familiar with the use and dangers of highways, and was possessed of good sight and all his faculties; that on a clear day he was crossing one of the main thoroughfares of the city, upon which there was no rush or confusion of travel at the time, with two companions, he being on the side next to an approaching automobile coming on its proper side of the street, with a clear view in that direction for half a mile; that he looked in that direction and saw nothing, although his companion on the side farthest away saw the car and avoided it; that under those conditions he walked into the path of the machine and was thrown and injured by it. Tolmie v. Woodward Taxicab Co. — Mich. —, 144 N. W. 855.

A verdict for the defendant should not be directed in an action to recover for an injury received through being struck by an automobile while crossing the highway, where the plaintiff testified that he looked up the street before attempting to cross, and there was nothing there except an approaching electric car, which was some distance away, and that when about reaching the gutter on the opposite side, he was struck by the automobile without having seen it at all, since this constitutes some evidence of the exercise of due care on the part of the plaintiff. Gouin v. Ryder, — R. I. —, 87 Atl. 185. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

And the question of the defendant's negligence and the contributory negligence of the plaintiff is for the jury in an action to recover for an injury sustained by a pedestrian who was struck by an automobile while attempting to cross a street, where there is evidence that the plaintiff, before leaving the curb, looked in the direction from which the automobile which struck her came, and saw nothing approaching on the street nearer than a block away, and that she had no intimation of the approach of the machine until the ringing of its bell the instant before she was struck, while the defendant's evidence tended to show that the machine was running slowly at the time of the accident, and that the bell was sounded several times before the collision occurred. Birch v. Abercrombie, 74 Wash. 486, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 59, 133 Pac. 1020.

And it cannot be said as a matter of law that the plaintiff in an action to recover for an injury received through being run into by an automobile was guilty of contributory negligence where he testified that just before stepping from the curb to board a street car, he looked along the street in the direction from which the car which struck him came, and did not see it, although three other witnesses testified that an instant later they saw the automobile at a point on the street near where it was intersected by another street, and the inference raised from the plaintiff's testimony that the automobile was not in sight when he looked is not overcome by the evidence given by the other witnesses, but on the contrary the coincidence that no witness saw the machine at a point on the street in which the accident occurred farther away than the intersecting street was a fact from which the jury would have the right to infer that the machine swung in from the intersecting street an instant before they looked. Hillebrant v. Manz, 71 Wash. 250, 128 Pac. 892.

then overdue. There is in this admission an indication of an attempt to hasten to his destination.

But, in the interval of time between his first and second view of the positions of the boys, the continuity of view, as defendant contends, was obstructed by a wagon preceding him along Piedmont street, and to the left onto Orchard street, and hence over the crossing, and around which he was obliged to pass to the right and thence also to the left in order to turn onto Orchard street. Assuming, however, the presence of the wagon at the time and place designated sufficiently proved under the conflicting testimony, it was a light and open delivery wagon, not of sufficient height to obstruct defendant's view. If it did in fact obstruct his view, it did not deprive him of the knowledge that the crossing was in constant use by pedestrians, and of the possibility of contact with those thereon, and especially with those whom he knew would probably be thereon when the car reached it. In Gregory v. Slaughter, 124 Ky. 345, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1228, 124 Am. St. Rep. 402, 99 S. W. 247, the plaintiff was struck by an automobile as he was following a street car which was about to stop on the opposite side of a street to permit him to board it. The defendant was driving his automobile at from 8 to 10 miles an hour on one of the principal thoroughfares of the city. He was unable to see the crossing as he approached it because the street car was between him and the crossing, and, instead of stopping

Failing to look for an approaching automobile before stepping into a street to take passage on a street car at the usual stopping place, or failing to look for an automobile while on the way to such car, is not negligence as a matter of law under all circumstances. Lewis v. Seattle Taxicab Co. 72 Wash. 320, 130 Pac. 341.

In Davis v. John Breuner Co. — Cal. —, 140 Pac. 586, in an action by a pedestrian to recover for injuries received through being run into while attempting to cross a street, the evidence was held sufficient to support a finding that the plaintiff walked heedlessly into the street without taking the ordinary precautions for his safety, and was guilty of contributory negligence.

And in Blackwell v. Renwick, 21 Cal. App. 131, 131 Pac. 94, whether a pedestrian who was struck by an automobile shortly after having alighted from a street car, and while proceeding along the street, was guilty of negligence in not looking backward to observe whether vehicles were approaching from that direction, was held to be a question for the jury. The court said: "It cannot be said that, had he observed the approach of the automobile before he and his wife started to move in a southerly direction, they could not have reasonably and prudently started on their course along the very portion of the street traversed by them up to the time of the collision. It certainly was not their duty to turn about constantly and repeatedly to observe the approach of possible vehicles from the rear, where the drivers of such vehicles could plainly observe them in time to give warning, or turn out and avoid a collision. The defendant admitted that he could have stopped his machine within a distance of about 20 feet, but he relied upon his belief that he could pass the pedestrians at their right without running any risk of injuring them."

guilty of negligence in not looking before he left the curb, the question whether he was guilty of negligence when he was struck is for the jury, where the evidence tends to show that at that time he had reached the middle of the street, and that at that point he was practically outside the zone of danger from automobiles coming from the direction of the one which struck him, and it became his duty to commence looking for vehicles coming from the opposite direction, there being an ordinance in force requiring automobiles to keep to the right and as near the right-hand curb as possible, and it appearing that the automobile which struck him was running in or near the middle of the street. Mosso v. E. H. Stanton Co. 75 Wash. 220, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 134 Pac. 941.

Where the evidence as to the speed of a pedestrian and the automobile which struck him was mere estimates, and not established facts, it was held that it could not be said as a matter of law that the person struck was guilty of contributory negligence in not looking before starting to cross the street, although from the evidence relating to speed it would appear that the automobile would have been in a position where it could have been seen by the pedestrian had he looked, as he testified he did, before leaving the curb. Ibid.

The violation of a statute fixing the rate of speed at which automobiles shall proceed at the intersection of streets, or of a provision requiring a warning to be given by such machines upon approaching pedestrians, is an act of negligence per se, and a violation of either provision by the driver of an automobile which strikes a pedestrian at the intersection of streets will render the defendant liable, if such negligence is the cause of the accident and the plaintiff is his automobile until the car passed, he merely changed his direction, so as to go around the passing car, when he was brought face to face with plaintiff at a distance too short to prevent a collision. The court, holding defendant guilty of gross negligence, said: "He states . . . [the car] was going at the rate of 8 to 10 miles an hour. He was on one of the principal thoroughfares of a great city, and approaching a crossing where it was at least reasonable to expect pedestrians to be. He could not see this crossing for the reason that the street car was between him and it, and thus obscured his vision. Instead of stopping his automobile until the car passed, and he could see whether there were pedestrians on the crossing beyond, he simply changed his direction so as to go around the passing car, and by his own act was brought face to face with the appellee at a distance too short to prevent the collision at the rate he was moving. This was, in itself, gross negligence to the verge of recklessness. In practical result there was no difference between what he did and if he had shut his eyes and driven his automobile over the street crossing without observing whether anyone was in his way or not."

But there is a further infirmity in the argument based on the obstruction. The wagon turned around the corner to the left near the curb. Defendant passed to the right of the wagon, and then turned to the left onto Orchard street, thus placing the posi-free from contributory negligence. Grier v. Samuel, — Del. —, 86 Atl. 209.

In Holderman v. Witmer, — Iowa, —, 147 N. W. 927, in an action to recover for the death of a pedestrian, caused by an automobile which struck him at a crossing, the evidence was held sufficient to go to the jury on the question of the defendant's negligence, there being testimony from which it might be found that the deceased was half way across the street at the time of the collision, and that the machine overtook him from the rear while he was in plain view of the driver, although it was not going fast at the time of the collision.

And the question of the deceased's contributory negligence was held to be for the jury, where the evidence tended to show that the deceased was half way across the street when struck, and presumably in more danger of vehicles coming from in front than the rear, and it appearing also that the automobile was running diagonally across the intersection of the streets. Ibid.

And the questions whether the plaintiff was justified in his conduct, and whether there was negligence on the part of the driver of the automobile, were held to be questions for the jury in Griffin v. Taxi Service Co. — Mass. —, 104 N. E. 838, where there was evidence from which it might have been found that at a place of great congestion of passage, plaintiff, seeing an approaching taxicab belonging to defendant company 20 to 25 feet away, under circumstances which led him to form a judgment that there was ample time to pass in front of it, started to cross from one side of a city street to the other, and was struck and injured.

So, the question whether a pedestrian who was struck by an automobile when attempting to cross at the intersection of streets was guilty of contributory negligence is for the jury, where he saw the machine which struck him when it was a block away, and he proceeded in a uniform course without hesitation, and failed to look a second time for the machine. Chase v. Seattle Taxicab & Transfer Co. — Wash. —, 139 Pac. 499.

And the question of contributory negligence was also for the jury in an action brought to recover for an injury to a pedestrian through being run into by an automobile, where there was evidence that near the intersection of streets crossing at right angles, she stepped into the street and passed in front of standing horses; that she stopped and looked both ways, saw a wagon coming and waited for it to pass; that she again looked both ways and saw no vehicle approaching, and proceeded to cross and was struck by an automobile going at an excessive speed, the approach of which was not announced by any warning. Kurtz v. Tourison, 241 Pa. 425, 88 Atl. 656.

And in Huggon v. Whipple & Co. 214 Mass. 64, 100 N. E. 1087, in an action to recover for an injury received by a pedestrian struck by an automobile while attempting to cross a busy street at a crossing, where the evidence was conflicting, the questions whether, in deciding to cross the street and in the method of carrying out that decision, the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care, and whether the driver of the automobile was negligent, and generally whether the accident was attributable to the negligence of either or both, or of neither of the parties, were held to be for the jury.

In Bachelder v. Morgan, — Ala. —, 60 So. 815, an action to recover for an injury to a pedestrian struck by an automobile while crossing a street at a regular crossing, the evidence was held sufficient to warrant a finding that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to cross the street on a dark rainy night, holding an umbrella over him in such a way as to obstruct his view, or in walking in front of the defendant's slowly moving automobile.

tion of the boys and the curb at which he first saw them to his right. The streets at their intersection are 30 feet between the curbs. His car should have been, and so far as appears was, on the right-hand side of Piedmont street. At least the provisions of § 8, chap. 32, Acts 1911, required him to pass to the right of the intersection of the center line of the two streets in turning to the left into Orchard street. If duly attentive to the operation of his car, he had sufficient space and opportunity to observe the crossing and the danger to be avoided. But at that time he was, according to one witness whose testimony he does not deny, engaged in looking at property owned by him located immediately in front of the intersection of Orchard street and Piedmont street, with which the former connects, but beyond which it does not extend.

But whether defendant was negligent was a question for the determination of the jury. It did determine the question against his contention, and we cannot, under the facts and circumstances thus far detailed, reach the conclusion that its findings are not correct, especially in view of the conflict of all the evidence introduced on the trial before the jury.

We reach the same conclusion, also, upon the question of contributory negligence of the plaintiff. An accident seldom occurs which, in some aspect or view, is not in part due to the negligence of both parties affected. In this instance there was in some degree negligence on plaintiff's part. The duty imposed by law on pedestrians

The questions of negligence and contributory negligence should be submitted to the jury in an action to recover for an injury received by a pedestrian through being run into by an automobile, where there is evidence that the plaintiff, when about 15 feet from the corner of a street, sought to cross diagonally; that, as he started to cross, he looked but saw no vehicle; that when he had reached the middle of the street he looked again, and saw an automobile rounding the corner and going in a straight line along the center of the street; that he continued his course for 2 or 3 feet, and when about that distance from the curb was struck by the car; that when he first saw the car it was running 5 or 6 miles an hour, but that its speed was increased until, at the time he was struck, it was running 8 or 10 miles an hour; that instead of keeping a course along the center of the street, the machine turned toward the curb and swung in toward the plaintiff, running him down; that the distance between the curb and the nearest wheel of the car while it was in the middle of the street was 3 or 4 feet. Fitzgerald v. Russell, 155 App. Div. 854, 140 N. Y. Supp. 519.

And in Fox v. Great Atlantic & P. Tea Co. 84 N. J. L. 726, 87 Atl. 339, the question whether the plaintiff, who was run into by an automobile while crossing the street diagonally between blocks, exercised reasonable care for her safety, was held upon the evidence to be for the jury, and motions to nonsuit and direct a verdict were held to have been properly denied.

In Havermale v. Houck, — Md. —, 89 Atl. 314, the evidence was held entirely insufficient to prove that the injury was directly caused by the negligence of the defendant, or to show that the plaintiff exercised proper care, the testimony in effect being that the defendant was driving his machine at a lawful rate of speed in the daytime when the plaintiff, an infant, came out of a house, ran along the street, and suddenly left the curb and started to cross diagonally in front of the automobile with his back to 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the machine, and when about half way across was struck.

And in Mills v. Powers, 216 Mass. 36, 102 N. E. 912, in an action to recover for the death of a boy eleven years old, who was struck by an automobile, it was held that it could not be found that he was in the exercise of due care, where it appeared that he was riding in a wagon with his back toward the driver, and jumped off, turning his body as he did so, thus bringing his face toward the driver, and jumping backward and starting diagonally across the street, when he was almost immediately struck by the defendant's automobile coming from behind, which, according to some evidence in the case, had just turned out to pass the vehicle ahead of it.

The jury were held warranted in finding that the plaintiff, who was struck by an automobile while crossing the street diagonally in a southwesterly direction, was not guilty of contributory negligence where it appeared that the automobile approached noiselessly at an excessive speed, and that the plaintiff was looking at a vehicle coming from the north at the time he was struck by the automobile, which was proceeding toward the north, there also being testimony that he looked both ways as he was about to cross the street, and did not see the automobile which struck him. Goldblatt v. Brocklebank, 166 Ill. App. 315.

The exercise of the "highest degree of care of a very careful person," provided for by § 8523, Mo. Rev. Stat. 1909, requires the driver of an automobile approaching pedestrians proceeding diagonally down the street, to stop his car where he could have done so, if, by proceeding and turning first to the right and then the left, there was required him to exercise some care and caution for his own safety. But was his negligence, if any appears, such as to preclude recovery? We answer that question, also, in the negative, as did the jury. In its view, the negligence attributable to defendant was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury.

As stated, the care to be exercised by pedestrians using the highways varies with the circumstances of each particular case. The mere fact of negligence will not excuse the infliction of an injury, where by due care and caution the injury may be avoided by the one inflicting it. One may negligently place himself in a situation where danger may reasonably seem imminent; yet, if injury is avoidable by another through the exercise of reasonable care, the danger of striking the pedestrians. Porter v. Hetherington, 172 Mo. App. 502, 158 S. W. 469.

The defendant's testimony shows that he "recklessly, carelessly, and negligently operated and ran his automobile so as to strike, knock down, and drag the plaintiff," where the accident occurred in the daytime, and the defendant testified that he had such perfect control that he could stop his car within an inch; that he knew the plaintiff was an old man; that when about 15 feet distant he called to him to get somewhere so he could pass; that they began zigzagging back and forth, and that he did not stop his car, but kept on and collided with the plaintiff. Dougherty v. Davis, 51 Pa. Super. Ct. 229.

In an action to recover for an injury received by a pedestrian who was run into by an automobile, the question of the defendant's negligence is for the jury, where the evidence tends to show that he was driving his car at an excessive rate of speed, and gave no warning of his approach; that he saw the plaintiff diagonally crossing the highway between two conveyances with his back partially toward the automobile, and in its path apparently hesitating as if confused, but that he continued to drive his car at a rapid rate, making a curve to avoid striking the plaintiff, when, according to his own testimony, he could have stopped instantly. Schock v. Cooling, 175 Mich. 313, 141 N. W. 675.

Where the driver of an automobile which struck a pedestrian admits that he actually saw the latter in plenty of time to stop before striking, the omission in an instruction as to the driver's duty to stop the car if, "by the exercise of due care," he could have seen the pedestrian, is not erroneous. Porter v. Hetherington, 172 Mo. App. 502, 158 S. W. 469.

But it is not negligence per se for a pedestrian to cross in front of a moving street car without first ascertaining whether an automobile is moving in the same direction with and on the other side of the street car at a dangerous and unlawful rate of speed, since he has a right to assume that if such vehicle is there, it is being run at a lawful rate of speed. *Citizens' Motor Car Co. v. And one alighting from a street car has a right to assume that he occupies a position of safety within 4 feet of the steps of a street car, where an ordinance prohibits automobiles running closer, and in the absence of any warning or reason to believe that the driver of an automobile would violate the ordinance, he is not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to look up and down the street when he alights from the car, to ascertain if drivers are observing such ordinance. *Medlin v. What may be deemed negligence by adults may not be chargeable as negligence by infants. In determining whether or not a plaintiff is guilty of contributory negligence, the conduct of children should not be judged by the same rules which govern that of adults. A pedestrian is not bound, as a matter of law, when using a called upon to drive his car so as to protect passengers on street cars who see fit to jump from the cars while they are in motion, unless and until he has warning that a passenger intends to jump from a car while in motion, and the defendant in an action to recover for an injury received by one who was struck by an automobile after he had jumped from a street car while it was in motion has a right to have the jury so instructed, although they were instructed generally that both the pedestrian and the driver of an automobile are required to exercise ordinary care in their conduct while upon the street, in order to avoid doing damage or injury to each other. Brown v. Brashear, 22 Cal. App. 135, 133 Pac. 505.

The question of an automobile driver's negligence is for the jury in an action by one who was struck by the machine while standing in the street where pedestrians usually stand preparatory to boarding cars, where there is evidence that the pedestrian could have been plainly seen, and that there was plenty of room to pass him, and the driver testified that the accident occurred through the plaintiff's stepping backward in front of the machine, while the plaintiff testified that he did not move from the time he took his position until he was struck. Ouelette v. Superior Motor Mach. Works, — Wis. —, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 147 N. W. 1014.

And where the driver of an automobile when some distance away saw an electric car coming, and knew that the place at which he collided with the plaintiff was where cars stopped, and there is evidence that when he struck the plaintiff, who was about to take a car, he was driving from 8 to 12 miles an hour along the principal business street of a city, the question whether he exercised due care is for the jury. Adams v. Averill, supra.

So, the question whether the driver of an automobile which struck the plaintiff while he was attempting to board a street car at a regular stopping place was negligent is for the jury, where there is evidence that the defendant was driving his machine at the rate of 25 miles an hour upon the wet pavement of a city street past a stopping street car, and within 20 feet of an intersecting street, where pedestrians were likely to be encountered in getting on or off the car. Hillebrand v. Manz, 71 Wash. 250, 128 Pac. 892.

And the question of the defendant's negligence and the plaintiff's contributory negligence was held to be for the jury, where the latter's testimony was to the effect that before alighting from a street car which had stopped at a crossing and then started, he looked back over his shoulder in the direction from which the automobile which struck him came, and that he saw no automobile, but could have seen one had it been within a distance of 100 feet, and that he heard no signal given of the approach of the machine, while the defendant's evidence tended to show that when the car stopped at the crossing, he stopped his machine in order to allow passengers to reach the sidewalk in safety, and that after the car started he proceeded to travel after it and when he was nearly across the intersection of the streets, the plaintiff swung himself suddenly from the moving car and ran directly in front of the automobile. Brown v. Brashear, supra.

So, in Winner v. Linton, 120 Md. 276, 8 Atl. 674, the question of negligence and contributory negligence in an action to recover for an injury to a child caused by being run into by an automobile just after the child had alighted from a street car was held, upon the evidence, to be a question for the jury, it appearing, among other things, that although the driver of the car had not time to stop, he could have turned and avoided the accident.

And the question whether one struck by an automobile while standing at the usual place in the street where pedestrians board street cars was guilty of contributory negligence is for the jury, where he paid no attention to the automobile horn, and testified that he did not hear it, and was not keeping a lookout for vehicles approaching from the rear, but stated that he had been standing there but a few seconds, and that public highway, to be continuously looking or listening to ascertain if automobiles or other vehicles are approaching, under penalty that, upon his failure to do so, if he is injured, his own negligence must be conclusively presumed. Hennessey v. Taylor, 189 Mass. 583, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 345, 76 N. E. 224, 4 Ann. Cas. 396, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 285; Gerhard v. Ford Motor Co. 155 Mich. 618, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 232, 119 N. W. 904. Such negligence, to avail as a defense, must be proved by defendant, unless it sufficiently appears from plaintiff's testimony. Millsaps v. Brogdon, 97 Ark. 469, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1177, 134 S. W. 632.

This action was twice tried, with the same result except as to amount; the first finding being more favorable to the defendant. Complaint is now made, however, that the case as submitted on the second trial, perhaps on both, was on the theory that plaintiff's injury permanently disabled him, when in fact, as defendant contends, its effect was only temporary. But, on whatever theory submitted, no substantial reason appears from the record to justify interference with the result of the trial for the reasons assigned. The plaintiff, according to the contention urged in his behalf, and to some degree sustained by the proof, was violently knocked down and run over by the car; his body and limbs were bruised; thereafter he was unconscious for several hours; his head was injured, and his memory impaired. With this proof before the jury, we cannot say the amount one car which he desired to take had passed him, and he was intent on signaling another at the time of the injury. Ouellette v. Superior Motor Mach. Works, supra.

A pedestrian who intends taking a street car is not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, where, before leaving the sidewalk, he looked in the direction from which the automobile which struck him was coming, but failed to see it, and did not look again in that direction after leaving the sidewalk before he was struck by the machine, it appearing that he did not step immediately in front of the automobile, nor in crossing the street obstruct its path, and was as much in view of the driver of the machine as it was in his view, and there was room to pass him on either side. Lewis v. Seattle Taxicab Co. 72 Wash. 320, 130 Pac. 341.

And it cannot be said as a matter of law that a pedestrian who went into the street for the purpose of taking a car, and stood looking in the direction from which the car would approach, was guilty of contributory negligence in not discovering the approach from the opposite direction of an automobile which struck him, and which was being driven upon the wrong side of the street, contrary to the ordinance of the city and the established and recognized rule of the road. Posener v. Long, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 156 S. W. 591.

Whether, after looking once and seeing a clear street, a pedestrian acted as a reasonably prudent man in proceeding diagonally from a point within 12 feet of the intersection of the street upon which he is walking, with another street, toward a street car which he is intent upon boarding without again turning and looking backward, in the absence of any sound of horn or other warning, is a question for the jury. Hillebrant v. Manz, supra.

In an action to recover for injuries resulting from an automobile colliding with one who had just alighted from a street car at the intersection of streets, where it appeared that there were but 2 feet between the curb and the machine, and not more than 18 inches between it and the side of the street car, an instruction is properly refused that if the plaintiff, before starting to cross the street from the street car to the curb, did not look to see whether a vehicle was approaching, or if he did look and saw the automobile and nevertheless tried to cross in front of it, he was guilty of contributory negligence, is properly refused, since it ignores the situation of apparent peril which the plaintiff might have found himself in, under which a prudent man might have thought the safest thing to do was to attempt to reach the curb. Taxicab Co. v. Parks, 121 C. C. A. 267, 202 Fed. 909.

Where the plaintiff is without fault in attempting to cross the street, and he is placed in a perilous position by the defendant's operation of his automobile, he will not be held to the same degree of deliberation and coolness as if there were no negligence on the part of the operator of the machine. Dougherty v. Davis, 51 Pa. Super. Ct. 229.

And where a pedestrian passes safely in front of a street car, and is confronted by an automobile running at an unlawful rate of speed, and is in a situation of unusual peril, he is not chargeable with contributory negligence in attempting to pass in front of the automobile, if he has reasonable grounds for believing that this course would be the safest, and he is not chargeable with the consequences of error of judgment resulting from the excitement and confusion of the moment, since he is in such case required to exercise only ordinary care under the circumstances. Citizens' Motor Car Co. v. Hamilton, 32 Ohio C. C. 407, affirmed in 83 Ohio St. 450, 94 N. E. 1103.

The question whether a pedestrian who was struck by an automobile was guilty of contributory negligence should be left to the returned is unreasonable. On the contrary, it seems to us reasonable and just, even though the injury thus inflicted may not in fact result in permanent physical disability.

Nor do we find the instructions amenable to the criticism urged by counsel. At least, they do not so far incorrectly propound the law applicable to the facts appearing in the record as to warrant reversal. Of these, 2 and 3 are criticized because given on the theory of permanent injury to plaintiff. If so, there is in the record evidence tending to some extent to sustain that theory. Plaintiff's mother testified: That his memory is impaired, that he is now forgetful; that "he complained of his head, and did all last winter; he was kept out of school a great deal."

"He has a headache, and dizziness in his head." "He vomited blood nearly all night," the night of the accident, and "from 10 o'clock until 4 the next morning, and then it ran out of his mouth on the pillow." "I could not raise him up to give him anything to eat; if I raised him up he would start to vomit, and I had to keep him" in bed for a period of nine days after the accident. Instruction No. 6 fairly presents jury, where there is evidence that the deceased, in a moment of imminent peril, resulting from the driver negligently charging down upon her at great speed while she was crossing a street, stepped back to permit the machine to pass, and then stepped forward again immediately in front of it and that this was not in fact the best thing she could have done if there had been time for deliberation, but that it was nevertheless the result of her uncertainty of what was best to do to escape the imminent danger. Wescoat v. Decker, — N. J. —, 90 Atl. 290.

So, the question of the plaintiff's contributory negligence is for the jury in an action to recover for an injury to a pedestrian struck by an automobile while walking in the street, where it appears that the automobile gave no warning of its approach, and there is testimony that the machine came up behind the person injured so suddenly that he was startled and acted with some precipitation, pushing his wife as he supposed out of the way of the injury and attempting to save himself. Blackwell v. Renwick, 21 Cal. App. 131, 131 Pac. 94.

In Carpenter v. Campbell Automobile Co. — Iowa, —, 140 N. W. 225, where the plaintiff, while on the sidewalk, was struck by the defendant's automobile, which according to some evidence was suddenly turned to the wrong side of the street to avoid a motorcycle, and mounted the curb and traveled along the sidewalk without the brakes being applied, it was held proper to refuse to instruct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant for the reason that the evidence showed that the driving of the machine on the sidewalk was the result of fright and excitement, since it was for the jury to say from the evidence whether the injury could have been avoided notwithstanding such emergency by the exercise of reasonable care, and whether the emergency was due to the negligence of the defendant.

And an instruction was held not prejudicial which in effect stated that if the person operating the car has shown that such an emergency existed as to justify him to turn to the left, nevertheless he was required to have it under such control after so turning as to be able to avoid injury to others. Ibid.

properly refused that if the act complained of by the plaintiff was the result of excitement and confusion produced by sudden and impending peril from an approaching motorcycle, and but for such excitement the automobile would not have been driven on the sidewalk, a verdict for the defendant should be returned, since it ignored the thought that if the emergency was produced by his own negligence, it would not relieve him from liability. Ibid.

The question of negligence in an action to recover for the death of a person struck in the back by an automobile which skidded against the curbstone and caused the tires to burst and the machine to run upon the sidewalk is for the jury, where there was evidence that the street was wide, straight, level, and dry; that no other vehicles were in the highway, and that it was a clear morning; that the machine was going from 18 to 25 miles an hour, and that after going upon the sidewalk the car ran a distance of 30 or 40 feet with no diminution of speed before it struck the deceased. Roach v. Hinchcliff, 214 Mass. 267, 101 N. E. 383.

And in an action to recover for the death of a boy who was run into by an automobile while standing on a sidewalk, the question whether the driver of the machine was negligent is for the jury, where there is evidence that when turning to get out of a wet car track the defendant increased, instead of diminished, the speed of his car, which skidded and ran upon the sidewalk. Williams v. Holbrook, 216 Mass. 239, 103 N. E. 633.

Where the question of the defendant's negligence in an action to recover for an injury to a pedestrian by being run into by an automobile depends upon the view the jury take of his act in operating the car within, instead of outside, the groove of a wet car track, and then attempting to turn from the track by increasing, rather than lessening, his speed, and the evidence for the plaintiff shows that even with brakes set and the steering gear under full control the car would continue to move irregularly solely because of its position, the mere skidding is not an occurrence of such un-the law applicable to the facts appearing in the record.

Instructions Nos. 1 and 3, proposed by defendant, were properly refused; the first, because it was misleading, and would have told the jury that it could not find for the plaintiff, unless it believed from a preponderance of the evidence "that the defendant was negligent in the very manner set out in the declaration." No such rigid, inflexible rule obtains. It is sufficient if plaintiff substantially proves the negligence averred. The court, therefore, properly modified the instruction accordingly. No. 3 as proposed was properly refused, because not in accord with the principles herein announced. As modified and given, it presented defendant's contentions in a light more favorable than was allowable under our view of the law applicable to the facts of the case.

Defendant's objection to the competency of the plaintiff and the two boys present when the accident occurred to testify is not tenable. Their statements show sufficient capacity to understand and comprehend the nature of an oath.

Finding no reversible error, we affirm the judgment.

In Coughlin v. Weeks, 75 Wash. 568, 135 Pac. 649, in an action by a husband and wife to recover for injuries sustained by being run into by an automobile, it was held that the question of negligence and also of contributory negligence was for the jury, there being evidence for the plaintiffs that they looked in both directions before attempting to cross, and saw an automobile at some distance, and that, as the machine approached them while they were crossing the street, it turned on the wrong side and struck them, while there was evidence for the defendant from which it might be found that the pedestrians were guilty of contributory negligence.

In Curley v. Baldwin, — R. I. —, 90 Atl. 1, it was held that a verdict for the defendant was properly directed where his evidence showed that he was driving a reasonable distance behind an electric car at about 7 miles an hour, when the plaintiff, a boy eight years old, ran into the street from between two wagons standing by the curbing, and collided with the automobile, although the plaintiff testified that he looked in both directions before stepping into the street and saw only a street car approaching. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And a nonsuit is properly granted in an action by a child for an injury resulting from being struck by an automobile on a public street, where there is an entire absence of testimony that the defendant was traveling at an excessive speed, or that he did not have his machine under suitable control, or failed to exercise due care, or any testimony to indicate that the child left the sidewalk until just before he was hit, or that there was anything in the situation which called for special precaution on the defendant's part to avoid the accident which was not taken. Hyde v. Hubinger, — Conn. —, 87 Atl. 790.

And the driver of an automobile is not liable for an injury to a four-year-old child which broke away from the hand of its custodian and ran into the street and collided at a crossing with the automobile which was proceeding on an intersecting street, it appearing that the horn on the machine was sounded and the brake applied and the speed diminished, but owing to the sudden appearance of the child the driver had no time to stop the car. *Paul v. —duty where pedestrian walks along street or crosses between blocks.

The fact that there was a sidewalk along the street at the point where a pedestrian who was walking in the street was struck by an automobile, and that the walk was customarily used by pedestrians, would not alone warrant the deduction that, as a matter of law, the person struck was guilty of contributory negligence in using the street instead of such sidewalk. Blackwell v. Renwick, 21 Cal. App. 131, 131 Pac. 94.

In an action to recover for an injury to a pedestrian struck by an automobile while he was walking in the street, the questions whether a sidewalk existed at the place, or whether its condition, if one did exist, was such as to warrant pedestrians in the exercise of ordinary care in using the street instead of the walk, were held to be questions for the jury where the evidence as to these facts was conflicting. Ibid.

A pedestrian has a right to cross a street at a point not a cross walk, and in doing so is bound to use only reasonable care for his or her safety, and by reasonable care is meant such care as an ordinarily prudent person would exercise under the particular circumstances. Fox v. Great Atlantic & P. Tea Co. 84 N. J. L. 728, 87 Atl. 339.

In crossing the street in the middle of a block a pedestrian has an equal right in the street with an automobile, and is under no legal duty to anticipate any action on the part of the driver of an approaching machine that will imperil her safety, and she is under no duty to look behind her or to anticipate, without having received any warning, that the driver intended to pass her on the left side of street. Ibid.

In Willis v. Harby, 159 App. Div. 94, 144 N. Y. Supp. 154, in an action brought by one who was struck by an automobile while he was walking in the highway at a point between crossings, the testimony as to the rate of speed at which the automobile was traveling was conflicting, but it appeared that the operator of the machine did all possible upon discovering the plaintiff, to avoid striking him, and brought the machine to a standstill not more than 100 feet from the place of collision, and it was held that the evidence was insufficient to establish negligence on the part of the defendant.

A pedestrian is guilty of contributory negligence where he attempts to cross one of the principal thoroughfares of a village on a rainy night at a point between crossings, and upon being unable to reach the further side of the street because of water, proceeds to walk up the roadway with an umbrella over his head, apparently without taking any precaution for his safety. Ibid.

—duty toward person under disability.

The driver of an automobile is bound to anticipate that he may meet infirm persons on a public street, and to have his car under such control as will enable him to avoid injury, by slowing up or if necessary stopping. Dougherty v. Davis, 51 Pa. Super. Ct. 229.

He is bound to consider the lack of capacity of those in his way to care for their own safety, when such incapacity is known or should have been known to him, and the law exacts greater care toward those who are unable to care for themselves, as children, blind persons, and drunken persons, when such incapacity is known or should have been known to the driver. Brown v. Wilmington, — Del. —, 90 Atl. 44.

And there is a dictum in Tolmie v. Woodward Taxicab Co. — Mich. —, 144 N. W. 855, that the standard of duty of the drivers of automobiles in cases of children, aged persons, and those under other disabilities, when discovered, requires a higher degree of care according to the circumstances than is required as to other persons.

If a pedestrian who was struck by an automobile was proceeding in a way that would have indicated to a reasonably prudent man that he was unconscious of the approach of the defendant's automobile, and the driver saw him, or in the exercise of reasonable care ought to have seen him, and observed his state of mind and discovered his peril in time to avoid striking him, and failed in this duty, he was guilty of negligence which was the proximate cause of the injury; negligence of the pedestrian if any was only the remote cause. Chase v. Seattle Taxicab & Transfer Co. — Wash. —, 139 Pac. 499.

But if at the time a pedestrian was struck by an automobile he was intoxicated, and the driver of the machine did not know it, or by the exercise of reasonable care would not have known it, or did not know that he was so intoxicated as to be unable to take ordinary care of himself, and the accident occurred not by the machine striking him, but by his falling against it, the case is one of pure accident or contributory negligence, and no recovery can be had. Brown v. Wilmington, supra.

A finding that the driver of an automobile, after seeing a boy thirteen years old in the street, failed to exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring him, and that such failure was the proximate cause of the boy's injury by the machine, does not establish a case of gross negligence on the part of the driver of the machine. Quinn v. Ross Motor Car Co. — Wis. —, 147 N. W. 1000.

An instruction in an action brought to recover for an injury to a boy who was run into by an automobile in the street, which in directing what is to be considered in determining the question of what is due care on the part of a child, leaves out the element of experience and capacity to appreciate danger, is erroneous. Shaw v. Corrington, 171 Ill. App. 232.

Ordinary care in the case of a child is only such care as the great mass of children of like age, intelligence, and experience ordinarily exercise under the same or similar circumstances, and it is error to apply to a child who was run into by an automobile when proceeding diagonally across a street, after having alighted from a sleigh, the tests of ordinary care which are applied to adults. Quinn v. Ross Motor Car Co. supra.

In an action to recover for the death of a boy killed by an automobile while crossing a street, it is erroneous to charge that the burden is upon the plaintiff to show that the deceased was incapable of taking care of himself in the street, in order to warrant a finding that he was not guilty of contributory negligence, since the plaintiff is thereby required to establish that the deceased, without reference to his age, intelligence, or the circumstances in which he was placed, was actually incapable of taking care of himself in the street. Ackerman v. Stacey, 157 App. Div. 835, 143 N. Y. Supp. 227.

It is not contributory negligence as matter of law for a person to step off the curb and try to cross the street at a time when an automobile is approaching on such person's side of the street about 100 feet away. Schneider v. Locomobile Co. 83 Misc. 3, 144 N. Y. Supp. 311.

It is improper in an action by a pedestrian to recover for injuries sustained by being run into by an automobile, to limit the necessity for the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the driver of the machine to the precise time when the injury occurred. Goldblatt v. Brocklebank, 168 Ill. App. 315.

Where a pedestrian falls in front of an automobile from mere fright or excitement, and is injured by the fall, and is not struck or injured by the machine, no recovery can be had against the driver for such injury. Bachelder v. Morgan, — Ala. —, 60 So. 815.

In Schock v. Cooling, 175 Mich. 313, 141 N. W. 675, in an action by a pedestrian to recover for an injury received through a collision with an automobile, the question of the plaintiff's contributory negligence was held to be for the jury, although it was claimed that, as a physical fact, he could not have been hit by the rear wheel of the car as claimed, unless he stepped back or turned against the car after the front wheel had passed, there being other evidence from which it might be found that the quick turning of the car to make a curve in order to avoid the pedestrian might have made it possible for the car to have inflicted the injury shown.

In an action to recover for an injury to a pedestrian by an automobile, negligence is not presumed, but must be proved, and the burden of making such proof is upon the plaintiff. Grier v. Samuel, — Del. —, 86 Atl. 209; Tolmie v. Woodward Co. supra; Havermale v. Houck, — Md. —, 89 Atl. 314.

So, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff in an action to recover for the death of a pedestrian claimed to have been hit by an automobile, in the absence of direct evidence, to show the existence of such circumstances as would justify the inference that the injury which caused the death was due to the wrongful act of the defendant, and exclude the idea that it was due to a cause with which the defendant was unconnected, and where, from the facts and circumstances testified to, it is equally as consistent to find that death resulted from foul play as to find that it was the result of being struck by an automobile, a recovery is not justified. Hicks v. Romaine, — Va. —, 82 S. E. 71.

In an action to recover for the death of a pedestrian who was struck by an automobile, where the court charged that if the jury believed that the driver of the machine was negligent to some extent, and also believed the deceased was negligent to an equal or a greater extent, a recovery could not be had, the failure of the court to charge that if the deceased and the driver were equally negligent, no recovery could be had, is not a cause for a new trial. O'Dowd v. Newnham, 13 Ga. App. 220, 80 S. E. 36.

In an action to recover for an injury to a pedestrian who was run into by an automobile while crossing the street, it was held that slight negligence on the part of the plaintiff could not be said to contribute or enter as one of the concurrent proximate causes of injury resulting from palpable and continuous negligence on the part of the defendant, since to hold slight negligence as contributory would be to impose the rule of extraordinary care. Mosso v. E. H. Stanton Co. 75 Wash. 220, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 134 Pac. 941.

The rule of last clear chance is grounded in the doctrine of proximate cause, and like any other phase of proximate cause may be submitted to the jury, and it is not error to submit this question to the jury in an action to recover for an injury sustained by a pedestrian who was struck by an automobile, where the defendant's answer alleged that the injury was due to the plaintiff's own negligence, which was denied by the reply, and it was alleged in the complaint that the defendant was operating his machine recklessly and without regard to the safety of pedestrians on the highway. Ibid. J. WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

OSWALD MEHLOS, Appt.,

v.

CITY OF MILWAUKEE et al., Respts.

(156 Wis. 591, 146 N. W. 882.)

Constitutional law — licensing dance halls — validity.

1. Requiring a license to conduct a public dance hall does not interfere with any constitutional right of liberty or property.

Municipal corporation — power to license dance hall.

2. Power to require a license to conduct a public dance hall is conferred upon a municipal corporation by charter authority to pass ordinances for government and good order of the city and the suppression of vice and prevention of crime.

Note. — Requiring license for dance hall or place where dancing is taught.

This note is supplementary to an earlier note to People ex rel. Duryea v. Wilber, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 357, on this subject.

It has been held, that an act giving cities the power to license and regulate shows, circuses, and athletic exhibitions, does not authorize an ordinance forbidding any person or persons to hold in any place where liquors are sold any ball or dance, either with or without music, without first Same — ordinance — regulation of dance hall — reasonableness.

3. Conditioning the granting of a license for a public dance hall upon satisfactory proof of the place being fit for such gatherings as regards health, convenience, and safety, and making it subject to cancellation for violation on the premises of good order or good morals, and to the duty of keeping it in fit condition, of closing not later than 3 o'clock A. M., and not allowing anyone under eighteen years of age to attend and participate in the dancing after 10 o'clock P. M. unless accompanied by a parent or guardian, is not unreasonable.

Constitutional law — equal protection — licensing public dance halls.

4. An ordinance requiring a license to conduct a public dance hall while permitting other dances to be conducted without license does not deprive its owner of the equal protection of the law.

Municipal corporation — ordinance — validity — conferring power on mayor.

5. Arbitrary power sufficient to render the ordinance invalid is not conferred upon the mayor with respect to the granting or refusing of a license for a public dance hall, where the ordinance fixes the standard of fitness for the place where it is to be conducted, and requires the mayor to act upon the report of four city officials as to whether or not the standard has been met.

Same — permitting police to stop dance.

6. An ordinance for the regulation of public dance halls is not invalid because it confers power upon a police officer to stop a dance if any provision of the ordinance is violated, an indecent act is committed, or any disorder of a gross, violent, or vulgar character exists.

(April 9, 1914.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County dissolving a temporary injunction restraining the enforcement of an ordinance for the regulation of public dance halls. Affirmed.

The ordinance sought to be restrained is as follows:

"Section 1. The term, 'public dance' or 'public hall,' as used in this ordinance, shall be taken to mean any dance or hall to which admission can be had by payment of a fee or by the purchase, possession, or presentation of a ticket or token in which a charge is made for caring for clothing or other property, or any other dance to which the public generally may gain admission with or without payment of a fee. The term, 'public dance hall,' as used herein, shall be taken to mean any room, place, or space in which a public dance or public ball may be held, or hall or academy in which classes in dancing are held and instruction in dancing given for hire.

"Sec. 2. It shall be unlawful to hold any public dance or public ball, or to hold classes in dancing, within the limits of the city of Milwaukee, until the dance hall in which the same may be held shall first have been duly licensed for such purpose. The application for such license shall be granted in the same manner as providing for the issuing of licenses under chapter 27 of the General Ordinances of the city of Milwaukee.

"Each license granted hereunder shall expire on the 1st day of July of each year, and the license shall be posted in a conspicuous place within the hall in which the dance is held.

"The annual license fee shall be five (5) dollars. This ordinance shall be printed in full upon each license issued, and each license shall, by its terms, be made subject to revocation, as hereinafter provided.

"Sec. 3. No license for a public dance hall shall be issued until it shall be found that such hall complies with and conforms to all ordinances, health and fire regulations of the city; that it is properly ventilated and supplied with efficient toilet conveniences, and is a safe and proper place for the purpose for which it is to be used.

"Sec. 4. The license of any public dance hall shall be forfeited or revoked by the mayor for disorderly or immoral conduct on the premises, or for the violation of any of obtaining a license for that purpose from the board of aldermen. Loertscher v. Jersey City, 84 N. J. L. 537, 87 Atl. 68. The court in this case, while holding the ordinance not within the power of the city as laid down in the statute, freely admitted the advisability of licensing and regulating places where liquors are sold, and of supervising dances held therein.

In People ex rel. Ritter v. Wallace, 160 App. Div. 787, 145 N. Y. Supp. 1041, under the law drawn to meet the constitutional objections sustained to the law under consideration in the Wilber Case, supra, it was held that the licensing authority may revoke or forfeit a license on the ground of noncompliance with that law, even though 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

no conviction has been had for such noncompliance.

An ordinance declaring that any person who shall publicly perform or cause to be performed, in any place whatever, for any price, gain, or reward, any dancing or feats of uncommon dexterity and agility of the body, and any person having possession or care of any building who shall permit any performance of any kind in such building, without first having obtained a license for that purpose, shall be liable to a fine for every offense, was held in Elizabeth v. Lytton, 83 N. J. L. 371, 85 Atl. 341, to apply to an individual performer (a dancer in that case) who may be hired to help make up an exhibition.

W. W. A.

the rules, regulations, ordinances, and laws governing or applying to public dance halls or public dances. If at any time the license of a public dance hall shall be forfeited or revoked, at least six months shall elapse before another license or permit shall be given for dancing on the same premises.

"Sec. 5. Every licensed owner of a dance hall shall, immediately upon application being received by him from any person, club, or society to lease or rent his hall for the purpose of holding a public dance or ball therein, report to the mayor of the city of Milwaukee the name and address of such person, club, or society, and the date when such public dance or ball is proposed to be held. The mayor shall at once make, or cause to be made, an investigation for the purpose of determining whether such dance or ball shall be held. If the mayor shall determine that the proposed dance or ball ought not to be held, he shall, within five (5) days after receipt of the aforesaid notice of application for lease or rental, notify the licensed owner of such dance hall, in writing, that the proposed public dance or ball shall not be held therein, and the licensed owner of such dance hall shall thereupon refuse to permit such public dance or ball to be held in such hall. Failure on the part of the licensed owner of such hall to comply with the provisions of this section shall be sufficient cause for the revocation of the license of such licensed owner.

"Sec. 6. All public dance halls shall be kept at all times in a clean, healthful, and sanitary condition, and all stairways and outer passages, and all rooms connected with a dance hall, shall be kept open and well lighted. The chief of police, a captain, a lieutenant, or a sergeant of police, shall have the power, and it shall be their duty, to cause the place, hall, or room where any dance or ball is held or given to be vacated whenever any provision of any ordinance with regard to public dances and public balls is being violated, or whenever any indecent act shall be committed, or when any disorder of a gross, violent, or vulgar character shall take place.

"Sec. 7. It shall be unlawful after 10 o'clock P. M. to permit any person to attend or take part in any public dance who has not reached the age of eighteen (18) years, unless such person be in company with a parent or natural guardian. It shall be unlawful for any person to represent himself or herself to have reached the age of eighteen years in order to obtain admission to a public dance hall, or to be permitted to remain therein when such person in fact is under eighteen years of age, and it shall also be unlawful for any person to represent himself or herself to be a parent or natural guardian of any person, in order that such person may obtain admission to a public dance hall, or shall be permitted to remain therein when the party making the representation is not in fact either a parent or natural guardian of the other person.

"Sec. 8. The mayor shall refer all applications for dance-hall licenses to the chief of police, who shall investigate, or cause to be investigated, each application to determine whether the dance hall sought to be licensed complies with the regulations, ordinances, and laws applicable thereto, and in the making of such investigation the chief of police shall, when desired, have the assistance of the building inspector, the commissioner of health, and the chief of the fire department. The chief of police shall furnish to the mayor in writing the information derived from such investigation, accompanied by a recommendation as to whether a license should be granted or refused. No license shall be renewed except after inspection of the premises as provided herein.

"Sec. 9. All public dances shall be discontinued and all public dance halls shall be closed on or before the hour of 3 o'clock A. M.

"Sec. 10. Any person, persons, society, club, or corporation who shall violate the provisions of this ordinance shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than twenty-five ($25) dollars, and the cost of prosecution, and not more than one hundred ($100) dollars and the cost of prosecution for each and every offense, and on default of payment thereof shall be imprisoned in the House of Correction, Milwaukee county for a period of not exceeding ninety (90) days."

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These are the basic propositions to be considered: Is the maintenance of public dance halls a proper subject for police regulation? Does the city of Milwaukee possess authority in respect to such matter? Are the means adopted legitimate?

The general nature of the police power has been too often defined to leave room for anything further to be said of a strictly original nature. This court dealt, generally, with the matter in the following and other cases: State ex rel. Adams v. Burdge, 95 Wis. 390, 37 L.R.A. 157, 60 Am. St. Rep. 123, 70 N. W. 347; State ex rel. Winkler v. Benzenberg, 101 Wis. 172, 175, 76 N. W. 345; State ex rel. Milwaukee Medical College v. Chittenden, 127 Wis. 463, 519, 107 N. W. 500; State v. Redmon, 134 Wis. 59, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 229, 126 Am. St. Rep.

1003, 114 N. W. 137, 15 Ann. Cas. 408; Bonnett v. Vallier, 136 Wis. 193, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 486, 128 Am. St. Rep. 1061, 116 N. W. 885.

Notwithstanding mere reiteration is unnecessary and attempts to improve on what has gone before seem futile, we do well to follow that wise constitutional admonition:

"The blessings of a free government can only be maintained by a firm adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, frugality, and virtue, and by frequent recurrence to fundamental principles." Const. art. I, § 22.

That is more than a mere admonition voicing in another way the thought often expressed as "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." It is a declaration giving emphasis to the declared purpose of the fundamental law as involving restraint of anything in legislation invading inherent rights,—that freedom for which we are "thankful to Almighty God" and for the conservation of which and security of "the blessings" for which "governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." It points to the very vitals of the fundamental law, and pictographs its spirit, making it visible to, and its beneficence appreciable by, the commonest understandings.

It were better, perhaps, to speak of exercisable police power in the collective sense,—as that broad conception involved in the expression: It is the sovereign authority exercisable directly, where not expressly or inferentially prohibited, and otherwise, where not so prohibited, to pass laws regulating, reasonably, all those things which appertain to the public welfare.

Things may be within the police power, in the general sense, and not in the legal sense, because expressly prohibited. Many things fall within such general sense which do not within the legal sense, because impliedly prohibited. The heresy which once had some believers, that it is a power above fundamental restraints, has been so completely exposed as to only now exist as a matter of history, which more excites our curiosity as to its origin and how the idea could have originated, in the light of any worth-while appreciation of our constitutional liberty, than challenges attention to any reason for a legitimate basis thereof. True, it is a great power. Without it the purpose of civil government could not be attained. It has more to do with the well-being of society than any other power. Properly exercised, it is a crowning beneficence. Improperly exercised it would make of sovereign will a destructive despot, superseding and rendering innocuous some of the most cherished principles of constitutional freedom. So it is said in State v. Redmon, 134 Wis. 89, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 229, 126 Am. St. Rep. 1003, 114 N. W. 137, 15 Ann. Cas. 408: "It may be extended disastrously, or restrained and administered beneficially, according as the judiciary shall perform its constitutional functions. Confined within its legitimate field of reasonable regulation it is essential . . . to the full accomplishment of the purposes of civil government."

Too much significance cannot be given to the word "reasonable" in considering the scope of the police power in a constitutional sense. It took much time, notwithstanding clear declarations, over and over again, on the subject here and by the Federal Supreme and other courts (Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 137, 38 L. ed. 385, 388, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499; Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 41 L. ed. 256, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1138; Rideout v. Knox, 148 Mass. 368, 2 L.R.A. 81, 12 Am. St. Rep. 560, 19 N. E. 390, and Ely v. Niagara County, 36 N. Y. 297), for courts and text writers, in general, to appreciate that the final evidentiary test of the legitimacy of a police regulation is whether it is reasonable under all the circumstances. No court has been more emphatic on the subject than this. State v. Redmon, supra; State ex rel. Milwaukee v. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. 144 Wis. 386, 397, 140 Am. St. Rep. 1025, 129 N. W. 623; State ex rel. Adams v. Burdge, 95 Wis. 390, 37 L.R.A. 157, 60 Am. St. Rep. 123, 70 N. W. 347; Bonnett v. Vallier, 136 Wis. 193, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 486, 128 Am. St. Rep. 1061, 116 N. W. 885. In the latter case the court deduced the following from the many authorities in this and other courts:

"A police regulation must not extend beyond that reasonable interference which tends to preserve and promote enjoyment, generally, of those 'unalienable rights' with which 'all men are endowed' and to secure which 'governments are instituted among men.' . . . When it goes beyond the scope indicated and enters unto the dominion of the destructive, it is illegitimate and offends against some constitutional restraints, express or implied."

There must be reasonable ground for the police interference, and also the means adopted must be reasonable for the accomplishment of the purpose in view. So, in all cases where the interference affects property and goes beyond what is a reasonable interference with private rights, it offends against the general equality clauses of the Constitution, it offends against the spirit of the whole instrument, it offends against the provision against taking property without due process of law and against taking property for public use without first rendering just compensation therefor. So, every police regulation must answer for its legitimacy at the bar of reasonableness.

Some confusion at one time existed on the subject discussed here, because of expressions of judges as to a law or ordinance being void for unreasonableness. No provision could be pointed to, in state or national Constitution, limiting legislative authority on that ground.

As a rule, fundamental limitations of regulations under the police power are found in the spirit of the Constitution, not in its letter; but they are just as efficient as if expressed in the clearest language. As said before, the existence of the power itself is presumed from very necessity therefor, to the end that the functions of government by, of, and for the people may be efficiently exercised, but in the very reason for its existence is seen the respect due to its limitations. The same circumstances which imply the one imply the other. There we see the dignity of the term "reasonable," which has sometimes been omitted in describing the police power under our constitutional system.

The confusion was created by failure to appreciate that, by the use of such term, the characteristic of means was referred to, instead of the effect, while the latter is the real mischief which infracts the constitutional restraints.

That is to say, the legislative effort at regulation, within the police power, is not subject to condemnation, strictly speaking, because unreasonable, but because it impairs or destroys some inherent right, instead of conserving it. In respect to inherent rights, all which conserves is reasonable; that which impairs or destroys is unreasonable. So, when it is said that an act of the legislature is unconstitutional because unreasonable, the idea involved is that the interference with some inherent right is so great as to destructively affect it and so violates its guaranteed inviolability. Thus the conception that regulation, within the constitutional scope of the police power, makes efficient, constitutional guaranties, instead of impairing or destroying them, while outside such scope the contrary is true. State ex rel. Runge v. Anderson, 100 Wis. 523, 533, 534, 42 L.R.A. 239, 76 N. W. 482.

Now, given a proper subject for police regulation,—it being understood that whether a given matter is such is wholly a judicial question, there is yet the field of appropriateness of means. Naturally, as the power is inherent in our system, of necessity, there must be some reasonable basis for legislative activity in respect to the matter dealt with, else the subject is outside the scope of legislative interference. However, given a subject in respect to which there is some reasonable necessity for regulation, fair doubt in respect thereto being resolved in favor of the affirmative, in case of the legislature having so determined, the degree of exigency is a matter wholly for its cognizance.

What is said as regards legitimacy of subjects for exercise of the police power may be repeated as to appropriateness of means: while given the two elements,—legitimacy of subject and appropriateness of means,—the degree of interference within the boundaries of reason is for the legislature to decide, there being left in the end the judicial power to determine whether the interference goes so far as to violate some guaranteed right,—regulate it so severely as to materially impair it, reasonable doubts being resolved in favor of legislative discretion.

With the elementary principles stated, in evidence, we may quickly reach the vital question upon this appeal. Public meetings and meeting places which are liable to be characterized by disorderly conditions, or lead to breaches of the peace, or promote immorality, have, universally, been considered proper subjects for police regulation. Public dances and dance halls fall within the latter class. While, if conducted in a proper manner such a hall and its use may afford opportunity for innocent amusement, in the absence of any regulation, it tends to breed disorder, indolence, intemperance, immorality, and to otherwise lower the standard of people in the social state. Such places, conducted for gain, open, in general, to all who come in suitable order to be received, no other condition being exacted except the prescribed entertainment fee, are so liable to be centers of disturbance and character lowering or destruction, that they have been subjected to pretty severe regulation by statute and city ordinances, to preserve the possible benefits of such amusement places, and prevent the possible or probable abuses. They have been so regulated in Massachusetts by statute for many years. A violation of the law there is punishable much more severely than by the ordinance in question. Power is vested in administrative officers to determine the terms of the license and the terms and manner of its revocation. Neither legislative power is contemplated in the issuance of the license nor judicial power in the revocation,—only the discretion of the administrative officer, subject, of course, to answer in judicial remedies for any clearly unreasonable or arbitrary action.

Does the city of Milwaukee possess authority to legislate respecting the particular subject? It is conceded that, unless it was given such authority in its charter, it does not possess it.

True, as claimed, the power in question is only conferrable by language showing such purpose with reasonable clearness. The general principle in that regard, stated in Chain Belt Co. v. Milwaukee, 151 Wis. 188, 192, 193, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 899, 138 N. W. 621, is here reaffirmed. But that does not mean that such a power can be given only expressly and unmistakably. If general terms, in the general welfare clause, show a reasonably clear purpose to clothe the municipality with such power,—reasonable clearness being satisfied by a grant in clear terms covering a broad subject,—then the detailed subjects, within the entirety, are proper matters to be dealt with.

As said in State ex rel. Elliott v. Kelly, 154 Wis. 482, 143 N. W. 153, the general welfare feature of the city charter of the city of Milwaukee is very broad. It evinces a legislative purpose to accord the municipality the usual powers granted to cities of the kind. There is no rule requiring such a grant to be strictly construed so as to minimize its effect, rather the rule is that it should be construed, if construction be permissible and is needed, liberally to carry out the legislative purpose. Such purpose being plain, reasonable doubts as to the meaning of language used to effect it should be resolved in favor of the end the legislature clearly had in view.

Section 3, chap. 4, Charter of Milwaukee, page 54 (Compiled 1905), shows a grant of discretionary power to the common council to pass ordinances "for the government and good order of the city . . . for the suppression of vice, for the prevention of crime . . . as they shall deem expedient, and to declare and impose penalties and to enforce the same. . . ." The term, for the "government and good order" of the city, by itself, is amply broad enough to cover the regulation of public places of amusement such as dance halls. It is very comprehensive as used in city charters. It covers the entire scope of reasonable police regulations to conserve the peace, the health, the safety, and the morals of the community, as will be seen by reference to 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, 4th ed. §§ 392-408, and notes. This court has so viewed its scope. Ellinwood v. Reedsburg, 91 Wis. 131, 64 N. W. 885.

Thus far we have found that the particular subject is a legitimate field for regulation under the police power, and that 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

authority in that regard was plainly conferred upon the city of Milwaukee. We have now to see whether the means and extent of interference go beyond reasonable boundaries of conservation of the right to use property and to indulge in the amusements incident to public dances.

The plan of regulation is the usual one and the one contemplated by the charter. Its general feature is the creation of a disability to use a hall for public dances except upon condition of a permit being first obtained therefor, based on a satisfactory proof of the place being fit for such gatherings as regards health, convenience, and safety; such permit to be subject to cancellation in case of violation on the premises of good order or good morals, or of any municipal regulation of such places, and subject to a duty to obtain public approval in advance of such intended use, to keep the hall and its accessories in a fit condition for such gatherings, and not to permit the use of the hall on any day later than 3 o'clock A. M. nor after 10 o'clock P. M., to allow anyone to attend and participate in dancing who shall not have reached the age of eighteen years, unless accompanied by a parent or natural guardian, and to prevent, during any use of the premises for a public dance, any gross behavior of a disorderly, violent, or vulgar character. Those detail features are common in such ordinances, and have never been held to be, and, from an original standpoint, certainly are not, unreasonable. They seem mild rather than harsh. The penalties for violation, as regards the proprietor at least, are not immoderate.

So it seems that if there is anything unreasonable in the ordinance it must be in matter of details of a strictly administrative character.

We may well observe, in passing, that the suggestion is made that the ordinance violates some of the equality guaranties of the Federal Constitution. There is no Federal guaranty which exempts citizens of the United States from reasonable police regulations as regards person and property (State ex rel. Kellogg v. Currens, 111 Wis. 431, 56 L.R.A. 252, 87 N. W. 561), or which prevents legitimate classification for the purpose of police regulation. In case of such classification and the regulation effecting all members of the class alike, there is no violation of any equality clause of national or state Constitution. These principles are so well understood that it would be a waste of energy to discuss them. As the classification in this case—halls used for public dances—obviously satisfies all essentials on the subject of legitimacy, and, just as obviously, the restraints of the ordinance bear equally upon all members of the class, we need not spend much time with this branch of the case, which is argued at some length in the brief of counsel for appellant.

The fact that many of the things which the ordinance was designed to guard against may occur as well at a dance where patrons attend by invitation, and that dances may be held at places and under conditions quite similar to those of such public dances as are within the ordinance, is not fatal to the classification. It is generally the case that a classification cannot be made so as to make a definite line within which may be seen all the dangers to be guarded against and without which there are no such dangers. The best that can be done is to keep within the clearly reasonable and practicable. That is accomplished where there are such general characteristics of the members of the class as to reasonably call for special legislative treatment. That may be true, generally, and yet, some of such characteristics sometimes be found to exist outside of the boundaries of the class. Exactness in division is impossible and never looked for in applying the legal test. All that is required is that there must be, in general, some reasonable basis on general lines for the division, all reasonable doubts to be resolved in favor thereof. There ends the judicial and commences the legislative function, each being dominant in its particular field. State ex rel. Kellogg v. Currens, supra; State ex rel. Risch v. Policemen's Pension Fund, 121 Wis. 44, 98 N. W. 954; State v. Whitcom, 122 Wis. 110, 99 N. W. 468; Bingham v. Milwaukee County, 127 Wis. 344, 106 N. W. 1071; State v. Evans, 130 Wis. 385, 110 N. W. 241.

We are unable to perceive why the principle declared and applied in those cases does not answer counsel's contention at this point. The authorities cited to support the theory of illegitimate classification do not seem to fit the situation in hand. So far as we are advised, public dance halls have commonly been put in a class for the purpose of regulation, and it has never been condemned.

On the subject of whether the administrative features of the ordinance are unduly severe, the main objection raised is in that the power is lodged in the mayor to refuse to issue a license and without assigning any reason therefor; and without there being any standard fixed for him to go by nor any method for a review. The idea seems to be that this makes the owner of a hall which he desires to devote, in whole or in part, to use for public dances, subject to the arbitrary will of the mayor.

Counsel misconceive the nature of the ordinance and the nature of the mayor's administrative duties. The ordinance, very distinctly, fixes a standard of fitness, so far as practicable, without danger of undue harshness. From the very nature of the case, minor details had to be made matter of administration by appropriate officials. The place is required to conform to all ordinances, health and fire regulations, to be properly ventilated and supplied with sufficient toilet conveniences, and to be a safe and proper place for the purposes for which it is used. Why does that not set up a quite definite reasonable standard? Before granting a license the mayor is required to refer the application therefore to the chief of police for an investigation, and report as to whether the place satisfies all the calls of the ordinance. The investigator is required to call to his assistance three officials of the city, viz., the building inspector, commissioner of health, and the chief of the fire department. After investigation with the help of such three expert assistants, the investigator is required to make a report in writing to the mayor, accompanied by his opinion as to whether the application should be granted or refused. That report the mayor is required to consider and pass judgment upon in coming to a conclusion.

In view of the foregoing, what foundation is there for the claim that the ordinance clothes the mayor with arbitrary power in the matter of passing upon an application for a license, affording him opportunity, irremediably, to act upon his personal prejudice or mere caprice or some unworthy motive? It provides for a most careful, impartial, intelligent investigation by four city officials of high station, and contemplates that the mayor will honestly apply his judgment to the result. If he should refuse a license without doing so in the particular manner suggested, or refuse, under such circumstances as to clearly indicate the existence of some improper motive therefor, judicial remedies would be found ample to redress the wrong.

Power of a municipality to confer administrative authority on the mayor, as in the ordinance in question, was upheld in Milwaukee v. Ruplinger, 155 Wis. 391, 145 N. W. 42. What was there said need not be repeated. We are unable to discover anything in the Eubank Case, 226 U. S. 137, 57 L. ed. 156, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1123, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 76, upon which appellant's counsel rely, out of harmony with this.

When it comes to the method ordained for revoking a license, though the power is lodged in the mayor, the grounds of revocation are clearly specified, and, just as clearly, by implication, it is provided that the mayor shall proceed in the performance of his duties as a quasi judicial tribunal.

There are several other details of the scheme of regulation, particularly, in respect to administrative features, which are urged should be looked upon as fatal, but we do not recognize any not the same or similar to those common to such police regulation and, generally, approved without even criticism. The authority of a police officer to put an end to a public dance upon the event of any provision of the ordinance being violated, or any indecent act being committed, or any disorder of a gross, violent, or vulgar character, is, we apprehend, common.

Complaint is made of conferring discretionary power upon the officials to act without any opportunity for any sort of a hearing. There is nothing novel about that, nor undue restraint upon liberty or property involved in it. It is a reasonably necessary provision for the preservation of good order. It would be utterly useless to attempt to suppress such acts as that feature of the ordinance is designed to reach, if before action some sort of a judicial hearing were required. It must be remembered that the police power, as before indicated, is grounded on necessity. The basic reason for it renders details of dealing with a particular subject legitimate which are reasonable under all the circumstances, and are not expressly prohibited.

It is a mistake to suppose that a government by law contemplates law to protect one in liberty to do whatever he sees fit and do it as he sees fit. When we say, ours is a government by law, and not by men, we mean that ours is a government based on rights with laws to preserve and conserve those rights, and men to administer those laws. There must be the human element or there could be no administration. Without administration, law would have no vitality. Without law to preserve and conserve rights, vitalize by proper administration, there would be no rights, and the very purpose for which governments are founded would fail of effectuation.

Other features of the ordinance to which our attention is called are as wanting in merit as those which have been discussed. They will be passed with the assurance that they have been considered with full appreciation of the nature of police regulations and their limitations; that the very existence of the power lies in the necessity for personal and property rights to be fenced about, to some extent, in order to be possessed beneficially,—really promote life and happiness,—and that freedom, under our constitutional system, means liberty to enjoy that which is inherent under such restraints as to repress that which is detrimental to a worth-while social state in order to conserve that which promotes and is necessary to it. Thus small limitations upon liberty of individual action are required,—are absolutely essential in order that rights, in the aggregate, may be possessed efficiently. The constitutional guaranty of their possession constitutionally commands such exercise of the police power as is essential to preservation and conservation thereof. The degree of such exercise rests in legislative wisdom up to the point where it would be obviously operated to destroy instead of conserve. There comes in the constitutional bar. There is the respect which all men owe to it and for which all ought to bow to it. The lesson which needs most to be learned is that liberty, under a popular government, contemplates many restraints, that such restraints are necessary to civil society, and that all must yield to them and appreciate that, within the limitations mentioned, in legislative wisdom rests the particular degree of restraint.

No more need be said in this case. It is presented with confidence and good faith, yet has no special merit. We have not found it necessary or advisable to discuss the many authorities cited to our attention. It is easy to accumulate eloquent passages from legal opinions as regards sacredness of individual liberty. That could not well be too much exalted. Yet sometimes in picturing its significance respecting some particular condition, language is used which, if not restrained to such or similar conditions, would give rise to a very mischievous idea of what liberty, in a worth-while social state, means. When understood, the citations will not support anything out of harmony with what is said in this opinion. If it were otherwise, it would not change the result, because that rests on principles which cannot be changed by any concrete situation to which they may have been applied or any mode of expression in applying them.

The order is affirmed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

CHARLES MATTHIAS, Appt.,

v.

MINNEAPOLIS, ST. PAUL, & SAULT
STE. MARIE RAILWAY COMPANY,
Respt.

(125 Minn. 224, 146 N. W. 353.)

Nuisance — operation of railroad.

1. The smoke, noise, and disturbance

Headnotes by HOLT, J.

which ordinarily attend the proper operation of a railroad at and between stations should not be held a private nuisance to adjacent property affected thereby.

Same — railroad yards.

2. But as to such incidental railway facilities as shops, roundhouses, and switch yards, of the character here involved, the location and operation of which is not determined by public convenience or necessity, the railroad is liable, if thereby a nuisance is imposed upon an adjacent landowner, even though the location of the facility be proper and the operation thereof duly careful.

Same — damage to property.

3. If the ordinary careful location and operation of such railroad facility as the one here in question creates a private nuisance upon adjacent property, such property is thereby damaged within the purview of the Constitution entitling the owner to compensation.

Trial — question for jury.

4. Under the evidence, the question whether the operation of defendant's switch yard imposed a private nuisance upon plaintiff was for the jury.

(March 20, 1914.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Hennepin County dismissing his action brought to recover damages for the diminution in the value of his premises by the operation of defendant's switch yard and for permanent injury to his real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James A. Peterson and Adolphe C. Peterson, for appellant:

The conditions as they are alleged and shown by plaintiff within the city of Minneapolis constitute a nuisance per se.

There is no real reason why that which this court has held to be a nuisance per se, and which admittedly substantially interferes with plaintiff's "reasonable and comfortable enjoyment and use" of his property, should not be held to be, merely because a railroad company may be responsible, such a damage as entitles the property owner to compensation under the amended Constitution.

Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

For more than twenty-five years defendant has owned a 66-foot right of way near what is now the northerly limits of the city of Minneapolis. Upon this right of way is located its main line of railway running west. It crosses Queen Avenue North, a street running north and south, at Forty-seventh Avenue North. Proceeding westerly it angles north about 15 degrees. Prior to 1909 the land north of the railroad between Humboldt and Thomas avenues, the former being nine blocks east and the latter three blocks west of Queen avenue, had been platted. South of the right of way the land is also to a large extent platted into city lots. Very few lots were ever built upon. Indeed, the general appearance along the right of way, in the neighborhood described, is that of a farming or truck gardening district. In 1909 plaintiff bought three lots fronting west on Queen avenue; the northerly boundary of these lots is the southerly boundary of defendant's right of way. Soon after the purchase, he built a small house thereon, which has since been his home. A barn has been erected and some other improvements have been made on the lots. It appears that recently defendant acquired by purchase a strip of land several hundred feet in width immediately north of its right of way, and extending from Humboldt avenue westerly over a mile. Thereafter, in March, 1912, it secured from the city council of Minneapolis the vacation of all streets in the platted portions of this strip. The object of defendant was to locate a switch yard for handling, principally, grain shipments from the West. The yard was constructed in the summer of 1912, and consists of six or seven tracks north of and parallel with the original main track and as close thereto and to each other as they well may be for safe operation. These tracks constitute the receiving yard. Some 200 feet north of these and parallel are some seven or eight tracks, termed the "classification yard." 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

All these tracks have suitable switches, leads, and passing tracks connecting with each other and the main track. The lead track approaching the classification yard from the west is up grade until it reaches the hump, a point about 600 feet northerly from plaintiff's dwelling. From thence east it is down grade, so that cars shunted over the hump will of their own motion run down into the classification yard. As freight trains come in from the West, the cars are placed in the receiving yard; and then in the evening a switch engine with crew comes and pulls a string of cars west of the switch for the lead to the classification yard, backs them up the lead to the hump, uncouples, and kicks or shunts them in on the proper track, to be thereafter taken to the different elevators or places of destination. This work generally lasts until morning. Thus moving cars during the stillness of the hours of night creates a great deal of unusual noise and disturbance. The cars shunted down grade slam into cars previously set out upon the tracks, slack runs in and out with a loud clatter as trains are started and stopped, and the exhaust of the locomotive becomes at times very penetrating. It is plain that the noise is a serious disturbance of the rest and comfort of plaintiff, who lives so close to the tracks. Plaintiff sues to recover damages for depreciation of the rental value of his property by the operation of this yard up to the commencement of the action, and for permanent injury, on the ground that the yard is a private nuisance to him. He does not contend that the impairment of the use, enjoyment, and value of his property might be avoided or lessened by the exercise of proper care in operating the switch yard. In addition to the disturbing noises incident to the operation of the yard, plaintiff claims that more soot, smoke, and cinders are cast upon his premises than was the case before the yard was established. When plaintiff rested, the action was dismissed on defendant's motion. Plaintiff excepted to the ruling and appeals from the judgment.

Before the adoption of the constitutional amendment providing that compensation must be paid for damaging or destroying private property for public use, as well as for taking the same, it was established by three decisions of this court that no action lies against a railroad company for damages unavoidably resulting to near-by property from the noises, smoke, or jarring incident to a proper operation of its railroad upon lands in which the person inconvenienced has no interest. Rochette v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 32 Minn. 201, 20 N. W. 140; Adams v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. 39 Minn. 286, 1 L.R.A. 493, 12 Am. St.

Rep. 644, 39 N. W. 629; Carroll v. Wisconsin C. R. Co. 40 Minn. 168, 41 N. W. 661. In the last-mentioned case Chief Justice Gilfillan states: "Railroads are a public necessity. They are always constructed and operated under authority of law. They bring to the public great benefits; to some persons more, to other persons less. The operating them in the most skilful and careful manner causes to the public necessary incidental inconveniences, such as noise, smoke, cinders, vibrations of the ground, interference with travel at the crossings of roads and streets, and the like. One person may suffer more from these than another. . . . But the difference is only in degree, not in kind. Such inconveniences are common to the public at large. If each person had a right of action because of such inconveniences, it would go far to render the operating of railroads practically impossible." With the exception of the courts of Nebraska, we believe the above rule has been applied in the face of constitutional provisions similar to the one we now have, so far as the operation of a railroad at and between stations is concerned. Reasons, more or less cogent, may be suggested for the rule. Public necessity seems to require a network of railroads penetrating everywhere, and, if every disturbance and inconvenience arising from the lawful and careful operation would give rise to a cause of action, it would disastrously affect the cost and efficiency of transportation. Furthermore, along the route of the railroad the annoyance to near-by property owners from noise, smoke, and cinders, even on lines of extensive traffic, is intermittent and of short duration. A moment or two and the disturbance is over; the atmosphere is pure. Considering the public importance of railroads, occasional and passing annoyances from their operation should be borne in silence by the individual subjected thereto. To be sure, at stations and terminals the disturbance is more incessant and of longer duration, but it may also be said that the owner of property adjacent thereto has also the benefit of sharing in the advance in values which so often attend the location of depots and railroad terminals and trackage. The greater inconvenience is likely to be offset by greater advantages. Usually population centers around railroad stations and terminal yards, and in such neighborhoods more or less smoke, dust, and distracting noises are prevalent. Factories, shops, and mills find locations near and create the same discomforts in some degree. A person building a home on a city lot has no assurance that the adjoining lot owner may not erect a factory or warehouse which may sadly interfere with the enjoyment and value of the home. The law does not redress every inconvenience or disturbance to which an owner or occupant may be put by a neighbor's use of his property. The location, the degree of annoyance, its duration, and the time of its occurrence, are all matters which bear upon the question of whether the law affords a remedy for the damage suffered.

It is not necessary to pursue this subject further, for plaintiff concedes the soundness of the rule generally adopted that disturbance, smoke, dust, and cinders from the ordinary operations of trains upon a railroad's right of way, which reach adjacent properties, causing discomfort and damage to the owners or occupants thereof, do not give rise to a cause of action. But he insists that a different rule applies to such facilities in railroading, as shops, roundhouses, and switch yards, so that, when a railroad company selects such a place for these that the operation thereof creates a private nuisance to owners of near-by property, a cause of action arises in every case where a like injury inflicted by a private person would be actionable.

Courts have distinguished between the location and operation of a railroad between and at stations, and the location and operation of such incidental but necessary equipments as railroad shops, roundhouses, and switch yards like the one here in question. These latter do not serve the public directly. Their location and operation is of no public concern except as indirectly affecting the transportation problem. In selecting a place for these, the railroad acts as an individual attending to his private business, and must be responsible as such for injuries to the property rights of others flowing from such selection and subsequent operation. In other words, in the location and operation of these incidental transportation facilities, the railroad company has a free hand, and may not shield itself from responsibility for damage to others behind any rule of public necessity or authorization by law. It is different from freight houses and yards for receiving and delivering carload shipments. Public necessity, and sometimes statutes, demand that such be located for public convenience. We therefore do not think decisions like Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Armstrong, 71 Kan. 366, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 113, 114 Am. St. Rep. 474, 80 Pac. 978; Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Maddox, 116 Ga. 64, 42 S. E. 315; Taylor v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 145 N. C. 400, 122 Am. St. Rep. 455, 59 S. E. 129; Beseman v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 50 N. J. L. 235, 13 Atl. 164,—which state the broad doctrine that no redress is given to a private person who suffers from the consequences of an act authorized by law, are controlling here, even if sound.

The location of this switch yard must be conceded proper in the sense that none other could well have been found where less people would be affected by its operation. But that does not, in our opinion, determine plaintiff's right to complain of injuries special to him. In Romer v. St. Paul City R. Co. 75 Minn. 211, 74 Am. St. Rep. 455, 77 N. W. 825, Chief Justice Start thus alludes to a well-established rule, that "what is authorized to be done by law cannot be a public nuisance, yet it may be a private nuisance as to individuals who are specially injured thereby." Did plaintiff show injuries special to himself? We have already stated that the testimony tended to show that during the nighttime the noise and disturbance from the operation of the switch yard were so loud, incessant, and distracting as to rob plaintiff and his family of sleep and rest; also, that large volumes of smoke, cinders, and dust were thrown upon his property, and thereby its use and value almost destroyed. Section 8085, Gen. Stat. 1913, reads: "Anything which is injurious to health, or indecent or offensive to the senses, or an obstruction to the free use of property, . . . is a nuisance. An action may be brought by any person whose property is injuriously affected or whose personal enjoyment is lessened by the nuisance, and by the judgment the nuisance may be enjoined or abated, as well as damages recovered." In Wood on Nuisances, 3d ed. § 611, it is said: "It is now well settled that noise alone, unaccompanied with smoke, noxious vapors, or noisome smells, may create a nuisance, and be the subject of an action at law for damages." And in § 505 it is stated that "smoke alone may constitute a nuisance." See also §§ 495 and 497, to the effect that everyone has the right to have air diffused over his premises in its natural state, free from artificial impurities imparted by a neighbor; and that the property owner has the right to recover damages, not only for injuries affecting the corpus of his estate, but also for such as impair unreasonably the enjoyment and use thereof. Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 237, pertinently asks: "What valid distinction can be made between discharging smoke or noxious gases into the atmosphere, which find their way into the air of the adjoining lot and cause a nuisance, and the discharge of water or noxious liquids which flow upon adjoining property or percolate through its soil so as to create a nuisance upon the land? The operation of machinery may communicate vibrations to the air which make life a burden to those in the neighborhood by reason of the noise so produced, and at the same time may communicate vibrations to the land which crack the walls and shake down the plaster of the houses in which they live. How can a distinction be made between the two when both kinds of injury go to the extent of materially impairing the use and enjoyment of the property?" In Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Drake, 148 Ill. 226, 35 N. E. 750, the court said it was not prepared to coincide with the view that noise and disturbance from railway yards were damnum absque injuria. A case more frequently cited than any other on the proposition here involved is Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 317, 27 L. ed. 739, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 719, which was an action against the railroad company for damages on account of the erection and operation of a shop and roundhouse so near the church that its use by the plaintiff congregation was seriously impaired from the smoke, noise, and steam emitted from the company's plant. There was a recovery. The court, after stating that the liability of the railroad company for the annoyance and discomfort caused is the same as that of individuals for similar wrongs, and that it was no defense to say that the shop and roundhouse were skillfully constructed and were necessary for the maintenance of the road authorized to run through the city, proceeds: "Grants of privileges or powers to corporate bodies, like those in question, confer no license to use them in disregard of the private rights of others, and with immunity for their invasion. . . . It admits, indeed, of grave doubt whether Congress could authorize the company to occupy and use any premises within the city limits, in a way which would subject others to physical discomfort and annoyance in the quiet use and enjoyment of their property, and at the same time exempt the company from the liability to suit for damages or compensation, to which individuals acting without such authority would be subject under like circumstances." In the opinion is the suggestion that the company might have selected another location where the injury to adjoining property would not have been so great. But it is not, therefore, to be inferred that if the railroad company, instead of locating its roundhouse and repair shop adjacent to this large church edifice of an influential congregation in the heart of the city, had placed them up against the humble house of worship of a religious organization forced by stress of circumstances to seek a cheap location in the outskirts of Washington, compensation would have been denied for similar annoyance to the use and enjoyment of their church property. While suitable location has a bearing on the question, it is not controlling. To properties in the heart of a city, dust, smoke, and distracting noises are appurtenant, so to speak, and therefore they cannot be injured by like matters from the operation of a railroad to the same extent that properties in the sparsely occupied and quiet suburbs are.

And as sustaining the view herein before expressed that railroad shops, roundhouses, and switch yards like the one in question here stand on a different footing from tracks between stations, passing tracks, depots, freight houses, and yards for receiving and delivering shipments, in respect to their location and operation being a private injury or nuisance which the law will redress, may be cited: Cogswell v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 103 N. Y. 10, 57 Am. Rep. 701, 8 N. E. 537; Spring v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 88 Hun, 385, 34 N. Y. Supp. 810; Wylie v. Elwood, 134 Ill. 281, 9 L.R.A. 728, 23 Am. St. Rep. 673, 25 N. E. 570; Louisville & N. Terminal Co. v. Lellyett, 114 Tenn. 368, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 49, 85 S. W. 881. In the last-named case it is held that a terminal railway company, in exercising the discretion conferred by the legislature to locate its yards and terminal facilities, acts at its peril not to create a nuisance to neighboring property. There the plaintiff's property was 225 feet away from the original tracks; the terminals were located beyond these. The court says: "We are of the opinion that, in so far as the growth and increase of travel and traffic into and through the station has brought discomfort to plaintiff, he is without remedy. In other words, the roads have the right to accommodate their increasing traffic and travel without liability, so long as their trains are operated without negligent disregard of the comfort and usable value of the plaintiff's property, and, for this purpose, to lay such additional tracks, side tracks, and switches into and through the station as may be required to accommodate such travel and traffic, both passenger and freight, and it is only for the additional conveniences of roundhouses, sandhouses, coal bins, coal chutes, and the switch yards and tracks necessary to operate such additional conveniences, which might be located elsewhere, though not so advantageously, perhaps, that plaintiff can complain, if they materially damage plaintiff's property." In Townsend v. Norfolk R. & Light Co. 105 Va. 22, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 87, 115 Am. St. Rep. 842, 52 S. E. 970, 8 Ann. Cas. 558, it was said: "Damage occasioned by the location of a power house [for the railway] does not stand on the same footing as damage resulting from the operation of a railway along an authorized route." It may also be suggested that the property and persons affected by the location of shops, roundhouses, and switch yards such as this are limited and circumscribed in extent; and that those annoyed by their operation do suffer differently from those exposed to the intermittent discomforts which attend the ordinary operation of trains. The injury to those affected by these incidental railway facilities may therefore be said to be special and peculiar. The noise and smoke from shops are incessant during the ordinary work day. And here the operation of the switch yard was continuously distracting during the night. See also Baltimore Belt R. Co. v. Sattler, 100 Md. 306, 59 Atl. 654, 3 Ann. Cas. 660, and Bramlette v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 113 Ky. 300, 68 S. W. 145. The distinction herein pointed out is also recognized in the late case of Roman Catholic Church v. Pennsylvania R. Co. — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 125 C. C. A. 629, 207 Fed. 897.

It would seem to follow that if this switch yard, although properly located and operated, constitutes a private nuisance to plaintiff's use and enjoyment of his property, there is an injury to private property by a public use for which compensation must be made under the Constitution of this state as it now reads. Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 238, states: "If the use of property for public purposes produces a nuisance, those injured are entitled to compensation. . . . It is immaterial whether the particular use of the property in question is authorized by the legislature or not. The right not to be injured by a nuisance on adjoining land cannot be taken without compensation. . . . The Massachusetts court has held that 'the legislature may authorize small nuisances without a compensation, but not great ones.' Bacon v. Boston, 154 Mass. 100, 28 N. E. 9; Com. v. Parks, 155 Mass. 531, 30 N. E. 174; Levin v. Goodwin, 191 Mass. 341, 114 Am. St. Rep. 616, 77 N. E. 718. But where is the line to be drawn? The courts of New Jersey, perceiving this difficulty, have held that it cannot be drawn anywhere, and have hence concluded that the legislature can authorize all nuisances, both great and small. Beseman v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 50 N. J. L. 235, 13 Atl. 164. But it is certainly more logical, more just, and more in keeping with the trend of modern decisions, to hold that no right of property can be taken, destroyed, or materially impaired without compensation."

The decisions in Nebraska, which, however, go further than in any other state, uniformly hold that injurious consequences to property such as shown herein from the operation of a railroad is an injury or damage within the constitutional provision requiring compensation, and that without regard to whether it proceeds from the operation of the railroad between stations, or from shops and the like. Chicago, K. & N. R. Co. v. Hazels, 26 Neb. 364, 42 N. W. 93; Omaha & N. P. R. Co. v. Janecek, 30 Neb. 276, 27 Am. St. Rep. 399, 46 N. W. 478; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. O'Neill, 58 Neb. 239, 78 N. W. 521; Stehr v. Mason City & Ft. D. R. Co. 77 Neb. 641, 124 Am. St. Rep. 872, 110 N. W. 701, and Kayser v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 88 Neb. 343, 129 N. W. 554. Judge Hook, in Mason City & Ft. D. R. Co. v. Wolf, 78 C. C. A. 589, 148 Fed. 961, in summing up the law as it obtains in Nebraska, states: "The right of recovery under the state Constitution is not limited to those cases in which the property of a private owner is actually invaded or appropriated by a railroad company. It extends to cases where the value of the property is depreciated by the disturbance of some right, either public or private, which the owner enjoys in connection therewith. . . . The right of recovery includes damage to the property from noise, smoke, cinders, and vibrations of the ground, and the obstruction or impairment of the right of the owner to make use of public highways in the vicinity."

Judge Caldwell, in Chicago G. W. R. Co. v. First M. E. Church, 50 L.R.A. 488, 42 C. C. A. 178, 102 Fed. 85, in a situation somewhat parallel to Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 317, 27 L. ed. 739, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 719, observes: "The smoke, cinders, offensive smells, and loud and protracted noises which constitute the nuisance to the plaintiff, are not the usual and unavoidable result of the mere operation of the defendant's trains over its track laid in the street, but they result from other uses by the defendant of the street and its track in the immediate vicinity of the plaintiff's property, which do not affect in a like injurious manner the public generally, or other abutting owners of property on the street."

We also refer to the exhaustive discussion of the subject found in the dissenting opinion of Justice Lewis, concurred in by Justice Lumpkin, in Austin v. Augusta Terminal R. Co. 108 Ga. 671, 47 L.R.A. 55, 34 S. E. 852, and the notes to Louisville & N. Terminal Co. v. Lellyett, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 49, and Tidewater R. Co. v. Shartzer, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1053. In Rainey v. Red River T. & S. R. Co. 99 Tex. 276, L.R.A.(N.S.) 590, 122 Am. St. Rep. 622, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.)

89 S. W. 768, 90 S. W. 1096, 13 Ann. Cas. 580, this language occurs: "Did the legislature intend to authorize a railroad running in the city of Austin, to establish and operate structures of the character in question, so near to the capitol as to render it unfit for the purposes for which it was constructed? The same question may be asked as to a courthouse of the county, the public school buildings and churches of the city. We should be loath to answer this question in the affirmative. Yet, if the statute empowers a railroad company to establish its shops in such proximity to a private dwelling, as to depreciate its value and to bring great discomfort upon the occupants, no sufficient reason suggests itself to our minds, why the same might not be done as to the capitol, the courthouse, and other public structures."

Cases relied on by defendant come nearly all within the principle conceded by plaintiff; namely, that in so far as disturbance, smoke, and dust emanate from the operation of a railroad between and at stations, there is no redress for the individual who may suffer in the use and enjoyment of his property. Church of Jesus Christ, L. D. S. v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 36 Utah, 238, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 860, 140 Am. St. Rep. 819, 103 Pac. 243, was a case where increasing traffic required additional operating or passing tracks. Hyde v. Minnesota, D. & P. R. Co. 29 S. D. 220, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 48, 136 N. W. 92, related to tracks in connection with a properly located depot. St. Louis, S. F. & T. R. Co. v. Shaw, 99 Tex. 559, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1245, 122 Am. St. Rep. 663, 92 S. W. 30, is evidently not out of harmony with Rainey v. Red River, T. & S. R. Co. supra, for it relates to the necessary facilities and operations of trains at a properly located station. It holds that personal discomfort to adjoining proprietors occasioned by the operation of cars in the station yards cannot be made the basis of a cause of action against a railroad company, when there is nothing improper in its selection of the particular locality for its tracks, or in the operation of its cars thereon, and no depreciation in the value of the complainant's property therefrom. The court says: "It is hardly necessary to add that side tracks at such stations are an essential part of the road, and are as much authorized and required as the main line and stations. It cannot be held, therefore, that the mere location of such tracks and stations near to the property of others gives rise to the liability here asserted. If so, the same liability would arise to everyone who might be annoyed by trains passing along the main line, for no reason could be given for the liability in one case which would not be valid in support of it in the other; and yet it has often been held that no such liability can be sustained consistently with the law which authorizes the construction of such quasi public works." Dolan v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 118 Wis. 382, 95 N. W. 385, holds that the undesirable consequences to near-by property from the location of a railroad stock yard for receiving cattle for shipment, as required by statute, does not constitute a private nuisance if constructed and managed with reasonable care. Even in the absence of a statute on the subject, public convenience, as already intimated, would, in most instances, require shipping stock yards near or at the station. The decisions cited from Pennsylvania, as suggested by Judge Lewis in Austin v. Augusta Terminal R. Co. supra, are controlled to a large extent by the wording of the constitutional provision of that state, which guarantees compensation for injury to private property for construction or enlargement of public works, thus excluding, by implication, injury from the operation thereof. In Walther v. Chicago & W. I. R. Co. 215 Ill. 456, 74 N. E. 461, a demurrer was sustained to a bill in equity asking that the defendant railway be enjoined from establishing a switch yard in a residence neighborhood. In the absence of allegations that the location was improper and was not required by public necessity, the court might well deny an injunction, and leave the one whose property rights are damaged to his action at law. The opinion is silent on this phase of the question; but it would be reasonable to infer from other decisions of the courts of Illinois herein before cited, or referred to in the citations, that the location and operation of a switch yard (which does not serve the public directly) so that it necessarily injures the use and enjoyment of private property by throwing thereon smoke and cinders, and causing unusual disturbances during the nighttime, would require the payment of compensation. See also Illinois C. R. Co. v. Trustees of Schools, 212 Ill. 406, 72 N. E. 39.

It is claimed that under Romer v. St. Paul City R. Co. 75 Minn. 211, 74 Am. St. Rep. 455, 77 N. W. 825, decided subsequent to the amendment of the Constitution securing private property against damage or destruction by public use, as well as against the taking thereof for such use, without compensation, there can be no recovery here. It will be noticed, however, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

that the defendant in that case, a street railway company, was authorized and required to operate its cars upon the street. The disturbance created came mostly from the movement of the cars after they passed out of the barn and onto the street, and the court seems to place the refusal to regard the car barn as a nuisance upon the ground that the discomforts to plaintiffs were essentially the same as those suffered by others where the car line turns corners. The court also distinguishes a commercial steam railroad from a street railway as to the consequences to adjacent property rights, and therefore did not consider the case of Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 317, 27 L. ed. 739, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 719, a controlling guide. The point that under our Constitution the right to compensation is given where damage to private property results from public use was not there raised, nor could it be for § 6137, Gen. Stat. 1913, provides that no street railway company shall exercise the right of eminent domain within the limits of a city or village. In the case of the maintenance of a private nuisance by a street railway within the city limits, the court could not well refuse to abate the same if requested, even though its maintenance might almost be a public necessity. But in the case of a commercial steam railroad the court might well refuse to abate if the railroad desired to exercise its right of eminent domain. That the constitutional amendment referred to broadened the protection of private property cannot be doubted. That there need be no physical invasion of property in order to give a right to claim compensation for damage to the same from public use is now established. Vanderburgh v. Minneapolis, 95 Minn. 329, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 741, 108 N. W. 480. That case would be decisive of this appeal in plaintiff's favor, had it appeared that the vacated Queen avenue had been opened or laid out across the original right of way.

We are of the opinion that it was a question for the jury upon this record whether the disturbances and loud noises proceeding from the operation of this switch yard during the nighttime, together with the smoke, dust, and cinders thrown upon plaintiff's premises, were such as to seriously interfere with and impair the enjoyment and value thereof which existed previous to the operation of the switch yard. It was therefore error to dismiss the action.

Judgment reversed.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

HOSPITAL OF ST. VINCENT OF PAUL
IN CITY OF NORFOLK, Plff. in Err.,
v.

SALLIE W. THOMPSON.

(— Va. —, 81 S. E. 13.)

Negligence — unsafe premises — hospital — patient's attendant.

1. One who at the request of a patient about to enter a hospital accompanies him to render reasonably necessary assistance is an invitee of the hospital, to whom it owes the duty of exercising ordinary care to have the premises reasonably safe.

Charities — negligence — liability to stranger.

2. A hospital conducted as a public charity is liable for negligent injuries to one who accompanied to its building an intending patient for the purpose of rendering necessary assistance to him, as such person is not a beneficiary of the charity.

Negligence — unsafe premises — elevator entrance.

3. A hospital may be found to be negligent in maintaining an entrance to an elevator from outside the building, which resembles an ordinary doorway and is protected only by unfastened screen doors, so as to render it liable to one who, mistaking the entrance for an ordinary one, steps inside and falls down the shaft.

Keith, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit brought by Mrs. Thompson against the Hospital of St. Vincent of Paul, in the city of Norfolk, to recover damages for an injury alleged to have resulted from the negligence of the defendant. There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $2,500, to which a writ of error was awarded.

Three errors are assigned to the rulings of the trial court: First, the action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the declaration; second, its refusal to give certain instructions asked for by plaintiff in error, and the giving of certain instructions asked for by defendant in error; and, third, its refusal to set aside the verdict and entering judgment thereon.

assigned, which present no question of novelty or importance, and the underlying principles of which will be sufficiently discussed in the succeeding part of this opinion. Suffice it now to say that the declaration, in our judgment, states a cause of action, and the demurrer was therefore properly overruled.

It is assigned as error that the court refused instructions 1 and 3, asked for by the plaintiff in error, and gave instruction 4, asked for by the defendant in error.

Instruction No. 1, asked for by plaintiff in error and refused by the court, declares that a hospital which is incorporated for taking care of sick and disabled persons who may be received by it, which has no capital stock, and is not conducted for dividends or profits, is a charitable institution; and, if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant is a charitable institution according to this definition, it cannot be held liable for the plaintiff's injury merely because its employees' negligence may have caused said injury, but that, before they can bring in a verdict for the plaintiff, they must further find that the defendant was guilty of negligence in selecting said employees.

The third instruction asked for by the plaintiff in error, and refused, tells the jury that "if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff in this case came upon the premises of the defendant on the 31st day of July, 1912, at the time of the injury complained of, without an invitation, either express or implied, from the said defendant, then the said plaintiff was a mere licensee, and the said defendant was liable to her, if injured upon said premises, for wanton injury only, and they must find for the defendant, unless they further believe that the said plaintiff was wantonly injured while on the premises of the said defendant."

Taking up these instructions in their inverse order, and dealing first with the principle announced in the third instruction, we are of opinion that it was rightly rejected. It appears from the declaration and from the proof—indeed, all of the evidence tends to establish—that the defendant in error was an invitee, and not a mere licensee, to whom the plaintiff in error owed the duty of reasonable care. The law is correctly and, we think, sufficiently stated upon this branch of the case in instruction No. 2, given at the instance of defendant in error, as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff on July 31, 1912, accompanied at her request a sick friend to the defendant's hospital for treatment, that the condition of her friend was such as to render it reasonably necessary for the plaintiff, or someone else, to accompany her, then the defendant owed to the plaintiff the duty to exercise ordinary care to have its premises in reasonably safe condition for the visit; and, if the defendant negligently failed to perform that duty, and, as the proximate consequence thereof, the plaintiff, while exercising due care, was injured, then the defendant is liable for the injuries sustained."

There is no dispute as to the facts on which this instruction is predicated, and, the facts being ascertained, it was the duty of the court to tell the jury the law which applied to them; and this, as we have said, is correctly done in defendant in error's instruction No. 2.

Instruction No. 1, asked for by plaintiff in error, presents a question of great interest. It must be conceded that the plaintiff in error is a charitable institution. That it receives compensation from patients who are able to pay for the accommodations received does not render it any the less a charitable institution in the eye of the law. This seems to be well established by the authorities. McDonald v. Massachusetts General Hospital, 120 Mass. 432, 21 Am. Rep. 529; Glavin v. Rhode Island Hospital, 12 R. I. 411, 34 Am. Rep. 675.

It may also be conceded that, by the weight of authority, a beneficiary of the charity cannot hold the association responsible for negligent injuries, but the basis upon which the immunity is made to rest differs widely in the adjudicated cases. This court has never heretofore been called upon to consider this subject.

In Trevett v. Prison Asso. 98 Va. 332, 50 L.R.A. 564, 81 Am. St. Rep. 727, 36 S. E. 373, Trevett, who was a stranger to the association, obtained an injunction against it for polluting a stream which passed through his premises, upon the ground that it had created a nuisance. The association undertook to maintain that it was a public corporation, and relied upon the authority of Maia v. Eastern State Hospital, 97 Va. 507, 47 L.R.A. 577, 34 S. E. 617, a corporation which was held to be purely of a governmental character and under the exclusive ownership and control of the state, and was therefore not liable in damages for the negligent acts of its servants. It was held that the Prison Association could not plead immunity upon this ground; that it was not a public corporation, and, though of a benevolent character, was responsible for its torts.

The subject has, however, been considered and treated with great learning and ability by numerous courts.

Benev. Asso. 92 Neb. 162, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 973, 137 N. W. 1120, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1127, the supreme court of Nebraska held that a charitable institution conducting a hospital solely for philanthropic and benevolent purposes is not liable to inmates for the negligence of nurses; that a charitable hospital does not, by accepting compensation from a patient who is able to pay for room, board, and care, incur liability to such patient for the negligence of nurses. It will be observed that in this case the hospital accepted compensation from a patient who was able to pay, and, notwithstanding this fact, the court charged the jury, that "the undisputed evidence further shows that the defendant is a charitable institution maintained for philanthropic and charitable and benevolent purposes, and in no manner, directly or indirectly, for private profit or dividend paying to anyone;" and the appellate court held that this instruction was fully justified by the evidence, and was properly given. In the course of its opinion, the court said: "It is a well-established doctrine that a charitable institution conducting a hospital solely for philanthropic and benevolent purposes is not liable to inmates for the negligence of nurses. Some courts say that one accepting the benefits of such a charity exempts his benefactor from liability for the negligent acts of servants. Others assert that nonliability is based on the ground that trust funds created for benevolent purposes should not be diverted therefrom to pay damages arising from the torts of servants. Exemption from liability is frequently sanctioned on the ground that public policy encourages the support and maintenance of charitable institutions, and protects their funds from the maw of litigation. While there is a diversity of opinion as to the reasons for the rule, the doctrine itself is firmly established."

The appellate court said, further in its opinion, that, even though full compensation had been paid in the particular case by the plaintiff, it would not necessarily follow that the patient received no benefit from charity. "She occupied a room in a building maintained in part at least by donated funds intended for benevolent purposes. Necessary care, skill, and food came from the same source. On the record as made the jury should not have been permitted to find that the inmate had received no benefit from charity." For these propositions a great number of authorities are cited, which fully warrant the statement that we have made, that the fact that compensation was paid in the case before us does not alter the fact that the association was a benevolent institution.

While it may not be necessary in this case for us to decide, we have little hesitation in saying that what is known as the trust-fund doctrine does not appeal to us as a satisfactory footing upon which to rest the immunity of such associations. The trust-fund doctrine would establish absolute immunity, if carried to its logical conclusion, for all torts committed by such associations. It would apply to the omission to perform, or the negligent performance of, nonassignable duties, and, indeed, to negligence in all its conceivable forms. The immunity flowing from the acceptance of the benefits of such a charity, as held by decisions of many courts, rests upon a more logical foundation, and has met with approval of many courts of high standing, and the trend of modern decision seems to be in that direction.

In Basabo v. Salvation Army, 35 R. I. 22, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1144, 85 Atl. 120, the subject was examined with the utmost care, and a vast number of authorities cited and considered. It discusses every phase of the case and every ground of exemption from liability that has been suggested. In the course of the opinion, Judge Parkhurst observes: "Some of the cases cited absolutely deny the liability of a charitable corporation in any event to pay damages for injuries arising from the negligence of its servants or agents, either to a patient or inmate or to a third party, on the ground of public policy, saying . . . that 'it would be against all law and all equity to take those trust funds, so contributed for a special charitable purpose, to compensate injuries inflicted or occasioned by the negligence of the agents or servants' of the charity, and arguing that, if such damages were to be allowed to be paid out of the trust funds, it would tend to destroy the charity, and to discourage the giving of money or other property for the establishment of charities. (Citing a number of authorities.) Other cases cited, while arguing along the same general lines of public policy, limit the exemption of charitable corporations from liability for injuries occasioned by the negligence of physicians, surgeons, nurses, and servants, and agents to cases where there has been no negligence on the part of the defendants in the selection or retention of such persons. (Again citing authorities.) We think these latter cases must be regarded as entirely inconsistent with the general proposition of the exemption of charitable corporations on grounds of public policy, set forth in the previous cases. As was said in reference to many of these cases by Gaynor, J., in Kellogg v. Church Charity Foundation, 128 App. Div. 214, at page 217, 112 N. Y. Supp. 61 L.R.A.(N.S.)

566: 'In many, if not most, of the cases, a ground for the nonliability for the torts of agents or servants of charitable institutions is that to pay damages for such torts would be a diversion of their funds from the trust purposes for which they are donated by the charitable, and thus a contravention of the trust; and that, as such institutions have no other funds, it would be futile to allow judgments to be taken against them in such cases. But the opinions of the judges in these same cases almost invariably except cases where the agent or servant was incompetent and there was negligence in his selection, failing to take note that it would be as much a diversion of the trust funds to pay damages for the tort of negligence in selection as for any other tort. If the rule exists, it must necessarily apply to all torts and in all cases. The only support for the argument that it does exist is found in the remarks of judges in certain rather old English cases, . . . and never had a direct application to actions of tort against charitable corporations such as are now common.'

Referring to Powers v. Massachusetts Homœopathic Hospital, 65 L.R.A. 372, 47 C. C. A. 122, 109 Fed. 294, Judge Parkhurst says: "After a very careful review of the authorities up to the date of decision (1901), the United States circuit court of appeals repudiated the doctrine of general exemption on the ground of public policy, and placed the exemption of the defendant in the case at bar, where it was sued for negligence of a nurse by a patient injured, upon the ground that (p. 380) 'one who accepts the benefit either of a public or of a private charity enters into a relation which exempts his benefactor from liability for the negligence of his servants in administering the charity; at any rate, if the benefactor has used due care in selecting those servants. . . . If, in their dealings with their property appropriated to charity, they [charitable institutions] create a nuisance by themselves or by their servants, if they dig pitfalls in their grounds and the like, there are strong reasons for holding them liable to outsiders, like any other individual or corporation. The purity of their aims may not justify their torts; but, if a suffering man avails himself of their charity, he takes the risks of malpractice, if their charitable agents have been carefully selected.'

In Hearns v. Waterbury Hospital, 66 Conn. 98, 31 L.R.A. 224, 33 Atl. 595, the same doctrine was maintained; and in Downes v. Harper Hospital, 101 Mich. 555, 25 L.R.A. 602, 45 Am. St. Rep. 427, 60 N. W. 42, it is said: "It certainly follows that the fund cannot be indirectly diverted by the tortious or negligent acts of the managers of the fund, or their employees, though such acts result in damage to an innocent beneficiary. Those voluntarily accepting the benefit of the charity accept it upon this condition."

Basabo v. Salvation Army, and the authorities there cited, seem to go far to establish that, with respect to the physicians, surgeons, and nurses, and other skilled attendants such as are furnished the patients, not being under the control of the corporation as to their treatment, are not to be considered as the servants of the corporation in such sense as to make it responsible under the doctrine of respondet superior, provided they are selected with due care, and upon this principle many of the cases relating to immunity of benevolent corporations may be logically and properly rested. Secondly, that there are certain duties to patients which are corporate duties, such as the exercise of due care in the selection of skilled and competent attendants, and the exercise of due care in the summoning of such attendants in a case where the condition of the patient requires such service, and that the agent of the corporation, whose duty it is to summon such attendants, is in such case the agent and representative of the corporation, whose negligence is deemed to be that of the corporation itself. Thirdly, that the doctrine of the general immunity of a charitable corporation from liability for damages, on the ground of public policy, as involving the diversion of trust funds from the purposes of the trust, has no logical foundation, and that, where such a corporation has funds available for the general purposes of the corporation, it may apply such funds to pay damages for which it is held liable, notwithstanding the trusts for which they are held, because the liability is incurred in carrying out the trusts and is incident to them.

The case of Basabo v. Salvation Army, then goes on to deal with the negligence of servants or agents of benevolent institutions resulting in injuries to third persons who are not in the relation of inmates, patients, or beneficiaries. The case of Fire Ins. Patrol v. Boyd, 120 Pa. 624, 1 L.R.A. 417, 6 Am. St. Rep. 745, 15 Atl. 553, is said to stand almost alone in declaring immunity to a benevolent corporation for injuries inflicted upon a stranger.

In Hewett v. Woman's Hospital Aid Asso. 73 N. H. 556, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 496, 64 Atl. 190, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 621, a nurse in the employment of the defendant, a charitable corporation, who was receiving wages and instruction in consideration of her services as such nurse, was placed by the superintendent in charge of a patient suffering from diphtheria, of which the superintendent had notice, but neglected to give notice to the nurse. The nurse, not knowing the nature of the case, took the disease, and, for the injury to her caused thereby, brought suit. She was held entitled to recover. Exemption from liability was claimed by the defendant on the same grounds of exemption as set forth in many of the cases above cited. After examining the statutes of New Hampshire, under which the defendant was incorporated, and finding therein no express exemption from liability, the court proceeds to a careful examination of the cases holding such corporations exempt from liability on general grounds of public policy, and the court finds from the evidence that the plaintiff was a servant or employee of the defendant corporation. In stating its conclusions upon this branch of the case, the court says as follows: "If she had been employed by an individual to attend a member of his family afflicted with smallpox, of which he had knowledge, but of which he did not inform her, and she took the disease without fault on her part, and suffered damage therefrom, it would not be seriously denied that he was guilty of actionable negligence in not informing her of the danger to which he exposed her. It was his duty, arising from his employment of her, or from the contractual relation of master and servant existing between them, to warn her of the danger incident to the service which he knew, or, under the circumstances, ought to have known, and of which he knew she was ignorant, though in the exercise of ordinary care. And this duty is a nondelegable one. . . . To say that a similar duty was not imposed upon the defendant for the benefit and protection of the plaintiff, because it is a charitable corporation, is to relieve such corporations from the reasonable obligation of exercising the care ordinarily required of, or contractually assumed by, men in general in the prosecution of their legitimate business. The necessity for such an exceptional holding is not apparent. Since the property of the defendant is held for the general purpose of maintaining a hospital without other specific limitation, it is no more exempt from being appropriated to the payment of damages occasioned by the negligence of the hospital than is the property of an individual, which he holds for commercial or charitable purposes, for the consequences of his negligence."

In Bruce v. Central M. E. Church, 147 Mich. 230, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 74, 110 N. W. 951, 11 Ann. Cas. 150, the court found that the defendant was a charitable corporation, and proceeded to examine the doctrine of the exemption of such charitable corporations from liability for negligence. In this case plaintiff was an employee of a contractor engaged in decorating the church building, and sued for injuries sustained by reason of the breaking of defective scaffolding furnished by the agents of the defendant. The majority opinion, after setting forth the reasons for holding the defendant to be a charitable corporation, proceeds to the examination of the case of Downes v. Harper Hospital, 101 Mich. 555, 25 L.R.A. 602, 45 Am. St. Rep. 427, 60 N. W. 42, where some of the language used was consistent with the doctrine of general exemption on grounds of public policy, and says as follows: "I conclude, therefore, that we cannot hold the principle of the decision in Downes v. Harper Hospital, supra, inapplicable, upon the ground that the funds of the church are not charitable trust funds. This leads us to the inquiry: Is there any other ground upon which we should hold Downes v. Harper Hospital inapplicable? There is this distinction between Downes v. Harper Hospital and this case, viz., in the Downes Case plaintiff was a patient in defendant's hospital, and therefore a beneficiary of the charitable trust administered by the hospital corporation, while in this case he was an employee of the defendant's contractor, and not a beneficiary of the trust administered by defendant. If we hold that the principle of the Downes Case applies to the case at bar, we must declare that that principle exempts a corporation administering a charitable trust from all liability for the torts of its agents, and, as a corporation can act only by and through its agents, that it is exempt from all liability whatsoever for torts. What is the principle underlying the Downes Case? Does it exempt a corporation administering a charitable trust from all liability for torts? Those who answer this question in the affirmative cannot support their position by appealing to the reasoning of the opinion in that case. While that opinion says, 'The law jealously guards the charitable trust fund, and does not permit it to be frittered away by the negligent acts of those employed in its execution,' the pith of its reasoning, in my judgment, is contained in the following words: 'It certainly follows that the fund cannot be indirectly diverted by the tortious or negligent acts of the managers of the fund, or their employees, though such acts result in damages to an innocent beneficiary. Those voluntarily accepting the benefit of the charity accept it upon this condition.' " And, after referring to a large number of cases, the 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Michigan court, in Bruce v. Central M. E. Church, said: "In the latest of these cases (Powers v. Massachusetts Homeopathic Hospital)—the opinion is exhaustive and elaborate and discusses nearly all the authorities—it is held that the ground upon which liability is denied is that of assumed risk; the court saying: 'One who accepts the benefit either of a public or of a private charity enters into a relation which exempts his benefactor from liability for the negligence of his servants in administering the charity, at any rate if the benefactor has used due care in selecting those servants.' "

Coming to deal with exemption upon the ground of public policy, in Basabo v. Salvation Army, quoting from Powers v. Massachusetts Homeopathic Hospital, it is said that such exemption "must rest upon the argument that the advantage reaped by the public from such trusts justify the exemption; that is, as applied to this case, the advantages to the public justify defendant's exemption from liability for wrongs done to individuals. If this argument is sound—and its soundness may be questioned, for there are those who will deny that the advantages to the public justify the wrong to the individual—it should be addressed to the legislative, and not to the judicial, department of the government. It is our duty, as judges, to apply the law. We have no authority to create exemptions or to declare immunity."

In 147 Mich. at page 255, the opinion says: "I conclude from this reasoning that corporations administering a charitable trust, like all other corporations, are subject to the general laws of the land, and cannot, therefore, claim exemption from responsibility for the torts of their agents, unless that claim is based on a contract with the person injured by such a tort, and that Downes v. Harper Hospital and other similar cases are consistent with this rule. They rest upon the principle, correctly stated in Powers v. Massachusetts Homeopathic Hospital, 65 L.R.A. 372, 47 C. C. A. 122, 109 Fed. 294, viz., that the beneficiary of such charitable trust enters into a contract whereby he assumes the risk of such torts. It is not surprising that years should have elapsed before the correct legal principle governing these cases was announced in Powers v. Massachusetts Homeopathic Hospital. The discovery of correct legal principles, like the discovery of scientific and social truths, requires time and patient investigation."

In Hordern v. Salvation Army, 199 N. Y. 233, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 62, 139 Am. St. Rep. 889, 92 N. E. 626, the action was brought to recover for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff, a journeyman mechanic, who was engaged in making repairs upon a boiler upon defendant's premises, through the defective condition of a runway or staging leading from a door in the boiler room. The defendant claimed exemption from liability as being a religious or charitable corporation. The court cites many of the cases above referred to where such corporations have been held to be totally immune from liability, as well as those where they have been held immune on the ground that they were performing governmental functions, and also those where the immunity is made dependent upon the relation the plaintiff bears to the defendant, and says: "In all it is recognized that the beneficiary of a charitable trust may not hold the corporation liable for the neglect of its servants. This is unquestionably the law of this state" (citing cases)—and, after discussing certain other cases in New York, where defendant charitable corporations have been held liable to third persons for negligence, repudiates the doctrine of the nonliability of trust funds for payment of damages arising from negligence.

Hordern v. Salvation Army fully approves the doctrine of Powers v. Massachusetts Homeopathic Hospital, supra, and the court said: "We can add nothing to the force of this reasoning, but simply express our concurrence therein, as well as in the argument of Judge Lowell." Hordern v. Salvation Army itself was subsequently approved by the New York court of appeals in Kellogg v. Church Charity Foundation, 203 N. Y. 191, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 481, 96 N. E. 406, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 883, 3 N. C. C. A. 444, where the court says: "It must now be regarded as settled that a charitable corporation is not exempt from liability for a tort against a stranger because of the fact that it holds its property in trust to be applied to purposes of charity."

We are much indebted, in considering this case, to the very learned and able opinion of the Rhode Island court in Basabo v. Salvation Army, supra, from which we have extracted with great freedom.

Applying the principles considered to the case before us, it becomes at once apparent that the defendant in error was not a beneficiary of the charity, but that she is to be considered as a stranger, and comes within the influence of the principle that a charitable corporation is not exempt from liability for torts against strangers because it holds its property in trust to be applied to the purposes of charity; a principle which seems to be fully established by courts of the highest authority and in well-considered cases.

that much that has been said in this opinion was, in this view of the case, unnecessary; to which we reply that the whole subject was discussed in oral argument and in the briefs of counsel; that it is of great interest and of first impression in this state; and we felt therefore that it would be well to consider it in all its bearings.

Our conclusion is that there was no error in the instructions given or refused.

Coming to the facts of the case, we find from the evidence that they are fairly stated in the brief for defendant in error as follows: That Mrs. Davis was expecting to be confined, and her husband had made arrangements with the hospital to receive her as a pay patient. On the day in question Mr. Davis was out of the city, but, before leaving, had requested Mrs. Thompson, a friend of his wife, to look out for her and to go to the hospital with her, if necessary to go before his return to the city. About noon on July 31, 1912, Mrs. Thompson received a phone message from Mrs. Davis, telling her that she felt ill, and that she was preparing to go to the hospital, and asking her to come down and go with her. Mrs. Thompson complied with this request, and went to the apartment occupied by Mrs. Davis. She phoned to Mrs. Davis's physician, and he told her to order a carriage and proceed with Mrs. Davis to St. Vincent's Hospital. Mrs. Thompson ordered a carriage, and in the meantime Mrs. Davis phoned to St. Vincent's Hospital, and advised the authorities that she would come over in a short time, and asked them if they were prepared for her. She was informed that the hospital authorities were in waiting and in readiness for her arrival. About half-past 1 o'clock in the afternoon Mrs. Davis and her friend Mrs. Thompson went in the carriage to St. Vincent's Hospital. Before they arrived, a storm came up, and it began to rain rapidly. The driver, who was familiar with the hospital and its entrances, drove around to the rear of the hospital into an open court, and stopped his carriage at the entrance which was used by the hospital for its patients and friends accompanying them. Mrs. Davis was at the time suffering a great deal. At her request the driver got down from his seat, and rang the bell at the entrance, and then got back on his seat on the carriage. No one having responded to the summons, Mrs. Thompson suggested that she should get out of the carriage so that there would be no delay when the nurse came. This she did, and, as it was raining very hard at that time, she approached the entrance for the purpose of going inside of the hospital, and thereby protecting herself from the rain until the nurse came. She walked up to the entrance, which was equipped with double screen doors, and, opening the door to the left, she stepped into what she thought was a hall or reception room, but, instead of that, it was an elevator shaft, and she fell to the bottom of the shaft, a distance of 4 feet 7 inches, and sustained the injuries for which she later on instituted this action.

Coming to a more particular description of the elevator, it appears that one side of the elevator shaft was an outside rear wall of the building. At the level of the ground a doorway was cut into this shaft, so that when the floor of the elevator was on a level with the surface of the ground, people could walk in and out of the elevator. This doorway was fitted up as an entrance. There was a stone doorsill at the bottom, and at the top of the doorway there was a stone lintel. There were two wooden doors which opened outwardly, and were fastened back during the summer. There were also two screen doors which opened outwardly, and which were in use in the summer months. One of these screen doors, the one to the left of a person approaching the entrance, was equipped with a handle, so that it could be opened from the outside, but there was no inside fastening on this door at all, and when the elevator was further up in the shaft there was nothing to prevent anyone from opening these doors and walking into the shaft. The lower part of these screen doors was covered with a grating, which prevented a person approaching from seeing through it into the shaft beyond. On the left-hand side of the screen doors there was a push bell, just as at any ordinary entrance door, and there was a little inclined wooden way leading up to the sill of the door. In other words, the testimony seems to show that this entrance was equipped just as any ordinary entrance into a hall or reception room is equipped. There were no signs or warnings of any kind to indicate that these doors opened into an elevator shaft instead of into a hall.

We think the evidence tends to support all the averments of the declaration and all the facts upon which the several instructions were predicated, and makes a case which was proper for the consideration of the jury, whose verdict, under proper instructions, is conclusive.

We are therefore of opinion that the trial court committed no error, and its judgment is affirmed.

Charvoz v. Salt Lake City, — Utah, —, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 652, 131 Pac. 901.

Mr. Otis E. Hungate for appellees.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees, in their petition, alleged: That they are the father and mother of Matteson Harper, deceased. That on December 5, 1911, and prior thereto, the defendant city owned and maintained a public park, known as Central Park, within the limits of said city, and kept and maintained therein a pond of water which had been constructed by the city. That near the south end of the park the pond was 7 or 8 feet deep, and on the date named was frozen over and covered with ice about 1 inch thick. That the park was in a residence portion of the city where many children lived and passed by. That the city kept and maintained open gates to said park, and paths and walks therein upon which the public was permitted to walk, one of which paths was along the south end of the pond. That for a long time prior to the accident numerous children of the locality frequently resorted to the park to play and for amusement, and especially when the park was covered with ice to slide and skate thereon. That the city neglected to make any effort to keep the children from playing about the pond, or from skating and sliding thereon, and provided no watchman to patrol said pond, or to rescue children therefrom, if any got into the pond. That on the above date Matteson Harper, then about seven years old, was going from the Central Park School, located west of Central Park, to his home on Western avenue in the city, and in so doing passed through the park, and along the south bank of the pond, which was the direct route from the school to his home. That, observing that the pond was frozen over, and lacking in judgment and discretion by reason of his youth, he was attracted thereby, and went upon the ice to slide. That he broke through the ice, fell into the water, and was drowned at a point where the water was 8 feet deep. That the deceased did not know the dangerous condition of the ice; but the condition was well known to the city, its officers, agents, and employees. That when the deceased was drowned, he was a strong, healthy boy, and affectionate to his parents. That, had he lived, his services would have been of the value of $10,000 to the appellees, for which sum appellees prayed judgment. To this petition the city filed a demurrer on the ground that the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Upon the hearing of the demurrer it was overruled by the court, and the city appeals.

Ordinarily cities and other municipal corporations in the exercise of their governmental functions are not liable in damages for any neglect, or even wrongdoing, of their officers in the discharge of such duties, unless such liability is expressly imposed upon them by law. Pfefferle v. Lyon County, 39 Kan. 432, 18 Pac. 506; Peters v. Lindsborg, 40 Kan. 654, 20 Pac. 490; La Clef v. Concordia, 41 Kan. 323, 13 Am. St. Rep. 285, 21 Pac. 272; New Kiowa v. Craven, 46 Kan. 114, 26 Pac. 426; Caldwell v. Prunelle, 57 Kan. 511, 46 Pac. 949; 4 Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 1660, p. 2895; 28 Cyc. 1305.

An exception to the rule has been made which holds cities liable for damages resulting from defects in their highways or certain conditions of notice. In Jansen v. Atchison, 16 Kan. 358, it is said: "Cities having the powers ordinarily conferred upon them respecting bridges, streets, and sidewalks within their limits, owe to the public the duty of keeping them in a safe condition for use in the usual mode by travelers, and are liable in a civil action for special injuries resulting from neglect to perform this duty."

In the second edition of the reports containing the latter case, numerous authorities are cited approving the doctrine. Neither counties nor townships, however, were held liable in this state for injuries caused by defects in bridges, culverts, or highways until the enactment of chapter 237, Laws of 1887 (§ 658 of the General Statutes of 1909). Eikenberry v. Bazaar Twp. 22 Kan. 556, 31 Am. Rep. 198; Marion County v. Riggs, 24 Kan. 255; Parr v. Shawnee County, 70 Kan. 111, 78 Pac. 449.

Another exception to the general rule stated as to the liability of cities in the state was adjudicated in Kansas City v. Siese, 71 Kan. 283, 80 Pac. 626. In that case the city was held liable in damages for maintaining an attractive nuisance in or adjacent to a street in a thickly settled district of the city, and the doctrine was reaffirmed in Roman v. Leavenworth, 90 Kan. 379, 133 Pac. 551. There are, however, limitations upon the application of the doctrine. In Tavis v. Kansas City, 89 Kan. 547, 132 Pac. 185, the following quotation from Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 345, 56 Am. St. Rep. 106, 47 Pac. 598, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 4, is made with approval: "The owner of a thing dangerous and attractive to children is not always and universally liable for an injury to a child tempted by the attraction. His liability bears a relation to the character of the thing, whether natural and common, or artificial and uncommon, to the comparative ease or difficulty of preventing the danger without destroying or impairing the usefulness of the thing, and, in short, to the reasonableness and propriety of his own conduct, in view of all surrounding circumstances and conditions. As to common dangers existing in the order of nature, it is the duty of parents to guard and warn their children, and, failing to do so, they should not expect to hold others responsible for their own want of care. But, with respect to dangers specially created by the act of the owner, novel in character, attractive and dangerous to children, easily guarded and rendered safe, the rule is, as it ought to be, different." 115 Cal. 356.

The maintenance of the park as described in the petition is clearly a governmental function. The city as a corporation derives no benefit therefrom; but the park is maintained for the benefit of the public without regard to residence. The park is not a public highway, and, unless the pond therein is an attractive nuisance, the city cannot be held liable for the accident upon any principle heretofore recognized by the courts of this state. As described in the petition, and as a matter of common knowledge, the park is not an annoyance to the public, but is a beneficent provision made by the city for open-air recreation and diversion. It adds to the happiness and healthfulness of the thousands who avail themselves of its benefits. The pond in the park adds to its beauty, and is accessory to all the beneficent purposes for which the park was established and is maintained.

By the allegations of the petition, it appears that the pond proved not only dangerous, but destructive, to the little boy who ventured thereon, and who, by reason of his tender years, was incapable of appreciating and avoiding the dangers encountered. The suggestion in the petition that the pond should have been fenced by the city, or that patrolmen should have been at the place to keep the boy from going upon the ice, is evidently impracticable. A 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) fence about the pond would disfigure the park and rob the pond of much of its attractiveness. So far as appears, the boy went there and upon the ice alone, and there was nothing to attract the attention of patrolmen, if such had been employed to watch the pond. The pond was dangerous at the time only because covered with a thin coating of ice.

The pond appears to be of like character, and, although made by the city, is virtually a reproduction of the ponds found in nature, and nature does not maintain attractive nuisances. That there always is possible danger of a child going upon the ice or falling into the water is true; but such an accident is as likely to occur on any like pond in nature. It has been said that there is possible danger in every step of life from the cradle to the grave, although the danger may not be foreseen. Every tree that stands in the park or in the city presents the possible danger that some boy may climb it and fall to his injury, or even death. Ordinary care requires only that means be taken to avoid such dangers as are reasonably to be apprehended,—probable dangers, not possible dangers. The imminence of the danger is ordinarily the measure of care to be taken to avoid it. There seems no reason in this case to hold the city liable which would not have been equally cogent had the boy, in going to or from school, gone through a neighbor's pasture, with the owner's consent, and met a like fate upon a pond therein. We know of no rule that imposes higher care upon a city than upon an individual.

Much reliance is placed by the appellees in the case of Bowden v. Kansas City, 69 Kan. 587, 66 L.R.A. 181, 105 Am. St. Rep. 187, 77 Pac. 573, 1 Ann. Cas. 955, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 339. The syllabus reads: "A municipal corporation is performing a ministerial public duty in maintaining a fire station, and is liable in damages to an employee for personal injuries resulting from the neglect of the corporation to furnish him a reasonably safe place in which to work." Notwithstanding the use of the word "ministerial" in the syllabus, the real principle involved was the relation of employer and employee as stated in the opinion.

We have examined the authorities cited by counsel on the question submitted for additional briefs, and also the collection of authorities in extended notes to three cases in 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1094, 1136. The general rule we have stated is sustained by much the greater number of cases, and upon what appears to be the better reasoning in cases brought against cities or municipalities where the question of immunity from liability is raised.

It is strenuously urged that a city should be liable for any defect or negligence in the maintenance of its parks on the same grounds as in the maintenance of its highways. The necessities of public travel at all times and under all conditions presumably impelled the courts to make the exception regarding the maintenance of the highways in cities as we have noted. Like reasons do not seem to require the extension of the exception to the maintenance of parks; at least this has not been done in this state, and we do not feel that justice would be promoted by making the further exception.

On the facts stated in the petition, it does not appear that the pond is an attractive nuisance. The demurrer should therefore have been sustained.

The order and judgment is reversed.

West, J., specially concurring:

I concur in the conclusion reached, for the reason that no actionable negligence is shown by the allegations, but I do not think that the question of governmental function is in the case; neither am I ready to concede that the reproduction of a natural pond may not be as dangerous and attractive a nuisance as any other. The statutes seem to clothe the city with authority to maintain parks, and likewise charge it with duty of proper regulation and care. Gen. Stat. 1909, §§ 831, 834.

Municipal corporation — requiring license for sale of cider.

1. Charter authority to regulate any trade of a tendency dangerous to morals, health, or safety, and to prevent nuisances and declare what are such, includes power to require persons engaged in the sale of cider to procure a license.

Intoxicating liquor — license of sale of cider — excessiveness of fee.

2. A fee of $15 per month for wholesalers, and $10 per month for retailers, for the privilege of selling cider free from intoxicating qualities, making frequent analyses necessary to determine whether or not the licensee is acting within his authority, is not so excessive that the court can say that it is for revenue, rather than for regulation, and is therefore void.

(March 2, 1914.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Miller County Chancery Court sustaining a demurrer to the answer in a suit to restrain the enforcement of a city ordinance regulating the sale of cider by wholesale. Reversed.

Statement by Smith, J.:

The appellees brought suit in the chancery court of Miller county, Arkansas, to restrain the city of Texarkana, Arkansas, and Foster Rogers, its chief of police, from enforcing a certain ordinance of that city, regulating the sale of cider by wholesale and retail. The lower court issued a temporary injunction, which was made permanent on the final hearing.

So much of the ordinance as we need consider here reads as follows:

"Sec. 3. That the selling of cider, either at wholesale or retail, within the incorporate limits of the city of Texarkana, Arkansas, is hereby declared to be a privilege, and it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to engage in the sale of cider, either at wholesale or retail, until either he or they shall have complied with the provisions of this ordinance.

"Sec. 4. That each dealer in cider within the incorporate limits of this city of Texarkana, Arkansas, shall, before engaging in said business, whether at wholesale or retail, pay into the city treasury of the city of Texarkana, Arkansas, the following license fees, namely:

"(a) Each wholesale dealer in cider shall pay the sum of fifteen ($15) dollars per month, payable monthly on the first day of each month.

"(b) Each retail dealer in cider shall pay the sum of ten ($10) dollars per month, payable on the first day of the month.

"Any person or persons engaging in the business of selling cider within the said city of Texarkana, Arkansas, either at wholesale or retail, without having first paid the license fee required by this ordinance, shall be subject to a fine of twenty-five ($25) dollars for each offense; and each day that said business is so illegally carried on shall constitute a separate offense."

The complaint alleged that appellee the Hudgins Produce Company is a domestic corporation, and that the city of Texarkana, Arkansas, is a city of the first class, and that the Hudgins Produce Company is engaged in the wholesale grocery and produce business in said city, and is also engaged in the sale of sweet cider. The complaint further alleged that the ordinance was unreasonable, void, and of no effect, for the following reasons: "First, that the city of Texarkana, Arkansas, is not empowered or authorized to pass any act to declare the wholesaling and retailing of cider a privilege, or to license or regulate the same, and that the effort of the city to collect a license under the said ordinance is an illegal exaction, and an abuse of the power of the said city; and, second, that the said ordinance is a revenue measure, and that the amount of the tax is unreasonable, excessive, and void; and, third, that the ordinance is void because it contains and attempts to legislate upon more than one subject, and the subjects are not clearly expressed in the title." Appellees rely upon the first and second grounds. Appellants admitted in the answer that appellee is engaged in the wholesale grocery business in the city of Texarkana, Arkansas, and further admitted that it is engaged in the wholesale cider business; but denied that the cider sold by it was the cider commonly known as sweet cider; but it stated the truth to be that the cider sold by appellee was a cider made by a chemical process, with harmful and dangerous ingredients therein, and said cider, when fermented, contained a large percentage of alcohol, and that the carrying on of said business had a tendency dangerous to morals, health, and public safety, and came expressly within the terms and conditions of subdivision 4 of § 5648 of Kirby's Digest of the statutes of the state of Arkansas. Appellants deny the said ordinance is unreasonable and void, and deny the city was not authorized or empowered to license or regulate the wholesaling of cider, and alleged that dealing in cider, as appellee was doing, was a business properly subject to the regulation of the city council, but it denied that the license fee provided for was imposed for the purpose of raising a revenue; but say the sole purpose of said ordinance was for the regulation of said business, and the fees provided therefor were intended to pay the necessary expenses of such supervision. Appellants further alleged that, in order to ascertain the extent of the fermentation of said cider, and the adulteration thereof, it was necessary to make tests of the said cider, and that said tests are expensive, and are required to be frequently made, and that the license fee of $15 per month will not more than pay for the inspection or tests of said cider, and the proper regulation of the sale thereof. Appellants also stated that it is a duty of the chief of police of said city, made so by resolution of the said city council, to inspect the places where cider is sold, and to report to the mayor any dealer who is handling intoxicating cider. A copy of said resolution was attached as an exhibit to the answer, and it reads as follows:

"Sec. 1. That the chief of police of the said city of Texarkana, Arkansas, and his assistants are hereby instructed and directed to inspect all cider offered for sale by wholesale and retail dealers within the city of Texarkana, Arkansas, and he shall see that said cider so offered for sale is pure and wholesome.

"Sec. 2. That in the inspection of the business of any wholesale dealer he may require from said dealer such reasonable proof of the quality of the cider to be sold as will satisfy him that the same is pure and wholesome.

"Sec. 3. In the inspection of cider sold at retail by dealers within said city of Texarkana, the chief of police shall see that the places at which cider is sold are not made tipping houses, and that the cider so sold at said places is pure and wholesome, and that the same is not hard nor intoxicating; it shall also be his duty to see that the places where said cider is retailed are kept in a clean and sanitary condition.

"Sec. 4. If the chief of police shall determine that any cider sold within the city of Texarkana, Arkansas, is unwholesome or intoxicating, it shall be his duty to report the seller of said cider to the mayor of the city of Texarkana, with his recommendation as to whether or not the license of said dealer should be revoked.

"Sec. 5. The chief of police shall furnish to each person granted a license to sell cider a copy of this resolution, and the same shall be considered a part of said license."

The ordinance requiring the license was passed on the 27th of May, 1913, and the resolution fixing the duties of the chief of police in regard to the inspection of the cider was passed on June 24, 1913. The complaint in this cause was filed on the 2d day of July, 1913.

Appellee says that the resolution prescribing the duties of the chief of police was passed merely to bolster up the ordinance, and that it cannot be considered in determining the validity of the ordinance. Appellee demurred to the answer, and this demurrer was sustained, and appellants electing to stand upon the demurrer, have appealed.

Mr. Frank S. Quinn, for appellants:

The defendant city had authority to pass an ordinance taxing or licensing or regulating the sale of cider.

The ordinance in question is a revenue measure.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is said that the ordinance is void 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

because it designates the business of selling cider, either at wholesale or retail, as a privilege, and undertook to derive a revenue from the exercise of this privilege by imposing a tax so excessive that its purpose to raise revenue is made manifest. It is true the business of selling cider is referred to as a privilege; but the use of that term is not controlling in the consideration of the purpose of the ordinance. It is proper to consider not only the amount of the license fixed by the ordinance, but it is necessary also to consider the nature of the business sought to be regulated, and the probable regulation which will be necessary to effectuate the purposes of the ordinance.

Appellants say the authority to pass the ordinance in question is found in the 4th subdivision of § 5648 of Kirby's Digest, which section confers additional and enlarged powers upon cities of the first class, and that the part of said section conferring the authority for the ordinance under consideration reads as follows: "And to prevent or regulate the carrying on of any trade, business, or vocation of a tendency dangerous to morals, health, or safety . . . and to prevent, abate, or remove nuisances of every kind, and to declare what are such." To determine whether or not the ordinance in question is authorized, and the authority for its enactment conferred by the language quoted, it will be necessary for us to consider whether or not the sale of cider is a proper subject of municipal regulation; and, if it is found to be, then the further question arises whether or not the fee imposed by said ordinance was designed to cover the estimated cost of regulation, or was intended as a means of raising revenue.

Is the sale of cider a proper subject of regulation? Appellee says that, if this ordinance is not void, cities may impose a license upon all merchants as such. But we think this is not so; for, in our opinion, the sale of cider is not an improper subject of regulation. Cider is defined in 7 Cyc. 130, as: "An alcoholic beverage obtained by the fermentation of the juice of apples; a fermented liquor made from the juice of apples—formerly used of all kinds of strong liquors except wine; a drink made from the juice of apples." An interesting case which discusses the chemical composition of cider, and which shows that it may be an alcoholic and intoxicating beverage, and one which cannot lawfully be sold in a state whose statutes prohibit the sale of alcoholic or fermented liquors, is Eureka Vinegar Co. v. Gazette Printing Co. (C. C.) 35 Fed. 570. This is a very learned opinion, and was delivered by Justice Caldwell, as judge of the circuit court of the eastern district of Arkansas.

The city of Lawrence, in the state of Kansas, passed an ordinance regulating the sale of cider, which was not intoxicating, and prohibited its sale in less quantity than 1 gallon, and forbade the drinking of same at the place of sale. This ordinance was attacked upon the ground that it was a violation of private rights, and was an unreasonable restraint upon trade, and was not authorized under any legislative enactment of the state. It was held that the legislative power given to city councils to enact and make all such ordinances, by-laws, rules, and regulations not inconsistent with the laws of the state, as may be expedient for maintaining the peace, good government, and welfare of the city and its trade and commerce," was a sufficient authority for the enactment of such an ordinance. It was there insisted that cider is a harmless and wholesome drink, and that the restraint upon its sale was unreasonable, in contravention of a common right, and therefore unconstitutional. In upholding that ordinance the supreme court of that state said: "The ordinance was manifestly not enacted in pursuance of the prohibitory law, nor for the regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquors. The ordinance inferentially permits the sale of cider in quantities of a gallon or more, and the penalty for its violation may be $10, without imprisonment. These provisions are not consonant with the laws prohibiting and punishing the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors, and hence we must infer that the ordinance was passed for the purpose of controlling the sale and disposition of cider that was not intoxicating. It will be observed that the ordinance regulates, rather than prohibits, the sale of cider, and the legislative power to regulate the sale of an article or liquid which in some stages is harmless and in others hurtful is no longer open to question. The juice of apples quickly changes from fresh to hard cider, and hard cider is presumptively not only a fermented, but an intoxicating, liquor. State v. Schaefer, 44 Kan. 90, 24 Pac. 92. It is difficult to show when the change occurs and when it reaches such a state as will produce intoxication. It may have been thought that the drinking of cider might foster a taste for strong liquors, and that, if the unrestricted sale of cider by the glass was permitted, the officers might be easily deceived as to the character of the drinks sold, and that a tippling shop might be carried on under the guise of a place to sell cider. In the interest of the health of the people, and the peace and good order of the communities, it was deemed wise to regulate the traffic. To sell it by the glass and allow it to be drunk upon the premises where sold was deemed to be subversive of good order, and dangerous to the health and morals of the people, and hence the city imposed a regulation that it should not be sold in less quantities than 1 gallon, and should not be drank at the place of sale. Such a regulation violates no private right, and does not unreasonably or improperly restrain trade." The court then proceeds to show that, while there is no provision of the statutes of Kansas directly authorizing the enactment of such an ordinance, yet that the city possessed authority to pass the ordinance under the general welfare clause, which authorized city councils "to enact and make all such ordinances, by-laws, rules, and regulations, not inconsistent with the laws of the state, as may be expedient for maintaining the peace, good government, and welfare of the city and its trade and commerce." Monroe v. Lawrence, 44 Kan. 607, 10 L.R.A. 520, 24 Pac. 1113. It is a matter of common observation that, where the sale of liquor has been prohibited, a common method of violating the law which works this prohibition is to engage ostensibly in the sale of what is ordinarily called soft drinks, and that cider is one of the drinks so sold. And we know, too, from the authority of the cases herein cited, that, by processes of fermentation, cider may cease to be sweet, and become intoxicating.

Other interesting cases on this subject are those of Com. v. Reyburg, 122 Pa. 299, 2 L.R.A. 415, 16 Atl. 351; Re Jahn, 55 Kan. 694, 41 Pac. 956; Lincoln Center v. Linker, 5 Kan. App. 242, 47 Pac. 174, s. c. 6 Kan. App. 369, 51 Pac. 807, and 7 Kan. App. 282, 53 Pac. 787; also Eureka v. Jackson, 8 Kan. App. 49, 54 Pac. 5.

At the time of the passage of the ordinance in question, it was unlawful to sell intoxicating liquors of any character within 10 miles of the city of Texarkana, it having been made so by Act No. 26 of the Acts of the General Assembly of 1913, prohibiting "the sale or giving away or storing or keeping stored for another person any alcoholic liquors, or any spirituous, ardent, vinous, malt, or fermented liquors, or any compound or preparation thereof commonly called tonics or medicated liquors," which act of the general assembly was approved February 7, 1913. This ordinance does not give one who pays the fee therein provided the right to sell any kind of cider, the sale of which is made unlawful by the special act of general assembly above mentioned. Evidently one of the purposes of the ordinance is to obtain information if cider was sold which it was unlawful to sell. The resolution dated June 24, 1913, expressly so provides. But, even though we may not consider this resolution in ascertaining the purpose of the ordinance, the answer alleged that the chief of police had frequent inspections made by chemical analysis to ascertain the character of cider being sold by the various dealers therein in the city. It cannot be said that the purpose of an ordinance is not that of regulation, simply because the ordinance contains no provision for the inspection or regulation of the business to be licensed thereunder. In the cases of the Helena v. Miller, 88 Ark 263, 114 S. W. 237, where a municipal ordinance of the city of Helena imposed an annual license fee of $25 upon hotels and $15 upon boarding houses, the contention was made that the ordinance was void, as having been passed for the purpose of raising revenue, and not for the purpose of regulation, because no provision was contained in the ordinance providing for the inspection or superintendence of the business there licensed; but the court held that the ordinance should not be declared void on that account. We have many cases which discuss the authority of municipal corporations to impose a license, such as is imposed by the ordinance now under consideration, and it has been said in a number of these cases that it is our duty to indulge every reasonable presumption in favor of the validity of the ordinance, and not to declare it void, unless it plainly appears to be so. In the case of Helena v. Miller, supra, it is said: "It is difficult for the court to draw the line precisely between amounts which are reasonable and those that are unreasonable. The license fee fixed by an ordinance may, however, be so high that the court will, on the face of it, declare it to be unreasonable (Stamps v. Burk, 83 Ark. 351, 104 S. W. 153), or so low that the court will declare it to be reasonable." A leading case on this subject, and one which has been generally quoted in the different opinions of this court, is the case of Fayetteville v. Carter, 52 Ark. 301, 6 L.R.A. 509, 12 S. W. 573, in which case it was said: "A fee sufficient to cover the expense of issuing the license, and to pay the expenses which may be incurred in the enforcement of such police inspections or superintendence as may be lawfully exercised over the business, may be required. It is obvious that the actual amount necessary to meet such expenses cannot, in all cases, be ascertained in advance, and that 'it would be futile to require anything of the kind.' The result is, if the fee required is not plainly unreasonable, the courts ought not to interfere with the discretion exercised by the council in fixing it; and, unless the contrary appears on the face of the ordinance requiring it, or is established by proper evidence, they should presume it to be reasonable."

In the case of Trigg v. Dixon, 96 Ark. 199, 131 S. W. 695, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 509, an ordinance of the city of Texarkana, Arkansas, which imposed a license of $50 upon all persons engaged in the business of a butcher, was upheld. That ordinance was upheld as having been authorized both under § 5438 of Kirby's Digest, giving cities and towns power to establish and regulate markets, and also under § 5648, subdiv. 4, giving cities of the first class authority to prevent or regulate the carrying on of any trade, business, or vocation of a tendency dangerous to morals, health, or safety, and it was said there, as has been said in numerous other cases: "The power to regulate includes the power to license as a means of regulating." Upon consideration of the decisions in various cases of our own, as well as of other courts, we think the test of the reasonableness of an ordinance imposing a license for the purpose of regulation may be said to be that, if it is such a sum as is so manifestly excessive, and out of proportion to the regulation which will probably be required to make the ordinance effective, so that it is certain the city will derive a profit from the enactment of the ordinance, then, in all such cases, it may be said that the purpose of the ordinance is to raise revenue, and such ordinances are void, when no statute authorizes their enactment for the purpose of raising revenue.

Upon the other hand, if the amount of the regulation is uncertain, and its cost is indeterminate, depending upon circumstances, which may vary, and it does not appear that the license imposed is so out of proportion to the probable cost of its enforcement so that the ordinance will necessarily be the source of income to the municipality, such ordinances should not be declared invalid, as having been passed for the purpose of raising revenue, rather than the purpose of regulation, although they may, in fact, prove to be the source of profit to the municipality.

Is the sale of cider a proper subject of regulation? Appellee says that, if this ordinance is not void, cities may impose a license upon all merchants as such.

We conclude, therefore, that the sale of cider, either by wholesale or retail, is a proper subject of municipal regulation; and that the license imposed by the ordinance in question is not so excessive that we can say, as a matter of law, it was passed for the purpose of revenue; and the decree of the court sustaining the demurrer to appellants' answer is therefore reversed, and the cause will be remanded, with directions to overrule said demurrer.

v.

LEWIS CONSTRUCTION COMPANY et al., Resp'ts.,

and

THEODORE FLECK et al., Appts.

(— Wis. —, 146 N. W. 1120.)

Mechanics' Lien — material consumed in form for concrete works.

A lien may be claimed for lumber furnished and used in the erection of a building for shoring, that is, support for the concrete while it is setting, so far as the lumber is destroyed or depreciated in value by such use, under a statute giving a lien for materials furnished "for or in or about" the erection of a structure.

Note. — Mechanics' Lien: materials wholly or partially consumed in process of work, but not becoming a part of the structure.

The purpose of the present note is to supplement that appended to B. F. Avery & Sons v. Woodruff & Cahill, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 866, which contains the earlier cases on the point, and refers to annotation on related subjects. A later note of interest in this connection is appended to Speer Hardware Co. v. Bruce Bros. 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 354, and deals with mechanics' liens upon premises for an improvement not placed thereon, but having a physical or beneficial connection therewith.

The earlier note shows that until recently the courts consistently denied liens for materials which, though employed or consumed in the work, became no part of the structure; but, as also pointed out in that note, there appears to be a tendency to relax that rigid rule, several late cases allowing liens to the extent to which the materials are consumed or depreciated in the work.

Efforts have been made to distinguish decisions denying liens for materials used, but not incorporated into the improvement, upon the ground that it appeared in such cases that such materials were not consumed, but were taken away and used for other purposes by the contractor. For example, one case sought to be distinguished in that way is Kennedy v. Com. 182 Mass. 480, 65 N. E. 828, which is set out in the earlier note, and which denies a lien for lumber for concrete forms. It is true that, as has been said, the statement of the facts in that case recites that the lumber was not consumed, but was removed, but in rendering the decision the court declared generally and without qualification that, to require a lien under the Massachusetts act giving a lien for materials used in the construction of a public building, it is neces-

A PPEAL by defendants Fleck from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in favor of the defendant Lumber Company in an action to foreclose a mechanics' lien. Affirmed.

Statement by Kerwin, J.:

This action was brought to foreclose a mechanics' lien. The respondent Sanborn Lumber Company furnished certain lumber to the contractor, who was engaged in building a reinforced concrete building on the land of appellants. The lumber was used for what is known in the trade as shoring; that is wooden forms are constructed, into which the concrete is poured, and in which it remains until it has set, when the shoring is removed. The shoring is often used several times in constructing the same building. The case was sent to a referee, who made his report and findings, and his findings were substantially sary to show that the materials are a part of the completed structure,—that they have entered into it and become a part of the reality. Therefore, this case in no way militates against the statement in the earlier note that the earlier cases on the question denied liens upon general grounds.

Attempts have also been made to distinguish for like reasons, the case of Rittenhouse & E. Co. v. Brown, 254 Ill. 549, 98 N. E. 971, reported since the preparation of the earlier note. That case too recites that the "false work" was taken away by the contractor, and the court, in denying a lien, emphasizes the fact that the false-work lumber never became, and was not intended to become, the property of the owner of the building, but belonged to the contractor who bought it, used it for the temporary purpose for which he obtained it, and took it away to be used for his own purposes. But although the court concedes that the lumber was depreciated in value by the use, it does not allow a lien to the extent of the depreciation, and the opinion plainly shows that the real reason for denying the lien is that the lumber did not enter into and become a part of the building.

The modern extension of mechanics' liens to materials employed in temporary processes is well exemplified by the case of Chamberlain v. Lewiston, 23 Idaho, 154, 129 Pac. 1069, allowing a mechanics' lien for lumber used in a cofferdam constructed for the purpose of laying an intake pipe for a waterworks system. Having first determined that the destruction of the work by flood did not affect the right to a lien, and without alluding to the question whether the lumber was consumed or depreciated by such use, or whether but for the flood it could have used again, the court allowed a lien upon general grounds, saying: "When the city contracted for the laying of this pipe and doing of this work, its agents and officers knew at the time that it would be necessary to construct a cofferadopted by the court on the facts material here. The question involved is whether the Sands Lumber Company was entitled to a lien for the shoring furnished, or any part thereof.

The court made findings at great length covering all the issues in the case between the different parties. We shall refer only to those material and attacked upon this appeal, namely:

"That the defendant Sands Lumber Company, at the request of the Lewis Construction Company, furnished lumber which was used in the construction of the building in question in the manner and to the extent hereinafter more particularly found; that said lumber was furnished on or between the 1st day of September, 1910, and the 7th day of October, 1910, and was of the value, at customary and reasonable rates, of $1,021.23; that on the 19th day of November, 1910, the Lewis Construction Company paid $300 on account of last-named sum, leaving a balance of $721.23 due and unpaid from said Lewis Construction Company, together with interest thereon from said 10th day of November, 1910.

"That the lumber furnished by the Sands Lumber Company was used in the construction of false work or forms into which the concrete was poured, which constituted the walls of the said building; that the said lumber was thus used three or four times in the construction of this building, and that after it was thus used, about 75 per cent of all the lumber could not be used again, but became mere kindling, and was of practically no value; that the remaining 25 per cent of said lumber was fairly good, but full of holes, and could be, and was actually in part, used again in other concrete work, on other buildings not belonging to the defendants Fleck, but that said 25 per cent of said lumber was second-dam or use some other means or method that would accomplish the same result, in order to do the work and make the repair that the contract called for. If this be true, and it undoubtedly is, then we fail to see what difference it makes to the city whether this labor and material was employed and used in building the cofferdam or in procuring some other means or contrivance through and by which the work should be carried on and completed. When a man contracts to have a building erected, he knows that the contractors and builders will be obliged to have scaffolding and other material that does not actually go into the building, but which may practically be used and consumed and destroyed in the course of the work. Such material and the labor incident thereto is as much a part of the contract as if it were specified and set forth in the contract itself." The court cites with approval Barker & S. Lumber Co. v. Marathon Paper Mills Co. 146 Wis. 12, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 875, 130 N. W. 866, and E. R. Darlington Lumber Co. v. Westlake Constr. Co. 161 Mo. App. 723, 141 S. W. 931, which are cited in the earlier note and which mark the modification of the old rule against liens for temporary work. The Chamberlain Case was followed in Potlach Lumber Co. v. Lewiston, 23 Idaho, 167, 129 Pac. 1073.

So, the Kansas court has recently held that lumber furnished for and used in the making of forms for a concrete structure, as provided in the contract and specifications for its erection, which is largely consumed and rendered valueless by such use, is "material" within the meaning of a mechanics' lien law. Chicago Lumber Co. v. Douglas, 89 Kan. 308, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 843, 131 Pac. 563. In reaching this conclusion, the court said: "These forms operated to enhance the value of the land on which they were used as did the labor in setting them up. They were finally taken down and removed, but the life and substance of 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the material had been used up in the erection of the building. The material cannot be regarded as a part of the contractors' plant, because it was impregnated with cement and rendered practically unfit for other uses. It was used directly in the construction of the building, and, being consumed in that use, it can be fairly said that, within the meaning of our statute, it entered into and was used in the erection of the building. It is clear that it came within the terms of the bond, as it was 'material furnished and used in and about said contract work.'"

Attention is also directed to Pacific Sash & Door Co. v. Bumiller, 162 Cal. 664, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 296, 124 Pac. 230; allowing a lien for lard oil applied to the threads of pipe joints, insulated wire for drop lights, plaster for soldering joints, asbestos comprising a part of the electric switchboard, and soapstone used on the inside of pipes to facilitate the pulling of wires through the same. In allowing these items the court contented itself with saying merely that the contention that these materials did not enter into or become a part of the structure was unfounded.

The Iowa court expressly recognizes the right to a lien for lumber consumed in constructing false work for the erection of a bridge, distinguishing the cases in which a lien is claimed for tools, machinery, and equipments furnished the contractor. Empire State Surety Co. v. Des Moines, 152 Iowa, 552, 132 N. W. 837, denying rehearing of 152 Iowa, 531, 131 N. W. 870.

While this note, like the earlier one, excludes cases involving the right to liens for tools and equipment furnished the contractor, reference may be made to Farmers' Irrig. Co. v. Kamm, 55 Colo. 440, 135 Pac. 766, in which materials used in erecting a temporary shelter for men and teams were placed in the same category as tools and equipment of the contractor, and were therefore held not lienable. L. A. W.

hand lumber, and worth about $10 per thousand.

"That the 75 per cent of the lumber furnished by said Sands Lumber Company, which, as heretofore found, could not be used again, was actually consumed in the erection and construction of the building in question, and has entered into and formed part of such completed structure; that the 25 per cent of the lumber furnished by this defendant, which became secondhand lumber, was not entirely consumed in its use in or about the erection or construction of said building, but was in part a tool or appliance; that said 25 per cent has been, by its use in said building, diminished in value to the extent of $133.14, for which sum, in addition to the sum of $465.92, balance due upon the 75 per cent above mentioned, the defendant Sands Lumber Company is also entitled to lien, making a total of $599.06, with interest as aforesaid."

The court found the amount due the respondent Sands Lumber Company in accordance with the above findings, and ordered judgment therefor and a lien on the premises. Judgment was entered accordingly, from which this appeal was taken by the appellants, Theodore Fleck and Otto Fleck, owners of the premises.

A materialman is not entitled to a lien for shoring.

Messrs. Lorenz & Lorenz, for respondent lumber company:

A materialman furnishing lumber for false work for concrete construction is entitled to a lien to the extent of the value of the lumber actually consumed in the work.

Kerwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

for any of the lumber used in shoring, because it did not become a part of the structure, and, further, that the findings to the effect that 75 per cent of the lumber was consumed in the construction of the building, and that 25 per cent was depreciated in value, as specified in the findings, are not supported by the evidence. A careful examination of the evidence convinces that the findings are well supported by the evidence. The question whether the Sands Lumber Company was entitled to a lien upon the established facts is a more delicate question. In a case recently decided by this court (Barker & S. Lumber Co. v. Marathon Paper Mills Co. 146 Wis. 12, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 875, 130 N. W. 866), it was held that where lumber was furnished and used in a cofferdam, which dam was no part of the building, but was afterwards torn or blown out and the lumber thereby became destroyed, or practically so, the materialman furnishing the lumber was entitled to a lien upon the structure, though no part of the lumber became a part of it. It appeared that the cofferdam was a structure built in order to facilitate the construction of a concrete dam on the premises, to furnish water power to operate the mill in process of construction on the premises. The cofferdam was a temporary affair, and became useless after construction of the permanent or concrete dam.

While the right to a mechanics' lien must be found in the statute, this court has held that the statute must be liberally construed, with a view of carrying out its intention and remedial purpose. The statute gives a lien for materials furnished "for or in or about" the erection of the structure, and the question here is whether the shoring used in the reinforced concrete building was furnished for, in, or about the building. There is no question here but what the material was furnished and delivered to be used in the building, and was in fact used for shoring, but did not remain in the building after the concrete had become set, and 25 per cent of it was removed and used for other purposes, though considerably depreciated in value by use in appellant's building. Seventy-five per cent, as the court found, was practically consumed or destroyed by use.

This case is very similar in principle to Barker & S. Lumber Co. v. Marathon Paper Mills Co. supra. There the lumber did not remain in the structure, but was practically destroyed in the use. Here the lumber was actually used in the construction by supporting the concrete until it hardened and was self-supporting, and then was removed. It was thus used several times in the construction, and after the building was finished had become so damaged that 75 per cent of it was practically destroyed and of no value, except for kindling wood, as the evidence shows and the court found.

It has been held that mechanics' liens may be allowed for the value of explosives used in preparing the ground for the building of the structure, upon the principle that where the material is used directly upon the structure instrumental in producing the final result and actually consumed in use, it may be said to form a part of the structure. See cases cited in Barker & S. Lumber Co. v. Marathon Paper Mills Co. 146 Wis. at page 22. The logic of these decisions is, as said by this court in the Barker Case, that the material is consumed necessarily in the process of constructing the building, and that its life has gone into the fabric of the structure. This necessarily is peculiarly applicable to the instant case. The shoring had physical contact with the building in its construction. It added to the value of the completed structure, and its life and substance had in effect gone into the structure to the extent, at least, that the material was consumed. We think it clear, therefore, that the Sands Lumber Company, furnisher of the material, had a lien for the 75 per cent of the lumber consumed.

Nor do we see any solid reason for denying a lien for the amount of depreciation of the remaining 25 per cent of the lumber used for shoring. This lumber was likewise used in the construction of the building, but in such use was not wholly consumed, but was consumed or destroyed to the extent found by the court below, and for which amount of destruction or consumption a lien was awarded. Thus, the whole amount of consumption of the lumber used in the construction of the building was held lienable. This ruling is, we think, in harmony with Barker & S. Lumber Co. v. Marathon Paper Mills Co. supra, and late cases in other jurisdictions. Avery & Sons v. Woodruff & Cahill, 144 Ky. 227, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 866, 137 S. W. 1088; E. R. Darlington Lumber Co. v. Westlake Constr. Co. 161 Mo. App. 723, 141 S. W. 931; Chicago Lumber Co. v. Douglas, 89 Kan. 308, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 843, 131 Pac. 563.

In Avery & Sons v. Woodruff & Cahill, supra, it was held that the materialman had a lien for lumber furnished for shoring in construction of concrete building, where the lumber was in greater part consumed in the building; and the case of United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. Probst, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 63, 97 S. W. 405, is distinguished.

lake Constr. Co. 161 Mo. App. 723, 141 S. W. 931, holds that where the material is consumed in whole or in part the claim is lienable. This was a case of lien for shoring used in the construction of a concrete building.

True there are cases holding that no lien exists for lumber used to make molds for concrete work; as, for example, Rittenhouse & E. Co. v. Brown, 254 Ill. 549, 98 N. E. 971. But it will be seen the lumber was not destroyed or consumed in that case, but was taken away and used again. In the case of Kennedy v. Com. 182 Mass. 480, 65 N. E. 828, the lumber was not consumed, but was moved away and used on other jobs.

It is further insisted by appellant that since the lumber was not totally destroyed, no lien can be had for any part, because the statute does not cover a case of partial destruction or consumption, and that the lienable and nonlienable portions of the lumber cannot be distinguished. No reason is perceived why a lien cannot be had to the extent that the lumber has been consumed, although a part was saved. The case of E. R. Darlington Lumber Co. v. Westlake Constr. Co. supra, is in point upon this proposition. There the lumber was consumed in part only, and the court said: "Where certain material is provided for by the contract in erection of a structure, and is furnished and used accordingly, and is either in whole or in part consumed in its use, the materialman is entitled to a lien for the material thus consumed in the erection of the structure, to the extent of the consumption of its reasonable value, regardless of the fact whether or not such material formed a permanent part of the structure when completed. Consumption of value means the depreciation in the market value of the material by the use provided for by the contract." There is no question here of the inseparable, indistinguishable, lienable, and nonlienable articles. The case does not come within the decisions cited by the appellant, namely, Allen v. Elwert, 29 Or. 428, 44 Pac. 823, 48 Pac. 54, and Rinzel v. Stumpf, 116 Wis. 287, 93 N. W. 36, where from the contract and articles delivered the value of the lienable and nonlienable articles could not be ascertained. In the Rinzel Case the lien claim represented a stipulated lump contract price, and the articles consisted of fixtures which were lienable and others which were nonlienable. So it will be seen that that case, as well as Allen v. Elwert, supra, are clearly distinguishable from the instant case. In the case at bar all the lumber was lienable; therefore the materialman was entitled to a lien for the value of such part of the lumber as was consumed. Horn v. Clark Hardware Co. 54 Colo. 522, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 100, 131 Pac. 405. We are of opinion that the judgment of the court below is right, and should be affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

JOSIE I. BLUME, Appt.,
v.
PITTSBURG LIFE & TRUST COMPANY.
(263 Ill. 160, 104 N. E. 1031.)

Insurance — lapse — claim for paid-up insurance within six months.

Under a provision in an insurance policy that in case of lapse for nonpayment of premium, the insured may within six months surrender the policy and take paid-up insurance for the cash surrender value, surrender of the policy within the specified time is necessary to preserve the right to the option, and in the absence of such sur-

Note. — Effect of failure to apply for paid-up insurance within time stipulated.

As to right of beneficiary to exercise option upon default in payment of premium, see note to New York L. Ins. Co. v. Noble, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 391.

As to whether option provisions in policies of life insurance operate automatically, see Jones v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 803.

The question considered in the present note is covered in the note to Lenon v. Mut. L. Ins. Co. 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 193, and this note includes only the later decisions upon the point.

As stated in the earlier note, the Arkansas and Kentucky decisions, which hold that time is not of the essence of a provision of a life insurance policy stipulating that the assured must make application for a paid-up policy within a specified time, although apparently supported by reason and justice, are against the result reached by the courts of other states, with the possible exception of Maine.

The conclusion of the Arkansas and Kentucky courts was also concurred in by the court in Ingersoll v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 156 Ill. App. 568, but the supreme court of Illinois, in BLUME v. PITTSBURG LIFE & T. Co., reached the opposite result.

The insurance companies have, since the writing of the earlier note, to which this is supplemental, attempted, but without success, in several cases in Kentucky to obtain a different holding from that reached in the earlier cases in that state.

Thus, in a subsequent case it was held that, although a policy provided that the demand for a paid-up policy must be made within three months from the date of a default in the payment of the premium, a 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) render all rights under the policy will cease.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Municipal Court of Chicago in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due under a life insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edward O'Bryan, with Mr. Edward O'Bryan, Jr., for appellant:

Time is not of the essence of the contract between the parties.

Ingersoll v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 156 Ill. App. 568; Manhattan L. Ins. Co. v. Patterson, 109 Ky. 624, 53 L.R.A. 378, 95 Am. St. Rep. 393, 60 S. W. 383; *Lenon v. Mutual L. Ins. demand made within five years from that time was sufficient. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Amos, 145 Ky. 167, 140 S. W. 172.

And in Dawson v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 32 Ky. L. Rep. 86, 105 S. W. 422, where the policy apparently contained a provision requiring a return of the policy and a demand for paid-up insurance within six months after a default in the payment of a premium, it was held that time was not of the essence of the contract, and that the insured was entitled to a paid-up policy if a demand was made within a reasonable time; but it was held that a demand must be made, at the latest, not more than five years after a lapse.

In United States L. Ins. Co. v. Wood, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 1120, 107 S. W. 1193, where a policy provided that after it had been in force a specified time, upon the nonpayment of premiums a paid-up policy should be allowed, in accordance with a statute which provided that in case of a lapse in the payment of the premium, the insurer should, on demand and surrender of the policy within six months after a lapse, apply the reserve as agreed in the application and policy, it was held that the insured, under the agreement in the policy, was entitled only to a paid-up policy, and that he was not put to an election between paid-up and extended insurance, and that he had a reasonable time in which to demand and secure the benefits of a paid-up policy, and that a demand made by bringing suit to compel the issuance of such a policy within five years after the occurrence of a lapse was made within a reasonable time.

But in Wilson v. Washington L. Ins. Co. 31 Ky. L. Rep. 717, 103 S. W. 339, where the policy stipulated that if the insured failed to pay any premium, the insurer would, upon application made within six months from the date of the lapse, issue

Messrs. John H. Rollins and Frank Ewing, for appellee:

To entitle the insured, who has default-a paid-up policy for a proportionate amount, a lapse of seven years before making a demand after a failure to pay a premium was held to bar the insured's right to compel the insurer to issue a paid-up policy.

In Hatcher v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 134 Ga. 652, 68 S. E. 581, where the provision was that the insurance should become forfeited upon a failure to pay the premium, but that the insured might within six months after forfeiture surrender the policy and receive a paid-up policy, a recovery after the death of insured, which occurred about three years subsequently to his default, was denied, there having been no offer to surrender the original policy, which had been lost, or demand made to have a new one issued or a copy of the original policy established for purposes of surrender and cancellation in accordance with the contract.

It has been held that a failure to make a demand within the five years allowed in Kentucky is not excused because of a letter from the insurer giving the amounts of the surrender value and paid-up insurance, and stating that unless otherwise agreed the offer will not be binding after the expiration of six months. Dawson v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. supra.

Nor because the policies had been marked void by the insurer and reported as forfeited to the insurance commissioner, it not being alleged that the insured had any knowledge of these facts within five years of the default. Ibid.

In Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Amos, supra, it was held that no particular form of demand for a paid-up policy was necessary.

And a letter from the insured to the insurer, after he had paid the premium for a long time and a default had occurred, stating that he had fully decided not to 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ed in the payment of his premiums, to a paid-up policy under the terms of a policy which provides that the insured will be entitled to a paid-up policy on demand and surrender of the original policy within a specified time, the demand therefor and surrender of the original policy must be made within the time limited in the original policy.

pay any more on the policy and that the matter had to be settled sometime, and asking what amount of paid-up insurance would be given, there being a difference between the parties as to the amount which should be allowed, was held to be a sufficient demand for paid-up insurance. Ibid.

And it is not necessary, to entitle the beneficiaries to relief, that it should appear that the insured and the insurer agreed upon the amount of the paid-up policy the former was entitled to, or that he made a demand for a paid-up policy of a specified amount, or that he declined to accept a paid-up policy for the amount offered. Ibid.

And it was held that it did not follow from the fact that he declined to accept a paid-up policy for the amount offered by the insurer, that he did not demand a paid-up policy. Ibid.

The insured's wife, who is the beneficiary of a policy, is a proper, but not a necessary, party to a suit to compel the insurer to issue a paid-up policy after a lapse in the payment of the premium, and the fact that she does not become a party to the suit until more than five years after the lapse will not preclude the husband from maintaining the suit. *United States L. In Haas v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 90 Neb. 808, 134 N. W. 937, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 919, it was held that the provisions in a policy giving the insured options in case of lapses in the payment of premiums should be considered in connection with the law as to the nature of the life insurance contract and the fact of there being no forfeiture clause, and that, while the insured might exercise one of the options upon default, he was not bound to do so, but he had the right to rely upon the main contract, and not upon the ancillary provisions.

Vickers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant, Josie I. Blume, brought an action of assumpsit against the Pittsburg Life & Trust Company on a policy of life insurance for $5,000, seeking to recover $760 claimed by her as paid-up insurance under said policy. The trial court rendered judgment against her for costs. The record was removed to the appellate court for the first district by a writ of error to the municipal court of Chicago. The appellate court affirmed the judgment below, and granted a certificate of importance and an appeal to this court.

The life policy was issued by the Security Trust & Life Insurance Company upon the life of George A. Blume. After the issuance of the policy the Security Trust & Life Insurance Company transferred all of its assets and liability policy holders to the appellee, the Pittsburg Life & Trust Company. George A. Blume paid five annual premiums on said policy of insurance, and gave his note for $196 for the premium falling due October 15, 1905, upon which he paid $75.30. The last payment was made May 1, 1906. The insured died November 29, 1910. The following provisions are in the policy:

"6. Paid-up values.—If the full premiums on this policy be paid, as already provided, for not less than three complete years, it can be surrendered within six months from the date of lapse for the amount of nonparticipating paid-up life insurance specified in the accompanying table.

"7. Cash value.—If the full premiums on this policy be paid, as already provided, for not less than five complete years, it can be surrendered within six months from the date of lapse for the amount of cash specified in the accompanying table.

"8. Reinstatement.—This policy will be reinstated, on written application from the insured, after nonpayment of any premium, subject to satisfactory evidence of good health furnished on the company's blanks and the payment of the premiums then due, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent for the time elapsed."

"11. Premiums.— . . . If any premium is not paid on or before the day it is due, this policy shall become void and all payments previously made shall remain the property of the company, except as hereinbefore provided."

The table accompanying the policy referred to in clauses 6 and 7 shows that the insured might have surrendered his policy after it had lapsed, and received either $350 as a cash surrender value, or a paid-up policy for $760. The policy was not surrendered by the insured in his lifetime, nor did he make any request for paid-up insurance, or otherwise indicate that he desired to avail himself of either of the options stipulated in the policy. On October 6, 1906, the Security Trust & Life Insurance Company wrote the insured that if he desired to reinstate his policy it would be necessary for him to furnish a satisfactory certificate of good health, and that until said certificate was furnished the policy stood lapsed. There was no reply made to this letter. After May 1, 1906, when the insured made a partial payment upon his note for the sixth premium, he seems to have paid no further attention whatever to his insurance contract.

Appellant's contention is that when the policy lapsed for the nonpayment of the premium it was automatically converted into a paid-up contract for the amount of insurance specified in the table, and that the provision requiring the insured to elect within six months whether he would take the cash surrender value or paid-up insurance is not a condition precedent with which the insured was required to comply, or, differently stated, the contention is that the limitation of six months in which it is provided that the policy may be surrendered and paid-up insurance substituted is not of the essence of the contract. We are not aware that the precise question thus raised has heretofore been considered by this court, although it has frequently arisen in other jurisdictions. A question somewhat similar to the one involved here was decided in Phoenix Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Baker, 85 Ill. 410, and there this court held that where a party takes a policy of insurance on his life for five years, with the privilege, at any time after the payment of three annual premiums, of taking a paid-up policy by a surrender of the original policy, if he wishes to avail himself of this privilege he must do so before the policy expires. It was held that if he waited until the expiration of the five years, his right to take a paid-up policy will be gone, for the reason that he would then have nothing to surrender for a paid-up policy. In that case the policy was a five-year term policy and expired by its own terms at the end of the period fixed. At the end of the term, the contract having expired, the insured would have nothing to surrender in exchange for a paid-up policy. By the terms of the policy involved in the case at bar, the policy lapsed for the nonpayment of premium, with the proviso that the insured might, within six months, surrender his policy and take paid-up insurance for a specified amount, or the cash surrender value thereof. The policy does not provide that upon a failure or neglect of the policy holder to surrender his policy within the prescribed period and apply for paid-up insurance, the original policy shall stand as a paid-up policy, but, on the contrary, the provision is that if the insured does not, within six months, make his election and surrender the policy, at the end of that period all rights of the insured thereunder, of every kind and character, are forever gone. This seems to be the clear meaning of the language of the contract. The relation of an insurance company to its policy holders is purely contractual. There is ordinarily no element of trust relation involved. The parties, being competent to contract, had a legal right to insert such provisions in the agreement as they saw proper, and it is the duty of courts to construe and enforce agreements as made, and not to make new contracts for parties.

Our conclusion is that the right to paid-up insurance or surrender value was conditioned upon the surrender of the old policy within six months from the time it lapsed for the nonpayment of the premium, and that a failure on the part of the insured to make an election within the time caused the forfeiture, which was conditional in the first instance, to become absolute after the expiration of six months. This view is supported by the decided weight of authority outside of this state. Knapp v. Homeopathic Mut. L. Ins. Co. 117 U. S. 411, 29 L. ed. 960, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 807; *Bonner v. Mutual L. Ins. The supreme court of Arkansas, in Lenon v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 80 Ark. 563, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 193, 98 S. W. 117, 10 Ann. Cas. 467, and the supreme court of Kentucky, in Manhattan L. Ins. Co. v. Patterson, 109 Ky. 624, 53 L.R.A. 378, 95 Am. St. Rep. 393, 60 S. W. 383, are the only courts that seem to have taken an opposite view of this question. The appellate court for the first district, in Ingersoll v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 156 Ill. App. 568, following the Arkansas and Kentucky cases, reached the same conclusion announced by those courts. Aside from the fact that those cases are opposed to the decided weight of authority in the United States, we are not deeply impressed with the reasoning upon which the conclusions in those cases rest.

The judgment of the Appellate Court for the First District is correct, and the same will be affirmed.

I. Introduction.

The earlier cases on this subject will be found collected and discussed in the note to Wright v. Fire Ins. Asso. 19 L.R.A. 211. There has been very little change in the attitude of the courts since the publication of the earlier note, but such alteration of views as have taken place have been in favor of the divisibility of a policy covering different kinds of property separately valued. An insurance contract, in the absence of statute prescribing its form, is like any other contract; that is to say, just what the parties make it. It is to be interpreted with a view of giving expression to the real intention of the parties as gathered from the language of the written document.

In Taylor v. Anchor Mut. F. Ins. Co. 110 Iowa, 625, 57 L.R.A. 328, 93 Am. St. Rep. 261, 88 N. W. 807, the court, after referring to the conflict over the question whether the entirety of the premium is conclusive as to the entirety of the contract, said: "We think, however, the great weight of authority at the present time is to the effect that the question is one of the intention of the parties, and that if the condition of the property is such that the risk as to one class of property would be affected by the destruction of the other, then it must be presumed that the breach of condition as to one class is a violation of the contract, also, as to the other class, because the company would not have insured the one except upon the condition imposed as to the other; while, if the loss of the one class of property could not affect the risk as to the other, then it must be presumed that there was no intention that the conditions as to one should apply to the risk as to the other." 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Baltimore City Court in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George R. Gaither, for appellants:

The question of the kind of books to be kept, if books are kept, and the question as to their sufficiency for the purpose of the business conducted, is a question of fact for the jury to determine, and not a point of law to be decided by the court.

Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Kearney, 180 U. S. 132, 45 L. ed. 460, 21 Sup. Ct.

In Hanover F. Ins. Co. v. Crawford, 121 Ala. 258, 77 Am. St. Rep. 55, 25 So. 912, it is said: "It does not necessarily follow that because all the items insured are covered by one policy, that a breach of a condition subsequent in the policy will avoid it as to all the items or subjects covered. And, indeed, it does not necessarily follow that because there are many items or subjects insured by the policy that it may not be avoided as to all of them. Whether either of these results flow from a breach of a condition in a policy must depend upon the nature and character of the condition and the purpose to be accomplished. They are usually adopted by insurance companies to protect themselves against fraud, and they have been recognized and enforced by the courts as valid stipulations whenever they are reasonable. Whenever nothing but injustice will be accomplished by the enforcement of a condition, the courts cannot presume that it was the intention of the parties to have so contracted as to that particular item of property insured. The law will be guided by a respect to general convenience and equity and by the good sense and reasonableness of the particular case, for it must be supposed that it was the intention of the parties that such construction should take place."

In Hanover F. Ins. Co. v. Crawford, supra, in discussing a contract such as has just been referred to, the court said: "We are aware that in many of the states it is held that a policy like the present one is an entire contract, and a false warranty will avoid the entire policy. In others, the rule is different, and, unless the false warranty is of such a nature as to increase the hazard or risk assumed by the insurance company as to all the subjects separately valued, the assured is allowed to recover for the loss or destruction by fire of those not falling under the influence of this construction. This latter rule is declared by the courts, holding it to be the fairer one, and more clearly carrying out the intention of the parties to the contract."

But the insurance contract, where the form is not prescribed by statute, is made by the insurer, and the insured usually knows very little about it. He accepts the contract in good faith, pays his premium, and does not think much about the language of the policy. While this does not excuse his lack of knowledge of the terms of his contract, it has nevertheless led the courts to be extremely cautious in declaring forfeitures, especially for technical breach of the conditions of the policy.

In some of the cases, in construing policies as divisible, the courts invoked the rule of strict construction as against forfeiture. German Ins. Co. v. Miller, 39 Ill. App. 633.

It is a familiar rule that forfeitures are not favored, that contracts will be strictly construed to avoid forfeitures, and that the burden is upon him who claims a forfeiture to clearly show that he is entitled to it. Born v. Home Ins. Co. 110 Iowa, 379, 80 Am. St. Rep. 300, 81 N. W. 676.

The attitude of the courts might well be said to be that forfeitures of contracts are not favored,—especially insurance contracts. The rule against forfeitures has undoubtedly been strained to its limit to help the insured out of the consequences of a bad bargain, and this has probably been a good thing not only for the insured, but also, in the long run, for the business of the insurer. It is only by keeping in mind the object the courts have had in view, that their reasoning in interpreting the language of some of the insurance contracts can be understood.

This note is limited to a discussion of the kinds of contract of insurance which are severable, as between the insurer and insured; but it does not cover the divisibility of marine contracts because of termination of the voyage before completion,—the question in Ogden v. New York Firemen Ins. Co. 12 Johns. 114. Nor does it cover the divisibility of a contract of insurance as between subsequent and prior insurers, which was the question in Columbian Ins. Co. v. Lynch, 11 Johns. 233. It also excludes the question of what constitutes joint policies, and whether, for example, under such a policy, if the right of action is barred as to one of the parties, it is barred as to all. On this point see Monaghan v. Agricultural F. Ins. Co. 53 Mich. 238, 18 N. W. 797, and Perry v. Mechanics' Mut. Ins. Co. 11 Fed. 478.

cases in which the question is as to the forfeiture of the entire policy because of breach of condition as to part of the property, and the question whether there has been any forfeiture at all because of something done with respect to part of the property.

For example in Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Lorenz, — Ill. App. —, 29 N. E. 604, a provision in a policy that "if the property shall hereafter become mortgaged or encumbered this policy shall be null and void" was held to mean all of the insured property, so that the policy was not avoided by the mortgaging of part of the property.

And where real and personal property were insured in one policy in which it was provided that "if the property shall hereafter become mortgaged or encumbered" the policy shall become null and void, it was held that it was the property, and not a part of it, the mortgaging of which rendered the policy void, especially where the policy was to be avoided by the procurement of other insurance "on any of such property." Born v. Home Ins. Co. 110 Iowa, 379, 80 Am. St. Rep. 300, 81 N. W. 676.

And where a policy "on household and kitchen furniture, useful and ornamental, beds, bedding, . . . musical instruments," etc., was held not rendered void by a chattel mortgage on a piano which was one of the articles covered by it, as in North British & M. Ins. Co. v. Freeman, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 33 S. W. 1091, the court said that in order to render a policy void by a mortgage under a clause providing that the entire policy shall become void if the subject of insurance be personal property and become mortgaged, etc., the mortgage must have been upon the subject insured; that is, the entire property. The mortgages having reference to a part of the property, they cannot defeat the policy.

And in Sullivan v. Mercantile Town Mut. Ins. Co. 20 Okla. 460, 129 Am. St. Rep. 761, 94 Pac. 676, in holding that under the stipulation that the entire policy and each and every part thereof shall become void if the subject of insurance be personalty, and be or become encumbered, a forfeiture cannot be claimed because one item of personal property insured by said policy, separately set out, and separately valued therein, was encumbered by mortgage, where the subject of the insurance was partly real and partly personal property, the court said that the unquestioned meaning and effect of the words, "each and every part thereof," in the policy in controversy, is to render the policy an indivisible contract; and, if any part of same shall become void, then each and every part thereof shall be void. The holding under the facts of the case was that there was no forfeiture at all.

E. 546; Continental Ins. Co. v. Ward, 50 Kan. 346, 31 Pac. 1079; Trabue v. Dwelling House Ins. Co. 121 Mo. 75, 23 L.R.A. 719, 42 Am. St. Rep. 523, 25 S. W. 848; *Wright v. Fire Ins. Messrs. W. Calvin Chesnut and Gans & Haman, for appellee:

And in Dow v. National Assur. Co. 26 R. I. 379, 67 L.R.A. 479, 106 Am. St. Rep. 728, 58 Atl. 999, a policy covering household furniture of every description, containing a standard statutory clause that the policy shall be void if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership, unless other ownership be assented to in writing, was held to be wholly avoided where it appeared that a considerable portion of the furniture was owned by others than the insured or was bought on the instalment plan. The court said: "When insurance is contracted upon property as a whole, it is no answer to say that the insured owned a part of it. A new element would be introduced into the contract. We cannot say that the contract would have been made as it was, or even at all, if the fact had been known that only a small part of the property belonged to the plaintiff. Such a fact is deemed to be so important that it is no longer merely a provision of contract, but of statute; for the statute prescribes the clause in question. The terms of it apply to the policy as a whole. The policy is made void, not void simply as to the part of the property in which there may not be absolute ownership and valid as to the rest. We see no room for such a construction of the terms of the policy."

And where a policy for a specified sum on household and kitchen furniture specified generally, as "beds and bedding, linen, family wearing apparel, trunks, satchels, printed books and music, musical instruments, sewing machines," etc., it was held that the contract was not avoided because of the fact that the insured was not the shire Ins. Co. 96 Wis. 362, 71 N. W. 606. The court said: "It was intended to cover all the property of the classes named of which the plaintiff should be possessed with proper title, at the place designated, at any time during the life of the policy. If some articles of the classes named, which were in plaintiff's possession, should not be his property, it simply was not intended to insure such. That could not affect the contract as to other property in his possession of which he had proper title. The contract, in this sense and to this extent, is certainly divisible, and was intended to be so."

So, in Brehm Lumber Co. v. Svea Ins. Co. 36 Wash. 523, 68 L.R.A. 109, 79 Pac. 34; and in Worley v. State Ins. Co. 91 Iowa, 150, 51 Am. St. Rep. 334, 59 N. W. 16, the question was whether a forfeiture occurred through vacancy of one of several buildings insured; that is to say, whether the condition as to vacancy had been broken at all. Cases of this kind are not, of course, authorities on the question of the divisibility of the contract, and are therefore excluded.

And finally, cases which turn not upon the question of divisibility, but upon the question of whether the facts bring the parties within the rule as to divisibility, are not discussed.

For example, where a policy for $1,800 on a gristmill and $700 on machinery had been renewed several times by receipts in which the risk was distributed, and was finally renewed in general terms for $2,500 without distribution of risk, it was held that the intention was that the risk should not be distributed, the policy applying to both building and machinery. Driggs v. Albany Ins. Co. 10 Barb. 440. Cases of this kind are considered to be beyond the scope of this note.

The failure to comply with the iron-safe clause avoided the policy both as to the stock and as to the fixtures.

the question of the entirety of the premium. The weight of authority is against the proposition that a policy otherwise severable is rendered indivisible by the fact that a gross premium is stipulated. A distinction must be made between cases in which merely a gross premium is named, and those in which there is a gross premium and separate valuations. There would appear to be not much room for dispute as to the indivisibility of a policy of the former kind.

Where the policy is issued for a gross sum and covered different articles of property, not separately valued, the contract is entire and indivisible, and a breach of the condition of the policy as to encumbrances as to part of the property avoided the policy as a whole. Fitzgerald v. Atlanta Home Ins. Co. 61 App. Div. 350, 70 N. Y. Supp. 552.

In Burr v. German Ins. Co. 84 Wis. 76, 36 Am. St. Rep. 905, 54 N. W. 22, it was held that where the property covered by a policy is all personal and situated in the same warehouse, and the premium paid is a gross sum, the whole policy is avoided by the subsequent change of interest by virtue of a levy and seizure of part of the property. The court said: "The property insured being so situated that any increase in the risk, as to any portion thereof, necessarily increased the risk as to the whole, it is very obvious that the whole risk was a unit, and the contract of insurance an entire indivisible contract."

An insurance policy upon a quantity of cranberries insured for a gross sum is indivisible; and a breach of a condition against change of possession, as to part of the cranberries, will avoid the policy as to the whole. Carey v. German Ins. Co. 84 Wis. 80, 20 L.R.A. 267, 36 Am. St. Rep. 907, 54 N. W. 18.

But even where the different kinds or classes of property are separately valued, it has been held that the contract is entire where but one premium covering the insured property is paid.

In Massachusetts a policy covering a dwelling house and stable separately valued, upon which but one premium is paid, has 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

been held entire, so that it is wholly void if void in part. Thomas v. Commercial Union Assur. Co. 162 Mass. 29, 44 Am. St. Rep. 323, 37 N. E. 672.

In Gore Dist. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Samo, 2 Can. S. C. 411, a contract of insurance for a gross sum on a building and contents separately valued for one premium was held to be entire so as to be wholly avoided by a misrepresentation as to encumbrances affecting the realty. Recovery was also denied on the ground that the policy was made subject to the provision of a statute providing that "the concealment of any encumbrances on the insured property, or on the land on which it may be situated, . . . shall render the policy void, and no claim for loss shall be recoverable thereunder, unless the board of directors shall see fit, in their discretion, to waive the defect."

In Pennsylvania a contract of insurance in consideration of one premium, insuring separate houses for a gross sum but valuing them separately,—two dwelling houses being insured for $2,000 at $1,000 each and a house situated on an alley in the rear of the two buildings being insured for $400,—was held to be entire, so that a breach of condition as to vacancy of the house on the alley avoided the contract as to the other two. Kelly v. Humboldt F. Ins. Co. 4 Sadler (Pa.) 99, 6 Atl. 740.

In Iowa the early rule that when a premium on a policy is in a gross sum the contract is not divisible although the amount of insurance on different items of property is fixed, was held not changed by a provision that the premium will be 15 per cent of the amount insured, where it is clear that the premium was not 15 per cent and that part of it which was to be paid was a gross assessment on the entire insurance. Kahler v. Iowa State Ins. Co. 106 Iowa, 380, 76 N. W. 734. The policy in this case was on a grain elevator and machinery, and there was a false representation as to the ownership of the building, which was held to avoid the whole contract.

The prevailing opinion, however, as already stated, is against the gross premium test as to the divisibility of the contract.

Cas. 1912D, 79; Associated Firemen's Ins. Co. v. Assum, 5 Md. 165; Southern F. Ins. Co. v. Knight, 111 Ga. 622, 52 L.R.A. 70, 78 Am. St. Rep. 216, 36 S. E. 821; Coggins v. Aetna Ins. Co. 144 N. C. 7, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 839, 56 S. E. 506; St. Landry Wholesale Mercantile Co. v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. 114 La. 146, 38 So. 87, 3 Ann. Cas. 821.

Boyd, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants sued the appellee on a policy of insurance which included what is known as the iron-safe clause. At the conclusion of the case, the court refused two prayers offered by the plaintiffs, and granted two, instructing the jury to render a verdict for the defendant. The rulings on those prayers present the only questions for our consideration.

The appellants were engaged in the millinery business, trimming hats and selling them. They had been on High street, in Baltimore city, but, on the 23d of January, 1909, moved to Baltimore street, where they still were at the time of the fire at which the loss occurred, November 26, 1909. The policy of insurance was for the term of one year from the 22d of September, 1909, being for $1,000 on the stock of merchandise and $200 on the furniture and fixtures. The business was run by Mrs. Mankowitz, the wife of one, and Miss Joffe, the daughter of the other, appellant. Miss Joffe was absent the day of the fire by reason of illness,

In many of the cases, cited in other subdivisions of the note, holding insurance contracts divisible, the premium was entire. In others, while it does not clearly appear whether it was or not, the fair inference is that it was, and, in any event, no emphasis is laid upon the point, showing that it was not deemed important. In some cases, however, the question has been directly raised and decided against the contention of the entirety of the policy.

The broad rule laid down in the earlier Iowa decisions was modified in Taylor v. Anchor Ins. Co. 116 Iowa, 25, 57 L.R.A. 328, 93 Am. St. Rep. 261, 88 N. W. 807. Referring to the prior decisions, the court said: "In Garver v. Hawkeye Ins. Co. 69 Iowa, 202, 28 N. W. 555, the proposition is broadly laid down that where the premium is in gross the contract is not divisible, and a breach of warranty as to a part of the property will vitiate the policy as to the whole. But it is to be noticed that there the policy covered a barn and certain horses, and the court might well have held that the risk so far as the horses were concerned was involved in any risk affecting the barn; and the conclusion was therefore in accordance with the rule which we think to be the proper one, although we do not regard the reason given as satisfactory. In Kahler v. Iowa State Ins. Co. 106 Iowa, 380, 76 N. W. 734, the view expressed in the Garver Case, was qualified so as to leave the way open for adopting the position which we now take. We therefore hold on this question, as involved in the case before us, that entirety of premium does not necessarily prove that the contract is indivisible, and that where it appears from the terms of the policy that distinct items or classes of property were separately insured the policy may be valid as to one item or class, although it is invalid as to another item or class, by reason of breach of conditions of the policy with reference thereto, provided it appears, also, that the risk which it was intended to exclude by the condition which is broken does not apply to the other items or classes of property. In this case, a chattel mortgage on the cows 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) and horses could not in any way affect the nature of the risk as to the dwelling house and contents, and therefore we find that a breach of a condition in the policy as to the one class of property did not invalidate the insurance as to the other."

In Kentucky although the premium is entire, a contract has been held severable where separate values are placed upon different classes of property insured. Thompson v. Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co. 10 Ky. L. Rep. 282.

In Nebraska a policy naming a single premium, and classifying the property insured, and limiting the insurance to a stated amount on each class, is held divisible, so that a breach of condition as to encumbrances on the real estate will not avoid the contract as to personal property. Johansen v. Home F. Ins. Co. 54 Neb. 548, 74 N. W. 866, citing State Ins. Co. v. Schreck. 27 Neb. 527, 6 L.R.A. 524, 20 Am. St. Rep. 696, 43 N. W. 340, and Phenix Ins. Co. v. Grimes, 33 Neb. 340, 50 N. W. 168.

In Missouri a policy covering several separate articles or species of property separately insured at different amounts stated in the policy was held severable, although the insurance is for a gross sum and premium, so that a breach of condition as to the encumbrances on the real estate will not avoid the policy as to the personalty. Crook v. Phenix Ins. Co. 38 Mo. App. 582. The policy in this case did not contain such a clause as was stated obiter in American Ins. Co. v. Barnett, 73 Mo. 364, 39 Am. Rep. 517 would render the policy indivisible.

In Pratt v. Dewling House Mut. F. Ins. Co. 130 N. Y. 206, 41 N. Y. S. R. 303, 29 N. E. 117, it was said that whatever the rule may be elsewhere it is settled in New York state that where insurance is made on different kinds of property separately valued, the contract is severable even if but one premium is paid and the amount insured is the sum total of the valuation.

And in Texas where a condition of the policy breached was, "and unless such books and inventories are produced and delivered to this company for examination, this poland Mrs. Mankowitz and a Miss Rosen, who was employed to trim hats, were at the store on that day. Mr. Mankowitz was a tailor, but he kept the books, paid the bills, etc., for the millinery business, going to the store every night, and at other times when he was not engaged in his regular occupation. He was not working the day of the fire, but some time before it started he had left the millinery store to pay a bill which was due. When Miss Joffe was there, it was her custom to go to dinner at 12 o'clock and return at half past 12, and then Mrs. Mankowitz would go; but as Miss Joffe was not there on November 26, 1909, Mrs. Mankowitz and Miss Rosen left for dinner at the same time,—12 o'clock. Mrs. Mankowitz went to her brother-in-law's, which was near the store, and only intended to be away twenty minutes or half an hour. She locked the store door, and while she was at luncheon heard an alarm of fire, and upon going out on the street found it was at their store. After the fire was discovered, a neighbor broke the door open, but the stock of goods was practically ruined by fire and water, and the fixtures were very much injured.

By the first prayer granted, the jury was instructed "that it appears from the plaintiffs' own evidence that they failed to comply with the provision of the policy sued on, known as the iron-safe clause," and by the second "that it appears from the plaintiffs' own evidence that the plaintiffs did not keep the books required by the condition of icy shall be null and void, and no suit or action shall be maintained hereon," and the policy covered a stock of goods in a specified amount as well as other property, it was held that the fact that the policy was issued for a gross premium would not make the contract entire so as to prevent recovery for the property insured other than the stock. Sun Mut. Ins. Co. v. Tufts, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 147, 50 S. W. 180. The court said: "The books and inventories to be kept could serve only one purpose, that of affording means by which the amount of loss on stock could be ascertained, and had no relation whatever to the other property."

b. Entirety of risk.

In some instances the courts have declared policies entire, although the property was insured under separate valuations, where the risk as to all of the property is increased by a breach of the contract as to part of it. This would seem to be a very important inquiry, for, manifestly, it may well be said that if the insurer had known of the increased hazard he would not have issued a policy on any of the property.

"It may be said," declared the court in Taylor v. Anchor Mut. F. Ins. Co. 116 Iowa, 625, 57 L.R.A. 323, 93 Am. St. Rep. 261, 88 N. W. 807, "that several cases in which courts have announced the unqualified rule that a breach of condition as to one class or item of property covered by the policy will constitute a breach of the contract as to all the property covered, are cases where the different classes or items of property were so situated with reference to each other that the risk as to one constituted a risk as to all."

It has been held that breach of condition as to encumbrances on either personalty or realty, or false statements as to title or encumbrances as to realty, where the policy covers both a house and its contents, so increases the risk on the whole subject of insurance as to render the contract indivisible.

Fed. 984, it was held that a policy insuring a dwelling house and furniture separately valued, containing a provision that "this entire policy unless otherwise provided by agreement, indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void, . . . if the hazard be increased by any means within the control or knowledge of the insured; . . . or if the subject of insurance be personal property and be or become encumbered by a chattel mortgage," was rendered wholly void by a chattel mortgage. The court said: "Encumbrance of insured property increases the hazard to the insurer, because it lessens the interest of the insured in the property to the amount of the encumbrance, and to that extent at least lessens his interest in protecting the property from loss or destruction. And if the hazard was increased as to the household furniture, it was of necessity increased as to the dwelling house which contained it, for the entire property was insured as one risk, and was so closely connected and associated together that the destruction of a part by fire would almost inevitably result in the destruction of the whole."

Where false statements as to the title of the insured in real estate, and as to encumbrance thereon, were made before the issuance of the policy, which also covered personal property therein, it was held that the entire contract was avoided thereby. Ætna Ins. Co. v. Resh, 44 Mich. 55, 38 Am. Rep. 223, 6 N. W. 114. The court said: "If it was for the interest of the insured to cause or suffer a loss of the building, because he had not the interest therein he had represented, it would, we think, be idle to say that such fact would not increase the risk upon the personal property in such building. It would be very unsafe, therefore, to assume that the company would have taken a risk upon the personal property, separate from the building, and therefore, because the rate and the amount insured upon the personal can be separated from that on the building, to hold that the contract is divisible. That the company would have taken a risk upon the personal property alone, to a like amount and at the policy." Each of them concluded with an instruction that the verdict must be for the defendant.

The clause in this policy relied on was as follows:

Iron-Safe Clause. Warranty to Keep Books and Inventories, and to Produce Them in Case of Loss.

The following covenant and warranty is hereby made a part of this policy:

1st. The assured will take a complete itemized inventory of stock on hand at least once in each calendar year, and unless such inventory has been taken within twelve calendar months prior to the date of this policy, one shall be taken in detail within thirty days of issuance of this policy, or the same rate, we may assume, even with full knowledge that the insured had no title to the building; but it would be hazardous to assume that, with such knowledge, the company would have written upon both the personal property and the building, so that upon the whole policy the insured would be more interested in a loss of both than in their protection."

Breach of warranty of title in an insurance policy with respect to the building will avoid the insurance on the contents, although building and contents were insured for separate amounts for an entire premium, where the risk upon both items is the same. Goorberg v. Western Assur. Co. 150 Cal. 510, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 876, 119 Am. St. Rep. 876, 89 Pac. 130, 11 Ann. Cas. 801.

But it has also been held that insurance upon a building and its contents is a single, and not a distinct, risk, so that such a policy is wholly avoided by false swearing as to personal property destroyed which renders the policy void as to that class of property, although the premium is distributed partly to the realty and partly to the personalty. Worachek v. New Denmark Mut. Home F. Ins. Co. 102 Wis. 88, 78 N. W. 411.

Different classes of personal property situated in the same building have been declared subject to the same risk. The nature of the condition broken might, however, have some effect on this question. If, for example, there was a false statement as to the ownership of the building in which the insured property was located, it is apparent that this might affect the entire property covered by the policy. If, however, there was a breach of condition as to encumbrances on part of the property, it is not so clear that the entire risk would be affected.

In McWilliams v. Cascade F. & M. Ins. Co. 7 Wash. 48, 34 Pac. 140, however, under a policy for a gross sum on different classes of personal property in a building, separately valued, the property insured including a piano valued at $200, it was held that since the property was all situated in the same building it was therefore this policy shall be null and void from such date, and upon demand of the assured the unearned premium from such date shall be returned.

2d. The assured will keep a set of books, which shall clearly and plainly present a complete record of business transacted, including all purchases, sales, and shipments, both for cash and credit, from date of inventory as provided for in the first section of this clause and during the continuance of this policy.

3d. The assured will keep such books and inventory and also the last preceding inventory, if such has been taken, securely locked in a fireproof safe at night, and at all times when the building mentioned in this policy is not actually open for business subject to the same risk, so that where there was a breach of the contract as to sole ownership of the piano the whole policy was avoided.

Different buildings insured under a single policy may also be so situated with reference to one another as to be subject to the same risk, so that a breach of condition as to one of them will avoid the entire contract.

Although a policy of insurance against fire, lightning, tornado, and windstorm, so written as to place separate valuations upon separate subjects of insurance, will ordinarily be severable, it will not be so if the risk intended to be excluded by a condition which has been violated affected the item of property for the destruction of which a recovery is sought. Republic County Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 69 Kan. 146, 105 Am. St. Rep. 157, 76 Pac. 419, 2 Ann. Cas. 20. In this case the subject of insurance was a house, hay and grain, and a double graincrib. The graincrib stood between 200 and 300 feet from the house. The condition breached was the clause against vacancy. The graincrib was blown down while the house was unoccupied. The court said: "In the policy under consideration there is nothing whatever to indicate that the company would have insured the hay and grain at all except as it fell under the protection of a guardian of the premises, or that it would have entertained for a moment an application for the insurance of an isolated unfrequented cornercrib and stable, the prey of the elements, devoted merely to the shelter of unused implements and machinery, and subject to be made the rendezvous of tramps. To assume that it would have done so involves an absolute and perfectly arbitrary repudiation of the conspicuous purpose of the vacancy clause in the contract. Any ordinary individual in charge of premises would exercise a preservative superintendence over them,—would take some steps to anchor a ruffed or toppling stack of hay before he would suffer it to scatter before the wind; and would secure loosened boards about the crib, close-widening apertures, brace-racked timbers, and otherwise fortify ness, or, failing in this, the assured will keep such books and inventories in some place not exposed to a fire which would destroy the aforesaid building. In the event of failure to produce such set of books and inventories for the inspection of this company, this policy shall become null and void, and such failure shall constitute a perpetual bar to any recovery thereon.

Mr. Mankowitz admitted that they did not have a safe, but testified that every night he carried such books as they had to his brother's store, which, according to his evidence, was about six or seven houses away, and according to that of his brother was about ten houses, from the one in which the fire occurred. He arranged with his brother that the books were to be taken to the latter's store every night, when the plaintiffs' store was closed, and then taken back in the morning. They were kept in a drawer in the brother's store, as the latter's safe was already full. On the morning of the fire, Mr. Mankowitz got the books and took them to the store.

We do not understand the appellee to claim that the plaintiffs could not keep the books at the brother's, as they were kept there, but the important question is whether the store was actually open for business at the time of the fire, within the meaning of the policy. As the books and inventory were not kept in a safe, it was undoubtedly the duty of the plaintiffs to keep them in some place, not exposed to a fire which the rigidity of the structure against storms."

On the other hand, it has been held that the risk on personal property in a building covered by the same policy is not increased by a misstatement as to the ownership of the ground on which the building stood.

A policy for a gross premium, insuring a storehouse for $200 and a stock of goods therein for $3,800, is not avoided as to the goods by the fact that the insured was not the owner in fee of the ground in which the building stood, where there was no misrepresentation or concealment of the facts on his part. Coleman v. New Orleans Ins. Co. 49 Ohio St. 310, 16 L.R.A. 174, 34 Am. St. Rep. 565, 31 N. E. 279. The court said: "Forfeitures do not readily find favor in the law, and courts are reluctant to declare and enforce them, if by reasonable interpretation it can be avoided. It is not likely that in this case the small amount of insurance on the storehouse constituted any inducement for the insurance placed upon the stock of goods; and it does not appear that the rates upon these classes of property were different, nor how it could make any difference if they were, since the only effect, in this respect, of holding the contract severable, is that the insurance company is enabled to retain the whole of the premium, which it accepted as the consideration for the insurance of all the property, for the lesser risk on part of the property only; and it is not to be presumed that the premium for the insurance of part only of the property would exceed that accepted for the risk on all of it. It was not shown at the trial that the plaintiffs were guilty of any misrepresentation or intentional concealment concerning the title to the land on which the storehouse stood. No inquiry was made of them about it. The subject was not a matter of negotiation between the parties in effecting the insurance, and the plaintiffs were ignorant of the condition, for the breach of which the company claims the right to forfeit the whole policy. If the position taken by the company be correct, the condition was broken when the policy was issued, and there was, therefore, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

no consideration for the premium that was paid, for no risk attached; and yet the company, while asserting the invalidity of the contract, holds on to its fruits. This is not a very consistent position, nor a very just one. A just result is reached, and, as we think, the lawful one, by holding, as we do, that the contract of insurance in this case is severable, and the breach of the condition as to the title of the land does not defeat the plaintiffs' right to recover for the loss of the stock of goods insured by the policy in suit."

The Coleman Case was followed in Phillips v. Ohio Farmers' Ins. Co. 13 Ohio C. C. 679, 6 Ohio C. D. 266, in which it was held that a policy on a building, furniture, etc., separately valued, was divisible so that there might be a recovery on the personal property although there had been a breach of condition as to encumbrances and an overstatement of value in respect to the real estate.

A breach of a condition as to part of a policy as to encumbrances on a house will not avoid the policy as to furniture therein separately appraised, where the risk is not affected thereby. Loehner v. Home Mut. Ins. Co. 17 Mo. 247, affirmed in 19 Mo. 628.

So, the violation of the iron-safe clause has been held not to affect the risk in the building in which the personal property was.

The violation of the iron-safe clause of the policy covering a storehouse, fixtures, and stock of goods will not prevent the insured from recovering for the loss of the storehouse and fixtures. Hanover F. Ins. Co. v. Crawford, 121 Ala. 258, 77 Am. St. Rep. 55, 25 So. 912. The court said: "We are unable to see how a failure to comply with the condition could possibly affect the risk upon the building and fixtures. If broken by the assured and a loss occurs by fire, the assured loses the value of his goods, and this, too, whether the fire is occasioned by his wilfulness, neglect, accident, or the incendiarism of another. There could then be no inducement for him to destroy the building, or the building and its contents. Unlike the case, in this respect where there would destroy the building, at night, and at all times when the building was not actually open for business. It cannot be doubted that in a literal sense the building was not actually open for business when the fire occurred, and it would seem to be equally clear that if it had been open the probabilities are that the fire would not have been so disastrous (if it had occurred at all), and, at any rate, the books could have been easily saved. They are thus described in the testimony: "Three of them were small books of the size of the one produced, and one was a 200-page ledger; the book produced was a book about 12 inches long by 4 inches wide by three quarters of an inch thick, weighing about 6 ounces. The ledger was a little wider and a little thicker." An inventory, made just before they moved to Baltimore street was in one of the books. All but one of them was totally destroyed by the fire, and that was what Mr. Mankowitz called "the sales book." They could by reason of their size very easily have been taken to his brother's when Mrs. Mankowitz went there to dinner.

It is true that she only expected to be absent about half an hour, but she was gone long enough for the fire to make such headway that, according to the plaintiffs' claim, the stock was practically destroyed and the fixtures very much damaged. If it be conceded that the plaintiffs had such books and inventory as this clause required, the very object of the requirement was deis a misrepresentation as to ownership of a building containing machinery more or less attached to the building, and both the building and the machinery are the subjects of insurance in the same policy. Here, we can well see how the hazard or risk upon the machinery would be increased if there was a false warranty as to the ownership of the building. The assured might be induced, if allowed to recover for loss of machinery, notwithstanding his false warranty which would deprive of the right to recover for the loss of the house, to destroy the house for the purpose of getting the insurance upon the machinery. . . . Whatever may be the rule as to the effect of false warranties, we are clearly of the opinion that the condition under consideration as to its application cannot, by any rule of construction consonant with justice and reason and the manifest intention of the parties, be made to so apply to the building and fixtures as that a breach of it would defeat his recovery for their loss."

Attention should also be called to the fact that recovery on part of the property, where the policy covered a building and its contents, has also been allowed in a number of cases in which the question of entirety of hazard is not discussed. For illustration see infra, IV. b. See also cases cited in note to Wright v. Fire Ins. Asso. 19 L.R.A. 211.

c. Separate valuation.

1. In general.

Separate valuation of each kind or class of property insured is held, in some jurisdictions, to be controlling on the question of the entirety of the contract.

The New York rule is that having made the property distinct subjects of insurance by separately valuing it, by distributing the insurer's risk among the several subjects of insurance, and limiting its risks as to each, the parties to the contract will be deemed to have intended as many distinct insurances as there may be subjects of insurance; and the avoidance of the policy by breach of its condition as to one of the subjects of insurance will not have the effect of avoiding it as to the others, in the absence of language clearly indicating that such was the intention of the parties. American Artistic Gold Stamping Co. v. Glens Falls Ins. Co. 1 Misc. 114, 20 N. Y. Supp. 646.

In Merrill v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 10 Hun, 428, an action on a policy which insured separately and in separate sums, a dwelling house and barns and certain personal property in each of the buildings, it was held that a breach of the condition as to encumbrance of the real estate did not affect the insurance on the rest of the property.

In Kiernan v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 81 Hun, 373, 63 N. Y. S. R. 146, 30 N. Y. Supp. 892, it was held, under a policy insuring a dwelling house and personal property therein in separate amounts, and providing that "if the subject of insurance be personal property and be or become encumbered by chattel mortgage," and also that "if the property, real or personal, covered by this policy, be or become encumbered by mortgage, trust deed, judgment, or otherwise, this entire policy shall be void unless otherwise provided," etc.,—that a breach of the condition as to the real property left the policy good as to the personalty.

In Kansas, a contract of insurance is held severable where separate valuations are placed upon different subjects of insurance, as, for example, $800 on a dwelling house and $200 on the furniture therein. German Ins. Co. v. York, 48 Kan. 488, 30 Am. St. Rep. 313, 29 Pac. 586.

In Missouri breach of condition as to additional insurance as to part of property covered by a policy will not invalidate it as to other property included therein and separately valued. Jenkins v. German Ins. Co. 58 Mo. App. 210.

In Oregon a contract placing $1,600 on a dwelling house and $400 on the personalty therein was held severable so as not to render the whole contract void by a breach of condition as to sole ownership of the house. Oatman v. Bankers' Fire Relief Asso. 66 Or. 388, 133 Pac. 1183, 134 Pac. 1033.

And in Texas breach of warranty as to feated by reason of the plaintiffs' representative leaving them where they were, unprotected in case of fire in her absence. If an insured can relieve himself of the obligation of his warranty to produce the books and inventory in case of fire, by shutting up his store for half an hour with no one in it, and claiming the books, etc., were kept, but were destroyed, there is but little protection to the insurer by such a clause, and it might as well be abandoned. If it can be done for half an hour, then why not for an hour or more?

Such a clause in an insurance policy should undoubtedly receive "a fair and reasonable interpretation," as the authorities have frequently said of it; but it will be observed that in considering such a question as the one now been largely gov of each partic tempting to lay there is no q caused the loss fault or neglig naturally shrink terpretation on will deprive the cover, by reason fense, if that ca even then, when are clear and ur right to make ne or ignore those simply to avoid view of the many the ownership of personalty insured does not defeat the right of recovery for loss of real estate included in the same policy and separately valued. Georgia Home Ins. Co. v. Brady, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 41 S. W. 513. The court said: "It is well established that stipulations as to ownership are warranties only as to property specified in such stipulations, and, upon a policy embracing real and personal property, such stipulations are divisible."

But in Wisconsin a misrepresentation as to existing encumbrances as to part of the property covered by a policy and separately valued avoids the whole contract, since it is entire. Schumitsch v. American Ins. Co. 48 Wis. 26, 3 N. W. 595. "The reason," said the court, "is that the contract of insurance is entire, and the insurer has the right to know what the interest of the insured in the property is, and to have disclosed all material facts affecting the risk; for the risk is assumed upon the express condition that these facts have been accurately and truly stated in the application."

And in Washington, where a provision of a policy was that it should be void if the interest of the insured in the property covered thereby were other than that of sole owner, it was held that a breach of condition as to a piano insured avoided the contract as to other classes of property covered by the policy and separately valued. McWilliams v. Cascade F. & M. Ins. Co. 7 Wash. 48, 34 Pac. 140. The court said: "The respondent accepted this policy with all its provisions and conditions, and it would be neither reasonable nor equitable to permit her, after she has violated one of its conditions as to a part of the risk, to now assert that this condition only affected that particular portion of the risk to which the breach related. . . . To hold the appellant liable upon this policy would be to impose upon it an obligation which it never agreed to assume, and would be equivalent to making a contract for the parties different from that which they themselves made, and then enforcing it against one of them for the benefit of the other. This the court must decline to do. Insurance companies, like private, perfect right to ma tion to their bu subserve their ow with such compa freely entered i upon both the as if they are violat is thereby relea thereunder."

It has been held a marine policy, of bales of cotton amount per bale ance of each bale of N. A. 5 Clara said: "In what valuation of an show that that ar Was intended to without a valuation just as well. The nothing to do with insured? The ins by force of the purpose, and is j the same extent, whether the article valued singly, or at all."

2. Classes of the

It would hardly tion that the div contract does not of property which valued. The reason there is a separate risk as to each cla ble policy; but not of which each class covers a house therein, in a fixed and a specified sum contains a provision and part of the gaged, the rule as mean that there r property not mortg and personal; but clause will show a tendency in some instances to do more for the protection of the insured than they seemed ready to do for themselves, although the clause has been very generally recognized as valid and reasonable, and has been declared to be useful and desirable, not simply for the insurer, but for the honest insured.

It may be that it might be well to require by legislation insurance companies making use of it to make it so prominent in the policies, or to give such notice of it, as will leave no question about the insured having notice of it, when it is inserted in or attached to a policy, as we do not understand that all standard policies on stocks of merchandise contain it; but in this case the plaintiffs knew of it, and hence do not even have the excuse of their ignorance of such provision. They knew of the necessity of taking their books out of the building when the store was not actually open for business, and presumably they knew the object of such a provision. If they had had a safe in the store, it would not have been unreasonable to require them to place those four little books in the safe before shutting up the store and leaving it without protection. The undoubted fact is that the storeroom was left unprotected long enough to give the fire such headway as to consume the contents before anyone could extinguish it. Customers not only could not enter the room, but those who discovered the fire could not, until the door was finally broken open. And, as we have good as to the reality. In other words, under such a contract there is only one division, and that is between the reality and the personality. The courts hold that there can be no recovery for the loss on personal property although only a part of it was mortgaged.

Although a policy covering different classes of property valued separately is severable, it is indivisible as to each class so valued. If, for example, a stock of goods is separately valued in a policy covering goods and building, an encumbrance of part of the goods will invalidate the insurance on the entire stock. Home F. Ins. Co. v. Bernstein, 55 Neb. 260, 75 N. W. 839.

A policy on a stock of merchandise and on barbers' furniture and fixtures, separable as to these two classes of property, is invalidated as to the furniture and fixtures by a mortgage of a portion of them, contrary to the provision of the policy. Vucci v. North Britain & M. Ins. Co. 88 N. Y. Supp. 986.

Where a policy insures both real and personal property, a breach of the condition as to sole ownership as to part of the personal property avoids the entire contract as to the personal property. Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Green, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 36 S. W. 143. The court said that the contract as to real and personal property was divisible, and that it might fail as to one class of property and be sustained as to the other, but that as to personal property it was entire.

d. Special language of contract.

The question of divisibility of risk has sometimes turned upon the special language of the contract. In the last analysis, of course, the question, as stated, is one of intention, to be determined from the words in which the agreement is expressed. Where the language is not prescribed by statute it would seem to be not a difficult matter so to draw the contract as to relieve it from any ambiguity as to its entirety or severability. It is not likely, however, that a provision that "the policy" shall be avoided 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

for a breach of any of its conditions would prevent the contract from being declared divisible, if it were otherwise so.

In Dacey v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 21 Hun, 83, a dwelling house and certain classes of personal property were insured under separate valuations. The policy contained, among other things, a provision that "if the property shall become encumbered by mortgage . . . then and in every such case the policy shall be null and void until the written consent of the company at the home office is obtained." Part of the property was mortgaged before a loss occurred. The written consent of the company not having been obtained, it was held that the policy was void as to the property mortgaged.

It would seem that a provision that the "entire" policy shall become void by a breach of any of its conditions would be deemed to evidence an intention to make the contract nondivisible, but there is a conflict of opinion upon this question.

It has been held that a policy insuring furniture for a certain sum, and providing that "this entire policy shall be void" for a breach of its conditions, is manifestly entire, and is therefore rendered wholly void by a breach of its conditions as to a part of the property. Dumas v. Northwestern Nat. Ins. Co. 12 App. D. C. 245, 40 L.R.A. 353.

And under a provision that "this entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon or added hereto, shall be void . . . if a building herein described, whether intended for occupancy by owner or tenant, be or become vacant or unoccupied and so remain for ten days," the policy, covering both a house and personal property therein, was held to be rendered wholly void by the nonoccupancy of the house. Agricultural Ins. Co. v. Hamilton, 82 Md. 88, 30 L.R.A. 633, 51 Am. St. Rep. 457, 33 Atl. 429.

In Shoup v. Dwelling-House F. Ins. Co. 51 Mo. App. 286, a stipulation that the "entire policy" would be avoided by misrepresentation as to title was held to render the contract void as to personal property as well as real estate by breach of the condialready indicated, the store being closed, without anyone in charge, and the books being left there exposed, have deprived the insurer of the kind of evidence of the loss it was by the express terms of the contract entitled to. We do not feel justified in saying that because it was intended to close the store for half an hour, and then open it again, it was during the half hour in which the fire occurred actually open for business, and hence the clause in the policy does not apply. The provision not only says the building must be open for business to avoid the necessity of putting the books in a safe, or, in the alternative, keeping them in some place where they would not be exposed to a fire in the building, but it says actually open for business. It cannot be correctly open for locked up, with hour, and no one or protect the It will be a clause a policy inventory is hence we held erican Ins. Co. (N.S.) 345, 6 had become not failing to take limited, and thus making an inventory before a loss be applicable here keep the books tion as to the latter class of property. The court in this case was greatly influenced by the decision of Holloway v. Dwelling-House Ins. Co. 48 Mo. App. 1, which was afterwards reversed in 121 Mo. 87, 25 S. W. 850, see infra.

In Elliott v. Teutonia Ins. Co. 20 Pa. Super. Ct. 359, a policy covering three items: (1) A stated amount on certain stock; (2) a stated amount on certain machinery; (3) a stated amount on factory and office fixtures,—providing that the entire policy should be void for a breach of its conditions, was declared wholly invalidated by a failure of the insured to disclose to the insurer that the former did not own the machinery.

In Germier v. Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. 109 La. 341, 33 So. 361, misrepresentation as to the ownership of a house where the representation was specifically declared in the policy to constitute a warranty, was held to avoid the contract as to the personal property, under a provision "that the entire policy shall be" void if there be either concealment or misrepresentation as to that subject.

And in Germania F. Ins. Co. v. Schild, 69 Ohio St. 136, 100 Am. St. Rep. 663, 68 N. E. 706, it was held that an insurance policy which contains a stipulation that "this entire policy shall be void" on certain named conditions, is not a severable risk, although the amount of insurance is distributed among different classes or articles of property. As to this point the Coleman Case, supra, was distinguished.

On the other hand, it seems to be the prevailing opinion that the word "entire" does not refer to the whole risk, but merely to that part of the property covered by the policy as to which there has been a breach. The repugnance of courts against declaring a forfeiture of the entire policy for a technical breach of conditions touching part of the risk has undoubtedly led to the adoption of this rule, which seems, upon first examination, contrary to the plain language of the contract. There is, however, some room for the operation of the word "entire," even under this construction; for, manifestly, where the policy covers or classes of property may also cover in any of these people, may insure under separate might rule that the forfeiture would not invalidate by a breach of personalty. Nevertheless that the provision the entire policy any part of the although the breach only to part of the people, if part of it to the provision the construction forfeiture of the mit recovery on erty may seem to be said that the wholly meaning any rate, is well tions.

Where a policy dwelling house and tents thereof, it "the entire policy of condition as void as to person the forfeiture of by change of the House Ins. Co. 142 Am. St. Rep. court said: "When and separate insurance, a part on require two separate dental circumstances merely they are does not merge the alone were destroyed icy applying to the basis of recovery of making a contract in the case. The according to legal made is severable ing to indicate the provided, and, "in the event of failure to produce such set of books and inventories for the inspection of this company, this policy shall become null and void, and such failure shall constitute a perpetual bar to any recovery thereon." The latter does not make a policy null and void merely because the assured does not keep his books in a safe, or as provided in the alternative, but the failure to produce the books and inventories has that effect, and constitutes a bar to recovery for a loss sustained. In other words, if there had been no fire, the closing of the store on this occasion would not have invalidated the policy, but as the fire did occur, and did confessedly prevent the books and inventories from being produced, then there can be no recovery in the absence of such books and inventories, unless the assured did what they agreed to do for the safe-keeping of the books and inventories, or can be excused from not doing so.

In that connection, we would add that we would have no hesitation in holding that if an assured, acting in good faith, placed the books in a safe which he believed to be fire-proof, or in some place which he had the right to believe was not exposed to a fire which would destroy the building, the mere failure to produce the books would not necessarily be a bar to his recovery. On the contrary, we could readily concur in the view taken by the Supreme Court in Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Kearney, 180 U. S. 132, 45 L. ed. 460, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 326, and other cases on such a ques-assumed the risk on the house without taking one also on the goods, nor vice versa. The contract as to each admitted of being separately executed as to the separate subjects of insurance. The application is for separate insurance, and it is kept distinct in the policy." This case was followed in Hollaway v. Dwelling House Ins. Co. 121 Mo. 87, 25 S. W. 850, reversing 48 Mo. App. 1.

The fact that the risk is divisible, however, does not mean that the contract may in all cases be treated as if there were two separate and distinct policies. See on this point Howe Ins. Co. v. Connelly, II. g. Fraud, infra.

The New York rule as to the severability of an insurance contract is not affected by a provision that "this entire policy shall be void," etc., in case of a breach of the condition. American Artistic Gold Stamping Co. v. Glens Falls Ins. Co. 1 Misc. 114, 20 N. Y. Supp. 646.

In Donley v. Glens Falls Ins. Co. 184 N. Y. 107, 76 N. E. 914, 6 Ann. Cas. 81, the court said: "Whatever our views might be if the question were new, we regard it as settled that where, by the same policy, different classes of property, each separately valued, are insured for distinct amounts, even if the premium for the aggregate amount is paid in gross, the contract is severable, and a breach of warranty as to one subject of insurance only does not affect the policy as to the others, unless it clearly appears that such was the intention." In this case the provision was that the entire policy should be void in case of a breach. The court said that the recent cases hold that this means the entire policy so far as it relates to the subject of insurance affected by the breach, because a severable policy is equivalent to so many policies as there are classes of property separately valued. In other words, the breach avoids the entire policy relating to the risk to which the warranty applies.

A policy on a stock of goods separately valued, and a store and fixtures separately valued, otherwise a severable contract, is not rendered indivisible by a provision that the entire policy shall be void in case of condition broken. Adler v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 17 Misc. 347, 39 N. Y. Supp. 1070. The court said: "It is not within the power of the insurer to make a divisible contract an entire contract by calling it so, and we must seek an intention agreeable to the kind of contract which he was actually making; that is to say, a policy embracing more than one subject and entire as to each subject. That intention we think is quite manifest. It will be observed that the provision in which the words, 'this entire contract,' occur, refers to the 'subject of insurance' becoming encumbered by chattel mortgages. The subject of insurance, in a policy insuring separate risks, means the subject of each separate risk, as to each of which there is, under the cases, a divisible contract or policy; and the provision that the entire policy would be void if the subject of insurance becomes encumbered means that the whole insurance upon that particular subject or risk should be so affected. A portion only of the goods separately insured might be mortgaged, but under this clause avoiding the entire policy in case the subject of insurance be mortgaged, the insurer provided that the entire insurance upon all the goods in that class should be void though only a part were mortgaged. As to each class of insurance the policy is entire, and not otherwise, and the insurer must be deemed to have had that legal distinction in view when employing the term under consideration."

In Miller v. Delaware Ins. Co. 14 Okla. 81, 65 L.R.A. 173, 75 Pac. 1121, 2 Ann. Cas. 17, the court said: "We think that the rule should be established here that where, by a policy, different classes of property are insured, and each class is separated from the others and insured for a specific amount, and there is a breach of the contract as to one class of the property insured, the contract should be considered not as one entire in itself, but as one which is severable, and in which the separate amounts specified may be distinguished, and a recovery had for one or more of them without regard to

ion. Mr. Justice Harlan said: "We are of opinion that the failure to produce the books and inventory referred to in the policy means a failure to produce them if they are in existence when called for, or if they have been lost or destroyed by the fault, negligence, or design of the insured," and, as the failure to produce them in this case was by reason of the fault and negligence of the plaintiffs in leaving them in the store when it was not actually open for business, they cannot be excused.

The cases relied on by the appellants on this point were Sun Ins. Co. v. Jones, 54 Ark. 376, 15 S. W. 1034; Jones v. Southern Ins. Co. (C. C.) 38 Fed. 19; Major v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 112 Mo. App. 235, 86 S. W. 883; and Phoenix Ins. Co. v.

Schwartz, 115 Ga. 113, 57 L.R.A. 752, 90 Am. St. Rep. 98, 41 S. E. 240. In the two first named, which referred to the same fire, it was held that the store was still open for business. In the Missouri case, a physician who had a drug store responded to an urgent call to see an ill patient, and during his absence of ten or fifteen minutes the fire occurred. He had a safe, but did not put the books in it in his absence, and did not remember whether he had locked the door of the store. The court said the store was still open for business. In the Georgia case, there was a suspension of business, caused by a fire raging in the neighborhood and threatening the building. In none of those cases did the courts think the parties were at fault, but w. cannot say the other, provided the contract is not affected by any question of fraud, unlawful act condemned by public policy, or any increase of the risk to the company on the whole property insured because of the breach." It was held that the rule was not affected by the fact that the provision as to forfeiture was that "this entire policy shall become null and void."

A policy covering different classes of property separately valued, including a certain amount on machinery, is not rendered void by a mortgage of a cotton press particularly described, although the contract contained a provision that the entire policy shall be void if the subject-matter of the insurance is personal property and becomes encumbered by chattel mortgage. Delaware Ins. Co. v. Harris, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 537, 64 S. W. 867.

A policy on a stock of goods and certain furniture and fixtures, providing that this entire policy shall be void if the subject of insurance be "personal property and be or become encumbered by chattel mortgage," is not rendered entirely void by a chattel mortgage on the stock. Spring Garden Ins. Co. v. Brown, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 143 S. W. 292. The court said: "The policy does not provide for a forfeiture, in whole or in part, if part only of the subject of insurance be or become encumbered with a chattel mortgage."

And in Texas it is also held that where the provision for the forfeiture of the entire policy depends upon the breach of the provision "if the subject of insurance be personal property, and be or become encumbered," there is no forfeiture at all if the policy covers both real and personal property. This ruling would, of course, take the case beyond the scope of this note, which assumes that there is a breach of condition and forfeiture as to part of the property.

"In Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Walker, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 60 S. W. 820, it was held that a false statement as to encumbrances on part of the subject of insurance does not render void the entire policy which provides: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon or added thereto, shall become void . . . if the subject of insurance be personal property, and be or become encumbered." The court said that as a forfeiture under this special clause of the policy can only take place where the subject of insurance named in the policy is all personal property which is or may be encumbered, the forfeiture cannot be claimed if the "subject of insurance" is both real and personal property; nor would it avoid the policy as to the personal property, though separately set out and separately valued, because by the terms of the contract the forfeiture is not to take place unless the subject of insurance (that is, all the property named in the policy) is encumbered, and it is not stipulated that if a part of the subject of insurance is encumbered the whole policy shall be void.

But where a policy provides that if "either real or personal property, or any part of it, be encumbered," etc., the entire policy and every part of it shall be void," it has been held that the contract is not severable, even in New York, where the rule is that the mere provision that the "entire" policy shall be void for a breach of any of its conditions does not render the contract indivisible. See Smith v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 118 N. Y. 518, 23 N. E. 883, the leading case on this point cited in earlier note to Wright v. Fire Ins. Asso. 19 L.R.A. 211.

And in Knowles v. American Ins. Co. 66 Hun, 220, 21 N. Y. Supp. 50, affirmed in 142 N. Y. 641, 37 N. E. 567, where hop crops of two years were insured in one policy under separate valuations and it was held that a breach of warranty as to encumbrances upon the crop of one year would not avoid the policy as to the crop not mortgaged, the rule is recognized; for the court pointed out that the policy did not provide that it should be avoided if the property "or any part of it" should be encumbered. The court said: "The clause avoiding the policy if the property insured is encumbered should not [under such a policy as was before the court] be held to apply to a separate class of property separately insured in the policy and unencumbered, any more than if such separately insured and that of these plaintiffs. In the case of Ætna Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 127 Ga. 491, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 667, 56 S. E. 643, as annotated in 9 Ann. Cas. 466, a number of cases are cited on the various phases of the iron-safe clause, and, although some of them may not be entirely in accord with the conclusion reached by us, none of them have gone so far as we would have to go in order to relieve the appellants of the consequences of their own deliberate acts, which resulted in this loss. In this state we have not followed the construction of insurance contracts adopted by some other courts, but, as Judge McSherry said in Agricultural Ins. Co. v. Hamilton, 82 Md. 88, 30 L.R.A. 633, 51 Am. St. Rep. 457, 33 Atl. 429: "In Kelly's Case, 32 Md. 421, 3 Am.

Rep. 149, and in Weaver's Case, 70 Md. 539, 5 L.R.A. 478, 17 Atl. 401, 18 Atl. 1034, this court repudiated the principle of interpretation adopted in some cases that insurance contracts are to be construed most strongly against the underwriter, and adopted the sounder view that the intention of the parties, as gathered from the whole instrument, must prevail."

As in our judgment the plaintiffs cannot recover by reason of the provision contained in § 3 of this clause, it is unnecessary to discuss the question whether sufficient books were kept, or whether the inventory made at High street was a sufficient compliance with the clause.

The only remaining question for our consideration is whether the policy can be unencumbered property was so insured by a separate policy."

So, in Texas, where the condition is that the entire policy should be void if the subjects of insurance "or any part thereof" be or become encumbered by mortgage or otherwise, and there was a vendor's lien on the land on which the house insured stood, it has been held that the entire policy including the amount covering the personal property is avoided thereby. Curlee v. Texas Home F. Ins. Co. 31 Tex. Civ. App. 471, 73 S. W. 831, 986.

Where the condition of the policy is against encumbrance of "the property," and not against the encumbrance of the property or any part thereof, it has been held not wholly broken by a mortgage of a part of the property, consisting of separate articles and capable of specific valuation, and that in such case the insurance would be vitiated as to the part so mortgaged only. German Ins. Co. v. Miller, 39 Ill. App. 633. The court upheld the rule of strict construction against the insurer, saying: "The modern tendency of adjudication is in the direction of greater strictness in construing conditions under which forfeitures are set up by the companies, and of applying with greater freedom the equitable doctrines of waiver and estoppel. This tendency has been induced largely by the modern methods of the insurance business, whereby the agents of the companies solicit risks, and, in order to obtain them, make representations and assurances calculated to mislead and to produce a want of care and scrutiny in reference to the language used in applications and policies."

In Allen v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. 30 La. Ann. 1386, 31 Am. Rep. 243, in holding that where a policy covered furniture at a store and also in a warehouse, and there was a breach of the condition of the policy as to the additional insurance on the warehouse, the whole contract was void. The court said: "There was but one policy issued by the defendant, and the stipulation covering subsequent insurance applied to the property as a whole, and that was that the insurance then effected should not be good if the plaintiff afterward effected any other 'on the property hereby insured.'" It does not appear from the report of the case whether there were separate valuations of the property.

In Coggins v. Ætna Ins. Co. 144 N. C. 7, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 839, 119 Am. St. Rep. 924, 56 S. E. 506, a policy on a storehouse and goods contained therein, separately valued, was held entirely avoided by a breach of the iron-safe clause, the court placing its decision on the ground that the premium was entire; that the policy contained a provision that "failure to comply with such clause shall constitute a perpetual bar to any recovery thereon," and also a further provision that "the goods are insured" while they are contained in the storehouse, and not elsewhere," making the risk on the goods and building substantially identical. The court said: "We are of opinion that the great weight of authority, as well as the better reason, establishes the positions that when, to the fact that the premium is entire, there is added the fact of identity of risk, the obligation is single, and, on breach of the stipulation, all recovery is barred."

In Royal Ins. Co. v. Martin, 192 U. S. 149, 48 L. ed. 385, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 247, it was held that a policy under which a building and a stock in trade contained therein were separately insured for distinct and different amounts is not avoided as respects the insurance on the building by a change in the ownership of such stock in trade without notice to the insurance company, although the policy provides that it shall cease to be in force as to any property thereby insured which shall pass from the insured to any other person otherwise than by due operation of law, unless notice thereof be given to the company.

In Home F. Ins. Co. v. Bernstein, 55 Neb. 260, 75 N. W. 839, a provision that "if the property now is or becomes . . . encumbered by mortgage or otherwise" the policy shall be void, it was said does not mean that the entire property covered thereby or the entire class of property, separately valued.

treated as divisible, and recovery allowed for the fixtures. The cases in the various jurisdictions have differed greatly on that question, but in this state the decisions have adopted the view that such a contract as this is an entire one. In Associated Firemen's Ins. Co. v. Assum, 5 Md. 165, there was a policy of insurance to the amount of $1,000,—$700 on stock of books and stationery, and $300 on music, musical instruments, fancy goods, bronze powder, and medicines. The policy provided that if the assured "shall hereafter make any other insurance on the hereby insured premises" he shall notify the company, "or, in default thereof, this policy shall cease and be of no effect." The court held: "That the proper construction of the covenant is that if any part of the goods mentioned therein was afterwards insured in any other insurance office without notice to the appellants, as provided in the covenant, the policy thereby becomes void and of no effect." In Bowman v. Franklin F. Ins. Co. 40 Md. 620, the policy contained a provision that an encumbrance on the property insured must be assented to by the company; "otherwise the policy shall be void." Part of the insurance was on the building, and part on the machinery therein, and there were judgments against the owner, which were liens on the real estate. Judge Alvey said: "The difficulty in the plaintiff's way is that the contract is entire. The consideration for it was entire; and in such case the contract is held to be entire, although its sub-must be mortgaged, in order to render the policy invalid as a whole or as to the class of property separately valued.

In Davis v. Boardman, 12 Mass. 80, a policy was taken out in this country for $3,000 on a ship and $1,000 on her cargo, and contained the provision that should the vessel and cargo be insured in England in time to attach, the American policy was to be canceled. Insurance was procured in England on the vessel alone. Upon the abandonment of the ship the contention of the insured was that, as the American policy was to be void only in case the vessel "and" cargo were insured in England, the condition had not been fulfilled, and the policy was therefore in effect as a whole, but the courts held that the intention of the parties was otherwise, and that the insured could recover only on that part of the American policy that covered the cargo.

e. Extent of remaining insurable interest.

In Western Massachusetts Ins. Co. v. Riker, 10 Mich. 279, it was held that a breach of a condition in a policy against alienation by the conveyance of an undivided one-third interest in the property avoided the policy as a whole, although the unconverted interest exceeded the amount of the policy.

f. Property included by mistake.

The fact that a piano was included in a policy by mistake, and separately valued therein, was held not to avoid the contract as to other property covered by the policy. Herzog v. Palatine Ins. Co. 36 Wash. 611, 79 Pac. 287. The court said: "The rule established by the great weight of authority, and the rule which we believe to be the correct one in such cases, is this: Where a policy of insurance is issued, covering different classes of property, and each class is insured for a specific sum, a breach of the contract of insurance as to one or more classes does not avoid the policy as to the other classes not affected by the breach, in 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the absence of fraud, act condemned by public policy, or an increase of risk on the whole property insured, by reason of the breach as to a part."

The contract would not be avoided as to the building, on the theory that, since there was a mistake as to the piano, there was no meeting of minds and therefore no contract. Ibid. The court said that the argument could not apply to the building, as to which there was no mistake.

g. Fraud.

Although the courts may hold a contract of insurance divisible for any of the various reasons discussed in the foregoing subdivisions of the note, where certain conditions of the policy have been broken, the rule does not, in the absence of statute, extend to wilful fraud.

It has been held in Missouri, for example, that the rule that a policy on different articles of property at different valuations is severable, so that a breach of condition as to one class of property will not prevent recovery on another, does not apply where the insured is guilty of wilful fraud, such as wilful false swearing as to the amount of his losses, with the intent and purpose of deceiving and defrauding the company. Hall v. Western Underwriters' Assn. 108 Mo. App. 476, 81 S. W. 227. The court said: "In such circumstances, he has no standing in a court of justice, and cannot receive the aid of the courts to collect any part of his claim. If he be allowed to collect the true amount of his loss, then he would run no risk in attempting to perpetrate his fraud, and there would be no punishment whereby he, and others, might be deterred from like attempts."

The equities in favor of the insured who is guilty of merely a technical and unintentional breach of the policy are not present where he has been convicted of fraud. Provisions of policies avoiding the entire contract for fraud as to part of the property insured would seem to be reasonable, and they have been so held.

The provision of the contract being that jects may consist of several distinct and wholly independent items. Moreover, the stipulation in regard to the forfeiture applies to the policy as an entirety." See also Agricultural Ins. Co. v. Hamilton, supra, and Norris v. Connecticut F. Ins. Co. 115 Md. 174, 80 Atl. 960, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 79.

In this case the consideration was not only entire, but the stipulation as to the forfeiture applied to the policy as an entirety,—“this policy shall become null and void, and such failure shall constitute a perpetual bar to any recovery thereon.” That the authorities differ widely on this subject can be seen by reference to the note to Republic County Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. John- son, in 2 Ann. Cas. 22. See also Ætna Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 127 Ga. 491, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 667, 56 S. E. 643, 9 Ann. Cas. 470, and the case of Coggins v. Ætna Ins. Co. (1907) 144 N. C. 7, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 839, 119 Am. St. Rep. 924, 56 S. E. 506, where cases on both sides are cited. But in view of our own decisions on the question of the divisibility of the contract, and of the language of the policy itself, we feel constrained to hold that there can be no recovery in this case for the reasons given. The judgment will therefore be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed; the appellants to pay the costs.

“all fraud,” etc., “shall cause a forfeiture of all claim under this policy,” it was held that false swearing as to a stock of grain insured avoided the policy as to the buildings, machinery, and fixtures covered thereby. The court considered this construction of the contract to be in accordance with the intention of the parties, and held that such a construction was reasonable. After pointing out that a policy of insurance is a contract, in the making of which, peculiar and great confidence must, of necessity, be reposed by the insurer in the insured, the court said: “Now, where, instead of there being no good reason to suspect fraud or false swearing on the part of the insured in making out his preliminary proofs, it is proved that his claim of his alleged loss on one of the subjects insured was fraudulent and false, and that the amount of loss designated in his said proof of loss, sworn to by him as aforesaid, was fraudulent and false, so far as the said subject was concerned, is it unreasonable for the policy to provide that in such a case the insured shall forfeit all claim under the policy, not only as to the said subject, but also as to all other subjects included in the policy? Having been proved to be guilty of fraud and falsehood in regard to one of the subjects included in the policy, it is not unreasonable to suppose that he may be guilty of the like wrongs in regard to the other subjects included therein. He may be so guilty, and the insurer may have no means of proving such guilt. He may himself have been the author of the burning of which he complains, or he may have obtained the insurance for the very purpose of obtaining money, by committing fraud and perjury in regard to one or more of the subjects insured. He was capable of either of these crimes, as he was capable of the crime which was proved upon him.” Moore v. Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. 28 Gratt. 508, 26 Am. Rep. 373.

So, where a policy provided that “any fraud or attempt to defraud or deceive on the part of the insured, or any misrepresentation in the proofs or examination as to the loss or damage, shall forfeit all claims under this policy,” it was held that a fraudulent statement as to the amount of personal property destroyed vitiated the whole contract. German Ins. Co. v. Reed, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 929.

Under a policy providing that “this entire policy shall be void . . . in case of any fraud or false swearing by the insured touching any matter relating to this insurance or the subject thereof, whether before or after loss,” it was held that false swearing touching the burning of wearing apparel avoided the policy as to the house and household furniture. Fowler v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 35 Or. 559, 57 Pac. 421. The court said it had found no case where fraud or false swearing affected the consideration wherein the contract was deemed to be divisible, except in Texas, where the statute is held to be the controlling factor in the construction.

But without emphasizing any special provisions of the contract with respect to its avoidance for fraud, it has been held that a policy insuring a building and contents is rendered wholly void by a fraudulent misrepresentation of value of personal property in proof of loss, under a statute requiring the declaration by the insured that the account furnished is just and true, and declaring that any fraud or false statements in the statutory declaration shall avoid the policy. Harris v. Waterloo Mut. F. Ins. Co. 10 Ont. Rep. 718.

And that breach of a condition of a policy covering different classes of personal property, as to subsequent encumbrances on part thereof, invalidates the whole contract, where the insured claims payment for loss of mortgaged property. Schumitsch v. American Ins. Co. 48 Wis. 26, 3 N. W. 595.

And especially will recovery be denied the insured where the company brings an action in equity to cancel a policy on the ground of false swearing as to personal property and proof of loss, and the insured files a cross complaint asking a recovery for the loss of a house covered by the same policy. Home Ins. Co. v. Connelly, 104 Tenn. 93, 56 S. W. 828. The court said: “To permit the cross complainant, coming as she does with a confession of fraud and false swearing, to recover, would be in disregard of that fundamental maxim of equity, that ‘he that doeth inequity shall not have equity.’ It is true that this maxim has its proper limitation. It does not extend to any misconduct, however gross, which is unconnected with the matter of litigation, and with which the opposite party has no concern, but it does control the administration of equitable remedies where the misconduct is in regard to, or at all events connected with, the subject of controversy, so that it has in some measure affected the equitable relation of the parties arising out of the same transaction. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 399. We can conceive of no case that affords better scope for the application of this rule than the present."

If a contract covering different kinds or classes of property were considered to be an insurance on each kind or class thereof, as if two separate contracts had been entered into, then, undoubtedly fraud as to part of the property would not avoid the insurance on the rest. If, for instance, the insured takes out a separate policy on a house and another policy on furniture contained therein, it would hardly be maintained that fraudulent proofs of loss as to the furniture would affect the right of the insured to recover on the house. It has been urged that a policy for an entire premium on different kinds of property separately valued is in effect not one contract, but several; that is to say, a separate contract for each kind of property covered. But it has been held in a case involving false proofs of loss that this is not so; that a contract may be divisible, and yet not, in effect, more than a single agreement, so that false proofs of loss as to part of the property would avoid the policy as to the rest.

In Home Ins. Co. v. Connelly, supra, in holding that a policy for an entire premium on a house and furniture separately valued was avoided in toto by false swearing in proofs of loss as to personal property, the court said: "It does not follow that, because such a policy is severable, that it is to be taken as if separate and distinct policies, covering each a separate piece of property, were issued at the same time. While it is an apportionable contract, yet that it is not two distinct and separate contracts is certain, not only from the fact that the premium paid is entire, but also from this consideration, that separate suits could not be maintained where all the property insured had been destroyed by one and the same fire. In such an event a recovery for the loss of one of the subjects of insurance, there can be no doubt, would bar a recovery in an independent suit for the loss of another subject of the same insurance, upon the principle that a plaintiff cannot split a single cause of action into parts."

But the rule denying the insured the right of any recovery in case of fraud may be affected by statute, as pointed out in Fowler v. Phoenix Ins. Co. supra.

In Texas, where art. 3089 of the Revised Statutes provides that "a fire insurance policy, in case of total loss by fire of property insured, shall be held and considered to be a liquidated demand against the company for the full amount of such policy, provided, that the provisions of this article shall not apply to personal property," it was held that since the provision of the policy that "the entire policy shall be void, . . . in case of any fraud or false swearing by the insured touching any matter relating to this insurance or the subject thereof, whether before or after a loss," could not be applicable to real estate because of the statute, a policy covering both the building and furniture separately valued would not be avoided as to the real estate by false statement as to the value of personal property in the proofs of loss. Sullivan v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 89 Tex. 665, 36 S. W. 73.

And under a statute providing that "whenever any policy of insurance shall be written to insure any real property, and the property insured shall be wholly destroyed without criminal fault on the part of the insured or his assigns, the amount of the insurance written in such policy shall be taken conclusively to be the true value of the property when insured, and the true amount of loss and measure of damages when destroyed," it has been held that fraudulent statements as to the value of real estate in proof of loss will not avoid the policy, because under the statute such representations are not material; but that where a policy covers both real and personal property, and there are fraudulent representations as to either the value or quantity of personal property destroyed, the entire policy is avoided. Oshkosh Packing & Provision Co. v. Mercantile Ins. Co. 31 Fed. 200.

h. Statutes.

In King v. Tioga County Patrons' Fire Relief Asso. 35 App. Div. 58, 54 N. Y. Supp. 1057, under a policy insuring both real and personal property, the rule as to severability was maintained although the company urged that, by the provisions of the statute under which it was incorporated (Laws of 1880, chap. 362), and by its by-laws, the company was authorized only to insure such personal property in connection with the building in which the same was contained, so that the contract could not be deemed severable; it appearing that the company would not have assumed the risk of the personal property separate from the building in which it was situated. The court said that in the Pratt Case, 130 N. Y. 206, 29 N. E. 117, in which the contract was held severable, the company was organized under the same statute.

In Thurber v. Royal Ins. Co. 1 Marv. (Del.) 251, 40 Atl. 1111, under a statute requiring that in contracts of insurance of real property the value agreed upon shall be indorsed on the policy, and providing that where any owner shall effect any subsequent insurance upon any higher value than so agreed, all insurance as well as that subsequently obtained shall become void, it was held that where a policy covered both real and personal property separately valued, a breach of this condition did not affect the policy as to the personalty. The court did not, however, rest its decision on the ground that the contract was severable, but on the ground that the statute was penal, and expressly confined the forfeiture to the realty.

So, a policy covering both real and personal property, fixing the amount to be paid on each specifically in case of loss, is not avoided as to the personal property by the subsequent insurance of the real estate upon a larger value than the one agreed upon in the policy, since by the statute a forfeiture is specifically confined to the realty. Ibid.

For effect of statute on the divisibility of the contract in case of fraudulent proof of loss, see II. g, Fraud, supra.

For effect of statute on question of divisibility, see also Gore Dist. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Samo, II. a.

III. Special kinds of contract.

a. Mutual policies.

In a number of the cases in which it is held that a policy covering both realty and personalty is entire, although the property is separately valued, the decision turns upon the fact that the insurance was made by a mutual company, which had a lien for premium upon the property insured which would be impaired by the breach of condition as to part of the property.

In Carleton v. Patrons' Androscoggin Mut. F. Ins. Co. 109 Me. 70, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 951, 82 Atl. 649, it was said to be familiar law that a mutual insurance policy on a building and furniture therein is entire, and that, being void on account of prior insurance on the building, is void as to the furniture.

For earlier cases on the point, see note to Wright v. Fire Ins. Asso. 19 L.R.A. 211.

The mutual-insurance company cases must therefore stand by themselves. They are not authority for a ruling as to entirety of other policies. They are closely analogous, however, to cases in which the decision as to divisibility turns upon the nature of the risk.

b. Open policies.

Under an open or floating policy on grain or malt, or grain in the process of malting in a house occupied as a malt house and for storage purposes, providing that the policy should be void if the subject of insurance should become encumbered by chattel mortgage without consent of the company indorsed upon the policy, it was held that the encumbrance of part of the property in violation of this condition merely rendered the property so covered not subject to the insurance within the terms of the policy, leaving the policy valid as to the rest. Coleman v. Phenix Ins. Co. 3 App. Div. 65, 38 N. Y. Supp. 986. The court said: "The terms of the policy are such as obviously secured 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to plaintiff the free use of the property in the malt house, and a right to deal with all or a portion of it as he saw fit, during the life of this contract. When, however, he exercised that right and dealt with the property by sale or mortgage, from that moment the property sold or mortgaged ceased to be covered by this policy of insurance, for from that moment it failed to answer the description and conditions of the policy, and ceased to be the 'subject of insurance.'"

c. Separate contracts.

Where personal property was insured some time after real property, and, instead of being covered by a new policy, was evidenced by an additional paper attached to the original policy, it was held that a breach of the condition as to sole ownership of the real estate would not invalidate the contract as to the personal property. Continental Ins. Co. v. Gardner, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 335, 62 S. W. 886. The court said: "This rule should certainly apply where the insurance of the personal property was really a separate contract, made independently long after the policy was issued, when the paper evidencing this additional insurance was attached to the policy as a more convenient method of reducing the contract to writing. There was no evidence here of fraud or bad faith, and we are unable to see that the condition of the original policy as to the title to the land should prevent a recovery for the personal property."

IV. Kinds of property covered by policy.

a. Separate buildings.

Under a policy stipulating a separate amount of insurance on each building insured, a representation or warranty relating exclusively to one of the buildings will not defeat a recovery of the insurance on the other. Rogers v. Phenix Ins. Co. 121 Ind. 570, 23 N. E. 498.

Where four dwelling houses were insured at $250 each, it was held that the fact that at the time of the fire two of them were unoccupied, so as to violate the policy as to them, would not prevent the recovery as to the other two. Speagle v. Dwelling House Ins. Co. 97 Ky. 646, 31 S. W. 282.

b. Building and contents.

It has been pointed out that the question has been raised as to the entirety of the risk where a building and its contents are insured under a single policy, although separate valuations are placed on each kind of property. There is a conflict of opinion as to the divisibility of such a contract, but in most of the cases the question of the effect of the situation of the property on the hazard is not discussed.

A policy covering a barn and its contents, placing different valuations upon the different subjects of insurance, is severable.

and a breach of the contract as to any part of the property does not affect the whole but only that part in respect to which the breach occurs. Continental Ins. Co. v. Vard, 50 Kan. 346, 31 Pac. 1079.

Where a policy is on a dwelling house and various classes of personal property, including household furniture, etc., described separately, different and separate amounts being specified on the dwelling and personal property, the contract is divisible, and is not avoided as to personal property by a violation of its conditions as to subsequent encumbrances on the realty. Kansas Farmers' F. Ins. Co. v. Saindon, 53 Kan. 323, 36 Pac. 983.

Recovery for loss of personal property covered by a policy, and separately valued, may be had although there is a breach of warranty as to title as to the realty included in the contract. Stephens v. German Ins. Co. 61 Mo. App. 194.

A policy of insurance on a building and various articles of personal property therein, separately valued, is not forfeited as to the personal property by virtue of a lack of title to the land, under a provision that the entire policy shall be void if the "subject of insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple," since the building is not alone the subject of insurance. Bills v. Hibernia Ins. Co. 87 Tex. 547, 29 L.R.A. 706, 47 Am. St. Rep. 121, 29 S. W. 1063.

In Home Ins. Co. v. Smith, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 32 S. W. 240, the court, on the authority of the last-mentioned case, set aside its former decision in 29 S. W. 264, in which it was held that breach of the condition of the policy covering real and personal property as to the title of the real estate avoided the whole policy.

A policy covering a storehouse, fixtures, and goods separately valued is divisible so as not to avoid the policy as to the building and fixtures by a breach of the iron-safe clause. Georgia Home Ins. Co. v. McKinley, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 7, 37 S. W. 606.

In Murphy v. Northern British & M. Co. 61 Mo. App. 323, a policy of a gross premium covering a stock of goods and building, separately valued, was held to be severable, so that it might be void as to one class of property and valid as to another. Failure of the insured to demand an arbitration as to the personalty was held not to affect his right to recover for loss of the realty.

In Roberts, W. & T. Co. v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co. 13 Tex. Civ. App. 64, 35 S. W. 955, it was held that a breach of the iron-safe clause would not affect the policy as to the building in which the stock of goods insured was contained, both building and goods being covered by the same policy for a gross premium, where the property was separately valued. The court said: "We are of the opinion that the iron-safe clause could have had no reference to the house insured, but must have referred to that part of the property affected by the clause, and we prefer to follow that line of decisions 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) holding such contracts severable, and that forfeiture as to the goods would not necessarily work a forfeiture as to the house. . . . There is nothing in the language of the iron-safe clause that would indicate that it was the intention of the parties to include in the forfeiture anything but the personal property. It is not the spirit of the law to favor or enlarge forfeitures by loose and liberal construction to that end."

In Mitchell v. Mississippi Home Ins. Co. 72 Miss. 53, 48 Am. St. Rep. 535, 18 So. 86, in holding that a policy on a stock of goods and store fixtures separately valued is not entire so as to be wholly invalidated by failure to observe the iron-safe clause, the court said: "The requirement of the iron-safe clause is that the last inventory, and the books of account of sales and purchases, shall be kept in such safe, or in some secure place other than on the premises where the insured property was kept, and that a failure to produce the inventory and books after loss shall avoid the policy; but all this has reference only to such articles of merchandise as constitute the stock in trade. The store fixtures and furniture, and the restaurant furniture, including the cooking stove, were never designed to be embraced in the inventory of stock on hand, or to be entered and carried on the books of account showing purchases and sales of goods by the insured. As to these, the policy was not avoided by appellant's failure to observe the iron-safe clause. The contract was divisible, and it may be true that appellant could be defeated of a recovery for the sum for which the stock of goods was insured, and yet might have been entitled to recover for the furniture and fixtures of the store and restaurant. The case is not to be confounded with those in which any recovery for any part of the sum insured has been denied because of misrepresentations or frauds of the insured."

But in Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Phillips, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 352, it was held that although a policy insured a house for one sum and furniture for another, if the insurance was procured by one contract, any misstatement or concealment as to any material fact which would invalidate the insurance as to any of the subjects will invalidate it as to the other.

And under a policy insuring a stock of goods and the building in which it is contained, the premium being for a gross sum, a breach of warranty relating solely to the goods,—in this case a violation of the iron-safe clause,—bars recovery not only as to the personal property, but also as to the building. Southern F. Ins. Co. v. Knight, 111 Ga. 622, 52 L.R.A. 70, 78 Am. St. Rep. 216, 36 S. E. 821. The court said: "It was competent for the parties to make two separate and distinct contracts,—one covering the goods and the other the building; but they did not see proper to do this. They combined the two, and made the consideration moving toward the insurer a gross sum. They further provided that the contract, not a part of it, should be void under certain conditions. It may, perhaps, seem to be unreasonable that simply for a failure to take an inventory of the stock of goods the plaintiffs should be precluded from recovering the value of the building. But this does not affect the question. The question is, What have they agreed upon? If there was any room to doubt as to the intention of the parties, that construction which is most reasonable and most consonant with justice would be applied. But there is none. The parties have deliberately chosen to enter into an agreement whereby the policy shall be forfeited if the insured fails to do certain things; and he has failed to comply with this agreement. In such a case there is but one thing for the courts to do, and that is, to enforce the agreement as made."

The court in this case was further of the opinion that its decision was in accord with the weight of authority, saying: "The question as to whether a policy of insurance such as is involved in the present case constitutes a separable or an entire contract is no new question. It has been the subject of numerous decisions by the courts in this country, and they are in hopeless and irreconcilable conflict. The weight of authority is to the effect that the contract is entire, and that the breach of a warranty which relates solely to one class of property will avoid the entire policy, if the contract so provides."

It would appear, however, that the weight of authority is on the side of the divisibility of the contract.

c. Fixtures and personal property.

In Manchester Fire Assur. Co. v. Feibelman, 118 Ala. 308, 23 So. 759, a policy contained separate valuations of the fixtures, wines, liquors, etc., and of the pool tables of the insured. The company asserted that the latter had violated the whole policy by having a mortgage on three of the pool tables, contrary to one of the conditions of the contract. It was held that the insurance as to each of these subjects was divisible, and that the insured might recover for the loss of the other items notwithstanding he had violated the policy as to the pool tables.

d. Different classes of personal property.

The fact that a policy covers different classes of personal property separately valued, instead of different kinds of property such as realty and personalty, does not seem to affect the general rule as to divisibility of insurance contracts which may prevail in any jurisdiction.

It has been held that a policy covering hay and grain in separate amounts is severable so as not to render the entire policy void because of breach of condition as to encumbrances as to part of the property. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Barker, 6 Colo. App. 535, 41 Pac. 513.

In Dwelling House Ins. Co. v. Butterly, 33 Ill. App. 626, affirmed in 133 Ill. 534, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

24 N. E. 873, it was held that where a policy covered farm, stock, and implements, valued separately, the sale or encumbrance of any part of the property avoided the policy only as to the specific articles sold or encumbered.

In Home Ins. Co. v. Delta Bank, 71 Miss. 608, 15 So. 932, a policy covering a stock of goods in a certain building, though void as to part of the stock by reason of a violation of the iron-safe clause, was held good as to the balance thereof kept in a separate apartment and as to which there had been no violation of the policy.

And in Light v. Greenwich Ins. Co. 106 Tenn. 480, 58 S. W. 851, a policy for a gross sum distributed among various classes of personal property separately valued was held a severable contract.

The New York rule as to the severability of an insurance contract on different subjects of insurance separately valued is not altered by the fact that the policy covered different classes of personal property so valued, and not real estate and personal property. American Artistic Gold Stamping Co. v. Glens Falls Ins. Co. 1 Misc. 114, 20 N. Y. Supp. 646. The court said that the decisions upholding the severability of the contract were not upon the ground that all of the property insured was not of the same species.

But in Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Public Parks Amusement Co. 63 Ark. 187, 37 S. W. 959, the fact that separate amounts of insurance are apportioned to separate items and classes of personal property does not necessarily make the policy indivisible.

In this case the policies covered "the following specified or located property, only to an amount not exceeding the actual cash value of the property herein described, at the time of such loss, and in no event to exceed $2,500, as follows: '$1.250 on their forty horses, not to exceed $125 on any one horse in case of loss; $875 on their rolling stock and vehicles of all kinds, including hacks, carriages, buggies, carts, and wagons; $375 on their harness, saddles, bridles, whips, blankets, robes, office and stable furniture, and fixtures of all kinds, including feed on hand.'" It was held entire, so that a breach of condition as to the statement of ownership, which renders it void as to part of the property, affected it in the same manner as to the rest. H. C. S.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

EX PARTE S. E. LOGAN et al.

(— Ala. —, 64 So. 570.)

Chattel mortgage — attachment by mortgagee — effect.

1. A mortgagee of chattels does not lose

Note. — Waiver of lien of chattel mortgage by attachment or execution.

The earlier cases on this subject will be his lien thereon by levying an attachment upon the property as that on the mortgagor, either by estoppel or waiver, where by statute the equity of redemption is subject to levy and sale under execution.

Judgment — in favor of claim in attachment proceedings — effect in subsequent detinue proceedings.

2. A judgment in favor of one who claims adversely property attached by a mortgagee as that of the mortgagor is not res judicata in a subsequent proceeding in detinue by the mortgagee against the mortgagor under his mortgage.

(February 5, 1914.)

PETITION for certiorari to the Court of Appeals to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the City Court of An-found in the notes to Dix v. Smith, 50 L.R.A. 714, and Kansas City Live Stock Commission Co. v. Bank of Hamlin, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 400.

In addition to the latter case, and the other cases cited in the notes referred to, the position of the Alabama supreme court in EX PARTE LOGAN, that the levy of an attachment or execution, at the instance of the mortgagee, does not waive the lien of the chattel mortgage, is further supported by the opinion of the appellate court in this case (9 Ala. App. 459, 63 So. 766), and other cases cited in the present note.

Thus, in Flores v. Stone, 21 Cal. App. 105, 131 Pac. 348, rehearing denied in 21 Cal. App. 111, 131 Pac. 351, it was held that there was no waiver, where one who, after attaching mortgaged chattels for a debt entirely independent of the mortgage debt, discovered the existence of the mortgage, took an assignment of the same and the notes secured thereby; prosecuted his action to judgment, and procured the insurance and levy of an execution on the property, which, however, was not sold, the attachment being released, a large part of the property having been claimed as exempt from execution. The court quotes the opening statement in the note in 50 L.R.A. 714, as to the grounds and limitation of the doctrine of Dix v. Smith.

So, in Stein v. McAuley, 147 Iowa, 630, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 692, 140 Am. St. Rep. 332, 125 N. W. 336, it was held that the lien of a chattel mortgage was not waived by the levying of an attachment, subsequently dismissed without trial of the attachment suit, on the mortgaged chattels, for the debt secured by the mortgage; and further that a waiver did not result from the mere fact that the chattel mortgagee put the mortgagor to the expense of defending the attachment. The court in this case also recognized the distinction between cases where the interest of the mortgagor is subject to levy, and where it is not, citing in this connection the note to Dix v. Smith, 50 L.R.A. 714.

So, in Green v. Bass, 83 Ohio St. 378, 94 N. E. 742, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 828, it is held 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

niston in plaintiff's favor in an action against petitioners to secure possession of certain property in accordance with the provisions of a chattel mortgage. Writ denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. O. M. Alexander, Merrill & Walker, and J. M. Foster, for appellants:

The levy by one having title to chattels, of an execution upon the chattels as the property of the defendant in execution, is a binding election to abandon and release his title, and estops him from afterward suing to recover the chattels on the strength of such title.

Campbell v. Kauffman Mill. Co. 42 Fla. 328, 29 So. 435; Lehman v. Van Winkle, 92 Ala. 443, 8 So. 870; Kolsky v. Loveman, that the owner of a senior chattel mortgage does not, by recovering a judgment on the note which it secures, and causing an execution to be levied on the mortgaged chattels, waive the priority of his lien, the levy having been abandoned.

And in J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Johnson, 152 Wis. 8, 139 N. W. 445, it was held that there was no waiver where the mortgagee, after the maturity of the note secured by the chattel mortgage, recovered judgment thereon and procured an execution to be levied on the mortgaged property, under which the property was advertised for sale, the levy, however, having been released the day before the sale. The court said: "It is fast coming to be generally accepted that where the mortgagor is recognized, as here, to have an equity of redemption, even after maturity of the debt, . . . he has an interest in the property which may be mortgaged by him or levied upon and sold by his creditors, and that the mortgagee is in no worse position in that respect than any other creditor."

In Sheets v. Hocker, 34 Okla. 676, 128 Pac. 725, it was held that there was no waiver of the lien of a chattel mortgage, where a judgment creditor of the mortgagor took an assignment of the mortgage and the debt secured thereby, and an execution was subsequently levied on the mortgaged property, but was subsequently returned because the property had been sold under the mortgage. The court observed that the evidence did not show an intention to waive; but that the execution was placed in the hands of the constable before the defendant learned of the existence of the mortgage, and that, as soon as the execution creditor learned of the mortgage, he bought it, and from that time proceeded under it, and proceeded promptly. The case was distinguished from Dix v. Smith, 9 Okla. 124, 50 L.R.A. 714, 60 Pac. 303, on the ground that in that case the creditor proceeded with the attachment; while in this case he proceeded with the mortgage, and instructed the officer not to proceed under the execution.

The equity of redemption remaining in a mortgagor of chattels cannot be seized under execution on a judgment for the mortgage debt.

Powell v. Williams, 14 Ala. 476, 48 Am. Dec. 105; Boswell v. Carlisle, 55 Ala. 554; Porter v. Wheeler, 105 Ala. 459, 17 So. 221.

Mr. James F. Matthews, for appellee:

An equity of redemption in mortgaged chattels is by statute subject to levy and sale in this state.

Heflin v. Slay, 78 Ala. 182; Bingham v. Vandegrift, 93 Ala. 283, 9 So. 280; Gassenheimer v. Molton, 80 Ala. 521, 2 So. 652; Stein v. McAuley, 147 Iowa, 630, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 692, 140 Am. St. Rep. 332, 125 N. W. 336; Byram v. Stout, 127 Ind. 195, 26 N. E. 687; Barchard v. Kohn, 157 Ill. 579, 29 L.R.A. 803, 41 N. E. 902; Dix v. Smith, 50 L.R.A. 716, note; Madsen v. Rutten, 16 N. D. 281, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 554, 113 N. W. 872; Kansas City Live Stock Commission Co. v. Bank of Hamlin, 79 Kan. 761, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 490, 101 Pac. 617, 17 Ann. Cas. 956.

After the determination of the claim suit, the claimant could not convey a good title to the property, upon principles of estoppel, superior to the plaintiffs' outstanding prior title.

McConeghy v. McCaw, 31 Ala. 447; Gassenheimer v. Molton, 80 Ala. 521, 2 So. 652; Barker v. Bell, 37 Ala. 354.

Mayfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions presented for decision are as follows:

Does the mortgagee of a chattel estop himself from maintaining an action of detinue to recover the mortgaged property by levying an attachment or execution upon the property as the property of the mortgagor?

If not estopped, does such levy amount to a waiver of the right or title of the mortgagee?

If the mere levy does not work an estoppel or waiver, is a claim suit instituted after the levy, between the mortgagee and a third party, which results in favor of the third party, res judicata in a detinue suit by the mortgagee against the mortgagor, as to the same property?

The trial court and the court of appeals answered each of the questions in the negative, and the defendant mortgagor seeks certiorari to have reviewed the judgment 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) and decision of the court of appeals as to these questions.

The exact questions are new in this court, so far as our investigation goes. They have been decided by other courts, however; but the trouble is they have been decided differently in the several courts. The questions, or some of them, have been answered in the affirmative by the supreme courts of Massachusetts and of Arkansas and other states, and in the negative by the supreme courts of Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Iowa, North Dakota, and of other states.

The rule of law is thus stated by the supreme court of Massachusetts: "A party holding personal property by virtue of a mortgage or pledge may waive his claim under such mortgage or pledge, and attach the property in a suit to recover the debt for which the mortgage or pledge was given Buck v. Ingersoll, 11 Met. 226, 232. Such attachment is, in itself, a waiver of the claim under the mortgage. The liens respectively created by mortgage and by attachment on the same property are essentially different, and cannot coexist. They affect very differently, also, the rights of third persons. A stranger may attach personal property subject to the encumbrance of a prior lien by attachment, with no responsibility for such prior lien; if the lien is by mortgage, he must pay the amount secured by such mortgage, before his attachment is effectual. We have no need to discuss the question whether the same rule shall apply to an attachment of the equity of redemption of personal property to secure the payment of the mortgage debt as applies to the equity of redemption of real property, for, in this commonwealth, the equity of redemption of personal property is not attachable." Evans v. Warren, 122 Mass. 304.

The Arkansas court thus states the rule, citing a number of authorities: "The levy of the attachment amounted to an assertion by appellants that the property was subject to seizure and sale under the attachment. But, as this could not be true if the lien of the mortgage still existed, the levy of the attachment was the same as a denial on the part of appellants that the mortgage lien existed, and was in effect a waiver on their part of the lien created by the mortgage. In other words, having sued out an attachment, levied it upon the property in question, and prosecuted the attachment suit to judgment, they must be held to have waived rights which were inconsistent with such a course of procedure. The mortgage lien, being inconsistent with such attachment, was thereby waived, and appellants have nothing upon which to base their action of replevin." Cox v. Harris, 64 Ark. 215, 62 Am. St. Rep. 187, 188, 41 S. W. 426.

The Indiana and Illinois courts criticized the rules declared by the Massachusetts and Arkansas courts as being technical and artificial, and declined to follow. See Byram v. Stout, 127 Ind. 195, 26 N. E. 687; Barchard v. Kohn, 157 Ill. 579, 29 L.R.A. 803, 41 N. E. 902. In the latter case it is said: "The main case which holds that an attachment of the mortgaged property by the mortgagee for the mortgage debt is a waiver of his lien under the mortgage is Evans v. Warren, 122 Mass. 303. The decision in that case was placed upon the ground substantially that the liens created by mortgage and by attachment upon the same property are essentially different, and cannot coexist, for the reason that under the Massachusetts statutes the equity of redemption of personal property is not subject to attachment, and hence, if the mortgagee causes an attachment to issue against the mortgaged property, it is a waiver of the mortgage lien. The cases which hold that the attachment operates as a waiver of the plaintiff's rights under the mortgage do so upon the general grounds that a person cannot avail himself of inconsistent remedies in relation to the same matter, and, having chosen and carried into effect one remedy, he cannot resort to a different one, involving a repudiation of the grounds upon which the first one was based; that the suit on the mortgage and the attachment suit are inconsistent, because the one proceeds upon the ground that the mortgagee is the owner of the property, and the other upon the ground that the mortgagor thereof is owner; that, when the debt matured, the mortgagee had the right to take the property under the mortgage, he having the legal title, subject only to a right of redemption; and that, by bringing the attachment suit, he elects to treat the property as the property of the debtor, and cannot, by seeking to enforce his mortgage, assert an ownership and right of possession in himself antedating the attachment. The reasoning in Evans v. Warren, supra, was held to be unsatisfactory, and its doctrine was repudiated in Byram v. Stout, supra. In the latter case the mortgagee in a chattel mortgage brought an action to foreclose it, and a junior mortgagee set up as a defense that the complainant had previously brought suit upon the evidences of debt secured by his mortgage, and had therein issued a writ of attachment and levied it upon the mortgaged property, and had thereby released his mortgage lien; but the court held that the attachment was not a waiver of the mortgage lien, and did not estop the mortgagee from claiming under his mortgage, basing its decision mainly upon the ground that in Indiana the mortgagee in a chattel mortgage is a mere lien holder. Jones, Mortg. § 565. In support of the conclusion that the mortgagee of personal property is a mere lien holder, Indiana decisions are there referred to, holding that personal property under mortgage may be levied upon and sold by execution subject to the mortgage lien."

The Massachusetts doctrine is thus criticized by an annotator of the case of Dix v. Smith, 50 L.R.A. 714: "The decision in the principal case, while the logical result of the view taken of the nature and effect of a chattel mortgage, and of the construction placed upon the statute governing attachments, rests upon strictly technical grounds. To render applicable the theory of the case, that the lien of a chattel mortgage and the lien of an attachment are inconsistent, and cannot coexist, since the first imports legal title in the mortgagee, and the second legal title in the mortgagor, not only the common-law doctrine that a chattel mortgage operates to transfer the legal title to the mortgagee, but also the common-law rule that a mere equitable right, such as the equity of redemption remaining in the mortgagor, is not subject to levy, must have been left undisturbed, both by statute and judicial decision. Even in a jurisdiction where the doctrine that the legal title is in the mortgagee has not been abandoned, there is no necessary inconsistency between the lien of a chattel mortgage and the lien of an attachment, though asserted by the same person, if, either by statute or judicial decision, the equity of redemption in the mortgagor is made subject to attachment. While the statute involved in the principal case affords the means of reaching by attachment property that has been mortgaged, the opinion emphasizes the fact that the statute contemplates the payment and discharge of the mortgage before the lien of the attachment can attach, so that the statute does not impair either of the doctrines of the common law referred to. The theory and decision of the principal case have the support of Evans v. Warren, supra, which is substantially like it, except that there the attachment, which was subsequently dissolved, was issued for the debt secured by the mortgage. The court took the view that the liens were essentially different, and could not coexist, pointing out that the legal title was in the mortgagee, and that the equity of redemption in personal property was not attachable."

Whatever might be the correct doctrine in this state but for our statutes, our statutes certainly change the law from that declared by the supreme courts of Massachusetts and Arkansas. Section 4091 of our Code expressly makes the equity of redemption in either land or personal property subject to levy and sale under execution. This being true, the doctrine of estoppel or waiver cannot apply to or result from the levy of an execution by the mortgagee, upon the mortgaged chattels.

It is true that this court in the case of Fuller v. Eames, 108 Ala. 464, 19 So. 366, held that, where there was a conditional sale of chattels, the vendor retaining title until the purchase price was paid, and the vendor attached the property as that of the vendee, he was thereby estopped from bringing an action of detinue to recover the same property, thereby claiming that it was the vendor's, and not the vendee's. In that case this court said: "In this attachment proceeding, the plaintiff unequivocally recognized the property as defendant's, and sought to subject it in a manner wholly inconsistent with the retention of the title in himself when he sold the property to defendant. He thereby waived any title he might have had to the property, and could not afterwards institute this suit, maintainable only on the theory of title in himself. Thomason v. Lewis, 103 Ala. 426, 15 So. 830; Montgomery Iron Works v. Smith, 98 Ala. 644, 13 So. 525; Lehman v. Van Winkle, 92 Ala. 443, 8 So. 870; Tanner & D. Engine Co. v. Hall, 89 Ala. 628, 7 So. 187."

In that case, as is pointed out, the two remedies were inconsistent, and not concurrent, and, the vendor having elected to attach the property as that of the defendant, and to hold him liable for the purchase price, he would not be allowed to have the property and also to have the purchase price.

In the case at bar, as to mortgaged chattels, the statute changes the rule, if it would not otherwise be different. The equity of redemption in chattels being subject to levy and sale under execution, the levy, of course, was not a claim inconsistent with that of the mortgagee's title, and, for this reason, the pleas setting up estoppel, election, or waiver, on account of this levy, were no defense to the action of detinue; hence no error intervened in the trial court or in the court of appeals as to the rulings on demurrer to these pleas.

The claim suit was a contest between the mortgagee and a third party. In this suit the issue was, by virtue of the statute, whether the property was that of the defendant, the mortgagor, and whether it was subject to the process. The title to the property as between the mortgagee and the mortgagor was not therefore put in issue, nor decided, so far as the pleas show, and therefore the result of that claim suit was not shown to be res judicata of the detinue suit between the mortgagee and the mortgagor.

In this state the mortgagee has three remedies against the mortgagor, either of which he is at liberty to pursue, or he may pursue any two or all concurrently: He may bring an action at law to recover the debt, an appropriate action to recover possession of the property, and may foreclose the mortgage, and sell the property. But, if he pursue one or more, each suit must be tried and determined on the principles applicable and prevailing in the forum in which the particular remedy is sought.

The questions were treated fully by the court of appeals in an able opinion by Walker, P. J., in which we entirely concur, and, but for the fact that the question is one of first impression in this court, it might well be disposed of by our merely adopting the opinion of the court of appeals.

The writ of certiorari is therefore denied.

Anderson, Ch. J., and Sayre, Somerville, De Graffenried, and Gardner, JJ., concur. McClellan, J., thinks the writ of certiorari prayed for should be denied for the reasons and upon the considerations set forth in the opinion of the court of appeals.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

THOMAS D. HILL, Appt.,

v.

CHESAPEAKE & POTOMAC TELEPHONE COMPANY.

(42 App. D. C. 170.)

Negligence — public telephone device — safety of passageway.

A telephone company which installs in a store operated by another a slot telephone apparatus for the use of the public is bound to provide a safe passageway to and from such apparatus, and is liable in damages for injury to one who, without fault on his part, falls through a trapdoor negligently

Note.— On the question as to the responsibility of one utilizing space in a store of building in the general occupancy of another, with respect to the condition of the premises, no cases have been found in addition to HILL v. CHESAPEAKE & P. TELEPH. Co. and the case therein set out Sullivan v. New York Teleph. Co. 157 App. Div. 642, 142 N. Y. Supp. 735. No attempt has been made to find cases, if any, dealing with the general question as to the responsibility of a lessee of a portion of a build-left open in the passageway by the storekeeper.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Supreme Court sustaining a demurrer to the declaration in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. Gwynn Gardiner and Baline Coppinger for appellant.

Messrs. Henry B. F. Macfarland, Charles Cowles Tucker, J. Miller Kenyon, Edward S. Bailey, and Horace G. Macfarland, for appellee:

There is no allegation that defendant was in possession of the store, or that it could or did exercise any dominion or control over the passageway to and from the telephone on the premises.

Liability for an injury from a nuisance or from defective repairs upon premises depends upon the power to prevent the injury by abating the nuisance or making the repairs, and therefore rests upon him who has the possession and control of the premises.

Defendant, not being in control, is not liable.

Mr. Chief Justice Shepard delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of damages by plaintiff, Thomas D. Hill, appellant against C. J. Conlon and the Chesapeake & Potomac ing for conditions existing in parts used in common by all tenants. For one of the recent cases dealing with a tenant's responsibility to his employees in such circumstances, see Hawkes v. Broadwalk Shoe Co. 207 Mass. 117, 92 N. E. 1017. To this case is appended in 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1123, a note dealing with the question whether the parts of the building subject to such common use are a part of the works and ways of a particular tenant within the meaning of the employers' liability act.

Telephone Company for injuries received through the negligent opening of a trapdoor in the floor or premises of Conlon, while plaintiff was on his way to use the public telephone maintained by the telephone company in the rear part of Conlon's room.

The telephone company demurred to the declaration. Demurrer was sustained, and plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was entered dismissing his action against the telephone company.

Later, he dismissed the action against Conlon, pending his appeal from the judgment for the telephone company.

The case presented is substantially this: Conlon was in the possession of a storeroom in which he sold liquors and cigars. By some arrangement between them, the terms of which are not stated, the telephone company erected an apparatus in the rear part of Conlon's room for public service. It was the ordinary slot machine. The proposed user goes to the apparatus, signals the central office, drops the required coin in the slot, and obtains the service paid for. Plaintiff knew of the situation of the telephone and had used it several times. Desiring its use on March 6, 1913, he entered the room, and on his way to the apparatus fell into an open space in the floor, caused by the opening of a trapdoor therein, negligently opened and left unguarded.

It may be assumed, as necessarily inferred from the allegations of the declaration, that Conlon was the owner or lessee of the premises, but not lessee of the telephone apparatus, which belonged to and had been installed by the telephone company for public use. The telephone company collected its charges from users by means of the slot machine. There was an implied invitation to the public to enter Conlon's premises and use the telephone. Under these circumstances was it the duty of the telephone company to provide or see to it that there was maintained a safe passage to and from the telephone apparatus, and is it liable to plaintiff for injuries sustained through negligent failure to maintain a safe passageway?

The question is a novel one. Research of counsel and of the court has discovered no precedent decision directly in point. That there is no precedent is of little importance, for it is more than likely that the exact situation has never before occurred. The case of Sullivan v. New York Teleph. Co. 157 App. Div. 642, 142 N. Y. Supp. 735, relied on by appellee, has some bearing upon the question, but is not directly in point. The facts in that case are that Barr occupied certain premises as a shoe store. He made a request for the installation of a telephone on a blank provided for the purpose by the telephone company. It contemplated that the company should keep an account of the messages sent from the station and render monthly statements thereof; that the tolls collected by the subscriber should be at rates prescribed by the company, and that the subscriber should conspicuously display such sign or signs as the company should furnish; that all signs, booths, or other equipment furnished should remain the property of the company, and should be returned on demand in good order, reasonable wear excepted; that the company should have access to its property for the purpose of inspection, repair, etc.; that the contract might be terminated by either party at the end of six months on ten days' notice served in writing; that the subscriber, who collected the tolls, was to pay to the company 80 per cent of all tolls charged by it for messages from said station.

Plaintiff came in to use the telephone and was directed to it by Barr. While passing to the desk of the cashier to pay the charges, she stepped into an opening in the floor, within a few feet of the telephone, caused by one of Barr's employees lifting a trapdoor leading to the basement, while she was using the telephone.

In the trial court plaintiff recovered judgment against both defendants. In the appellate division this was affirmed as to Barr, and reversed as to the telephone company. The court said: "It follows from these provisions that the defendant Barr had a direct interest in the use of the telephone, and had possession thereof as lessee or bailee. It was his duty, therefore, in inviting and permitting patrons to use the telephone, to exercise reasonable care to maintain his premises in a reasonably safe condition."

The telephone company was not liable because it said: "It was not in the possession of the premises, and although it shared with the defendant Barr in the profits arising from the use of the telephone, it was in no manner interested with him in the use of the premises, which were in his exclusive possession, with the exception that the company reserved the right of access to the telephone for the purpose of repairs or removal. The trapdoor was not opened in connection with the use of the telephone, or in the business of furnishing telephone accommodations to the public, in which Barr and the company were jointly interested."

Without attempting any criticism of the conclusions of the learned court, it is sufficient to say that there is a considerable difference in the facts of that case and this. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

On the other hand, the appellant relies on the case of Bennett v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 102 U. S. 577, 579, 26 L. ed. 235, 236, 7 Am. Neg. Cas. 349. That case decides as in Sullivan's case, supra, that the owner of premises who invites or induces others to come upon his premises for any lawful purpose is liable for any injury sustained through the unsafe condition of the premises or its approaches. See also Bell v. Central Nat. Bank, 28 App. D. C. 580.

If the telephone company had leased and occupied the building for use as a public station it would clearly be within the rule stated. So likewise if it had leased from Conlon the use of part of his room for the maintenance of its station, with an approach thereto, which it invited the public to use, it would be liable for negligent maintenance of the approach. But such are not the facts directly alleged in the declaration. Apparently, Conlon was the lessee or owner of the room in which he carried on a business of his own, and with his assent, under some arrangement not averred, the telephone company installed therein its station for public service, fixing its charges and collecting the same through its slot-box device. Conlon, apparently, had no interest in either. He was neither the lessee of the station equipment, nor co-partner with the company in its receipts. So far as the ordinary uses of the telephone were involved, it was no matter of necessary inquiry or concern of the public whether the telephone company was the owner or independent lessee of the room, or a sub-tenant of Conlon. The station was maintained for public use and profit therefrom.

As before stated, the telephone company, inviting the public to use it for hire, would be liable for the unsafe condition of its approaches were it owner or lessee of the premises.

Can it, then, escape liability by opening its station in the premises of another, inviting the public to enter and do business with it, and taking no care for the safety of its patrons?

In either case the purpose of the station and the invitation to use it are the same. Ought it then, by avoiding the direct maintenance of its station in a building or room of its own, and making some arrangement for the use of a room owned or controlled by another, to escape all liability for negligent maintenance of the necessary approach to its station by members of the public desiring to use it for lawful purposes? Could it do indirectly what it could not do directly?

No matter by what arrangement or contract it may have obtained the use of a space on or near the rear wall for the erection of its public service station, with the consequent right of its patrons to enter and use the portion of the floor necessary to go to and from the same, it ought to be held liable for negligence in the maintenance of said space. Keeping no special servant to exercise ordinary care in the maintenance of the safety of the approach, it may well be held to have devolved that special service upon Conlon, making him, to that extent, at least, its servant to perform its necessary duties. So that whether the telephone company leased the use of the wall and necessary floor space, and negligently suffered others to render it unsafe for the users of its telephone, or whether Conlon was its servant for the purpose of reasonably safe maintenance of the same approaches, upon which it invited the public to enter, we are of the opinion that the telephone company is liable for an injury to one of the public entering for the lawful use of its service, occasioned by its own negligence or that of its servant or agent, whichever he may be called.

It was error, therefore, to sustain the demurrer; and the judgment is reversed with costs, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

RE ESTATE OF FREDERIC ULLMANN, Deceased.

ELIZABETH ULLMANN, Exrx., etc., of Frederic Ullmann, Deceased, Appt.

Succession tax — rate — deduction of exemption.

The amount of an estate passing by will which is exempt from succession tax is to

The rule under the Minnesota statute is in accord with RE ULLMANN, that the exempt portion of the estate should be excluded in determining the amount for the purpose of fixing the rate. State ex rel. Holdridge v. Probate Ct. 111 Minn. 297, 126 N. W. 1070; State ex rel. Gage v. Probate Ct. 112 Minn. 279, 128 N. W. 18. See also State ex rel. Foot v. Bazille, 97 Minn. 11 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 732, 106 N. APPEAL by the devisee from an order of the County Court for Cook County, fixing the amount of the inheritance tax on the transfer to her of the property of her deceased husband under his last will and testament. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Ullmann, Hoag, & Davidson, for appellant:

The rate at which a legacy to a wife is taxable under the inheritance tax law of this state, where such legacy, after deducting the exemption of $20,000, to which the wife is entitled, does not exceed $100,000, is $1 for every $100.

Messrs. P. J. Lucey, Attorney General, and Thomas J. Young, Assistant Attorney General, for the People:

The granting of an exemption is a matter of grace on the part of the legislature, and upon such excess only;" and that the tax shall be computed upon the "full and true value of such inheritance . . . above such excess, at the following rates, viz.: (1) when such valuation is over $10,000 and less than $50,000, the rate shall be 1½ per cent thereof; (2) when such valuation is $50,000 or over, and less than $100,000, the rate shall be 3 per cent thereof; (3) when such valuation is $100,000 or over, the rate shall be 5 per cent thereof." Accordingly in the first Minnesota case cited it was held that a legacy whose total value was $58,000 was subject to a tax of only 1½ per cent, since, the exemption of $10,000 being deducted, the excess upon which the rate should be based was $48,000.

A question similar to the above, but differently decided, has arisen in several cases; that is, whether the exempt portion should and statutes exempting property from taxation should be strictly construed, and should not be extended by judicial interpretation.

The language of the statute clearly and plainly fixes the rate of taxation in inheritance-tax matters upon the basis of the fair market value of the property received, without reference to the amount of exemption given.

Farmer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by Elizabeth Ullmann, widow and devisee of Frederic Ullmann, deceased, from a judgment of the county court of Cook county fixing the inheritance tax on the transfer of property to her under the last will and testament of her husband.

Frederic Ullmann died testate on March 29, 1911. By his will he devised all his property to his widow, Elizabeth Ullmann, and named her as executrix of said will. The property which passed under the will was appraised at $116,534.73. Deducting the exemption allowed by statute of $20,000 left the taxable cash value of the property received by appellant $96,534.73. The county court held this amount was taxable at the rate of $2 on each $100 valuation, and fixed the tax accordingly at $1,930.69. Appellant has brought the case to this court by appeal, and insists the court erred in adopting the rate of $2 on the $100 valuation of the taxable property, and contends that the rate should have been $1 on each $100 valuation. This is the only question presented by this appeal, and involves a construction of § 1 of the inheritance tax act of 1909. Under that section, appellant was entitled to $20,000 of the estate of her husband exempt from the tax, and she contends that the rate of the tax is to be determined from the value of the

be included in determining the portion of the estate to which the lowest rate is applicable, leaving the balance of the estate subject to the higher rate, or whether the exemption should be deducted from the entire estate in the first instance. For example, in Re Timken, 158 Cal. 51, 109 Pac. 608, an estate was valued at $63,000 and the exemption allowed was $4,000. The statute provided for what was called a "primary rate," "where the property . . . exceeds in value the exemption . . . and shall not exceed in value $25,000." For estates exceeding $25,000 a multiple of the primary rate was provided. And it was held, as to the estate in question, that, for the purpose of determining the amount to which the various rates should apply, the amount of the exemption should not be deducted from the entire estate in the first instance, but should be included in the first $25,000, to which the "primary rate" applied; in other words, that the "primary rate" should apply to only $21,000, and the higher rates should apply to the balance over $25,000.

The same construction was placed upon the statute in Re Bull, 153 Cal. 715, 96 Pac. 366, although the point was not discussed.

A similar construction was placed upon the New York statute in Re Elletson, 75 Misc. 582, 136 N. Y. Supp. 455. The statute provided for a tax "at the rate of 1 per centum on any amount in excess of $5,000, up to the sum of $50,000; 2 per centum on any amount in excess of $50,000." And the question raised was whether, after exempting $5,000, a tax should be imposed of 1 per cent on $50,000, and 2 per cent on the balance, or of 1 per cent on $45,000 and 2 per cent on the balance, the latter construction being adopted.

Practically the same question was before the court in Re Jourdan, 151 App. Div. 5, 135 N. Y. Supp. 172, although in this case the part of the statute allowing exemptions was not construed, but only that part providing that if the estate "shall exceed the amount of $25,000 over and above the exemptions hereinbefore provided the rate of taxation shall be as follows: Upon all amounts in excess of the said $25,000, and up to and including the sum of $100,000, twice the primary rates," with similar provisions for progressive rates as to higher amounts; and it was held that only $75,000 was subject to taxation at twice the primary rate; that the balance of the estate, over $100,000, was subject to the higher rates.

Cases such as Re Mason, 69 Misc. 250, 126 N. Y. Supp. 998, holding that under a statute allowing an exemption of $500, and providing that if the estate is "of more than $500, it shall be taxable" at a certain rate upon the clear market value of the property, the full valuation, and not merely the excess over the exemption, is taxable where there is no question as to different rates which might be applicable, are not within the scope of the note.

As to constitutionality of succession taxes, see note to Rodman v. Com. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 592.

property after deducting the exemption. Appellee contends the rate is fixed by the value of the property received by appellant under the will of her husband, but is to be computed upon the value of the property after deducting the exemption. There is no dispute as to the value of the property subject to the tax. The only dispute is as to the rate the property is liable to be taxed.

Section 1 of the act of 1909 (Laws of 1909, p. 311) imposes a tax upon the transfer of all property to persons, institutions, or corporations "not hereinafter exempted," when the transfer is by will or by the intestate laws of this state. When the transfer is to or for the use of certain persons, including the wife, "the rate of tax shall be $2 on every $100 of the clear market value of such property received by each person, when the amount so received exceeds in amount the sum of $100,000, and one dollar on each $100 of the clear market value of such property received by each person when the amount so received is $100,000 or less: . . . Provided, that any gift, legacy, inheritance, transfer, appointment, or interest which may be valued at a less sum than $20,000 shall not be subject to any such duty or taxes, and the tax is to be levied in the above cases only upon the excess of $20,000 received by each person."

Appellee contends the meaning of this language is that the total value of the property received fixes the rate of taxation, and not the value of property received less the exemption allowed, and this was the view of the county court in fixing the tax. We do not think that is a correct interpretation of the language used or of the intention of the legislature, as indicated by the act. It is clear the tax is imposed only upon property not exempted by the act. If the property that passed to appellant by the will of her husband had not exceeded in value $20,000, it would have been exempt from liability to the inheritance tax. As the property she received exceeded that sum, its value in excess of $20,000 was liable to the tax. We understand the statute to mean that the rate is to be determined from the value of the "property received" subject to the tax. We do not believe that the statute warrants the construction that the rate of the tax was to be determined from the total value of the property received by appellant. Twenty thousand dollars in value of that property was not liable to the tax, and the rate could only be determined from the value of the property that was liable to the tax. This appears to us unquestionably to have been the meaning and intent of the legislature, as indicated by the language used 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) in the 1st section of the act. The most that can be said in support of the opposite side is that the language used leaves the legislative intent in some doubt. In that case the doubt would be required to be resolved in favor of appellant; for the tax sought to be collected is a special tax, and the law imposing it is required to be construed strictly against the government, and in favor of the taxpayer. In Re Fayerweather, 143 N. Y. 114, 38 N. E. 278; Re Vassar, 127 N. Y. 1, 27 N. E. 394; Re Harbeck, 161 N. Y. 211, 55 N. E. 850; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 340; People v. Koenig, 37 Colo. 283, 85 Pac. 1129, 11 Ann. Cas. 140. In our opinion, the tax should have been fixed at the rate of $1 on the $100 valuation of the property liable to the tax, which was $96,534.73.

The judgment of the county court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to fix the tax and enter judgment upon that basis.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

CITY OF PURCELL, Plff. in Err.,

v.

J. H. STUBBLEFIELD.

(— Okla. —, 139 Pac. 290.)

Municipal corporation — change of liability for streets.

1. A municipal corporation in the Indian territory, prior to statehood, being governed by the Arkansas laws, was not liable for injuries resulting to persons from defective streets and obstructions along and across the sidewalks thereof, and on November 16, 1907, by the terms of the enabling act (act June 16, 1906, chap. 3335, 34 Stat. at L. 267), the laws governing municipal corporations in Oklahoma territory, and then in force, were extended over towns and cities in the Indian territory, and these laws imposed a duty on municipal corporations and their officers to maintain the streets and sidewalks in a safe condition for the

As to the question of liability, generally, for injury from falling of object suspended use of its inhabitants and other persons lawfully using the streets.

Same — fall of sign — liability.

2. On January 28, 1909, it was the duty of the city of Purcell, being a city of the first class under the statutes of Oklahoma, to use reasonable care to keep its streets and sidewalks in a safe condition for persons using the same, and for failure to perform this duty said city was liable in damages to one injured by a sign falling and striking him, which had been permitted to remain across and above the sidewalk on one of its streets; the negligence of such person not contributing to such injury.

Act of God — windstorm — fall of sign.

3. When a heavy wooden sign, permitted to remain suspended over and above a street, is blown down by a severe wind, and strikes and injures one lawfully passing along the street, the city cannot relieve itself from liability by asserting that the injury was caused by an act of God, unless it also shows that the wind was unprecedented, and was the sole cause of the injury.

ERROR to the District Court for McClain County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. J. W. Hocker, for plaintiff in error:

A municipality governed by the laws in force in the Indian territory, by the acts of Congress not being liable for injuries resulting from the negligence of its officers in failing to maintain its streets and sidewalks in a safe condition, the adoption of the Constitution did not make the city liable for an injury happening after statehood, caused through the negligence of its officers, occurring prior to the statehood.

Messrs. J. F. Sharp, John E. Luttrell, and J. B. Dudley, for defendant in error:

The laws of Oklahoma with reference to liability of municipalities for the negligence of its officers in failing to maintain its streets in reasonably safe condition apply, and not the laws of Arkansas.

A city of the first class, under the laws of Oklahoma, is liable for damages for personal injuries sustained by reason of the negligence of its officers in failing to keep and maintain its streets and sidewalks in a reasonably safe condition.

It is the duty of a municipal corporation to keep its streets and sidewalks in a reasonably safe condition, both as to obstructions overhead and under foot.

building and permitted by the city to extend over the street. The contention of the city was that, inasmuch as there was no ordinance prohibiting such obstructions over the sidewalk, it had not been negligent in permitting the sign to remain. The court stated that the statute giving the city control of its streets, and imposing upon it the duty to keep them free from nuisances, could not be evaded by refusing to enact ordinances for that purpose.

Galbraith, C., filed the following opinion:

On the 13th of October, 1909, J. H. Stubblefield commenced this action in the district court of McClain county against the city of Purcell, a city of the first class, under the statutes of Oklahoma, to recover damages for personal injuries resulting to him from its alleged negligence. It is charged in the petition that on the 28th day of January, 1909, while passing along Main street, one of the principal thoroughfares of the defendant city, and near the location of the United States postoffice therein, about 1 o'clock in the afternoon of said day, a heavy wooden sign, which the defendant city had permitted to be suspended and remain over the sidewalk, and immediately over and above the heads of persons passing along said sidewalk, broke loose from its fastenings, fell upon the plaintiff, striking him upon the head and severely injuring him, cutting and lacerating his head and right eye, making a wound 1½ inches in length, and otherwise injuring him, from which he suffered great bodily pain and mental anguish, loss of time, etc., to his damage in the sum of $2,500, and that said sign had been permitted by the defendant city to be suspended in a careless and negligent manner from the roof of an awning over the sidewalk, supported by small wires, and said wires had become worn, rusted, and twisted so as to greatly weaken their strength, and render them unsafe to hold said sign against the force of the ordinary winds prevalent in that locality; that this sign had been permitted to remain in this unsafe condition for months prior to plaintiff's injury; and that the plaintiff was without knowledge of the dangers threatening and imminent to persons passing along the street beneath it, and that he was without fault or negligence. The defendant city denied its responsibility for the hanging of said sign, or permitting it to remain across the street, and that it had neither actual nor constructive notice of the danger, and denied any negligence or carelessness on its part, and as a special defense alleged that the falling of the sign was due to an extraordinary wind that was blowing at the time, and that the accident was caused by an act of Providence, and the city was therefore not liable.

A reply was filed by the plaintiff, and the cause was submitted to the court and a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $500. Upon the overruling of the defendant's motion for a new trial, an appeal was perfected to this court by petition in error and case-made.

The several assignments of error are grouped and discussed in the plaintiff in error's brief under three propositions, viz.:

"First. A municipality governed by the laws in force in the Indian territory, by the acts of Congress not being liable for injuries resulting from the negligence of its officers in failing to maintain its streets and sidewalks in a safe condition, did the adoption of the Constitution make the city liable for an injury happening after statehood, caused through the negligence of its officers occurring prior to statehood?

"Second. Is a municipal corporation in Oklahoma an insurer of the safety of its streets, or only chargeable with the exercise of ordinary care and diligence in preventing the erection and maintenance of dangerous objects over its sidewalks by the occupant of the abutting property?

"Third. Would a municipal corporation in Oklahoma be chargeable with negligence by an object suspended above its streets falling into the street, the proximate cause of the falling being a sudden gust of wind, or wind of extraordinary violence, which could not, with the exercise of reasonable foresight, have been contemplated?"

It is insisted that a negative answer should be returned to each of these questions.

It may be conceded that a municipal corporation in the Indian territory prior to statehood was not liable to an individual for injuries produced by the negligence of its officers in the construction and maintenance of the streets and sidewalks therein (as was held by the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit, in the case of Blaylock v. Muskogee, 54 C. C. A. 639, 117 Fed. 125 following the decisions of the highest court in Arkansas, from which state the law governing such cities was adopted by act of Congress).

It is argued that, inasmuch as the sign causing the injury to the plaintiff was erected by a citizen prior to statehood, and since, under the law governing cities in the Indian territory prior to statehood, the city could not be held liable for the injury, then under the schedule of the Constitution providing that "no existing rights, actions, . . . shall be affected by the change in the forms of government," etc., the laws in force in Oklahoma territory and extended over the state by the enabling act (§ 394, Wilson's Stat. being § 589, Rev. Laws 1910), giving the city council the right to prohibit and prevent all encroachments into and upon the sidewalks, etc., and the power to regulate the building of stairways, windows, doors, awnings, and all other structures, etc., projecting upon, over, and adjoining sidewalks along the streets of the city, and the construction of this statute placed upon it by the supreme court of the territory, holding municipal corporations liable for damages of the character complained of in the instant case, were not applicable, and did not apply to cities located in what was formerly the Indian territory part of the state, and therefore the defendant city is not liable in the instant case. This argument is not sound. The injury not having been received until fourteen months after statehood, the cause of action did not arise prior to that time. So far as the instant case is concerned, upon the advent of statehood, there were no "existing rights, actions," to be affected by the change in the laws and government. The laws then in force in Oklahoma territory relating to municipal corporations were applicable to municipal corporations in the Indian territory. These laws having been extended throughout the entire state on November 16, 1907, by the terms of the enabling act, the obligations and the duties thereby imposed were controlling in the defendant city the same as in other cities of the same class throughout the state. The defendant city is charged in the petition not only with negligence in permitting this sign to be erected and supported in the manner it was, but it is also charged with negligence in permitting it to remain in the position in which it was placed, being a menace and danger to persons passing along the street beneath it,—a clear charge of failure to discharge a plain duty imposed upon the defendant city by the laws by which it was governed subsequent to statehood. While it is true that the city would not have been liable if the accident had occurred prior to statehood, yet, since it did happen more than a year after statehood, and since the law extended over the defendant city at statehood imposed new duties and obligations upon it, among which was the duty of keeping and maintaining its streets and sidewalks in a safe condition for persons using the same in a lawful manner, and, for failure to discharge this duty after such laws were extended over and placed in force throughout the entire state, the defendant city was liable the same as cities organized under the statutes of Oklahoma. See Norman v. Teel, 12 Okla. 69, 69 Pac. 791; Stillwater v. Swisher, 16 Okla. 585, 85 Pac. 1110; Oklahoma City v. Meyers, 4 Okla. 686, 46 Pac. 552; Guthrie v. Swan, 6 Okla. 423, 41 Pac. 84; Fairfax v. Giraud, 35 Okla. 659, 131 Pac. 159.

The rule is announced in Norman v. Teel, supra, as follows: "A municipal corporation is bound by law to use ordinary care and diligence to keep its streets and sidewalks in a reasonably safe condition for public use in the ordinary modes of traveling, and, if it fails to do so, it is liable for injuries sustained by reason of such negligence, provided, however, that the party injured exercises ordinary care to avoid the injury. Ordinary care as applied to this class of cases means that degree of care and caution which might reasonably be expected from an ordinarily prudent person under the circumstances . . . at the time of the injury, and this is a question of fact for the jury to determine."

In Fairfax v. Giraud, 35 Okla. 659, 131 Pac. 159, the second paragraph of the syllabus is as follows: "A person traveling on a public street of a city, which is in constant use by the public, while using the same with reasonable care and caution, has a right to presume that such street is in reasonably safe condition, and is reasonably safe for ordinary travel by night, as well as by day, throughout its entire width, and is free from all dangerous holes and obstructions." And the third paragraph of the syllabus reads as follows: "In an action against a municipal corporation for personal injuries, there is no presumption that the plaintiff or defendant is guilty of negligence, and, in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover, it is sufficient for him to show that the defendant was guilty of negligence, with nothing in the circumstances establishing contributory negligence on his part; and, when such facts are proven, it devolves upon the defendant to prove affirmatively that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence."

It appears from the evidence that the de-defendant city had no ordinance regulating the erection or hanging of signs along its streets, and that it had no actual notice of the danger of this particular sign, still, if, by the use of ordinary diligence by its officers, the danger could have been discovered, it is charged with actual knowledge. It is said by the supreme court of Oklahoma territory, in Norman v. Teel, supra, on this question: "The sufficiency of notice to fasten liability upon a city for a defective sidewalk is a question of fact to be determined by a jury under all the circumstances surrounding the particular case. It is not essential that the corporation shall have actual notice. If the defective condition of the street or sidewalk has existed for such a period of time, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, the city authorities could have repaired the defect, and placed the street or sidewalk in a reasonably safe condition, and it fails to do so, then it is liable for any injuries that may be occasioned thereby by reason of such negligence, provided the injured party was in the exercise of ordinary care."

The fact that a sign 9 feet and 10 inches in length, 17½ inches wide, and weighing 44 pounds, was permitted to remain suspended over the walk for more than a year after statehood, and prior to the accident, and whether the city during these months should have discovered the dangers incident to the sign hanging in the manner and position it was, and its failure to remove it or cause it to be securely fastened constituted negligence, was a question of fact for the jury to determine. The jury by its verdict found that the defendant city was negligent in this, and this finding, being supported by the testimony, is conclusive on that point.

In answer to the third contention of the plaintiff in error that it cannot be held liable because the injury was occasioned by the act of God, it is only necessary to say that the evidence shows that on the day and at the time of the injury a strong wind was blowing in Purcell. There was a conflict in the testimony as to whether such winds were unprecedented, or were reasonably to be expected at that season of the year in that locality. The character of the wind and its relation to and connection with the accident were questions of fact for the jury. Even if it were admitted that the wind was unprecedented on that day, and that there had never been such a wind as that before, yet, if the accident was not due entirely to this wind, but the strong wind in connection with the negligence of the defendant operated as an efficient and contributory concurrent cause, then the defendant would still be liable. The definition of an act of God, as given by this court, is, "an act of God, such as an unprecedented rainfall and resulting flood, which will excuse from liability, must not only be the proximate cause of the loss, but it must be the sole cause. If, however, the injury is caused by an act of God, commingled with the negligence of the defendant, as an efficient and contributing concurrent cause, and the injury would not have occurred except for such negligence, the defendant will be liable." Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Johnson, 34 Okla. 582, 126 Pac. 567. Applying this definition to the facts of this case, in order for this defense to avail the defendant city, it must be found that the wind that day was of an extraordinary and unprecedented velocity, and that this wind was the sole cause of the sign falling and the resulting injury. No one can say upon this record that the wind, extraordinary though it may have been, was the sole cause of the accident, nor that the negligence of the city and its officers in allowing this sign to remain swinging over the sidewalk for fourteen months was not a contributing cause of the accident.

The jury may have found from the evidence that this large sign suspended over the sidewalk, supported by small wires, bent and rusty, so that a gentle breeze caused it to swing back and forth, was a danger and menace to persons passing under it, at any time; and when the gentle zephyrs down Purcell way should lash themselves into the fury of a gale, it became a real peril to any one passing that way; and that, if the defendant city had discharged the duty imposed upon it by law, the sign would have been removed long prior to January 28, 1900, the date of the accident.

Exceptions were saved to a number of instructions given by the court, and also to the court's refusal to give a number of instructions requested by the plaintiff in error. It does not seem to be necessary to examine these instructions in detail, since the court, in its instructions to the jury, covered the theory of the law as hereinbefore set out, namely, that subsequent to statehood the duty was imposed upon the defendant city by the statute to use reasonable care and caution to keep its streets and sidewalks in a safe condition for public travel; and whether or not this duty had been properly discharged by the defendant, and whether or not it had notice of the dangerous condition of this sign, these several issues were properly submitted to the jury under the instructions. The plaintiff in error embodied its theory as hereinbefore discussed in the requested instructions, and we are constrained to hold that the court did not err in refusing to adopt the theory of the law of this case as set out in these requested instructions; and it was not error to refuse to give them.

No sufficient reason appearing for disturbing the judgment appealed from, we conclude that the same should be affirmed.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

(Division No. 1.)

NORMAN MILLING & GRAIN COMPANY,
Plff. in Err.,

v.

E. A. BETHUREM.

(— Okla. —, 139 Pac. 830.)

Municipal corporation — power over streets.

1. A city has power of control over its streets, including spaces occupied by trees and wires thereon, but must act in good faith, and not abuse its exercise of this power.

Headnotes by THACKER, C.

Note. — Liability to abutting owner for mutilating trees in highway by erecting poles or stringing wires.

The early cases dealing with the above question are treated in the notes to Cartwright v. Liberty Teleph. Co. 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1125, and Slabaugh v. Omaha Electric Light & Power Co. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1084, which the present note brings down to date.

The easement of a city in the street does not include the right to erect poles and wires in such a manner as to destroy shade trees, to the damage of property owners, and a public-service corporation is liable to an owner of property for injury to trees located in the parkway between the sidewalk and the pavement in front of his property, which were practically destroyed by placing wires and poles through their tops. Rienhoff v. Springfield Gas & Electric Co. — Mo. —, 162 S. W. 761.

Although the mile circle upon which the city of Raleigh is situated was purchased by the state, and the city, so far as is within those limits, was divided into lots and sold, reserving the title to the streets to the state, the city, for the purpose of its government and management, can, in its discretion, cut down or trim up the trees bordering the streets, and cannot be restrained unless in cases of wilfulness or oppression. Moore v. Carolina Power & Light Co. 163 N. C. 300, 79 S. E. 597.

Highways — title to trees in.

2. An abutting lot owner has an equitable easement in trees grown by him on a street, notwithstanding fee in city, which will enable him, as such special owner, to maintain action for wrongful injury thereto, depreciating value of such lot.

Same — conflict between trees and wires.

3. Both owner of abutting lot having an equitable easement in trees on street and owner of wires thereon may be in lawful occupancy of a street; and, in such case, mutual and reasonable accommodation is due from each to the other.

Same — right to trim trees.

4. Ordinarily, an abutting lot owner growing trees on a street is a potential occupant of sufficient space, in addition to that actually occupied, for the perfection of the growth of such trees, and, without due compensation, cannot be excluded from any portion of such space to give exclusive occupancy to an owner of wires other than the city; and an owner of wires thereafter voluntarily occupying such space is not entitled, without due compensation, to injuriously trim such trees to sever or prevent contact with wires.

Same — liability for trimming trees.

5. Ordinarily an owner of wires, voluntarily strung within space already potentially occupied by trees grown by the abutting lot owner, who injuriously cuts back such trees from contact with such wires, in that circle have an easement or property in the shade trees standing along the sidewalk which the law will protect. Ibid.

And the city cannot transfer to any individual or a quasi public corporation, for its convenience and profit, this superior right, which it can exercise only for the public benefit. Ibid.

And a quasi public corporation, empowered by its charter to place its poles and wires along the streets of the city for the purpose of carrying electric lights, cannot invade the property right of an abutting owner in a shade tree standing on the sidewalk without compensation. Ibid.

Even if it is necessary for such a company to run its wires through the tree and cut its limbs, it can do so only upon compensating the abutting owner. Ibid.

And such an owner is entitled to compensation for the deterioration of his property caused by the cutting of trees, whether the cutting was skilfully or unskilfully done. Ibid.

In St. Paul Realty & Assets Co. v. Tri-State Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 122 Minn. 424, 142 N. W. 807, it was held that, under § 2927, 1 Rev. Laws 1905, authorizing telephone companies to erect poles and lines in roads and streets subject to municipal police regulation, the license to construct is not exclusive of the rights of abutting owners, but the rights of both must be so exercised as not unnecessarily to impinge upon, interfere with, or impede those of the other.

municipal corporation — power to permit tree trimming.

5. Only public necessity, as contradistinguished from necessity of private owner of poles or wires, will justify the city's commission, and only the latter will justify her such owner in excluding the other from space first rightfully occupied by the other by trees or wires on the street.

ERROR to the District Court for Cleveland County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to join defendant from injuring or destroying plaintiff's trees. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. B. F. Williams and Munden & Morton, for plaintiff in error:

Defendant is not liable for damage done by necessarily cutting the limbs of the trees under the law and its franchise.

Overholser v. Oklahoma Interurban Traction Co. 29 Okla. 571, 119 Pac. 128; Meyer v. Standard Teleph. Co. 122 Iowa, 514, 98 N. W. 300; Nichols v. New York & P. Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 126 App. Div. 184, 110 N. Y. Supp. 325.

And it was held that duty devolves upon telephone company to construct, maintain, and operate its lines with due regard to the property rights of those who own and occupy lands adjacent thereto, and who also have interests in those portions of the road or street occupied by both, and that the trimming of trees growing on adjacent property and on the boulevard must, if practically possible, be done in such manner as not to injure them. Ibid.

And in this case the evidence was held sufficient to warrant a verdict for an abutting owner against a telephone company for injuries to trees on the former's land and on the boulevard in front of it, which were caused by the swinging of, and electrical discharges from, the company's wires. Ibid.

In Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. Smithdeal, 103 Tex. 128, 124 S. W. 627, it was held that a property owner has a right to grow trees upon the sidewalk in front of his property, and that, if the damages to the trees by telephone wires contribute to a depreciation in the market value of his property, the injury will be considered in ascertaining the damages.

On a subsequent appeal of this case in 104 Tex. 258, 136 S. W. 1049, modifying — Tex. Civ. App. —, 126 S. W. 942, in which a claim for damage to trees was included, it was held that where telephone lines were erected in the street before the plaintiff purchased his property, he could not recover damages to the property which 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

The title to trees is in the city, and same may be disposed of if it suits the city.

The mere fact that abutting owners are permitted to plant trees does not change the rule that the city has an absolute right to control trees.

Baker v. Normal, 81 Ill. 108.

Mr. W. L. Eagleton, for defendant in error:

Defendant was a trespasser ab initio in going upon the parking and cutting trees of plaintiff without her consent and without condemnation proceedings.

Although title to the streets was and is resulted from the presence of the structures before he became the owner, but that he was nevertheless authorized to recover damages resulting from subsequent changes in the construction of the lines, or additions which increased the existing servitude.

It was further held that if it is shown by a property owner that wires or cables strung in the street in front of his property, if left in place, will kill or destroy the trees growing along the sidewalk, he is entitled to a mandatory injunction requiring their removal; but that where it is not made to appear that injury will result to the trees, the granting of such an injunction is improper. Ibid.

In Moore v. Carolina Power & Light Co. supra, it was held that forms of action are no longer matters of supreme importance, and that an ordinary action by an abutting owner for damages caused by the cutting of trees in front of his property might, if necessary, be styled an action to recover damages under the right of eminent domain.

In Com. v. Miller, 47 Pa. Super. Ct. 193, an owner of property on the opposite side of the street from that on which it was alleged trees had been cut by linemen erecting poles and stringing wires was held not an abutting property owner within the meaning of an act providing a penalty for cutting or injuring trees on public highways without the agreement of abutting property owners. Messrs. W. M. Newell and W. J. Jackson also for defendant in error.

Thacker, C., filed the following opinion:

Plaintiff in error will be designated as defendant, and defendant in error as plaintiff, in accord with their respective titles in the trial court.

In August, 1909, and at all times since about January, 1903, defendant, a public-service corporation, owned and operated electric current wires strung about 24½ or 26½ feet above the ground, and almost immediately over the center of the tops of certain black locust trees, about 17 or 18 in number, in a parking on a street in the city of Norman; and plaintiff, the abutting lot owner, having, in about 1896, set and since cultivated these trees, had whatever interest in them these facts and the act of March 2, 1905, together impart to her; but prior to and without regard to this act, she, as abutting lot owner and grower of the trees, notwithstanding the fee-simple title to the street was in the city (Guthrie v. Nix, 5 Okla. 555, 49 Pac. 918; Blackwell, E. & S. W. R. Co. v. Gist, 18 Okla. 516, 90 Pac. 889; McKay v. Enid, 26 Okla. 275, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1021, 109 Pac. 520, and also as a complement of the rule, see § 610, Stat. 1890, the same being § 588, Rev. Laws 1910), which was also the general owner of the trees (Mt. Carmel v. Shaw, 155 Ill. 37, 27 L.R.A. 580, 46 Am. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

St. Rep. 311, 39 N. E. 584), had and has such equitable easement in and special ownership of the trees as to entitle her to bring and maintain an action for wrongful injury to them resulting in consequential injury to and depreciation in value of her abutting lot. At the time defendant's wires were strung (January, 1903), these trees were small and their tops far from interfering; but, in August, 1909, as a result of about six years' additional growth, they came in contact with and extended some 7 or 9 feet above the wires, and thus presented a condition requiring severance and precautions against recurrence of contact, unless it was feasible to so insulate the wires and so protect such insulation as to thus afford protection to the trees, wires, and users of the streets from injury resulting from such contact, which does not appear. At that time (August, 1909), defendant cut off the tops and some of the branches of these trees, cutting off some 10 or 12 feet of the tops, and cutting the branches back in some instances to where they were an inch or more in diameter. The act of cutting was without regard to avoidance of exposure of cut ends of branches to weather, and without regard to immediate injury to stubs, the branches being hacked, and in some instances so as to leave a forked cut; and, in deference to the verdict of the jury, at least, we may say that as a result, these trees fell into a state of progressive deterioration in health which, at the time of the trial, had resulted in the death of one or two and, perhaps, presaged the death of others.

Plaintiff brought this action and recovered $100 as her damages for the consequential injury to and depreciation in value of her abutting lot, and the defendant attempted to justify the cutting by showing, but the trial court, upon objection made, did not permit it to show, that on January 10, 1903, by virtue of its due acceptance at that time of an ordinance enacted by the city of Norman on December 2, 1902, and which had been duly published, it acquired and has since had a franchise incidentally purporting to authorize it to so cut the tops and branches of trees. The terms of this ordinance granted to the defendant a franchise for twenty-one years, "with full right, power, and authority to erect, maintain, extend and operate a plant of machinery, poles, wires and all other apparatus and appliances within the corporate limits of the city of Norman, for the purpose of generating and furnishing to the city of Norman and its inhabitants electricity for light, heat and power, and for said purpose to enter upon and use the streets, alleys and public grounds of said city, and place and maintain thereon such poles, wires, apparatus and appliances as may be necessary and proper, and shall have the right to trim trees to prevent branches from coming in contact with wires and to remove such trees when necessary for the proper placement and maintenance of same, subject to the terms and conditions hereinafter provided." Another section of this ordinance provides "that said poles and wires shall be erected and placed under the direction of the city care and erect poles and wires in places wherein said grantee [the defendant] shall deem necessary." The ordinance does not limit defendant to such precise place for poles or wires as would have prevented the stringing of the wires higher or more to one side of the trees, or elsewhere than in the parking, nor, perhaps, would any public purpose which would justify cutting the trees be apparent therefrom if such limitation had been imposed, and the defendant strung its wires so as to occupy a space well within that which should at the time reasonably have been anticipated as necessary for perfection in the growth of plaintiff's trees. It appears that the defendant, in stringing its wires, both voluntarily and unnecessarily invaded space which at that time must reasonably have been anticipated as necessary for the perfection of the growth of the trees, and thus potentially occupied by their grower, the plaintiff. The court treated defendant as a trespasser ab initio upon proof of the foregoing state of facts, and instructed the jury in effect that, if plaintiff was damaged, she was entitled to recover as such damages the difference between the value of her lot before and its value after the cutting.

It is here contended by defendant that it was not a trespasser ab initio, and that the true measure of damages, if any, is the depreciation in the value of the plaintiff's lot by such trimming as was not reasonably necessary to sever the contact of trees and wires and keep them apart, if there was any such trimming, or, in other words, the difference between the value of the lot with the trees trimmed so far as reasonably necessary and its value with the trees trimmed as they were, if such trimming went beyond what was proper and necessary.

The widely divergent views of the courts and authors of text-books upon the question of the rights and duties of owners of trees and owners of wires upon the same street, under authority express or implied from the city, and of the liability of the latter owners for damages to the former for cutting back such trees, to sever or prevent contact with the wires, are well illustrated by the following citations: *Moore v. Our own conclusions are as follows:

First. Subject to the requirement that it must act in good faith, and not abuse its exercise of power, a city has the power of control over its streets, including the parkings and all spaces occupied by both the trees and wires thereon; and this power is paramount to any right that either the grower of trees or the owner of wires may acquire thereon. Sections 586-591, Stat. 1890, found with some amendments in §§ 572-575, Rev. Laws 1910; 28 Cyc. 851, 947, 953; McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 1327; Robinson v. Spokane, 66 Wash. 527, 120

Second. An abutting lot owner, even though the fee of the street and general ownership of the trees be in the city, has, without the aid of statute, an equitable easement, and therefore a special ownership, in the trees which will enable him to maintain an action for wrongful injury thereto which depreciates the value of his lot. McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 1326; Donahue v. Keystone Gas Co. 181 N. Y. 313, 70 L.R.A. 761, 106 Am. St. Rep. 549, 73 N. E. 1108, 18 Am. Neg. Rep. 203; Adams v. Syracuse Lighting Co. 137 App. Div. 449, 121 N. Y. Supp. 762.

Third. As stated in St. Paul Realty & Assets Co. v. Tri-State Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 122 Minn. 424, 142 N. W. 807, decided July 11, 1913, by the supreme court of Minnesota: "Both the company and the landowner may be in lawful occupancy of the street. The abstract right of neither can be said to be superior, and each must be regardful of the rule that property rights must be so exercised as not unnecessarily to impinge upon, interfere with, or impede those of another."

In such case, mutual and reasonable accommodation is due from each to the other; and slight injury to trees by necessary and reasonable trimming cannot be made the predicate of an action where the wires are rightfully in position and their owner has not voluntarily, or to any considerable extent, invaded space first actually or potentially occupied by the special owner of trees growing on the street when the wires were strung.

Fourth. Ordinarily such special owner of trees may neither be excluded from the occupancy of such space as her trees actually occupy, or such additional space as should be reasonably anticipated as necessary for their perfection in growth as is thus potentially occupied by them to make room for the exclusive occupancy of such space, or any part thereof, by the owner of wires, other than the city itself; and if such owner of wires within such space cuts back the trees to sever or prevent their contact with the wires, and thus injures the trees and depreciates the value of the abutting lot of such special owner, the latter is entitled to and may recover damages therefor.

Fifth. Only where public necessity, as contradistinguished from any necessity of either the private owner of the trees or the private owner of the wires, justifies such an act, may the city authorize either such private owner to invade and exclude the other from space first rightfully and actually or potentially occupied by the other, and so inflict any substantial injury or damage upon such other, without due compensation.

Sixth. A necessity for trimming trees resulting from the voluntary stringing of wires by defendant within the space which it must, at the time, have anticipated would be and which was required for the perfection of the growth of the trees, is a necessity for which defendant is blamable, and cannot be urged as justification of any substantial injury to the trees.

The burden of proof was, of course, upon plaintiff to make at least a prima facie case of liability against defendant; but it appears from the foregoing statement of facts that she has done this, and the said ordinance of the city purporting to authorize defendant to trim trees would not justify the trimming, nor constitute a defense against the recovery of the actual damages given.

Tested by the foregoing observations, it does not appear that there is any reversible error in the trial of this case in the court below; and the judgment of that court should be affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following response was handed down on April 4, 1914:

We have examined the several propositions urged in petition for rehearing without discovering any sufficient reason for change in the conclusions heretofore reached.

In respect to the principal question in the case, it is but a reiteration of the view heretofore expressed, with only slight change in form, to say that a right to occupy a street for the purpose of putting in position and maintaining posts and electric current wires does not include the right to occupy each and every portion of such street, and the defendant violated the rule of "mutual accommodation" announced in the opinion heretofore handed down in this case. If the city of Norman had limited defendant's right to that particular space and portion of the street which was necessary for the perfection of the growth of plaintiff's trees, the question as to whether the city had acted in bad faith and had abused its exercise of power would still remain for determination before this case could be reversed; but there was no compulsion by the city in this regard, and there was no necessity for trimming these trees unless made by the voluntary and wrongful act of the defendant in setting its posts and stringing its wires where it did.

In our opinion the petition for rehearing should be denied, and there should be adherence to the original opinion.

Per Curiam:

OKLAHOMA CRIMINAL COURT OF APPEALS.

EX PARTE GEORGE E. WINTERS.

(— Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 140 Pac. 164.)

Bribery — one holding himself out as officer.

1. A person who holds himself out as an officer under color of authority, and who solicits and accepts a bribe, has no right to defend and be discharged on the ground that, as a matter of law, he had no right to act as such officer.

Same — denial of office.

2. One cannot hold himself out as an officer of the law and prostitute the public trusts and debauch the public conscience by Headnotes by ARMSTRONG, P. J.

Note. — Bribery as affected by lack of, or defect in, title to office.

As to the jurisdiction or authority of officer to act in the matter as element of bribery, see note to People v. Jackson, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1173.

The general rule seems to be that offering, giving, soliciting, or accepting a bribe constitutes bribery where the one soliciting or accepting the bribe, although not an officer de jure, was acting under color of title to an office embraced in the pertinent statute, but that where there is no color of office there is no bribery. Some of the reported cases, however, are, on the face at least, seemingly conflicting, but in the main are reconcilable when one considers the fact that the cases are often governed by variant statutes, and keeps in mind the above-noted distinction between cases where the one bribed is an officer de facto, and those cases where he is not an officer de jure and is acting without color of title or authority.

EX PARTE WINTERS is illustrative of those cases wherein it is held that one who holds himself out as an officer, and as such solicits or accepts a bribe, cannot defeat the charge by saying that as a matter of law he had no right to act as such officer.

So, in Diggs v. State, 49 Ala. 311, the court, in holding that a de facto county solicitor was indictable for bribery notwithstanding his appointment was defeasible and invalid, said: "It is difficult for us to conceive of a more evil and dangerous proposition than that one who intrudes into or soliciting and accepting bribes, and be exonerated by the courts of this state, on the ground that he had no legal right to act in the capacity he assumed. If he is officer enough to solicit and accept a bribe, he is also officer enough to be sent to the penitentiary for his conduct.

usurps a public office, assumes its duties, and exercises its powers, can commit official crimes and shield himself from punishment by alleging that his crimes were only additions to his intrusion or usurpation. Admissions, on which another is induced to act, become conclusive on the party making them; and it is immaterial whether they were made innocently or fraudulently. . . . If this be true, what satisfactory reason can be given for not applying the same principle to one who deliberately assumes and exercises the duties and powers of a public office? He holds himself out to the world as an officer; he becomes entitled to protection as such; he can exercise the duties, and take the emoluments, until he is ousted; and he must be amenable as if he was the rightful officer."

And in Com. v. Wotton, 201 Mass. 81, 87 N. E. 202, it was held that one who was only de facto a member of the Lowell Water Board was subject to prosecution for soliciting a bribe under Massachusetts Rev. Laws, chap. 210, § 7, which relates to the soliciting and accepting of bribes, it being said that "no reason can be urged for punishing the acceptance of a bribe by an officer de jure which does not apply with equal force when a bribe is accepted by an officer de facto."

And in People v. McCann, 247 Ill. 130, 93 N. E. 100, 20 Ann. Cas. 496, it was held that a de facto police officer who became such by assuming and discharging the duties of such an officer could not excuse the acceptance of a bribe upon the ground that he had not been legally appointed to the of-

Armstrong, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original action begun in this court by George E. Winters for the writ of habeas corpus. The petition alleges that an information has been filed in the district court of Osage county by the county attorney of said county, charging petitioner with bribery. The information is as follows:

So, in State v. Duncan, 153 Ind. 318, 54 N. E. 1067, which is discussed and quoted in EX PARTE WINTERS, it was held that a de facto gravel road engineer could not defend a charge of bribery by proof that he was not an officer de jure.

And in State v. Ray, 153 Ind. 334, 54 N. E. 1067, which was a prosecution for conspiracy to bribe the defendant in State v. Duncan, supra, it was held, following the principle announced in that case, that the fact that Duncan was not an officer de jure did not afford a defense to the charge of conspiracy to bribe him.

And in State v. Gardner, 54 Ohio St. 24, 31 L.R.A. 660, 42 N. E. 999, referred to in EX PARTE WINTERS. Spear, J., in concurring in the majority holding that one charged with offering a bribe to a city commissioner could not defend on the ground that the statute under which such commissioner held office was unconstitutional, in answer to the contention "that the title of the office is an essential ingredient of the crime, and that an unconstitutional act cannot create a material element of a crime," among other things, said: "How is the corruption, the guilt of one who attempts to pollute the fountains of justice by bribing its acting officers, and thus cheat his neighbors and the community, any the less substantial, or the state's case against him any the less meritorious, because it may turn out that the officer's title would not stand the test of a quo warranto? . . . If the acting commissioner be good enough officer to be bribed ought he not to be held good enough officer to answer the designation of the statute in order to punish the briber? It is insisted that to convict the defendant in this case would override the maxim that an element of a crime cannot be supplied by estoppel. Let us see. Could the commissioner, had he accepted the bribe, be heard to say he was not an officer? Surely not. Wherein lies the difference? Why should there be a difference? Why should the venal scoundrel who, dealing with the other as an officer, invents the wickedness and tempts him, be let off by a mere technicality? The statute which prescribes punishment for accepting a bribe also prescribes punishment for giving it. What a travesty on justice would be presented by the judgment of a court, acting on the same facts, and applying the same criminal statute, which says to the tempted officer, you will go to the penitentiary, and to the wily fowler who spread the net, and gather in his grasp the ill-gotten gain, you may go free."

So, in Florez v. State, 11 Tex. App. 102, it was held sufficient for the state to prove, under an indictment for offering to bribe a "deputy sheriff," that such officer was a deputy sheriff de facto, he having as a matter of fact not qualified as directed by statute. The court, after saying that if the party is an officer de facto, that is, acting notoriously in that capacity, and is bribed or offered a bribe, those who bribe or offer to bribe him are liable to prosecution, and they cannot defend upon the ground that he is not an officer de jure, continued as follows: "To hold that deputy sheriffs, constables, and jailors, who have the custody of prisoners charged in a great many cases with capital felonies, can be bribed to discharge the felons, and when those guilty of the bribing are sought to be brought to justice and punishment, that they can plead that the custodians of prisoners were not in every particular legally appointed, would be a terrible doctrine indeed. Moral obliquity obtains in the one case as well as the other. The injury to public justice being the same, the defense, if one at all, is strictly technical, without foundation, as we think, in principle, and evidently against justice."

But, as above stated, it has been held that a charge of bribery cannot be sustained where the one soliciting or accepting a bribe is neither holding an office embraced within the bribery statutes nor acting under color of title to such an office.

Thus, in Messer v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 635, 40 S. W. 488, it was held that an allegation that defendant offered a bribe to "a deputy constable, . . . a peace officer, and a guard of the defendant," to let him escape, was not sustained by proof that the offer was made to a private citizen in whose custody the defendant had been temporarily put after his arrest, the ground and there wrongfully, unlawfully, and feloniously accept and receive the sum of $15, good and lawful money of the United States for himself, for and in consideration of an agreement and understanding with one W. T. Crabtree, that he, the said W. T. Crabtree, should be permitted to violate the provisions of the prohibitory liquor laws of the state of Oklahoma, in this, to wit: To sell, barter, give away, and otherwise furnish intoxicating liquors at Avant, in said county and state, contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state of Oklahoma.

of the decision being that such custodian was not a peace officer within the meaning of the statutes prohibiting the offering of bribes to certain enumerated officers, but was simply a private citizen placed in charge of a prisoner without any authority of law.

And in Naill v. State, 59 Tex. Crim. Rep. 484, 129 S. W. 630, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 1268, an indictment charging an offer to bribe an "acting assistant city attorney" was held fatally defective where the charter of the city showed that there was no such officer in existence, and the statute provided punishment for bribery or offering to bribe "any executive, legislative, or judicial officer," etc. It was further held in this case that a "deputy" city attorney was not an "assistant city attorney," and that the person to whom the bribe was offered, although acting as a deputy, was neither an official de jure nor de facto.

In Thomson v. United States, 37 App. D. C. 461, it was held that giving or offering to give a bribe to a person who had assumed the duty of inspecting paper for postal cards, but who as a matter of fact had no such authority, although he was postal-card agent, did not constitute bribery within the meaning of District of Columbia Code, § 861, 31 Stat. at L. 1330, chap. 854, which provides for the punishment of any person who gives or offers to give money "to any person acting in any official function," since the giving or offering was not to someone who was charged by law with acts official in character, and within his legal duty. The court said: "Under the government's contention, if a person not connected with the government service in any way had assumed to inspect such paper or any consignment thereof, and the defendant, under the mistaken belief that such person really was a government agent or employee, had offered him a bribe, the offense of bribery would have been complete. Such cannot be the law. Before there can be an official function, there must be some duty, some responsibility."

In Re Yee Gee, 83 Fed. 145, it was held in construing U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5451, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3680, which makes it an offense to offer, etc., any money to "any officer of the United States, or to any person

The assistant attorney general filed a demurrer to the petition.

In our judgment the pleadings raise only one question which is entitled to our consideration in this proceeding; that is, Does a person who holds himself out as an officer under color of authority, and who solicits and accepts a bribe, and endeavors to and does corrupt other persons, have a right to defend and be discharged upon the contention that, as a matter of law, he had no right to act as such officer, therefore the accepting of a bribe was not a violation of the statute? It is not necessary for us to determine in this proceeding the acting for or on behalf of the United States in any official function under or by authority of any department or office of the government, with intent to influence his decision or action on any question, matter, cause, or proceeding which may at any time be pending, or which may be brought before him in his official capacity, . . . or with intent to influence him to commit, or aid in committing, or to collude in or allow any fraud, or make opportunity for the commission of any fraud on the United States, or to induce him to aid, do, omit to do, any act in violation of his official duty,"—that one who offered a bribe to another who was an official interpreter, to secure a particular translation of certain Chinese letters which were to be used in a certain contemplated criminal proceeding, had not committed an offense under the statute, where such interpreter had not at the time of the offer been officially appointed to serve as an interpreter at this particular contemplated criminal proceeding; the court saying that "an offer made to a person in contemplation of a mere probability that he may be called to perform official functions, and intended to influence his conduct in performance of such functions if he shall be so called, does not violate this statute."

And in United States v. Dietrich, 126 Fed. 676, it was held not to be an offense under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1781, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1212, making it a criminal offense for any "member of Congress, or any officer or agent of the government," to receive or agree to receive a bribe for procuring or aiding to procure any office or place for another from the government, for a Senator elect who has not yet been seated to receive a bribe for procuring and aiding to procure for the giver an appointment as a postmaster.

And see State v. Graham, 96 Mo. 120, 8 S. W. 911, wherein it was held that a court erred in refusing to charge a jury impaneled to try one for offering a bribe to the mayor of a city to appoint defendant to an office, that in order to convict defendant it devolved upon the state to prove that the said mayor "was an officer of the city of S. and authorized to make" the appointment in question.

G. J. C.

right and power of the state enforcement officer, as that office existed at the time of the filing of this petition, and at the time he is alleged to have appointed the petitioner as a deputy enforcement officer, to lawfully make such appointment, nor is it necessary in our judgment to determine that persons so appointed were entitled to act as officers. It has been the policy of this court since its organization to assume every reasonable position possible, tenable with the view of aiding the enforcement of the law and the maintenance of good government in Oklahoma. As said by this court in Ellington v. State, 7 Okla. Crim. Rep. 252, 123 Pac. 186, which was an embezzlement case wherein a guardian was prosecuted for embezzling moneys of his ward, and who attempted to defend on the ground that the money embezzled by him did not legally belong to his ward, therefore it was no crime for him to embezzle it, that, "if he was agent enough to collect this money, he was agent enough to be punished for its embezzlement." The same might be said of the petitioner; if he was officer enough to solicit and accept a bribe, he was also officer enough to be sent to the penitentiary for so doing. Corruption and debauchery are not tolerated in civilized communities. It makes no difference for the purpose of this prosecution whether the state enforcement officer had the right and power to appoint deputies, as a matter of law, or not; if he did make such appointments, and such appointees assumed to act and hold themselves out as officers of the law, they were amenable to the criminal statutes of this state for soliciting and accepting bribes, and the good of society demands that any such persons so accepting bribes be punished. In this position we are not wholly without support by the authorities.

In State v. Duncan, 153 Ind. 320, 54 N. E. 1067, the supreme court of Indiana, in considering a similar question, said: "Bribery is an offense against public justice. The essence of it is the prostitution of a public trust, the betrayal of public interests, the debauchment of the public conscience. If one admits the doing of the things that produce these results, shall he escape by saying that he had no right to act at all? It would seem passing strange if the consequences of one breach of law might be evaded by showing another." In the Indiana case the accused was a gravel road engineer, and was prosecuted for accepting a bribe. His defense was based on the contention that there was no valid law authorizing his appointment. The supreme court of Indiana says that he could not thus prostitute the public trust and debauch the public conscience, and urges that, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

although he accepted the bribe, he had no authority to act as an officer. The petitioner was appointed as an officer; he assumed to act and exercise the duties of an officer; he will not now be permitted to say he had no authority in the premises.

The supreme court of Ohio, in State v. Gardner, 54 Ohio St. 24, 31 L.R.A. 660, 42 N. E. 999, promulgated a similar doctrine. In the Ohio case Gardner was prosecuted for offering a bribe to one purported to hold an office. His defense was that such office did not legally exist. The court held that he could not maintain any such defense.

In Price v. State, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 137 Pac. 736, we had under consideration a question involving the principle now under discussion. In that case Price was prosecuted for embezzling money as an attorney. He had moved from another state to Oklahoma, but had not been legally admitted to the bar in Oklahoma. His defense was based on the contention that, not having been legally admitted to the bar, he could not be charged with embezzlement as a lawyer. In determining that question, we said: "Where a lawyer from another state moves into Oklahoma, and, without securing admission to the bar of this state, holds himself out to the public as a lawyer, accepts business as such, and embezzles money collected by him as a lawyer, he cannot escape punishment upon the ground that he was never legally admitted to the bar of Oklahoma." See also Florez v. State, 11 Tex. App. 102.

We are of opinion that the demurrer should be sustained, and the petition dismissed; and it is so ordered.

PEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Lewis County in plaintiff's favor in a proceeding to condemn a right of way for a logging railroad. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. A. Reynolds, with Messrs. John Shackleford and F. D. Oakley, for appellants:

Defendants should have been permitted to show any depreciation in value of the land by reason of the construction of the proposed logging road.

Seattle & M. R. Co. v. Murphine, 4 Wash. 48, 30 Pac. 720; Portland & S. R. Co. v. Skamania Boom Co. 59 Wash. 191, 109 Pac. 14; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Messrs. Forney & Ponder and Dysart & Ellsbury, for respondent:

Defendants cannot show the value of the land for public railroad purposes.

Main, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The purpose of this action was to acquire title to real property by the exercise of the right of eminent domain.

At the time the action was instituted, the appellants were the owners of the east half of the southeast quarter of section 8, township 13, range 4 west, W. M., in Lewis county, Washington. Across this land from south to north extends what is known as Hope creek canyon. This is a narrow defile, with the hills on either side rising precipitously. The width of the canyon at its narrowest point, measuring from the foothills on the one side to the foothills on the other, is estimated by the witnesses to be from 45 to 75 feet. Down this canyon flows a small stream, known as Hope creek, which empties into the Chehalis river at a point to the north of the appellants' land. Covering the watershed of Hope creek is a 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) large body of heavy timber, owned by strangers to this action.

The respondent sought to condemn a right of way across the land above described, 60 feet wide, and extending through Hope creek canyon, for the purpose of the construction and operation of a toll logging road; the primary purpose being to enable the respondent to convey the logs from lands owned by it to the Chehalis river. Upon a hearing the court entered an order of public use and necessity. In due time the case came on for trial before the court sitting with a jury to determine the damages. Upon the trial the appellants offered evidence to show the value of the property taken for the purpose of a toll or public logging road, based upon the assumption that all the logs from the watershed of Hope creek would eventually pass down this canyon, as they claimed it was the most available outlet. This evidence was rejected as too remote and speculative.

The appellants were permitted to prove, not only the value of the land for the use to which it was then devoted by the owners, but for any purpose for which it was then reasonably and naturally adapted. The jury returned a verdict assessing the damages at the sum of $250. Upon the verdict judgment was entered, from which judgment the present appeal is prosecuted.

The primary question to be determined is the correctness of the court's ruling in excluding evidence as to the value of the land taken for a toll or public logging road when used in connection with the logging of the watershed of Hope creek; the timber upon this watershed being owned by neither of the parties to the action.

The general rule is that in estimating the value of the land taken, and damages to the remainder, if any, not only the use to which the property is then devoted may be considered, but any purpose for which it is at the time reasonably and naturally adapted. Seattle & M. R. Co. v. Murphine, 4 Wash. 48, 30 Pac. 720; Portland & S. R. Co. v. Skamania Boom Co. 59 Wash. 191, 109 Pac. 814; Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, 25 L. ed. 206. In the case last cited it is said: "So many and varied are the circumstances to be taken into account in determining the value of property condemned for public purposes, that it is perhaps impossible to formulate a rule to govern its appraisalment in all cases. Exceptional circumstances will modify the most carefully guarded rule; but, as a general thing, we should say that the compensation to the owner is to be estimated by reference to the uses for which the property is suitable, having regard to the existing business or wants of the community, or such as may be reasonably expected in the immediate future."

We think the evidence offered did not come within the rule stated. The timber upon the watershed of Hope creek was owned by other parties. When it would be logged and in what manner, and by what route the logs would be transported, were matters which were contingent upon the will of the owners alone. This being true, the value, if any, which the logging of that particular land might add to the value of the land in Hope creek canyon would be remote and speculative. Such damages are not allowed. Munkwitz v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 64 Wis. 403, 25 N. W. 438; Powers v. Hazelton & L. R. Co. 33 Ohio St. 429. In the case last cited the land was sought to be condemned for railroad purposes. Upon the trial the owners proposed to prove that the ravine through which the proposed right of way ran had a special value as the only roadway to market for coal on lands not owned by them, and the amount of rent that had been and could be obtained per ton for conveying coal on their railroad from mines belonging to other persons. This evidence was rejected by the trial court. The appellate court, in passing upon the ruling, said: "The difference in the value of the owner's property with the appropriation and that without it is the rule of compensation. This difference must be ascertained with reference to the value of the property in view of its present character, situation, and surroundings. It cannot be enhanced by proving facts of a contingent and prospective character, such as the probable rents that may be derived from the property, or its special value as a prospective monopoly of a roadway to the adjoining lands of other persons."

Complaint is also made of instructions given and the failure to give certain requested instructions. But we find no error in this regard.

The judgment will be affirmed.

ISABEL COVAULT

v.

GEORGE P. NEVITT, by Guardian ad Litem, Appt.

(157 Wis. 113, 146 N. W. 1115.)

Infant — Liability for negligence of servant.

1. An infant is not liable for injury to a pedestrian by the negligence of a janitor in charge of his building in opening doors in the adjoining sidewalk, the infant being absent, and not directing or consenting to the act, since the infant has no power to form a contract relation with a servant which will render him liable under doctrine of respondeat superior.

Same — necessities — janitor services.

2. The services of a janitor for a building belonging to an infant are not necessities, a contract for which will bind the infant.

(May 1, 1914.)

Note. — Responsibility of infant for tort of his servant or agent.

As to liability of a lunatic for torts of committee, guardian, or employee, see note to Gillet v. Shaw, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 87.

Generally, as to liability of infant for tort, see notes to Lowery v. Cate, 57 L.R.A. 673, and Briese v. Maechtle, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 574; and as to estoppel of infant by false representations as to his age, see also notes to Commander v. Brazile, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1117; Tobin v. Spann, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 672; Putnal v. Walker, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 33; and County Board of Education v. Hensley, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 643; and the case of International Land Co. v. Marshall, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1056.

Upon the question as to an infant's acts in inducing another to enter into a contract with him by representing that he is of age, as constituting the offense of false pretenses, see note to Com. v. Ferguson, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1101.

The position taken in COVAULT v. NEVITT, that the doctrine of respondeat superior is inapplicable to render an infant liable for the torts of one acting for him, is supported by the comparatively few cases in point. Thus, the court, in Burns v. Smith, 29 Ind. App. 181, 94 Am. St. Rep. 268, 64 N. E. 94, said: "The only tortious acts for which an infant can be made responsible are those committed by himself, or under his immediate inspection and express direction, and he cannot otherwise be made liable for the wrong of those assuming to act for him. In law, an infant cannot become a master, or be responsible as a master for the negligence or want of skill of his agent or servant. As he cannot create an agency, he cannot appoint a servant, and therefore cannot delegate powers to another."

So, it has been held that an infant is not liable for the malicious prosecution, in his name, by his next friend, of a suit which was commenced without his knowledge or authority, even though he expressly assented to the suit after he had knowledge of it. "He cannot become a trespasser by such assent, being liable only for his own personal acts." Burnham v. Seaverns, 101 Mass. 360, 100 Am. Dec. 123.

And an infant, not being responsible for APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Circuit Court for Winnebago County overruling a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's servant. Reversed.

Statement by Kerwin, J.:

Action against an infant to recover for negligence of servant. The complaint, among other things, alleges that the defendant, an infant, owned real estate on a public street in the city of Oshkosh, upon which there was a store building abutting on the street; that the defendant maintained trapdoors in the sidewalk opposite said premises; that defendant had in his employ one Powers, who was janitor of said store building, and who used the trapdoors as means of ingress and egress from the basement of the building; that on November 16, 1912, said servant, while performing his duties as janitor, negligently raised and opened said trapdoors; "that said servant failed and neglected to give any warning or notice of the intended raising and opening of said trapdoors, as aforesaid, to possible pedestrians who might be lawfully walking along said public side-the trespasses or unauthorized acts of his guardian, is not liable for the rents and profits of land which the guardian has wrongfully occupied as a part of the infant's estate. Cunningham v. Illinois C. R. Co. 77 Ill. 178.

So, in Robbins v. Mount, 4 Robt. 553, 33 How. Pr. 24, an action against infant devisees of real property to recover damages for an injury to a tenant's property by water thereon, in which it was claimed that the rule of respondcat superior applied, and that the infants were responsible for the negligence of their agents,—although the case seems to have turned upon the fact that the evidence entirely failed to connect the infants with the persons whose negligence caused the injury,—the court said: "An infant . . . is incapable in law of appointing an agent. . . . Such legal incapacity, however, does not exempt him from the consequences of his tortious acts. In respect to those, he is held responsible, if doli capax when the wrong is done. But such tortious acts must be committed by the infant himself, or under his immediate view, or by his direction or authority. As he cannot create an agency, he cannot appoint a servant, and therefore cannot delegate powers to another, nor can he guarantee or insure the fidelity, care, or skill of such other. The foundation of the rule pondeat superior is that the principal holds out his agent as competent and skilful, and fit to be trusted, and thus, in effect, warrants his fidelity and good conduct in all matters within the scope of the agency. An infant, being incapable of con-walk at said time;" that "wholly because of the negligent manner of raising and opening the trapdoors aforesaid, by defendant's servant, as hereinbefore set forth, plaintiff was tripped, causing her to fall against the sidewalk with great force and violence." The defendant demurred to the complaint for the reason that it appeared upon the face thereof that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court below overruled the demurrer, with leave to the defendant to answer upon payment of $10 costs. The defendant appealed from the order overruling the demurrer.

Messrs. Thompson, Thompson, & Jackson, for appellant:

The infant defendant, having no power to contract, cannot be held liable for the servant's negligence.

tracting, cannot warrant the competency or skill or care of a person with whom the relation of agent cannot exist. . . . All these rules necessarily include both the right and power to constitute the relation of master and servant. Such relation exists only in contract, and requires the same capacity in the contracting parties as in the formation of any other agreement. If either is incapable of contracting, there is no mutuality, and neither is bound. . . . The result of this review of the principles of agency is, that the liability of principals for the negligence or other misconduct of their agents arises for the express or implied authority of the latter, and the implied guaranty of the former, and has its foundation in the contract, which creates the relation, and by which it is implied that persons shall not suffer by the negligence of those they employ. . . . In the case of an infant, these principles cannot be applied. He cannot in law become a master, or be responsible as a master, for the negligence or want of skill of his servant."

And it is immaterial that an infant, sought to be held liable for the negligence or tortious acts of an agent, is married, as "the marriage of an infant with the consent of the father is an emancipation only to the extent as to enable him to make contracts for his own services, and to apply his wages to the support of his family. Otherwise it does not enlarge his power to contract, nor does it remove the disabilities of infancy so that he is bound by his contracts, except for actual necessities;" and he still has no power to appoint an agent. Burns v. Smith, supra.

In Smith v. Kron, 96 N. C. 392, 2 S. E. 533, the court said: "The next exception, not necessary to be decided in disposing of the appeal, in view of the absence of any evidence to sustain it, is to the ruling that infants, not being able to make binding contracts, except for necessities in a proper case, are incapable of forming such a relation with an agent as to render them liable for his torts, done in prosecuting the objects of the alleged agency. This is what we understand the ruling to be, and we give it our unqualified assent." But "if the instruction goes beyond the liability growing out of, and inseparable from, the relation of principal and agent, formed by contract, positive or implied, and protects the infant of sufficient intelligence and judgment from accountability for torts involved and done in the necessary prosecution of the business of the agency and the attainment of its ends, we are not prepared to concur in its correctness in law. We do not see why the rule in such case, qui facit per alium, facit per se, does not apply. But however this may be, the instruction was irrelevant and not hurtful to the appellants, for there was no evidence presenting a state of facts to which it was applicable."

And in Sikes v. Johnson, 16 Mass. 389, "the question . . . was, whether a feme covert or a minor might be charged as trespassers for having procured another to commit an assault and battery. And it was helden that they might; for all per- 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Kerwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented is whether an infant owner of property is liable respondens superior for the negligent act of a person in the employment of the infant and in charge of such property, where the infant in no way personally participated in such act. The contention of counsel for appellant is that: he is not liable, for the reason that he cannot appoint an agent, and that while he may be held for torts committed by himself, he is not liable for the torts of one acting for him in his absence and without his direction or consent.

On the part of the respondent it is insisted that the defendant is liable upon the ground that the party who committed the tort was in the discharge of a lawful duty for the defendant, in the course of which he committed the tort; therefore the defendant is liable. It is true that an infant may be liable for his personal torts. But it seems to be well settled that an infant cannot be made liable for the torts of one acting for him, because he has no power to appoint an agent or servant, and thereby create the relation of master and servant. The liability of a master for the torts of his servant rests on contract existing between master and sons aiding and abetting, or counseling and procuring, a trespass to be done, are principals, whether present or not. So are those who afterwards assent to a trespass done for their benefit: and there is no exception in the law in favor of femes covert or minors. The cases cited to the contrary relate to civil acts, done by the command of persons not having capacity to make contracts; and because such commands are in the nature of a contract, they are void. But trespasses are analogous to crimes, which femes covert and minors may be answerable for, although not personally present at the commission of them."

The position taken in COVAULT v. NEVITT is supported by Cooley, as is apparent from the quotation in the opinion from that author (1 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. p. 188). Mr. Labatt, however, in a discussion of the general subject of contracts made by infants as employers, suggests that "upon the analogy of the doctrine applied in respect to other contracts, it would seem that the contract of an infant for the hire of a servant should, if not clearly prejudicial, be regarded as being merely voidable at his own option; and that, until it has actually been disaffirmed by him, it should be deemed to subsist for all purposes, both as between himself and the servant, and with reference to third persons." (1 Labatt, Mast. & S. § 109.) And among the other consequences from that theory he deduces "that he [the infant] will be answerable for such torts as might be committed by the servant in the course of his employment."

servant, and an infant, having no power to contract, cannot be held for the torts of the servant. Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. p. 188; 22 Cyc. 514, 620; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 308; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 3d ed. 519; 26 Cyc. 968; Burns v. Smith, 29 Ind. App. 181, 94 Am. St. Rep. 268, 64 N. E. 94; Cunningham v. Illinois C. R. Co. 77 Ill. 178; Sikes v. Johnson, 16 Mass. 389; Schenk v. Strong, 4 N. Seaverns, 101 Mass. 360, 100 Am. Dec. 123; Armitage v. Widoe, 36 Mich. 124; Holden v. Curry, 85 Wis. 504, 55 N. W. 965.

Cooley states the rule concisely thus: "As the doctrine respondeat superior rests upon the relation of master and servant, which depends upon contract, actual or implied, it is obvious that it can have no application in the case of an infant employer, and he, therefore, is not responsible for torts of negligence by those in his service. Nor can he be made a trespasser by relation through the ratification of a wrongful act which another has assumed to do on his behalf, but without his knowledge." 1 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. p. 188.

In order to create a liability here there must not only be a valid contract between defendant and the janitor, but the acts of the janitor must be in the line of his employment under the contract. The doctrine of respondeat superior rests upon the performance of duty in the course of employment, and such duty rests upon contract. Kumba v. Gilham, 103 Wis. 312, 79 N. W. 325, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 412. In order to make one liable for the tort of another, the relation of master and servant must exist. King v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 66 N. Y. 181, 23 Am. Rep. 37; Burns v. Smith, 29 Ind. App. 181, 94 Am. St. Rep. 268, 64 N. E. 94. The general rule is that, since an infant "cannot create an agency or appoint a servant, and therefore cannot delegate powers to another, he cannot guarantee or insure the fidelity, care, or skill of such other." 22 Cyc. 620, and cases cited.

It is clear that in the instant case the alleged contract could only be sustained, if at all, upon the ground that it was a contract for necessities; and it is equally clear that such a contract is not a contract for necessities. 22 Cyc. 584, 585; Hollingsworth, Contr. p. 31; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 276.

The general rule respecting necessities is that they must be such as to supply the personal needs of the infant. Tupper v. Cadwell, 12 Met. 562, 46 Am. Dec. 704. Manifestly the contract in this case is not a contract for necessities under which a liability could be enforced, nor for the benefit of the infant. It has been held that repairs or improvements of a minor's real estate under certain circumstances are not necessities for which the minor can be held liable. 22 Cyc. 595; Tupper v. Cadwell, supra; Price v. Sanders, 60 Ind. 310. And it has been held that a materialman furnishing material to a minor for use in a building can have no lien therefor. Hall v. Kjer, 47 N. J. L. 340; McCarty v. Carter, 49 Ill. 53, 95 Am. Dec. 572; Wornack v. Loar, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 6, 11 S. W. 438; Bloomer v. Nolan, 36 Neb. 51, 38 Am. St. Rep. 690, 53 N. W. 1039; Jones, Liens, 1239. By citing the foregoing cases we do not approve them in every particular, nor do we pass upon the question whether a lien would exist under any circumstances, but cite the cases as showing to what extent courts have gone upon the subject.

Even if the alleged contract of janitorship in question were executed, it would not be binding on the minor if he were not benefited by it, and, if benefited, only to the extent of the benefit. 22 Cyc. 583; Ryan v. Smith, 165 Mass. 303, 43 N. E. 109.

If the alleged contract were voidable, it could be repudiated at any time before the defendant arrived at the age of twenty-one years. It is clear from all the authorities that upon the allegations of the complaint the alleged contract between Powers, the janitor, and defendant could not render defendant liable for the tort of Powers. The defendant had no connection with the alleged tort committed by Powers; had no knowledge of it until after it was committed; neither created nor maintained any nuisance upon the property which in any way contributed to the injury. Upon the facts admitted by the demurrer the acts complained of are solely the acts of the janitor; hence no liability is shown against the defendant. Beven, Workmen's Compensation, 4th ed. pp. 281, 282, and cases cited. The cause of action set up in the complaint is the alleged negligence of Powers, the janitor. The liability of the defendant as claimed by plaintiff rests upon the doctrine of respondeat superior, and, as we have seen, no liability exists upon that ground. That an infant may be held on a contract for necessities received by him to the extent of the benefits, and that some contracts of an infant are voidable and not absolutely void, and that infants are liable for torts committed by them personally, may be conceded, and authorities upon these propositions need not be discussed.

The question here is whether a valid contract creating the relation of master and servant between the infant and his alleged servant can be made. We think it clear that it cannot. True, as held in McCabe v. O'Connor, 4 App. Div. 354, 38 N. Y. Supp. 572, cited by respondent, an infant may be held liable for maintaining a nuisance upon his property, for that is his personal tort. Other cases are cited by respondent which involve the question of personal torts by the infant. But in the case at bar the complaint is specifically grounded upon the tort of Powers as servant of the defendant.

It is contended by respondent that an infant may appoint an agent to do an act which is clearly to his advantage, citing Story, Agency, § 6, Mechem, Agency, § 54, and Ewell's Evans, Principal & Agent, p. 13. The rule of these authorities is based upon cases of benefits received by the infant and the necessities of the case. Story, Agency, § 6, lays down the doctrine that infants are incapable of either wholly or partially appointing an agent, and that an infant cannot authorize one to do an act which is to his prejudice. Ewell's Evans, Principal & Agent, pp. 12, 13, and 14 refers to the rule laid down by Story, and also to the infants' relief act 1874, Stat. 37 and 38 Vict. chap. 62.

It has been held that an infant might appoint an agent to do an act unquestionably to his advantage—as to receive seisin of an estate conveyed to him. The reason of the rule is based upon the advantage received and the necessities of the case. Suppose an infant should appoint an agent to purchase necessities, and the agent should purchase and convert them to his own use; could the infant be held liable for the purchase price? Or suppose the agent agreed to pay double what the articles purchased were worth; could the infant be compelled to pay the agreed price? We think not.

It is argued that in any event the contract between Powers and the defendant is voidable only, and not void. On this proposition Patterson v. Lippincott, 47 N. J. L. 457, 54 Am. Rep. 178, 1 Atl. 506; Mechem, Agency, § 54, 22 Cyc. 583, and Jones v. Valentines' School, 122 Wis. 318, 99 N. W. 1043, are relied upon. But these authorities go to the extent of holding that the contract will be enforced only to the extent of the benefits received by the infant, and that a voidable contract may be ratified by the infant after becoming of age. They are merely in line with the general rule, and do not hold or intimate that an infant can be held for a tort committed by one acting for him.

Patterson v. Lippincott, supra, is to the effect that a contract for the infant's benefit is voidable, and may be ratified after becoming of age, and that the defense of infancy is a personal privilege. Jones v. Valentines' School, supra, holds that an infant is bound by implied contract to pay reasonably for necessities furnished him, but is not liable upon executory contracts to furnish them, nor upon express contract, but that such an executory contract is voidable, and not absolutely void, and when repudiated by the infant he must, so far as he reasonably can, make or offer to make restitution. But it has been held that the contract of an infant may be avoided by him without making restitution where restitution is impossible. 22 Cyc. 613. It has also been held that the avoidance of a voidable contract by a minor makes the contract void ab initio, as though no contract had ever existed. Vent v. Osgood, 19 Pick. 572; Rice v. Boyer, 108 Ind. 472, 58 Am. Rep. 53, 9 N. E. 420; Mustard v. Wohlford, 15 Gratt. 329, 76 Am. Dec. 209.

In 22 Cyc. at page 514, the general rule is stated that an infant cannot appoint an agent, and that such act is absolutely void; but it is said that such act may be voidable, and the case of appointment of an agent to sell a note is cited, where it is held that the infant may, on coming of age, ratify or disaffirm the act. At page 593 the general rule is stated that contracts of infants may be voidable, subject to being disaffirmed or affirmed at majority. The theory of voidable contracts of infants is that they may be sustained for the advantage of the minor, but that they cannot be enforced during infancy if not beneficial to the infant, and, if beneficial, they can be enforced only to the extent that they are beneficial. And so jealous is the law of the rights of infants that, where a tort is committed by an infant growing out of a contract, the infant is not liable if the basis of the cause of action be contract. 22 Cyc. 621; Lowery v. Cate, 108 Tenn. 54, 57 L.R.A. 673, 91 Am. St. Rep. 744, 64 S. W. 1068; Schenk v. Strong, 4 N. J. L. 87; Prescott v. Norris, 32 N. H. 101; Sikes v. Johnson, 16 Mass. 389; Collins v. Gifford, 203 N. Y. 465, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 202, 96 N. E. 721, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 969.

Counsel for respondent cites us to Labatt on Master and Servant, where the idea is advanced that an infant ought to be held liable for the acts of his servant in the course of his employment. 1 Labatt, Mast. & S. 2d ed. p. 379. The learned author, however, cites no authority to support the position, and admits that there is a singular dearth of judicial authority respecting the points. He does not attempt to meet the elementary doctrine that the relation of master and servant does not exist between an infant and his servant. Nor does he refer to the universal doctrine that infants can be held on voidable contracts only to the extent of the benefits received. All we have is the statement of the learned author, which, indeed, standing alone, is entitled to great respect, but we do not feel that it can outweigh principle and authority against it. Mr. Labatt, however, frankly admits the authorities are not with him, and does not take a decided position, but suggests an argument on the point.

The cases cited by counsel for respondent where the personal tort of the infant was the basis of the cause of action rest upon a different principle. Infants are, of course, liable for their personal torts, but here, upon the allegations of the complaint, the cause of action rests upon the doctrine of respondere superior; therefore the complaint states no cause of action.

The order appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to sustain the demurrer, and for further proceedings according to law.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

ERIE RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

JOHN WILLIAMS, Commissioner of Labor of the State of New York.

(233 U. S. 685, 58 L. ed. —, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 761.)

Constitutional law — who may question statute.

1. A railway company cannot complain

Note. — Validity and effect of statute regulating time of payment of wages.

The notes to State v. Northern P. R. Co. 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 134, People v. Erie R. Co. 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 240, and Erie R. Co. v. People —, L.R.A. (N.S.) —, on the general subject of state regulation of relation between railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce and their employees, include some cases involving the validity of state statutes relating to the time of payment of wages, as affected by the commerce clause. That question, however, is now settled by 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

for its employees of the repugnancy to the due process of law and equal protection of the laws clauses of the Federal Constitution of the provisions of N. Y. Laws 1897, chap. 415, § 10, as amended by Laws 1908, chap. 442, requiring the semimonthly payment of the wages of railway employees.

Same — intervals of wage payments.

2. The liberty and property of an interstate railway company are not taken without due process of law by the requirement of N. Y. Laws 1897, chap. 415, § 10, as amended by Laws 1908, chap. 442, passed in the exercise of the reserved power of the state over the charters of its corporations, that railway employees shall be paid their wages semimonthly, the effect of which is to prohibit both carrier and employees from contracting otherwise.

Commerce — state regulation — time of payment of railway employees.

3. Requiring an interstate railway carrier to pay its employees semimonthly does not, until Congress acts upon the subject, amount to an unlawful burden upon interstate commerce, where, as construed by the state courts, such requirement relates to those railway servants who are employed wholly within the state, and those whose duties take them from that state into other states, but not to those employed in other states.

(May 25, 1914.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of New York for Albany County to review a judgment entered pursuant to the mandate of the Court of Appeals, which affirmed a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, which in turn had affirmed a judgment of a Special Term for Albany County, dismissing a complaint filed to enjoin the enforcement of a state law requiring semimonthly payment of wages of railway employees. Affirmed.

the decision of the United States Supreme Court in ERIE R. Co. v. WILLIAMS; at least, until Congress has acted in relation to the matter.

In Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Schuler, — Ind. —, 105 N. E. 567, it was held that the Indiana statute (§ 2983c, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1914) was unconstitutional as arbitrary class legislation, which provided that "any railroad company employing men shall within seventy-two hours after any employee voluntarily quits such service or is discharged, pay to such employee in full the wages due to the time of quitting of such service: Provided, demand is made, therefor and upon failure so to do, such railroad company shall be liable to such employee for each day until such payment is made in a sum equal to the daily wage of the employee." The court said: "It is true . . . that railroads

Statement by Mr. Justice McKenna:

Suit brought by plaintiff in error, the Erie Railroad Company (as it was plaintiff below, we shall so designate it), to restrain the defendant in error (herein called defendant) from instituting actions to recover penalties for noncompliance with the provimay be placed in a class by themselves for some legislative purposes, but only for such purposes as have to do with duties peculiar to them as carriers, or with the dangers peculiar to their operation. . . . There is nothing in the act under consideration which suggests a valid basis for the classification which it makes. It is not designed to regulate the business of common carriers, nor has it any reference to the hazards peculiar to the operation of railroads. In brief, no good reason appears for requiring railroads to pay in accordance with the provisions of this act those who leave their service, while manufacturing corporations and other employers of labor are excepted from its operation." The court further points out that when the act was passed there was no statute relating to the time of payment of wages of railroad employees, but that since the passage of the act a statute was passed requiring all employers of labor to pay their employees semimonthly, and said: "If the act in controversy can be held valid, we would have a present situation where the faithful employee who is working regularly can only demand payment of his wages semimonthly, while one who voluntarily quits the service of the railroad company without cause must be paid in seventy-two hours. There is no just reason for such discrimination. The classification made in the act before us is arbitrary and without any valid reason for its basis."

It would seem that upon the question of class legislation this case is not to be reconciled with the decision in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Paul, 173 U. S. 404, 43 L. ed. 746, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 419, considered in the said note in 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 550, and referred to in the opinion in ERIE R. Co. v. WILLIAMS, as the statute in the Paul Case was limited to corporations or persons operating or constructing railroads or railroad bridges, but the Indiana court does not refer to such decision.

In Wynne v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. — S. C. —, 79 S. E. 521, the court sustained the statute of South Carolina requiring immediate payment on demand of wages earned by a laborer discharged by "any corporation carrying on any business in this state in which laborers are employed, whose wages, under the business rule or custom of such corporation, are paid monthly or weekly on a fixed day beyond the end of the month or week in which the labor is performed." The court held that the statute did not deprive the corporation of its property without due process of law, nor deny to it the equal protection of the laws, and cited, as sustaining a similar statute, the aforesaid case of St. Louis, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

sions of the labor law of the state of New York, which required plaintiff to pay its employees semimonthly and in cash.

The object of the suit is to test the constitutionality of the law.

The bill is very elaborate and alleges with much detail the following facts: Plain-

I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Paul, supra, and stated that the principal ground taken by the supreme court of Arkansas in the Paul Case of the right to alter or repeal all charters of incorporation was equally applicable under the South Carolina Constitution. The court held also that such legislation might be sustained under the police power. It will be noticed that the statute sustained in the Paul Case applied to a much more restricted class than the foregoing South Carolina statute.

In State v. Missouri P. R. Co. 242 Mo. 339, 147 S. W. 118, the court sustained the constitutionality of the Missouri statute of 1911, entitled, "An Act Requiring All Corporations Doing Business in This State to Pay Their Employees as Often as Semimonthly, and Fixing Penalties for Violation Thereof." It was held in terms that such statute did not violate § 1 of art. 14 of the Amendments to the U. S. Constitution, nor did it conflict with § 10 of art. 1 of that Constitution as destroying the right of defendant to make legitimate contracts with its employees in respect to matters which are not a violation of any criminal law, and which do not relate in any manner to the safety, health, or public welfare of such employees, as the law does tend to promote the welfare of defendant's employees and the general public, and is not needlessly injurious or oppressive to corporations. It was also held that the law did not violate the Missouri Constitution as depriving the companies of their natural right and liberty to contract, or of the gains of their own industry, or of their property without due process of law, or of the charter right to employ labor upon any reasonable terms agreed upon: nor did it violate such Constitution as taking the company's private property and appropriating the same to the private use of certain of its employees, nor as granting irrevocable privileges to certain persons, nor as special or class legislation.

In Regan v. Tremont Lumber Co. — La. —, 63 So. 874, it was held that the Louisiana statute of 1908, providing that checks, punch-outs, tickets, etc., issued to laborers and employees for their services, shall be redeemed in current money, does not violate any provisions of the Constitution of the United States. This act was in substance similar to the statute of Tennessee sustained in Knoxville Iron Co. v. Harbison, 183 U. S. 13, 46 L. ed. 55, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1, referred to at length in the aforesaid note in 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 549, and also in the opinion in ERIE R. Co. v. WILLIAMS, and the Louisiana court follows the Harbison decision.

tiff is a New York corporation, and defendant is commissioner of labor of the state. Plaintiff maintains a railroad in New York which extends into other states, and operates car floats and other floating equipment, navigating the navigable waters of the United States. These and other equipment are used in the business of plaintiff as a common carrier of persons and property under and in compliance with tariffs duly promulgated and filed under the laws of the state and of the United States; and plaintiff is also a carrier of the United States mails. As a rule, the trains of plaintiff run over an operating division without change of employees. Some of the divisions are interstate and some wholly within the state of New York.

Plaintiff, in carrying out its functions, has in its service upon that portion of its road lying east of Meadville, Pennsylvania, upwards of 15,000 men, who are employed either wholly within or partially within the state of New York, and nearly all of them are employed in the movement of interstate commerce. The great majority of these employees render service in more than one state, and many of them who reside in Pennsylvania or New Jersey render a part of their service in New York, any many who reside in the latter state render service in the other two states. The contracts of employment of many of them were made, and in the future must be made, in states other than New York, in which states they must reside.

By the laws of New York plaintiff was vested with its powers as a railroad and to contract and be contracted with for the employment of persons to conduct its operations and enterprises at and for such wages and upon such terms of payment as should or might be mutually agreed on; and thereunder it has been its custom to pay its employees monthly, and thus pay them prior to or on the 20th day of each month the wages earned during the preceding month.

The great majority of plaintiff's employees were in its service prior to January 1, 1908, and all accepted such service with full knowledge of its general and uniform custom so to pay its employees monthly.

Prior to January 1, 1908, there existed and has since existed a contract between plaintiff and its employees that the latter should be paid monthly as stated, and so to pay them, as distinguished from payment twice a month, is not inconsistent with the public interest, or hurtful to the public order, or detrimental to the common good.

Section 4 of the labor law of the state makes it malfeasance in office for any officer, agent, or employee of the state to violate or evade his duty under the law, or knowingly permit the violation or evasion of the act, and he is subject to removal from office.

Section 9† provides that every railroad company and certain other companies shall pay their employees in cash, and no such †“Section 9. Cash payment of wages.—Every manufacturing, mining, quarrying, mercantile, railroad, street railway, canal, steamboat, telegraph and telephone company, every express company, every corporation engaged in harvesting and storing ice, and every water company, not municipal, and every person, firm, or corporation engaged in or upon any public work for the state or any municipal corporation thereof, either as a contractor or a subcontractor therewith, shall pay to each employee engaged in his, their, or its business, the wages earned by such employee in cash. No such company, person, firm, or corporation shall hereafter pay such employees in script, commonly known as store money orders. [Laws 1897, chap. 415, as amended by Laws 1908, chap. 443.]

“Section 10. When wages are to be paid.—Every corporation or joint stock association, or person carrying on the business thereof by lease or otherwise, shall pay weekly to each employee the wages earned by him to a day not more than six days prior to the date of such payment. But every person or corporation operating a steam surface railroad shall, on or before the 1st day of each month, pay the employees thereof the wages earned by them during the first half of the preceding month, ending with the 15th day thereof, and on or before the 15th day of each month pay the employees thereof the wages earned by them during the last half of the preceding calendar month. [Laws 1897, chap. 415, as amended by Laws 1908, chap. 442.]

“Section 11. Penalty for violation of preceding sections.—If a corporation or joint-stock association, its lessee or other person carrying on the business thereof, shall fail to pay the wages of an employee, as provided in this article, it shall forfeit to the people of the state the sum of $50 for each such failure, to be recovered by the factory inspector in his name of office in a civil action; but an action shall not be maintained therefor unless the factory inspector shall have given to the employer at least ten days' written notice that such an action will be brought if the wages due are not sooner paid as provided in this article.

“On the trial of such action, such corporation or association shall not be allowed to set up any defense, other than a valid assignment of such wages, a valid set-off against the same, or the absence of such employee from his regular place of labor at the time of payment, or an actual tender to such employee at the time of the payment of the wages so earned by him, or a breach of contract by such employee, or a denial of the employment.” [Laws 1897, chap. 415.] company shall pay its employees in scrip, commonly known as store money orders.

Section 10 requires the payment of employees' wages semimonthly.

Section 11 imposes a penalty of $50 for each failure to so pay, to be recovered by the factory inspector in his name of office in a civil action, and limits the defenses to the action to a valid assignment of such wages, a valid set-off against the same, or the absence of such employee from his regular place of labor at the time of the payment, or an actual tender at the time of the payment, or a breach of contract by such employee, or a denial of the employment.

The commissioner of labor is required to enforce the provisions of the law, and notified plaintiff of his intention to do so, and to sue for the penalties imposed by the act. He expressed his opinion of the act to be that each failure to pay the wages of each employee constituted a separate offense, and that the aggregate of the penalties would be $250,000. Plaintiff believes, unless that officer is restrained, that he will exercise his authority under the act.

The employees of plaintiff are distributed over more than 1,819 miles, and the making of the payment of their wages in money semimonthly instead of monthly will impose upon and subject plaintiff to an increased cost and expense of several thousand dollars each month.

The difficulty of semimonthly payments is described, and it is alleged that the drastic and enormous penalties are, by reason of their necessarily aggregate character and effect, so excessive as to evidence legislative intention to unduly limit or prevent judicial inquiry, and practically constrain plaintiff to submit to the statute rather than, by contesting its validity, to take the chances of the penalties it imposes.

That the statute by its terms prevents plaintiff from setting up in defense the contracts existing between it and its employees for the payment of their wages once a month, and that the statute violates, when applied to plaintiff, various provisions of the Constitution of the state and of the United States, and thereby is repugnant to article 3 of the Constitution of the United States and article 6 of the Constitution of the state of New York, in that it is an invasion by the legislative of the judicial power; and it is also repugnant to § 1 of article 14 of the Constitution of the United States, and § 6, article 1, of the Constitution of the state of New York, in that it deprives plaintiff of property without due process of law: and violates § 10, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States, in that it impairs the obligation of contracts. The act in its other provisions deprives plaintiff of property without due process of law, and of the equal protection of the laws. It also interferes with and impairs plaintiff's performance and discharge of its duties as a common carrier in interstate commerce, is not a valid exercise of the police power, and is illegal and unenforceable and void under articles of the Constitution of the state and of the United States, which are enumerated.

By the enforcement of the act plaintiff will be subjected to enormous penalties, a multiplicity of suits, and to great and irreparable damage, and plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law.

The answer of the defendant admitted the allegations of the complaint as to the statute, and alleged that he intended to give such notice to plaintiff as to enforcing such penalties as he was required by the law to give and enforce. He denied that he had any knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief regarding the truth of the other allegations of the complaint.

A stipulation of facts was entered into by the parties upon which the court entered judgment dismissing the complaint. The judgment was successively affirmed by the appellate division of the supreme court and by the court of appeals.

The facts stipulated practically sustain the allegations of the answer, and detail the manner of the payment by plaintiff of its employees. The plaintiff also introduced in evidence an exhibit which classified its employees and showed the number of days' work, total compensation and average compensation per day as per pay rolls for the year ending June 30, 1908. Its materiality was contested.

Messrs. Frederic D. McKenney and George F. Brownell, for plaintiff in error:

The labor law of New York is repugnant to U. S. Const., 14th Amendment, in that it deprives the company of property, and specifically deprives the company and those of its employees to whom it applies of liberty without due process of law.

The conditions under which the legislature, in the exercise of its reserved right to alter and amend corporate charters, may deprive a person (i. e., a corporation) of liberty or property, are substantially the same as those which will justify such a deprivation in the exercise of the police power.

The question whether a statute is or is not a valid exercise either of the police power or the power to alter or amend charters is a judicial one, not foreclosed by legislative action.

Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court:

The contention of plaintiff is that the labor law is repugnant to the 14th Amendment, "in that it deprives the company of property, and specifically deprives the company, and those of its employees to whom it applies, of liberty, without due process of law." The contention may be limited at the outset to the rights of the company. It cannot complain for its employees; and before considering the contention thus limited, it is well to see what meaning or extent the court of appeals gave to the law.

The court decided that the law operates not only to require the railroads to pay their employees semimonthly, but prohibits them from making contracts with their employees which shall vary. If this were not law, the court said, neither their employees would have complaint, "as both would be left at liberty to contract they pleased in when the servant's wages and the medium in which he is to be paid." This liberty the court stated the contention to be that the law deprives the company to make contracts with its employees on advantageous terms, and beyond the power of the plaintiff also contended that the equal protection of the law is denied.

The opposing contention is: (1) The legislation of the power reserved to the state to amend its laws, (2) it constitutes a deprivation of the police power of the state.

The court rejected the contention of the plaintiff, and sustained the exercise of the power over the wages of the employees, and, advertent to the requirement of semimonthly payment, an unconstitutional in interstate commerce, the court observed that it [the law] does not conflict with any legislation of the state. And, exhibiting the effect of the law, it was found that it relates to the wages of the employees employed wholly within the state of New York, as well as to those whose duties take them outside the state. The subject of interstate commerce has not under New York, C. & H. R. R. Co. v. New York, 123, 35 L.R.A. 255, 19 N. Y. 123, 35 L.R.A. 255, 19 N. E. 850, 92 N. E. 850.

How far the reservation of the power over the charters of the company helped out by its power gave no indication.

that, in its reference in reviewing the decision, the sole ground of its decision and exercise of its power was the state. The court said:

"There is an irreconcilable conflict of decisions in different states as to the constitutionality of legislation fixing the maximum of the wages of the employees of corporations. After the leading cases sustaining our New York ground which has been established by the confiscation of corporate property directly. It does in burden upon the corporations to which it relates; but that, I think, is within the power of the legislature to the extent to which it has been exercised in this case."

The legislation having been passed in the exercise of the reserved power of the state, is it valid, notwithstanding it prohibits both the plaintiff and its employees from contracting against its provisions? Plaintiff asserts the negative, and attempts to sustain the assertion by a very comprehensive argument in which a number of decisions of this court and of other courts are cited and reviewed. They illustrate by various instances the fundamental and indisputable principle that personal liberty includes the power to make contracts. But liberty of making contracts is subject to conditions in the interest of the public welfare, and which shall prevail—principle or condition—cannot be defined by any precise and universal formula. Each instance of asserted conflict must be determined by itself, and it has been said many times that each act of legislation has the support of the presumption that it is an exercise in the interest of the public. The burden is on him who attacks the legislation, and it is not sustained by declaring a liberty of contract. It can only be sustained by demonstrating that it conflicts with some constitutional restraint, or that the public welfare is not subserved by the legislation. The legislature is, in the first instance, the judge of what is necessary for the public welfare, and a judicial review of its judgment is limited. The earnest conflict of serious opinion does not suffice to bring it within the range of judicial cognizance. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. McGuire, 219 U. S. 549, 562, 55 L. ed. 328, 336, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 259; German Alliance Ins. Co. v. Lewis, 233 U. S. 389, 58 L. ed. —, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 612.

In considering the competency of the legislative judgment and the power the courts have to review it, we may inquire, what is here complained of? What does the labor law of New York do that seriously affects the liberty of plaintiff? It requires cash payments. That requirement is not now resisted. It requires semimonthly payments. Plaintiff now pays monthly. The extent of its grievance, therefore, is two payments a month instead of one, with the consequence of expense and inconvenience. It is hardly necessary to say that cost and inconvenience (different words, probably, for the same thing) would have to be very great before they could become an element in the consideration of the right of a state to exert its reserved power or its police power. New York & N. E. R. Co. v. Bristol, 151 U. S. 556, 38 L. ed. 269, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

437; United States v. Union P. R. Co. 160 U. S. 1, 40 L. ed. 319, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 190; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Paul, 173 U. S. 404, 43 L. ed. 746, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 419; Wisconsin, M. & P. R. Co. v. Jacobson, 179 U. S. 287, 45 L. ed. 194, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 115. See also Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 221 U. S. 612, 55 L. ed. 878, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 621.

Putting cost and inconvenience to one side, there would remain only an abstract right. Taking them into consideration, they constitute the detriment to which plaintiff is subjected by not being able to make the forbidden contracts. It may be admitted an advantage is taken away from plaintiff, or, to put it another way, a burden is imposed upon it. Is it within the power of the state to impose the burden by virtue of its reserved control over plaintiff? The question must be answered as if the requirement of the law was part of the charter of plaintiff, and in such case it would seem certainly that a liberty of contract could not be asserted against it, for it would be a part of the contract accepted and binding on plaintiff,—a liberty exercised precluding a liberty to be exercised,—and it would seem necessarily to be the very essence of the right of amendment reserved that what could have been put in the charter originally, whatever its consequence, can be added to the charter, whatever the consequence of the addition. Of course, we mean what was and is competent for the state to impose; and we are brought to the narrow question whether a regulation of the time and manner of payment by a railroad of its employees is within the competency of the state to require. A negative answer is contended for, the argument urged to support the contention being that a contract right of dealing with its employees is conferred by plaintiff's charter, which right the labor law takes away, and plaintiff is deprived of property because of the expense to which it is subjected, which, it is contended, is not justified by a corresponding public benefit. It would seem, therefore, to be the contention of plaintiff that it acquired by its charter a vested right to deal with its employees according to its own judgment, and, as alleged in its answer, that it was vested with its powers as a railroad and to contract and be contracted with, for the employment of persons to conduct its operations and enterprises at and for such wages and upon such terms of payment as might or should be agreed on. In other words, it is the contention that the rights asserted are of the very essence of its grant, giving it the rights of a natural person, and investing it with the same immunity from control, whether exercised under the police power or the reserved power of amendment. We may, in answering the contention, put aside the rights of natural persons and the rights which might exist under a Constitution which did not reserve control in the state. The effect of the control reserved was to make plaintiff, from the moment of creation, subject to the legislative power of alteration, and, if deemed expedient, of absolute extinguishment as a corporate body. Spring Valley Waterworks v. Schottler, 110 U. S. 347, 352, 28 L. ed. 173, 175, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 48. And whether expedient or not is a question for the legislature, not for the courts. Id. 357. In other cases the effect of the reserved power of amendment is said to be to make any alteration or amendment of a charter subject to it which will not defeat or substantially impair the object of the grant or any right vested under the grant. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Smith, 173 U. S. 684, 697, 698, 43 L. ed. 858, 864, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 565; Looker v. Maynard, 179 U. S. 46, 52, 45 L. ed. 79, 81, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 21. Surely the manner or time of paying employees does not come within such limitation. It is a matter of pure administration, not comparable in its burden to those sustained in the cases which we have already cited.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Paul, 173 U. S. 404, 43 L. ed. 746, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 419, a law of Arkansas was sustained as an exercise of the reserved power of the state which required a railroad company discharging with or without cause, or refusing to employ, any servant or employee, to pay him his unpaid wages, then earned, at the contract rate, without abatement or deduction, to the date of his discharge, and providing that, if the same be not paid on such day, then, as a penalty for nonpayment, his wages shall continue at the same rate until paid.

In New York & N. E. R. Co. v. Bristol, 151 U. S. 556, 38 L. ed. 269, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 437, the railroad company was required to remove various grade crossings at its own expense.

In the Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700, 25 L. ed. 496, legislation requiring the creation of a sinking fund was sustained under the reserved power of amendment, and, after reviewing the cases, the court said "that whatever rules Congress might have prescribed in the original charter for the government of the corporation in the administration of its affairs, it retained the power to establish by amendment." Many other cases might be cited, but to cite them would be to accumulate authorities on a proposition which might well be taken at 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

this late date to be incontestable. Indeed, the contention of defendant that the legislation under review might be supported under the police power of the state has justification in cases.

In Knoxville Iron Co. v. Harbison, 183 U. S. 13, 46 L. ed. 55, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1, a law of the state of Tennessee which required all persons and corporations to redeem in money evidences of indebtedness given to their laborers or employees, in the hands of their laborers, employees, or a bona fide holder, came up for consideration. The Knoxville Coal Company paid its employees in cash and in coal orders. It made money by the practice. There was no proof of an express agreement between the company and its employees that the orders should be paid only in coal, except as implied from accepting the orders, and no proof of an implied agreement except as drawn from the face of the orders and the custom of the company. There was no proof of compulsion except that if the employees did not accept pay in coal orders they had to submit to be in arrears about twenty days, but the company paid in coal orders the whole wages due at the end of each month. Harbison purchased a number of the coal orders and demanded their payment in cash, which was refused. He then brought suit against the company, relying on the statute. The Supreme Court gave him judgment, which was affirmed by this court on the ground that the law was a proper exercise of the police power of the state. This court, by Mr. Justice Shiras, commenting on St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Paul, supra, said that in that case stress was laid upon the reserved power of amendment which the state had, "but it is also true that, inasmuch as the right of contract is not absolute in respect to every matter, but may be subjected to the restraints demanded by the safety and welfare of the state and its inhabitants, the police power of the state may, within definite limitations, extend over corporations outside of and regardless of the power to amend charters." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Matthews, 174 U. S. 96, 43 L. ed. 909, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609. The ruling was followed in Dayton Coal & I. Co. v. Barton, 183 U. S. 23, 46 L. ed. 61, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 5, although the Dayton Company was not incorporated under the laws of Tennessee.

In McLean v. Arkansas, 211 U. S. 539, 53 L. ed. 315, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 206, a law of Arkansas required, where miners were employed at quantity rates, and more than ten were employed, that they should be paid by the weight of coal mined by them as it comes from the mine and before it was passed over a screen of any kind. One of the grounds of attack on the law was that it was an unwarranted invasion of the right of contract secured by the 14th Amendment, the argument being that the law prevented the miners from contracting for wages upon the basis of screened coal instead of the weight of the coal as originally produced at the mine. The law was sustained as a proper exercise of the police power of the state.

It is, however, contended by plaintiff, that the law under review cannot be sustained either as an exertion of the police power or as an alteration of the charter of plaintiff, unless the court can say from a comparison of the systems of payment—monthly and semimonthly—that the former affects adversely the general welfare or public good, and the latter “remedies that evil or condition, and of itself does not constitute an unjust burden upon the employer.” But whether the law imposes an unjust burden depends upon its validity, and whether the public welfare is subserved by one system or the other is, as we have said, in the first instance, for the legislature to determine, and its judgment will not be reviewed unless “unmistakably and palpably in excess of legislative power.” McLean v. Arkansas, supra. The labor law of New York cannot be so characterized.

There are certainly advantages of cash payment over deferred payments, and an advantage to those who work for a living of a ready purchasing power for their needs over the use of credit. This is found as a fact by the trial court, and even if there is no affirmative evidence of it, it is the expression of experience.

The next contention of plaintiff is that the cost of paying twice a month is a direct burden on interstate commerce. It is not necessary to review and compare the cases in which this court has pointed out the difference between a direct and indirect burden of state legislation upon interstate commerce, or the power of the states in the absence of regulation by Congress. It is enough to say in the present case that Congress has not acted, and there is not, therefore, that impediment to the law of the state; nor is there prohibition in the character of the burden. The effect of the provision is merely administrative, and so far as it affects interstate commerce, it does so indirectly. The court of appeals, as we have seen, considered that the law relates to the wages of railway servants employed wholly within the state, and to those whose duties take them from the state into other states. In other words, did not make it applicable to those employed in other states, and it therefore does not embrace all of the employees of plaintiff, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) and the contention based upon its application to all is without foundation.

The last contention of plaintiff is that the statute violates the 14th Amendment, “in that it denies to the employees of the Erie Railroad Company the equal protection of the laws.” Considerable argument is made to support the contention, in which a comparison is made between the employees—mechanics, workmen, and laborers—to whom the law applies, and the other employees of the company, and it is declared that all, if any, suffer from monthly payments, and all are entitled, therefore, to receive the benefit of semimonthly payments. But, as we have said; employees are not complaining, and whatever rights those excluded may have, plaintiff cannot invoke.

Judgment affirmed.

v.
PACIFIC ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Respt.

(— Cal. —, 139 Pac. 73.)

Carrier — collision with vehicle — injury to passenger — presumption of negligence.

The injury of a street car passenger by collision of the car with a vehicle upon the highway raises a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier which will justify a verdict against it in an action to hold it liable for the injury, unless it explains the cause of the collision.

(February 13, 1914.)

Angellotti, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The following statement is taken from the opinion of the district court of appeals of the second district filed in this case:

"The action is one brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been received by plaintiff Lora R. Housel, who was a passenger upon a car of defendant, on account of the negligent operation of such car. The action was tried by a jury and a verdict rendered in favor of defendant. From the judgment entered upon such verdict, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal upon a statement.

"The injuries inflicted upon plaintiff Mrs. Housel were occasioned by reason of a collision between the car upon which she was a passenger and a hay wagon: both being upon the public streets of the city of Los Angeles. There is evidence in the record tending to show that the driver of the wagon, which was drawn by four horses and loaded with hay, going down a hill, lost control of his team, and that when about 150 feet from the point of collision one of the horses fell; that the motorman in charge of the car, having an opportunity to and seeing the team approaching, made no effort to stop his car, but continued on at a high rate of speed, and the car was actually in motion at the time the collision occurred. In other words, there was evidence tending to show gross negligence on the part of the servants of defendant, and that the injury was occasioned thereby. As is usual in cases of this character, there was a decided conflict in the evidence; that introduced by defendant tending to show that the accident was unavoidable and that its servants exercised the utmost care in the management of the car. Under this proof, the court properly instructed the jury as to the degree of care enjoined by law upon a carrier of passengers; that even the slightest negligence upon the part of defendant's servants rendered defendant liable; and that this was true even though some unavoidable accident or negligence of some other person may have also contributed to cause the accident."

The principal question in this case is whether the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is applicable under the circumstances. This question arises in view of certain instructions to the jury, given by the trial court, and the refusal of the court to give certain other instructions requested by plaintiffs.

The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is thus stated in § 59 of Shearman & Redfield on the Law of negligence, 6th ed., viz.: "When a thing which causes injury is shown to be under the management of the defendant, and the accident is such as, in the ordinary course of things, does not happen, if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from a want of care." This doctrine has been applied in a long line of cases in this state involving injuries to a passenger while being transported by a common carrier. The effect of the doctrine, when applied to such cases, is that proof of the injury to the passenger while he was being carried as such creates a prima facie case or presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier, which the carrier is called upon to meet or rebut. "The presumption that the injury was caused by the negligence of the carrier, which is raised upon the proof by the plaintiff that he was injured while being carried as a passenger, is itself a fact which the jury must consider in determining its verdict, and which, in the absence of any other evidence in reference to the negligence, necessitates a verdict in favor of the plaintiff." See Bush v. Barnett, 96 Cal. 204, 31 Pac. 2; Sambuck v. Southern P. Co. 7 Cal. Unrep. 104, 71 Pac. 174. If the doctrine was applicable under the circumances of this case, we do not see how can successfully be disputed that the trial court erred in the matter of instructions to the jury. The learned judge of the trial court clearly believed that the doctrine was not applicable here, and expressly instructed the jury that "the fact that an accident or collision happened is to be considered by you as tending to prove negligence on the part of the defendant," and also that "the mere fact that the car came in contact with the car is not of itself evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant." He also refused to give a requested instruction in line with what we have already declared to be the situation where the doctrine is applicable, and gave an instruction which, considered in connection with the whole charge, negated the theory that there was any presumption arising from proof of the accident, which the jury must consider as a fact in arriving at a verdict.

The theory of learned counsel for defendant is that the doctrine is not applicable here for the alleged reason that the jury was not caused by an instrumentality under defendant's control; or, at least, that the evidence on the question whether it was caused by such an instrumentality was conflicting.

As against the carrier, it appears to be settled by the decisions in this state that, under such circumstances as appear here, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is applicable in favor of the passenger. The question was squarely presented in Osgood v. Los Angeles Traction Co. 137 Cal. 280, 92 Am. St. Rep. 171, 70 Pac. 169, where the injury was the result of a collision between two cars owned and operated by two different defendants independent of each other. It was held that the rule clearly applied to the proprietor of the vehicle occupied by the passenger. The statement in McCurtie v. Southern P. Co. 122 Cal. 558, 5 Pac. 324, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 117, that "a prima facie case is established when the plaintiff shows that he was injured while being carried as a passenger by the defendant, and the injury was caused by the manner in which defendant used or directed the instrumentality under its control," was quoted approvingly, and the court said: "If the fault or negligence which was the proximate cause of the injury was attributable to some other vehicle under other and independent control, the defendant could so show, and that would be a good defense; but the presumption of defendant's negligence arises regardless of the fact that the injury may have been caused by some other agency." It was further said that the peculiar circumstances of 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

this class of cases, when made to appear, afford reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from want of care. Harrison v. Sutter Street R. Co. 134 Cal. 549, 55 L.R.A. 608, 66 Pac. 787, relied on by the defendant here, was there distinguished in such a way as to render it inapplicable here. The reasoning of this case is equally applicable to a collision of a car with a wagon as to that of two street cars belonging to different companies at a place of intersection of their tracks. The doctrine was also held to be applicable in Houghton v. Market-Street R. Co. 1 Cal. App. 576, 82 Pac. 972, where the car of defendant railroad company in which the plaintiff was a passenger came into collision with a truck owned and operated by another defendant. It was held that from the happening of the accident a presumption of negligence arose in favor of the passenger as against the railway company. Decisions from other states to the same effect are to be found. See Shay v. Camden & Suburban R. Co. 66 N. J. L. 334, 49 Atl. 547; Olsen v. Citizens' R. Co. 152 Mo. 426, 54 S. W. 470; Hill v. Ninth Ave. R. Co. 109 N. Y. 239, 16 N. E. 61. In § 121 of White on Personal Injuries it is declared that proof of collision of a car with a vehicle will ordinarily raise a presumption of negligence sufficient to justify a verdict, if the cause of the collision is not explained. See also 2 Nellis, Street Railways, § 496; Booth, Street Railways, 2d ed. § 361. In Shay v. Camden & Suburban R. Co. supra, it was said: "Proof of the happening of a collision between the car in which she was carried and a vehicle in the public streets, an accident which, in the ordinary course of events, would not have happened if the proper care had been used by the motorman, raised an implication of negligence on the part of the company. It was for the company to establish that the motorman was not, in fact, negligent." The reason for the application of the doctrine in such cases appears to be practically as stated in this quotation, viz., that, in view of the very high degree of care essential under the law on the part of a carrier of persons towards those who are its passengers, such a collision would not happen in the ordinary course of events if the carrier exercised such care, and that ordinarily when such an accident occurs it is due to failure on the part of the person operating the car to use the proper degree of care in so operating it; or, in other words, to "the manner in which defendant used or directed the instrumentality under its control." As said in Osgood v. Los Angeles Traction Co. supra, it is always open to the carrier to show, in reply to the prima facie case thus made, that there was no failure on its part to use due care. As has been suggested in some of the cases, the means of proving the specific facts as to the cause of the accident are peculiarly within the power of the carrier, and the explanation should come from it, rather than from the passenger, who very often is unable to ascertain and prove the real facts.

There is some conflict of authority upon the proposition we have been discussing. This court, however, has heretofore adopted the view we have set forth, and we see no good reason to depart therefrom.

We see nothing in the claim that the theory on which the case was tried was such as to make immaterial the matter we have been discussing.

In view of what we have said, we are of the opinion that the district court of appeal was correct in its conclusion that a reversal must be had.

As was said by the District Court of Appeal, it is unnecessary to pass upon the alleged misconduct of counsel for defendant, as it is not presumable that a repetition of the matters claimed to constitute misconduct will occur on another trial.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

EDWARD GERRISH GARDNER, by Next Friend,

v.

ARTHUR W. DENISON, Admr., etc., of Edward Gerrish, Deceased.

(217 Mass. 492, 105 N. E. 359.)

Contract — consideration — naming of child.

1. The privilege of naming a child is a valid consideration for a promise to pay money.

Note. — Validity and enforceability of contract in consideration of naming child.

"There is a sufficient consideration for a promise if there is any benefit to the promisor, or any loss or detriment to the promisee." 9 Cyc. 311.

Naming—as consideration generally.

That the privilege of naming a child is a valid and legal consideration for a promise is well established by all the authorities. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Same — for benefit of child — right to enforce.

2. A child may enforce an agreement made by a stranger with its parents to place a specified sum in trust for the child for the privilege of naming it.

Waiver — rights under contract — suit in name of another.

3. A father, by bringing an action as next friend in the name of his son, to enforce an agreement by a stranger to place money in trust for the child for the privilege of naming him, relinquishes any rights which he may personally have had under the contract.

(May 21, 1914.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County, made during the trial of an action brought to enforce an agreement to pay a certain amount in consideration of the performance of a promise to name plaintiff for the defendant's testator, which resulted in a verdict for defendant. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. L. P. St. Coeur and G. H. Mellen for plaintiff.

Messrs. S. K. Hamilton and T. Eaton for defendant.

Rugg, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts upon which the plaintiff seeks to recover are these: His father, who was on friendly terms with the defendant's testator, Edward Gerrish, told the latter, in November, 1900, that the birth of a child was expected in his family. Gerrish, after several interviews, promised that if a boy should be born and named for him, Edward Gerrish Gardner, he would make some provision for the child. When the child was born, on January 1, 1901, he was named for the defendant's testator. On January 23, 1901, the plaintiff's father, at the request of Gerrish, wrote at the latter's dictation the following:

Jan. 23, 1901.

I, Edward Gerrish, promise to place in trust for Joseph A. Gardner's youngest son, Daily v. Minnick, 117 Iowa, 563, 60 L.R.A. 840, 91 N. W. 913; Wolford v. Powers, 85 Ind. 294, 44 Am. Rep. 16; Diffenderfer v. Scott, 5 Ind. App. 243, 32 N. E. 87; Babcock v. Chase, 92 Hun, 264, 36 N. Y. Supp. 879, 3 N. Y. Anno. Cas. 25; Freeman v. Morris, 131 Wis. 216, 120 Am. St. Rep. 1038, 109 N. W. 983, 11 Ann. Cas. 481; Eaton v. Libbey, 165 Mass. 218, 52 Am. St. Rep. 511, 42 N. E. 1127. This rule is in accord with the holding in GARDNER v. DENISON.

In making such contracts, parents act as born Jan. 1, 1901, $10,000, for naming said son after me. Edward Gerrish Garduer.

No specific sum of money had been mentioned before. Gerrish then signed the paper in the presence of the plaintiff's father, who since has had the possession and control of it. Gerrish later lived in the family of the plaintiff's father and showed special attention to the child, bestowing many gifts upon him and constantly referring to him as "my boy." He died in 1906 leaving an estate of more than $200,000, never having made any provision for the benefit of the plaintiff.

The privilege of naming a child is a valid consideration for a promise to pay money. The child has a direct and immediate interest in his name and is more affected by it than anyone else. He loses the natural guardians of the child, and are presumed to act for its interest. Daily v. Minnick and Eaton v. Libbey, supra.

In Wolford v. Powers, 85 Ind. 294, 44 Am. Rep. 16, the court said: "The surrender, at the intestate's request, of the right or privilege of naming the appellant's child, was the yielding of a consideration. The right to give his child a name was one which the father possessed, and one which he could not be deprived of against his consent. If the intestate chose to bargain for the exercise of this right, he should be bound, for by his bargain he limited and restrained the father's right to bestow his own or some other name upon the child. We can perceive no solid reason for declaring that the right with which the father parted at the intestate's request was of no value. It is difficult, if not impossible, to invent even a plausible reason for affirming that such a right or privilege is absolutely worthless. The father is the natural guardian of his child, and entitled to its services during infancy, and within this natural right must fall the privilege of bestowing a name upon it. In yielding to the intestate's request, and in consideration of the promise accompanying it, the appellant certainly suffered some deprivation and surrendered some right. The rule is, that 'it is sufficient if there be any damage or detriment to the plaintiff, though no actual benefit accrue to the party undertaking.' . . . Conceding that the intestate derived no benefit, still, as the appellant suffered some detriment and yielded a right, there is a legal consideration. The concession that the intestate secured no benefit is one that cannot be justly made, for he himself determined that the act done by the appellant, at his request, was a benefit to him. It is not necessary that the consideration for a promise should be a property one. It is true that the courts and text writers use the words 'valuable consideration,' but this is done for the purpose of distinguishing the consideration from a good one; that is, one based upon the opportunity of receiving a more advantageous name, and is compelled to bear whatever detriment may flow from the name imposed upon him. The consideration moves in part from the child, although he is not in a position personally to yield an assent to the promise at the time it is made. It is a general rule that one who is not a party to a contract cannot bring an action on it even though it be made for his benefit. But the circumstances of the parties respecting the naming of a child are so peculiar, the nearness of the relation so great, and the obligation resting on the father and mother so important, and the consequences to the child so vital, that the inference may be drawn that the father is acting in the interests of and as agent for the son in making any contract as to giving him a name. Felton v. Dickinson, 10 Mass. 287, as in-love and affection, and from one resting on a purely moral obligation."

The benefit of the name to the promisor, and the detriment to the parents of parting with the right to give the child such name as they might choose, is that which the law considers as valuable. Daily v. Minnick, 117 Iowa, 563, 60 L.R.A. 840, 91 N. W. 913. And the detriment which the child itself may suffer from the name imposed is also considered. Eaton v. Libbey, 165 Mass. 218, 52 Am. St. Rep. 511, 42 N. E. 1127.

The naming of a child after the promisor is sufficient consideration for a promissory note payable to the father. Wolford v. Powers, supra. And the same is true of a like note payable to the child. Eaton v. Libbey, supra, where the court said: "Gifts to a child because of its name are common, and a change of name is often made the condition of a gift or bequest. In many jurisdictions the change of a name is regulated by statute. If we assume that the right to name a child belongs to its parents, and ultimately to its father, the child cannot be said to have no interest in the name imposed. The consequences affect the child more than anyone else. He is deprived of the advantage of receiving any other name, and is subjected to the possibility of detriment because he bears the name imposed. Assuming that the privilege belongs to the parents, if they waive the right in favor of another, we think the child has an interest in the name which it shall bear analogous to the interest which the child has in its own services, which belong to the father, but which, if the father waives his right, furnish a good consideration for a promissory note given to the child by a person to whom they have been rendered. . . . The right of the parents is one which they have as the natural guardians of the child, and they may be presumed to act in the matter for its interest. If, for exercising the right in a particular manner, they receive a reward which they recognize and treat as belongterpreted by Marston v. Bigelow, 150 Mass. 45, 53, 5 L.R.A. 43, 22 N. E. 71. It was said in Eaton v. Libbey, 165 Mass. 218, at 220, 52 Am. St. Rep. 511, 42 N. E. 1127, respecting the naming of a child: "The right of the parents is one which they have as the natural guardians of the child, and they may be presumed to act in the matter for its interest. If, for exercising the right in a particular manner, they receive a reward which they recognize and treat as belonging to the child, it should be considered as its property, even if the parents could have kept the reward as their own."

This action is brought in the name of the son by his father as next friend. That is a relinquishment of the father's personal rights as far as they ever might have been antagonistic to the son, and is equivalent to an assertion that whatever he did was done as agent for the son. The writing, signed by Gerrish, while inartificially expressed, in substance is a declaration by the de-ing to the child, it should be considered as its property, even if the parents could have kept the reward as their own. In this case it is fair to say that in the transaction in which the original note was given the parents were acting for the child, and were understood by the defendant's testator to be so acting. The plaintiff has continued to bear the name, and has accepted the present note since he arrived at years of discretion, and he has further ratified the contract by bringing this suit since he became of age. We are of opinion that there was a valid consideration for the note moving from the plaintiff himself."

The naming of a child for promisor in accordance with his previous request is a sufficient consideration for a subsequent promise to convey to the child a particular tract of land because of such act. Daily v. Minnick, supra.

Changing the name of a child is also a sufficient consideration for a promise to the parents for the benefit of the child. Babcock v. Chase, 92 Hun. 264, 36 N. Y. Supp. 879, 3 N. Y. Anno. Cas. 25.

—as adequate consideration.

In the absence of fraud, the question of the adequacy of such a consideration is left to the determination of the parties. Wolford v. Powers and Babcock v. Chase, supra.

In the Wolford Case the court said: "Where a party contracts for the performance of an act which will afford him pleasure, gratify his ambition, please his fancy, or express his appreciation of a service another has done him, his estimate of value should be left undisturbed, unless, indeed, there is evidence of fraud. There is, in such a case, absolutely no rule by which the courts can be guided, if once they depart from the value fixed by the promisor. If they attempt to fix some standard, it must defendant's testator that he acknowledges himself indebted in the sum of $10,000 for the privilege granted him of having the plaintiff bear his name. The words "in trust," in the absence of any definition of the terms of any trust, may be treated as meaning nothing more than the expression of a general purpose that the promise was for the benefit of the plaintiff. No promisee being named in the instrument, all the attendant conditions may be examined for the purpose of determining to whom in fact the promise to pay was made. Such resort to extrinsic circumstances is not for the purpose of changing the writing, but of applying it to its proper object. Way v. Greer, 196 Mass. 237, 81 N. E. 1002; Willett v. Smith, 214 Mass. 494, 497, 101 N. E. 1058, and cases cited. Under all the circumstances we are of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury.

Exceptions sustained.

necessarily be an arbitrary one, and ascertained only by mere conjecture. If, in the class of cases under mention, there is any legal consideration for a promise, it must be sufficient for the one made; for, if this be not so, then the result is that the court substitutes its own judgment for that of the promisor, and, in doing this, makes a new contract. Where the purpose of the party is to secure a pecuniary or property benefit, there is much more ground for judicial interference than in a case like this, where the controlling purpose is not gain, but the gratification of a desire or fancy. Even in the former class of cases, courts never do interfere upon the sole ground of inadequacy of consideration, and certainly should not in the class to which the one at bar belongs. No person in the world, other than the promisor, can estimate the value of an act which arouses his gratitude, gratifies his ambition, or pleases his fancy. If there be any consideration at all, it must be allotted the value the parties have placed upon it, or a conjectural estimate, made arbitrarily and without the semblance of a guide, must be substituted by the courts."

Uncertainty.

Of course, the terms of the agreement as shown by the evidence, to be enforceable, must not be ambiguous or indefinite and uncertain. Daily v. Minnick, 117 Iowa. 563, 60 L.R.A. 840, 91 N. W. 913, and Freeman v. Morris, 131 Wis. 216, 120 Am. St. Rep. 1038, 109 N. W. 983, 11 Ann. Cas. 481.

So, a contract in consideration of the privilege of naming a child, that something would be left the child at the promisor's death, but failing to state what amount of property would be left, or to provide a means by which the amount could be ascertained, is invalid for uncertainty. Freeman v. Morris, supra.

Such contract is not aided by the testator's declarations to third persons as to how much he would leave the child, or by bequests to the child in revoked wills. Ibid.

But the purchase by promisor of a tract of land, and his declaration that it is the land he intends to convey in fulfilment of his promise, are sufficient to render certain his promise to convey an infant a certain quantity of land in case he is named for him. Daily v. Minnick, supra.

Statute of frauds.

If such a contract is clearly within the statute of frauds, it is unenforceable. Daily v. Minnick, supra; Parks v. Francis, infra.

So, an oral promise to deposit a definite sum in a certain bank in four equal annual instalments for the privilege of giving a child the promisor's name was held void in Parks v. Francis, 50 Vt. 626, 28 Am. Rep. 517, as a contract not to be performed within a year, within such provision of the statute of frauds.

But naming a child for the grantor is a sufficient performance of the consideration to take an oral agreement to convey land to him in consideration thereof out of the statute of frauds, where payment of the purchase money, or part thereof, is allowed to do so. Daily v. Minnick, supra.

And naming a child after promisor at his request is such a consideration previously received as to constitute a sufficient performance of an oral promise to convey land to take it out of the statute of frauds. Ibid.

Who can enforce contract.

It is well established that there is such privity of contract between the child named and his parents as to entitle him to maintain an action for the enforcement of the contract. Daily v. Minnick and Freeman v. Morris, supra. GARDNER v. DENISON is in accord with this rule.

The child is not such a stranger to the consideration that he cannot recover on the promise. Eaton v. Libbey, 165 Mass. 218, 52 Am. St. Rep. 511, 42 N. E. 1127.

In Babcock v. Chase, 92 Hun. 264, 36 N. Y. Supp. 879, 3 N. Y. Anno. Cas. 25, in deciding whether the child could enforce a promise made in consideration of the change of her name, the court said: "It [the promise] was made expressly for her benefit, and by reason of the relationship between her and the promisees, and also by reason of her connection with the consideration, there was such a privity between her and the promisees that she had a right to enforce the contract."

By continuing to bear the name and bringing the suit, the infant ratifies the contract made by his parents. Daily v. Minnick; Eaton v. Libbey; and Freeman v. Morris,—supra.

In Wolford v. Powers, 85 Ind. 294, 44 Am. Rep. 16, the father of the child maintained the suit, while in the Diffenderfer Case, the child sued by her next friend. And in Parks v. Francis, supra, the child was plaintiff.

(Division No. 1.)

WALRUS MANUFACTURING COMPANY,

Plff. in Err.,

v.

C. A. McMEHEN.

(39 Okla. 667, 136 Pac. 772.)

Assignment — of article purchased — action against vendor.

1. A right of action in original purchaser and debtor against original seller, who is the creditor, does not run with chattels purchased in contracting the debt in the first instance to a second purchaser in succession, who assumes payment of the debt upon release of original debtor, in absence of such intent of the parties to such novation, and of any assignment of such right by original to substituted debtor.

Novation — sale contract — action on warranty.

2. Where, in respect to failure of consideration, it cannot be said, as matter of law, that the parties to a novation (by which plaintiff releases N. from liability upon notes in consideration of defendant's assumption to pay the same, the defendant having acquired by purchase from N. the chattel for which N., as original purchaser, executed such notes to plaintiff, and having assumed to pay said notes in consideration, as between himself and N. only, of his said acquisition) so intended, nor that N. assigned his right to the defendant, it was error for the court to instruct the jury, as matter of law, that defendant was subrogated to all the rights of N. as against plaintiff in respect to the latter's implied warranty, if any, of the quality of the chattel to N.

(November 18, 1913.)

Headnotes by THACKER, C.

Note. — Right of a purchaser of chattel to avail himself of breach of warranty made to the seller.

It is not intended to include herein cases involving the liability to the retailer or consumer of a manufacturer of food products and other articles, for defects therein, without reference to whether the liability is based upon the theory of an express or implied warranty, or on the doctrine of negligence. On this subject, see notes to Tomlinson v. Armour & Co. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 923, and Mazetti v. Armour & Co. 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 213, and other notes there referred to.

A warranty of personal property is personal to the purchaser of the property to whom the warranty is made, and a subsequent sale of the property by such purchaser does not operate to vest in a subsequent purchaser any right of action which the former might have against the original seller for a breach of the warranty, for such a warranty does not pass with the ERROR to the Superior Court for Pittsburg County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action on certain promissory notes given for the balance of the purchase price of a soda fountain outfit. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Wright & Boyd, for plaintiff in error:

An inspection of the article purchased, or an opportunity to inspect, relieves the plaintiff of any warranty as to the quality and condition of the article sold.

Mr. Carl Monk for defendant in error.

Thacker, C., filed the following opinion:

The position of the parties, in respect to their descriptive titles, remains the same here as in the trial court. Plaintiff sold the Nix Pharmacy, and installed in its place property, and, to maintain an action for breach thereof, there must be privity between the parties:

—Post v. Burnham, 27 C. C. A. 455, 55 U. S. App. 71, 83 Fed. 79, holding the original seller of chattels not liable upon an implied warranty of title to a subsequent purchaser from the original purchaser:

—Nelson v. Armour Packing Co. 76 Ark. 352, 90 S. W. 288, 6 Ann. Cas. 237, stating the doctrine that, unlike covenants of title to land, a warranty of personal property does not run with the property, and there is no privity of contract between the vendor in one sale and the vendees of the same property in subsequent sales, hence each vendee can resort, as a general rule, only to his immediate vendor:

—Boyd v. Whitfield, 19 Ark. 447, holding that an implied warranty of title to personal property is a contract personal to seller and purchaser, and does not pass by a mere transfer of the property to a subsequent purchaser, so as to give him a right of action against the first seller for a breach of warranty, the rule being that the purchaser who loses the chattel by the interposition of a paramount title, for his redress, must look to his immediate seller;

—Welshausen v. Charles Parker Co. 83 Conn. 231, 76 Atl. 271, holding a warranty as to the quality of personal property cannot be taken advantage of by a subsequent purchaser from the original purchaser:

—Kendig v. Giles, 9 Fla. 278, holding that a warranty of a slave does not pass with the slave when subsequently sold;

—Smith v. Williams, 117 Ga. 782, 97 Am. St. Rep. 220, 45 S. E. 394, holding that each sale is a separate transaction, and each seller is liable for his own contract, and to the extent thereof; but that he cannot enlarge his prior vendor's obligation beyond that fixed by law. If his title is not good, the purchaser must look to the person from whom he purchased the article, and to whom he paid the consideration;

—Broughton v. Badgett, 1 Ga. 75, holding that a bill of sale for personal property is not negotiable, and an indorsement of it does not transfer to the indorsee a right of action upon a warranty contained therein of the property sold, but the original purchaser may maintain an action upon such warranty after having disposed of the property. To the same effect, see Dukes v. Nelson, 27 Ga. 457;

—Zuckermann v. Solomon, 73 Ill. 130, holding a breach of warranty of personal property cannot be asserted by a subsequent purchaser, either by set-off or a suit in his own name;

—Prater v. Campbell, 110 Ky. 23, 60 S. W. 918, holding a warranty as to the size of timber, where the timber is personal property, does not pass to a subsequent purchaser thereof;

—Asher Lumber Co. v. Cornett, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 569, 56 L.R.A. 672, 58 S. W. 438, holding that for a breach of warranty of personal property the buyer may sue only his immediate seller; —Ranney v. Meisenheimer, 61 Mo. App. 434, stating the rule that a warranty of a chattel is available only between the parties to the contract, and not in favor of a third person, unless claiming as assignee of the warranty;

—Bordwell v. Collie, 45 N. Y. 494, holding a warranty of personal property, upon a subsequent sale thereof, not to pass to the subsequent purchaser.

But in Mazetti v. Armour & Co. 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 213, it is held that in the absence of an express warranty of quality, the manufacturer of food products under modern conditions impliedly warrants his goods when dispensed in original packages, and such warranty is available to all who may be damaged by reason of their use in the legitimate channels of trade.

Compare with Roberts v. Anheuser Busch Brewing Asso. 211 Mass. 449, 98 N. E. 95, holding that there cannot be a warranty of personal property where there is no privity of contract, and a subsequent purchaser of an article cannot maintain an action for damages on a claim of breach of warranty as to quality; but where the original seller is the manufacturer of the article, and by public advertisements inof business at McAlester, Oklahoma, a soda fountain, with articles for use in connection therewith, including a patented carbonator, for $1,100, of which $200 was paid at the time; the balance of $900 being evidenced by the purchaser's notes secured by his chattel mortgage on all the property. And about two and one-half months later defendant purchased with the consent of plaintiff, if not from it, and installed in his place of business in said McAlester, all the said property, upon the representation of the Nix Pharmacy that the carbonator, which he saw before purchasing, was a fine and first-class carbonator, guaranteed by plaintiff to do the work any other carbonator would do (these representations being repeated in the presence of a representative of plaintiff in this transaction), at the same time, in substitution for the obligations of certain of the Nix Pharmacy notes and mortgage, by indorsement thereon, assuming to pay the said notes in the sum of $622, and giving his own chattel mortgage on the same property as security therefor; the Nix Pharmacy being thus released on its obligations to plaintiff. But it is not shown how the amount of the original purchase price representing the difference between said $900 and said $622 was eliminated as a liability, nor whether the price at which the defendant purchased exceeded said sum of $622. It appears that defendant paid plaintiff the sum of $418, leaving an unpaid balance evidenced by said note in the aggregate sum of $204; but, in the duces a person to buy his product of a retailer, such manufacturer may be held in tort for damages occasioned the purchaser by such misrepresentations. As shown by comparison of this case with the preceding case, the cases are not in accord on the theory of liability of the manufacturer of the article to be sold at retail, although both hold him liable. As already pointed out, cases of this character are not included herein, but they may be found in the notes heretofore referred to.

In Conestoga Cigar Co. v. Finke, 144 Pa. 159, 13 L.R.A. 438, 22 Atl. 868, the liability of an inspector of tobacco to a subsequent purchaser, upon a warranty of quality printed on tags attached to the bales of tobacco, is held to be a question for the jury where there is evidence that, by custom and usage of trade, this tag or label constitutes a warranty of quality for a specified period of time for the benefit of any person in whose possession the tobacco may come within such time, it further appearing that the inspector has in other cases recognized his liability to third persons upon his warranties, and that his agent, when notified of the defect in the tobacco in question, admitted the defect and promised to make it good.

Effect of novation of contract.

Of course, there may be a novation of contract so complete in itself as clearly to render the seller liable to the substituted purchaser for a breach of warranty contained in the original contract. The cases considering the question have not clearly developed the point as to just how complete must be the substitution of a subsequent purchaser for the original purchaser, to entitle the former to avail himself of a warranty to the latter.

It has been held that a subsequent purchaser of an interest in personal property originally sold with a warranty, who executes a note jointly with the original purchasers in renewal of a note given by the latter for the purchase price, may, in a suit upon the renewal note, join with the other makers in asserting a breach of the warranty as a counterclaim. York Mfg. Co. v. Bonnell, 24 Ind. App. 667, 57 N. E. 590. It is stated in the opinion that it was alleged in the counterclaim that at the time of the purchase of the interest, there was assigned to the purchaser an interest in all contracts which the original purchasers had with their vendor.

In Boyd v. Whitfield, 19 Ark. 447, a suit in equity, the general rule that a warranty of personal property will not pass upon a subsequent sale thereof is held not to apply where an arrangement is made between buyer and seller and a third person by which the latter assumes payment of the purchase money directly to the original seller, and it is said that such purchaser in equity is subrogated to the implied warranty of title.

This case is very similar to WALRUS MFG. CO. v. McMEHEN, except that in the latter case the representations constituting a warranty were repeated by the original purchaser to the subsequent purchaser in the presence of a representative of the original seller. It is to be noted, however, that in the WALRUS MFG. CO. CASE a warranty to the original purchaser was held not to inure to the benefit of the subsequent purchaser.

Where the original seller, in order to make it possible for the purchaser to resell the article, gives the second purchaser a warranty similar to that of the original purchaser, the subsequent purchaser, after having paid the purchase price to the original purchaser, as his remedy for a breach of the warranty, cannot tender the article to the original seller and recover the purchase price from him. If he desires to pursue this remedy, he must have recourse to the person to whom the purchase money was paid. Johnson v. Whitman Agri. Co. 20 Mo. App. 100.

It has been held that a seller of personal property with a warranty, who takes notes secured by a mortgage on the property in payment thereof, is not liable upon the warranty to a subsequent purchaser of the property, although he took the notes of such purchaser as collateral to the notes meantime, the carbonator had failed properly and almost entirely to perform the function for which it was intended, although three times sent to plaintiff for repairs and as often returned to defendant with such repairs as plaintiff deemed proper or could make thereon; and defendant, having offered to return the carbonator and demanded a surrender of his unpaid notes, to which plaintiff would not assent, ultimately discontinued payment of these notes, this action by plaintiff following as a sequence.

The evidence tended to show that, although the carbonator would have been worth $250 if it would properly have performed the function for which it was intended, it was worthless when defendant purchased it and at all times thereafter, it being, in point of mechanism and material, inherently unsuited to perform such function; but there is nothing further to throw light upon how the carbonator was valued, or what portion of the purchase price was apportionable to it in either the original sale to the Nix Pharmacy or the later sale to defendant. Defendant, waiving any right he might have had to damages in excess of the face value of the seven notes sued on, tendered the carbonator to plaintiff in court at the time of the trial, and defeated plaintiff's action upon evidence tending to prove the facts as stated.

of the original purchaser, and at the same time released his mortgage: and this is true although the original purchaser sold the property upon the same warranty as that given him by the original seller, and so informed the latter. Thisler v. Keith, 7 Kan. App. 363, 52 Pac. 619.

And see WALRUS MFG. CO. v. McMEHEN, holding that a subsequent purchaser from the original purchaser, without an assignment of the latter's cause of action against the original seller for a breach of warranty, cannot take advantage of such breach in the absence of an express warranty to him by the original seller, although with the consent of the latter, he assumed payment of the notes given by the original purchaser for the purchase price upon the latter's release, and was induced to do so by the repetition to him by the original purchaser, in the presence of a representative of the original seller, of the warranty given by the latter to the original purchaser.

Assignability of cause of action for breach.

Where a purchaser of a chattel has a complete cause of action for a breach of warranty, there can be no doubt that it may be assigned to the same extent as may any other complete cause of action. The few cases which have considered the question make it doubtful whether the warranty itself, at least prior to a breach thereof, may be assigned so as to enable the

The application of the Nix Pharmacy to plaintiff for the purchase of this property. in the first instance, recited that the title should remain in plaintiff pending discharge of deferred payments on the purchase price: but this reservation of title in plaintiff was waived and lost by its acceptance of the Nix Pharmacy notes and chattel mortgage for such deferred payments, the taking of the notes and mortgage being inconsistent with plaintiff's ownership of the property; and it appears inferentially that that portion of defendant's testimony in which he said he purchased the property of plaintiff may have been given upon the erroneous theory that plaintiff held the legal title to the property at the time of his purchase by reason of said order, although the idea that there was a rescission of plaintiff's sale to the Nix Pharmacy and a new sale by it to defendant is not so clearly excluded as to remove all doubt in this regard. However, it appears that the transaction between the plaintiff, the defendant, and the Nix Pharmacy, to which each was privy, was merely a novation of parties in which the plaintiff released the Nix Pharmacy, and, supported by the consideration thereof, the defendant assumed and became legally bound for the payment of the Nix Pharmacy notes to the plaintiff—no other intent appears. See 29 Cyc. 1136, and Michigan assignee thereof to maintain an action at law for its subsequent breach.

Thus, it has been held that on a breach of a warranty of title, the original purchaser may satisfy the claim of the purchaser from him by assigning to the latter his claim and cause of action against the original seller for such breach, and the subsequent purchaser may maintain an action thereon. Bordwell v. Collie, 45 N. Y. 494.

And see Ranney v. Meisenheimer, 61 Mo. App. 434, wherein it is said that a warranty of a chattel is available only between the parties to the contract, unless the original purchaser's cause of action is assigned to a third person.

In Kendig v. Giles, 9 Fla. 278, it is held that a warranty of a chattel does not pass with the chattel, and the original purchaser cannot assign to a subsequent purchaser his right to maintain an action for breach of the warranty, which will be recognized in a court of law.

And in Zuckermann v. Solomon, 73 Ill. 130, it is said that a warranty of personal property is not assignable so as to permit a subsequent purchaser of the property to make it the subject of a set-off or of a suit in his own name.

And Smith v. Williams, 117 Ga. 782, 97 Am. St. Rep. 220, 45 S. E. 394, is also authority for the doctrine that a warranty of personal property is not negotiable or assignable.

Stove Co. v. A. H. Walker & Co. 150 Iowa, 363, 130 N. W. 130, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 505, and notes thereto at page 508.

The evidence adduced upon the trial does not raise this case above the plane of doubt and uncertainty as to the actual facts and the elemental character of the transaction in which the defendant acquired the property mentioned and assumed the payment of the Nix Pharmacy notes; and several possible theories suggest themselves for consideration in trying to ascertain what the evidence does show or tend to show in this regard. If the Nix Pharmacy, as owner, sold the property to defendant without assignment to him of its right of action, if any it had, upon plaintiff's original warranty, if any there was, to it, and plaintiff did not warrant the property to defendant, it would seem clear that defendant could not successfully defend against these notes, assumed by him, by a promise to pay supported by the consideration of plaintiff's release of the Nix Pharmacy from its obligation thereon. It appears that such a novation of parties could not operate to cause the Nix Pharmacy's right of action for breach of warranty, if any it had, to run with the property to the defendant, nor to subrogate defendant to any right of the Nix Pharmacy in respect to such warranty as against plaintiff. As, in effect, against the new debtor's right of action or defense upon such warranty, see 29 Cyc. 1137, 1138; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 671; Keller v. Beaty, 80 Ga. 815, 6 S. E. 598; Adams v. Power, 48 Miss. 450. As to assignment of right of action see, in connection with § 4268, Okla. Stat. 1890 (§ 6740, Rev. Laws 1910) the following: 4 Cyc. 7, 8, and 111, 112; Gustafson v. Stockton & T. C. R. Co. 132 Cal. 619, 64 Pac. 995; Nelson v. Armour Packing Co. 76 Ark. 352, 90 S. W. 288, 6 Ann. Cas. 237.

If plaintiff, as owner, sold the property, in part or in whole, through the agency of the Nix Pharmacy, to the defendant, the representations of the Nix Pharmacy as to the quality of the carbonator, the defects being latent, would be binding upon plaintiff; and it appears that defendant, if he relied upon such representations, would be entitled to set off, against the face value of the notes sued on, damages for breach of warranty, measured by the difference between the value of the carbonator as it actually was at the time to which the warranty relates and its value as it would have been if it had conformed to the requirements of the warranty (Wiggins v. Jackson, 31 Okla. 292, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 153, 121 Pac. 602, and Spaulding Mfg. Co. v. Holiday, 32 Okla. 823, 124 Pac. 35); but if there was any evidence whatever justifying the same, which we deem if unnecessary to determine, the case was not tried upon that theory, and the judgment cannot be affirmed upon the same for obvious reasons.

This case, in respect to ground of defense, was tried upon the theory of a failure, or partial failure, of the consideration supporting defendant's assumption and promise to pay the notes sued on; but if it be conceded that the purchase price is severable, and this defense allowable in that respect, a want or failure of consideration to which plaintiff was not privy, such as a want or failure of beneficial consideration passing from the Nix Pharmacy, as owner of the property constituting the same, to the defendant, is not available as a defense to defendant as against plaintiff's action on these notes; and plaintiff's release of the Nix Pharmacy from liability, if the obligation was valid, on the notes, would appear to be sufficient consideration to support the promise to pay involved in said assumption, which, in view of the Nix Pharmacy's apparent title to the property at the time of the sale to the defendant, is apparently the only consideration to which plaintiff was privy, unless whatever benefit to defendant or detriment to plaintiff may be found in the latter's consent, as mortgagee, to the former's purchase of all the property mentioned from the Nix Pharmacy, may be regarded as a distinct consideration, and not included in the release of the Nix Pharmacy from liability, which it is not material to consider.

It seems clear, in the light of the authorities already cited, that the trial court erred in assuming as a matter of law, and in instructing the jury, that defendant was subrogated to all the rights of the Nix Pharmacy, and so as to permit a verdict for the defendant upon the ground of a failure, or partial failure, of the original consideration upon which the Nix Pharmacy notes were given to the plaintiff in its purchase of the property about two and one-half months before the defendant acquired it.

Uncertainty as to the material facts involved in the transaction, which might change the legal aspect of defendant's position, forbid, in reversing and remanding this case, any extended discussion of the rule that, in the absence of fraud or express warranty, "the fundamental inquiry must always be whether, under the circumstances of the particular case, the buyer had the right to rely, and necessarily relied, on the judgment of the seller, and not upon his own" (Kellogg Bridge Co. v. Hamilton, 110 U. S. 108, 28 L. ed. 86, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 537), in order to ascertain if there is an implied warranty (2 Mechem, Sales, 1311-1318; 2 Benjamin, Sales, 862, 863; Gold Ridge Min. Co. v. Tallmadge, 44 Or. 34, 74 Pac. 325, 102 Am. St. Rep. 602, and notes at page 607; McQuaid v. Ross, 85 Wis. 492, 55 N. W. 705, 39 Am. St. Rep. 864, 22 L.R.A. 187, and notes; and Leavitt v. Fiberloid Co. 196 Mass. 440, 82 N. E. 682, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 855, and notes). But, in anticipation of another trial, we suggest that it might be well to observe the distinction in form between a counterclaim or cross action for damages for breach of warranty (which damages are measured by the difference between the actual value of the article as it is and its value as it would have been if it had been as warranted), available as a set-off without regard to whether the purchase price of the article is severable from the whole purchase price, and want of consideration involving a rescission of the contract, and designed to defeat the action to the extent of the purchase price of the article, which is not available unless the purchase price of the article may be ascertained and severed from the whole of the purchase price of all the articles purchased together.

For the reason stated, this case should be reversed and remanded, with instructions to grant plaintiff a new trial.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

WALTER GOODMAN

and

MRS. CORINNE A. RICHARDSON, Piff.
in Certiorari,

v.

CHARLES S. WILSON.

(— Tenn. —, 166 S. W. 752.)

Master and servant — joint employers of chauffeur — liability for negligence.

One of two joint owners of an automobile, who contribute equally to the expense of its up-keep and the wages of the chauffeur, and have equal right to the use of the car except a preference given to the other owner as to its use in going to and from business.

Note. — Liability of joint owners of automobile or carriage for torts of common servant.

As to liability in general of joint employers for torts of employee, see note to Moore v. Southern P. R. Co. ante, 866.

The decision in GOODMAN v. WILSON seems to be in accord with the general rule that joint employers are liable for the torts of an employee, even when such servant, in committing the tort, is at the time performing a duty for one only of his employers. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

is liable for injury caused to a traveler on the highway by the chauffeur's negligent operation of the car, in obeying the orders of such other owner to take the car to his office to convey him home, although the former had given no orders in connection with the journey.

CERTIORARI to the Court of Civil Appeals to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Shelby County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries caused by a collision between plaintiff's buggy and an automobile owned jointly by defendants. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. D. W. DeHaven, for plaintiff in certiorari:

As a matter of law, there is no evidence to support the verdict of the jury as against Mrs. Richardson.

Mrs. Richardson is liable for the injuries complained of by plaintiff

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Rust, 55 Tex. Civ. App. 359, 120 S. W. 249; 1 Bl. Com. p.

The only case in addition to GOODMAN v. WILSON which involves a similar state of facts is the Ohio case of Bell v. Pistorius, 18 Ohio C. C. 73, 9 Ohio C. D. 869, which is set out and discussed in the GOODMAN CASE, and which, it will be noted, is in direct conflict with the later case.

A somewhat similar case, however, from which GOODMAN v. WILSON derives some support, is Switzer v. Sherwood, — Wash. —, 141 Pac. 181, wherein it was held that both a husband and a wife who owned an automobile as a community were liable for 431; 26 Cyc. 1525; Lynde v. Browning, 2 Tenn. Civ. App. 264.

Lansden, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by Wilson against Goodman and his sister, Mrs. Corinne A. Richardson, to recover damages resulting from a collision with a buggy in which Wilson was riding and an automobile owned by Goodman and Mrs. Richardson. From the verdict and judgment in the circuit court against both defendants, an appeal was taken to, and the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed by, the court of civil appeals. The case is presented to us upon the petition of Mrs. Richardson alone. The facts which we consider material are that the automobile which collided with defendant in error is owned jointly and equally by Mrs. Richardson and Mr. Goodman, who are brother and sister. They live in the same residence, and jointly employ one chauffeur, and each pays one half of his wages, and he serves them both in the operation of the automobile. They equally bear the expense of operation and repair of the automobile, and each of them, separately or jointly, may use it accordingly as their needs or pleasures may require. They have an agreement by which Mr. Goodman has a right of preference to the use of the automobile in being carried to and from his office in the morning and afternoon, if he sees proper to require the use of the car at this time, to the exclusion of the right of Mrs. Richardson to use it at these hours. When either party desires to use the automobile, orders would be given by the one so desiring to use it to the chauffeur for this purpose. Occasionally they used it jointly, and occasionally Mrs. Richardson would ride into town after her brother, or would ride to town with him in the morning when he would go to his office.

On the occasion of the accident, the automobile was going into town to the office of Mr. Goodman, and was going west on Union avenue. Wilson was driving west on Union avenue in an open buggy with a horse attached. The automobile approached him from behind. It was racing with another automobile moving in the same direction, and was running at a rate of speed estimated by the witness for plaintiff at from 25 to 40 miles an hour. When Wilson saw the two automobiles approaching him, he drew his horse and buggy close to the curb, and, as he did so, the automobile in front of that of plaintiff in error passed Wilson, and plaintiff in error's automobile appeared to be trying to get in between the other automobile and Wilson's buggy. In this attempt, the automobile struck the wheel of the buggy, and knocked Wilson into the air, and he fell onto the asphalt pavement. The automobile ran 90 yards after striking the buggy, before it was stopped.

Upon these facts, it is insisted for Mrs. Richardson that she is not liable, because the evidence does not connect her with the accident, and that the chauffeur, at the time of the accident, was in the service of Mr. Goodman only, and therefore the rule of respondet superior does not apply as between the chauffeur and Mrs. Richardson.

The court of civil appeals was of opinion that, although Mrs. Richardson was not in the automobile at the time, and may not have given orders to the chauffeur to proceed on the journey, still the chauffeur and the automobile at the time of the accident were on the business of the joint owners of the automobile.

It is undoubtedly true, as a general proposition of law, that the doctrine of respondet superior applies only when the relation of master and servant is shown to exist between the wrongdoer and the person sought to be charged with the injury resulting from the wrong at the time and in respect of the very transaction out of which the injury arose; and the mere fact that the driver of the automobile was the defendants' servant will not make the defendant liable. It must be further shown that at the time of the accident the driver was on the master's business, and acting within the scope of his employment. This rule was said by Blackstone to be founded on the superintendence and control which the master is supposed to exercise over his servant. 1 Bl. Com. 431.

injuries caused by negligent operation of their car by their daughter while the husband was riding therein, although the wife was not in the car at the time of the accident.

And see the analogous case of Towers v. Errington, 78 Misc. 297, 138 N. Y. Supp. 119, affirmed without opinion in 156 App. Div. 892, 141 N. Y. Supp. 1148, wherein, in holding that a husband, one of the joint owners of an automobile, was not liable for injuries resulting from the negligence of a son, selected by and driving the automobile 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

for the wife, who was the other owner, the court said that the question in the case was whether the driver was acting as the servant of the husband; and intimated that had he been selected by him, and had he been operating the automobile for the purpose for which he was selected, the husband would have been liable.

As to liability in general where an automobile is being used by a member of the owner's family, see note to McNeal v. McKain, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 775. G. J. C.

The rule arises out of the relation of superior and subordinate, and is applicable to that relation wherever it exists, and is co-extensive with the relationship itself. It is founded on the power of control which the superior has a right to exercise, and which, for the safety of other persons, he is bound to exercise, over the acts of his subordinates, and in strict analogy to liability ex contractu upon the maxim, Qui facit per alium facit per se. Clark v. Fry, 8 Ohio St. 358, 72 Am. Dec. 590. This rule is not modified by the existence of the fact that the negligent servant is jointly employed by two or more persons. For instance, in the case of a flagman at a railroad crossing jointly employed by two or more railroads, the road in whose service he is negligent, or otherwise commits a tort, is liable for his misconduct. Brow v. Boston & A. R. Co. 157 Mass. 309, 32 N. E. 362; Illinois C. R. Co. v. King, 69 Miss. 852, 13 So. 824.

It is said in 26 Cyc. 1525, that "where a servant is jointly employed by several persons who are not partners, each contributing to his wages, one of the masters is not liable for the misconduct of the servant while engaged solely in the service of another master."

For the text a case is cited from a circuit court in Ohio (Bell v. Pistorius, 18 Ohio C. C. 73, 9 Ohio C. D. 869). From a note to the text, it appears that the case cited was where three persons hired a coachman and divided his wages, and the carriage belonged to one, and the horse to another, and a person was injured by the negligence of the coachman while driving one of his employers. It was held that the latter employer alone was liable for the injuries. Upon such a meager report of the case upon which the text is founded, we cannot determine its soundness. Upon principle, it would seem that if two or more persons, as the case under consideration, purchase an automobile in partnership and employ a driver, whose duty it is to drive the vehicle for the joint and separate use of the partnership, that both owners would be liable for injuries resulting from the negligence of the driver, whether they were both using the automobile at the time or not. In fact, neither owner was occupying the car at the time of this accident. It had left the residence of Mrs. Richardson, and was on its way to the office of Mr. Goodman for the purpose of conveying him to the residence of Mrs. Richardson, and it is conceded that this was one of the purposes for which the automobile was owned and operated by them. While it is entirely true that the driver and the automobile were going for Mr. Goodman, it is none the less true that the driver was doing the thing for which he was jointly employed, and the machine was being used for one of the purposes for which it was jointly owned. The machine is partnership property, and the driver was in the service of the partnership. There is no separateness of time at which the driver may serve, or of interest in the automobile, so that it could be said that the machine belonged exclusively to one, or the driver was exclusively in his service. The case might be different if the understanding between Mrs. Richardson and Mr. Goodman had been that at certain hours of the day one should have the exclusive use of the machine and the driver. But the proof is that each one has an equal right to the use of the machine and the services of the driver, with the slight exception stated heretofore.

Under the partnership arrangement. Mrs. Richardson could have directed the driver, when leaving for Mr. Goodman, to speed the car and return to her within a given time; and this shows that, as joint employer, she had control of the servant at the time of the accident.

We have examined Lotz v. Hanlon, 217 Pa. 339, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 202, 118 Am. St. Rep. 922, 66 Atl. 525, 10 Ann. Cas. 731; Steffen v. McNaughton, 142 Wis. 49, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 382, 124 N. W. 1016, 19 Ann. Cas. 1227; Eichman v. Buchheit, 128 Wis. 385, 107 N. W. 325, 8 Ann. Cas. 435. These cases and the annotator's notes indicate that the weight of authority is that an automobile is not a dangerous instrument, so as to be classed with locomotive engines, dangerous animals, explosives, and the like, and also that the liability of the owner of an automobile for acts or omissions of his chauffeur in handling the machine depends upon whether, at the time of the act or omission complained of, the chauffeur was acting within the scope of his employment: that the relationship between owner and chauffeur is not different from that existing between master and servant generally, and is governed by the same general rules of law which govern the relationship of master and servant. The cases referred to do not disclose the existence of any statutory regulation of the subject in the states in which they were decided, and the notes to those cases indicate that the authorities cited are speaking with reference to the general subject of master and servant, and proceeding upon the idea that an automobile is not a dangerous instrument, and falls within the general rule stated. In this case it is not necessary for us to say what effect chapter 173, Acts of 1905, would have upon the general rule, or whether this enactment of the legislature was intended to place the automobile in the category of dangerous instruments.

We believe the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should be affirmed, for the reason stated, and that is, that the driver and the automobile were employed directly in the execution of the purposes of the joint ownership of the automobile and the joint employment of the driver. It was a partnership arrangement, and not a separate interest which each had in the automobile and in the service of the driver.

WYOMING SUPREME COURT.

ROBERT E. BROWN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
ETHEL BROWN.

(— Wyo. —, 140 Pac. 829.)

Divorce — appeal — remedy for failure to pay attorneys' fee.

The remedy for failure of one who, having appealed from a decree of divorce, fails to comply with an order requiring payment

Note. — Remedy pending appeal from decree in divorce suit, for failure to comply with order for payment of temporary alimony, suit money, or counsel fees.

Upon the general question of contempt proceedings to compel payment of alimony, see the extended note to Staples v. Staples, 24 L.R.A. 433.

And as to power in general to punish disobedience to orders in case by striking pleadings, including the right of the court to so punish noncompliance with orders for suit money and alimony, see Trough v. Trough, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1185, and the note appended thereto.

As to failure to pay alimony or allowance for support granted by decree of divorce as a criminal offense, see note in 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1065. And as to imprisonment for failure to pay alimony as violative of the constitutional provision against imprisonment for debt, see note to Ex parte Davis, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1140.

It cannot be said that there is a well-settled rule as to what constitutes the proper remedy for failure to comply with an order for payment of temporary alimony, suit money, or counsel fees where an appeal has been taken in the case. The present status of the authority seems to be that where the order for the payment issued from the appellate court, it will dismiss the appeal if the refusal to pay is persisted in; and that there is a conflict when such order issued from the trial court, some of the courts holding that in such case the appeal will be dismissed, and others laying down the rule that the remedy is in the trial court and as for a contempt. No case has been found, however, which expressly of his wife's attorneys' fee, is not a proceeding to punish for contempt, but a dismissal of the appeal.

(May 15, 1914.)

ORDER to show cause why plaintiff in error should not be punished for contempt for failure to comply with an order requiring him to pay the amount of attorneys' fees allowed for preparation of a brief and representing defendant in error in the Supreme Court. Order authorizing motion to dismiss the proceedings if order for fees is uncomplied with.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Camplin & O'Marr for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Enterline & La Fleche for defendant in error.

Scott, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was formerly before this court on an application by the defendant in error for an allowance of attorneys' fees for preparing her brief and representing her in this refers to any possible distinction between cases where the order which has not been complied with emanated from the trial court and those cases where the order was issued by the appellate court. Of course, where the latter is the case, the trial court would have no possible jurisdiction, and the question would be, as in Brown v. Brown, whether dismissal of the appeal or contempt proceedings afforded the proper remedy. Where the order issued from the trial court, the rule seems to be that if the remedy is in that court, it is a proceeding as for contempt, whereas if the remedy is in the appellate court, it is by dismissal of the appeal or suspension of the decree pending compliance with the order. And whether the remedy is in the trial or in the appellate court depends in a great measure upon local statutes and procedure.

Brown v. Brown apparently is the only case which has discussed the question as to the proper remedy in case of failure to comply with an order of the appellate court for the payment of attorneys' fees, but its conclusion that the remedy is by dismissal of the appeal seems consonant with reason and principle.

As before stated, some of the courts lay down the rule that the proper remedy for failure of an appellant to comply with an order of the trial court for the payment of counsel fees, etc., is by dismissal of the appeal or suspension of final judgment. This was the rule adopted in White v. White, 148 App. Div. 883, 132 N. Y. Supp. 1043, wherein it was held that where the defendant in a divorce suit, by his insistent refusal to obey the orders of the court as to payment of alimony, counsel fees, and the expenses of the plaintiff in opposing his appeal from a divorce decree, has rendered court. 135 Pac. 801. Upon consideration we allowed attorneys' fees in the sum of $250 for that purpose. The case is now here upon a showing by affidavits that plaintiff in error has failed to comply with such order, and an application for an order citing him before this court to show cause, if any there be, why he should not be punished as for contempt in failing to comply with such order. We think it unnecessary to review the affidavits in support and the counter affidavits in opposition submitted upon the hearing of this application, other than to say that it sufficiently appears therefrom that the order has not been complied with, and : o good reason is shown for the failure of plaintiff in that respect. We think the allowance for attorneys' fees was reasonable in amount, and it will be observed that the plaintiff in error is the one who is in default. The defendant in error seeks no affirmative relief in the proceeding in error in this court as to the judgment. Upon the showing when the allowance was made and upon the hearing here, she was and is without means to pay a reasonable attorneys' fee for the services of her attorneys in preparing and filing a brief and appearing in this court on her behalf to properly defend such judgment. No brief has been filed in her behalf in this court, while plaintiff's brief has been on file for a year.

While the method of enforcing its orders by citation and punishment as for contempt may, in a proper case, be resorted to in this court, yet upon the facts here there is, in our judgment, a more effective remedy. The plaintiff in error is guilty, if at all, of a civil, but not a criminal, contempt. He has failed without excuse to comply with the order of this court, and by his petition in error is seeking affirmative relief at the hands of this court. It is elementary that such conduct is not favored. One cannot refuse to obey the lawful order of a court and expect relief at the hands of the court. This rule is a salutary one, and has been often applied by the courts. Casteel v. Casteel, 38 Ark. 477; Peel v. Peel, 50 Iowa, 521; McClung v. McClung, 40 Mich. 493; Waters v. Waters, 49 Mo. 385; Zimmerman v. Zimmerman, 7 Mont. 114, 14 Pac. 665; Walker v. Walker, 82 N. Y. 260; Williams v. Williams, 6 S. D. 284, 61 N. W. 38. The motion for a citation to issue as prayed is refused, but this court is of the opinion that if the order remains uncomplied with on June 1st next, to wit, June 1, 1914, then a showing to that effect with support a motion to dismiss the proceedings in error.

Potter and Beard, JJ., concur.

it impossible for the plaintiff to oppose his appeal, such appeal would be dismissed, the court saying: "Certainly the court cannot allow a party to an action to treat the orders of the court with contumely and contempt, and at the same time allow him to prosecute an appeal, especially where it appears that a compliance with the order is essential to the respondent to sustain the judgment and orders appealed from." So, in Williams v. Williams, 6 S. D. 284, 61 N. W. 38, it was held that a husband in an action for divorce who neglects or refuses to pay the wife temporary alimony and counsel fees pursuant to order of the trial court is not in a position to entitle him to a reversal on modification of a decree for permanent alimony, on an appeal therefrom to the supreme court, so long as such order is unappealed from and operative. And in State ex rel. Dawson v. St. Louis Ct. of Appeals, 99 Mo. 216, 12 S. W. 661, where the decree in the trial court was for defendant, and an appeal was taken, it was held that the appellate court could render a decree of reversal conditioned on payment by the appellant of arrears of temporary alimony as allowed by the trial court, or, in other words, that the court could suspend entry of a decree in his favor until he had paid the alimony. And see Wright v. Wright, 24 Mich. 180, wherein an allowance of alimony was ordered to be paid within a certain length of time, or the appeal would be dismissed.

But other courts have, on the other hand, held that failure of the appellant to comply with the order of the trial court is not sufficient to warrant a dismissal of the appeal, especially where there is a remedy in the trial court. Thus, in Eastes v. Eastes, 79 Ind. 363, it was expressly held that failure of the defendant in a suit for divorce to comply with an order of the trial court made after entry of decree in plaintiff's favor, requiring him to pay a sum into court to enable the plaintiff to prosecute her case before the supreme court, should it be appealed thereto by him, afforded no sufficient ground for the dismissal of such an appeal, the court saying: "Conceding, without deciding, that it is sufficiently shown that the appellant is prosecuting this appeal in contempt of the order of the circuit court, we are of the opinion that this action of the appellant would not authorize us to dismiss his appeal. The circuit court has full power by law to enforce its orders, and to punish, if necessary, a wilful disobedience thereof. But we know of no law which would authorize this court to dismiss the appeal in this case, for the reason that the appellant had failed, for some cause not shown, to comply with the order of the court below." And in Dwelly v. Dwelly, 46 Me. 377, where a libel for divorce was taken to the supreme judicial court on exceptions, and a motion was filed by the libellant to dismiss the exceptions because the libellee had not com-tions, to pay the libellant a specified sum to enable her to prosecute her exceptions. it was again held that the appellate court would not entertain the motion. The court said: "We are not satisfied that this court, sitting in banc, has any jurisdiction over the question when presented upon motion, as in the case before us. The proper place of proceeding, in a case like this, seems to be before the judge at nisi prius, where the party complaining of the neglect may proceed against the libellee as for contempt in disregarding the decree of the court, in which proceeding the libellee may appear, upon proper notice, and purge himself of the contempt, by showing his pecuniary inability to comply with the order, or any other facts which may properly produce a like effect; or, perhaps, an execution might issue for the sum allowed. We are of opinion that we cannot, in this summary way, overrule the exceptions of the libellee." The only possible ground upon which this case and the preceding case of Eastes v. Fastes can be distinguished from Brown v. Brown is that here the order for appeal money was made in the lower court, which, it was said, had power to punish disobedience of the order, whereas in the Brown Case the order for appeal money was made by the appellate court itself. A case closely analogous to and which supports Eastes v. Eastes and Dwelly v. Dwelly, supra, is Vosburg v. Vosburg, 131 Cal. 628, 63 Pac. 1009, wherein it was held that the fact that the defendant in a suit for divorce, pending his appeal from an adverse decree, kept a child of the marriage out of the state in violation of the decree, and that he also stayed outside the jurisdiction of the court for the purpose of preventing the execution of the decree with respect to the custody of such child, unless the decree on appeal was favorable to him,—did not afford sufficient ground on which to base a motion to dismiss his appeal. The court said: "The case presented does not warrant a dismissal of the appeals. It certainly does not present one of the grounds for dismissing an appeal prescribed either in the Code or the rules of this court, and it seems to be admitted that there is no precedent for a dismissal for the reasons here relied on. It is contended that there should be applied to this motion the principle upon which certain appeals in criminal cases have been dismissed because the appellant had broken jail and disappeared, but this contention cannot be maintained. . . . The status of appellant and of the boy Roydon is exactly the same as it was at the rendition of the judgment and order from which he appeals. Whatever part of the judgment was enforceable at the time it was rendered, and at the time the appeals were taken, would in like manner be enforceable upon its affirmance. In addition to the specific grounds for dismissing ap-ing between the parties, and no actual controversy pending; but no such condition appears in the case at bar. And, moreover, we cannot see any other general ground upon which this motion to dismiss can be placed."

And in State ex rel. Bordeaux v. District Ct. 31 Mont. 511, 79 Pac. 13, it was held that the only remedy for failure to comply with an order of the trial court to pay alimony, pending appeal, is in the trial court by contempt proceedings, it being said that the appellate courts have no authority to enforce the orders of lower courts in such cases.

Other remedies have been sought in the trial court, but without success. Thus, it has been held that where a right of appeal is absolute, the trial court cannot decree that a transcript for purposes of appeal be withheld until the payment of temporary alimony and a sum to enable the successful party to defend any writ of error or appeal. Martin v. Martin, 6 Blackf. 321. So, it has been held that the trial court cannot justify a refusal to sign a certificate of evidence for use on appeal upon the ground that one seeking the same is in contempt of court by reason of his failure to pay alimony and counsel fees as decreed. People ex rel. Crymble v. Horton, 46 Ill. App. 434. And in such case mandamus will issue to compel the trial judge to issue the certificate of evidence. Ibid.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

JETTON LUMBER COMPANY et al.,
Appts.,
v.

MRS. MINNIE HALL, by Next Friend.

(— Fla. —, 64 So. 440.)

Exemptions — construction.

1. Organic and statutory provisions relating to the homestead and personal prop-

Headnotes by SHACKLEFORD, Ch. J.

Note. — Wife as head of family within homestead or exemption statute.

This note supplements subdivision II. c, of the note appended to Sheehy v. Scott, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 365, dealing with the general question of what constitutes a "family" under the homestead and exemption law.

The present note does not deal with the rights of married women generally to homestead or other exemptions, but is concerned solely with the question whether she can assert any such rights under statutes in which exemptions are granted in favor of his widow; and as the will avers that he is residing in Massachusetts, consequently he is not deceased.

Betz v. Brenner, 106 Mich. 87, 63 N. W. 970.

Mr. V. H. Nysewander, for appellee:

Exemption laws are to be liberally construed in favor of their beneficial purposes.

McDougall v. Meginniss, 21 Fla. 362; Carter v. Carter, 20 Fla. 562, 51 Am. Rep. 618; Milton v. Milton, 63 Fla. 533, 58 So. 718; Green v. Simon, 17 Ind. App. 360, 46 N. E. 693.

The complainant is the head of a family, residing in this state.

State ex rel. Scoville v. Wilson, 31 Neb. 462, 48 N. W. 147; Hamilton v. Fleming, 26 Neb. 240, 41 N. W. 1002; Nash v. Norment, 5 Mo. App. 545; Kenley v. Hudelson, 99 Ill. 493, 39 Am. Rep. 31; Linander v. Longstaff, 7 S. D. 157, 63 N. W. 775.

Personal property, exempt under the Constitution from forced sale for debts, is not susceptible of fraudulent alienation, so far as the creditors are concerned.

Ballard v. Eckman, 20 Fla. 661; Claffin v. Ambrose, 37 Fla. 78, 19 So. 628.

Mr. C. W. Stevens also for appellee.

Shackleford, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 25th day of September, 1913, the appellee filed her bill in chancery against the appellants, which, omitting the formal parts, reads as follows:

"Mrs. Minnie Hall, by her next friend, which the premises were occupied by the wife and husband, together with her children by a prior marriage, the court held that the husband was presumptively the head of the family, and that the wife must overcome such presumption before she can assert exemptions.

But the presumption as to the husband's headship of the family was held rebuttable in Temple v. Freed, 21 Ill. App. 238, in which it was held that the wife was the head of the family, where the husband had for a time been confined as an insane person, though he was living with the family when the homestead right was asserted, and where the wife had taken exclusive charge of the farm on which they lived, she and the children doing the manual labor, and she buying the provisions and selling the produce.

Indeed it has been held that a selection of the exemption to heads of families may be made by the wife where the husband is adjudged insane and confined in a state hospital, although most of the property belongs to him. Ecker v. Lindskog, 12 S. D. 428, 48 L.R.A. 155, 81 N. W. 905.

On the other hand, the court, in Union County Invest. Co. v. Messix, 152 Iowa, 412, 132 N. W. 823, remarked in passing that the husband's insanity did not give the wife title to the property, nor confer upon her headship of the family.

Where the husband absconds and the wife remains on the homestead with the family, she as head of the family may claim the exemption. State ex rel. Scoville v. Wilson, 31 Neb. 462, 48 N. W. 147. Note in this connection JETTON LUMBER Co. v. HALL.

So, a business woman who goes to another state and marries a resident thereof, and immediately returns and resumes her business, she and her sister living together, is the head of the family within the exemption laws, her husband never having lived with her or become a resident of the state. Fish v. Street, 27 Kan. 270.

It is recognized in Farmers' & M. Bank v. Hoffman, 5 Neb. (Unof.) 9, 96 N. W. 1044, that where a husband has absconded from the state, and the support of the family has devolved upon the wife, and neither she nor the husband is owner of real estate subject to the homestead exemption, she as head of the family is entitled in lieu thereof to goods to the value of $500.

In Bank of Liberal v. Redlinger, 95 Mo. App. 279, 68 S. W. 1073, the court seemed to regard the wife as head of the family, in holding that a woman conducting a business in her own name and with her own funds, her husband having abandoned her and gone to another state, was entitled to exemptions.

Attention is also directed to Re Youngstorm, 82 C. C. A. 232, 153 Fed. 98, holding that the wife of an absconding debtor is entitled to claim the exemption under a statute providing that when the head of the family shall desert, "the family" shall be entitled to exemption. The court said that although the family had consisted only of the husband and wife, she was nevertheless entitled to the same as the remaining portion of the family.

It is held in Illinois that where the homesteader's wife obtains a divorce from him, she being the meritorious cause thereof, and the custody of the children is committed to her, she is to be regarded as a widow and the head of the family, in keeping with the spirit of that provision of the homestead law, which declares that upon the husband's death the homestead continues until the youngest child is twenty-one, and until the widow's death. Vanzant v. Vanzant, 23 Ill. 536, followed in Bonnell v. Smith, 53 Ill. 375.

Thus, it is seen that there is a tendency upon the part of the courts to construe the exemption statute liberally to the end that a wife who has assumed, or has had thrust upon her, the husband's burden, shall be entitled to the immunities thereby granted. But in thus meting out a liberal measure of justice the court should not lose sight of another phase of the situation which is especially well pointed out in Ness v. Jones, 10 N. D. 587, 88 Am. St. Rep. 755, 88 N. W. 706, in which the court stated that since, when the wife is held to be the head of the family, the husband loses his position as such, a tendency to extend the immunities of the exemption statute to the wife should be cautiously indulged; and that the mere bankruptcy of the husband ought not to deprive him of the headship of the family. For, it is said, if a debtor ever needs the benefits of the exemption laws it is when he is in greatest financial distress; and when he has nothing save his hands with which to support his family, he should at least be permitted to hope that his first acquisitions by such means would not be seized by creditors, as they would be if he had relinquished the headship of the family to his wife. Thus declaring itself, the court in the Ness Case held that therefore the wife was not to be regarded as head of the family and entitled to exemption in produce of her own farm conducted by herself, merely because the husband, who was an able-bodied man, had become bankrupt in an independent business of his own, and, though living with the family, did not aid her in running the farm and supplying the household, save by advice and a slight amount of labor.

John S. Horter, of the county of Hillsborough and state of Florida, brings this, her bill of complaint, against the Jetton Lumber Company, a corporation, with its principal place of business in the city of Tampa, county of Hillsborough and state of Florida, and W. C. Spencer, sheriff of Hillsborough county, state of Florida.

"The complainant would show unto your Honor that on the 23d day of September, A. D. 1913, one of the above defendants, the Jetton Lumber Company, filed suit against the complainant's husband, Harry Hall. That the said suit was instituted in the county court, by attachment of two automobiles, described as follows: One Overland car, city number, No. 1250, and one Buick car. That the said automobiles are still held by W. C. Spencer, one of the above defendants, under the said attachment levies.

The question is not to be determined by whether he or she contributes the greater sum to the support of the family. Farwell v. Martin, 65 Ill. App. 55.

Before she can be regarded as head of the family, either the wife must be under a legal or moral obligation to support the family, or else the members of the family must be actually dependent upon, and actually supported by, her. Briggs v. Bell, 8 N. J. L. J. 251.

A wife who is an owner of a business cannot be regarded as head of the family where the husband is not incapacitated, and manages her business as her agent. Blount v. Medbery, 10 S. D. 562, 94 N. W. 428.

He does not relinquish his character as head of the family by the fact that he is merely assistant in a business purchased with the wife's money, and principally conducted by her, where he is in a normal condition of health, owns the family residence, and other property a part of which he has devoted to the family's support, and devotes all his energy and time to the wife's business, in which he renders valuable services. Farwell v. Martin, 65 Ill. App. 55, distinguishing Temple v. Freed, 21 Ill. App. 238, supra.

"The complainant would further show unto your Honor that the said Harry Hall deserted the complainant on the 24th day of August, A. D. 1913, and that since the said date the complainant has been unaware of the whereabouts of her said husband, though she has since been informed that he is residing within the state of Massachusetts. That the said Harry Hall left against the will of this complainant, and, as your complainant believes, without any intention of returning.

"The complainant would further represent unto your Honor that she is thirty-five years of age, has two children by her said husband, to wit, George, age eleven, and Jack, age eight years. That the said children are dependent solely upon this complainant for their support and maintenance, and that this complainant, together with her said children, reside in the city of Tampa.

Nor can she be regarded as head of the family where the husband is an able-bodied man, twenty-four years old, in possession of all his faculties, and farms her land, receiving one half the crops and sharing the losses; and the fact that he does what he pleases with his share, or that she pays her own expenses when she travels, or that she owns the property and hires him to look after it, or all combined, do not destroy his status as head of the family. Arnold v. Coleman, 88 Ill. App. 608.

And a woman whose husband is in fact the head of the family is not a "householder" within the meaning of the Rhode Island exemption statute. Re Jamieson, 6 Am. Bankr. Rep. 601.

An abandoned wife who lives upon a farm with her mature sons, one of whom is married and operates the same, cannot be held to be head of the family. Somers v. Somers, 27 S. D. 500, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1024, 131 N. W. 1001.

So, a mother living with her daughter and the latter's husband is not the head of the family within the exemption act, where the daughter and husband are not dependent upon the mother, and are not even partially supported by her. Briggs v. Bell, supra.

Of course, the present question presents no difficulty in jurisdictions like Utah, where the statute expressly states that the head of the family may be either the husband or the wife. That such is the situation in Utah is shown by the case of Volker-Scowcroft Lumber Co. v. Vance, 32 Utah, 74, 126 Am. St. Rep. 828, 88 Pac. 896.

"The complainant would further show that the automobiles above described are in danger of being disposed of at forced sale, in pursuance of the said attachment suit, as aforesaid, by said defendants.

"That the said automobiles afford the complainant her only means of making a livelihood and a subsistence for herself and her two children (neither the complainant nor her said children having received any support whatsoever from her said husband since his desertion, as aforesaid, nor have they any reason to expect his future aid).

"The complainant further represents that against the said automobiles there are existing, respectively, encumbrances in the sums of $75 and $375, leaving an equity in your complainant of not more than $550. That this equity constitutes the whole of both the complainant's and her said husband's property, and is a true and complete inventory of the whole of their said property.

"That this complainant claims the said automobiles as exempt from said seizure and forced sale in pursuance thereof, under the Constitution of the state of Florida.

"The premises considered, and inasmuch as the complainant is without remedy save in a court of equity, where such matters are properly cognizable, and to the end that the defendants may be required to answer this, the complainant's bill of complaint, but not under oath, answer under oath being hereby expressly waived. And that the complainant's right to exempt the said property be decreed, and that the same be set apart to the complainant as exempt from seizure and sale, under said attachment writs, and the defendants be restrained from selling or disposing of said property.

"And that the complainant may have such other and further relief in the premises as equity may require and to your Honor shall seem meet:

"May it please your Honor to grant unto the complainant the state's most gracious writ of subpoena, issued out of and under the seal of this court, directed to the said Jetton Lumber Company and W. C. Spencer, commanding them to be and appear before this honorable court on a day certain therein to be named, and under a penalty certain therein to be stipulated, and to stand to and abide by such orders and decrees as may be made in this cause.

"The complainant prays the court to grant her a writ of injunction, enjoining and restraining the said Jetton Lumber Company and W. C. Spencer, the defendants, their attorneys, agents, and representatives from selling or disposing of the said automobiles until the further order of this court.

"And the complainant will ever pray," etc.

To this bill the defendants interposed the following demurrer:

"These defendants, by protestation, not confessing or acknowledging either of the matters or things in the bill of complaint contained to be true, say that said bill is bad in substance and insufficient in law, wherefore the said defendants demur to said bill, and for substantial matters of law to be argued in support of said demurrer, and assign the following, to wit:

"First. The bill does not state a cause of action cognizable in equity.

"Second. The bill shows on its face that it is instituted by a married woman without the joinder of her husband or next friend.

"Third. The bill shows on its face that the property attached is not the property of the complainant, but is the property of complainant's husband, who is a nonresident of the state of Florida.

"Fourth. The bill shows on its face that the complainant's said husband has permanently left the state of Florida without the intention of returning thereto, therefore he would not be entitled to exempt the said property, for which reason the law granting exemptions to the head of a family residing in the state does not give her the right to such exemption.

"Fifth. The bill does not show that the complainant is the widow or heir of the owner of the property in question, so as to cause the right of exemption which might have been claimed by the owner thereof, if the head of the family residing in the state of Florida, to inure to her benefit under the provisions of § 2, article 10, of the Constitution of Florida."

The following order was made at the hearing of the demurrer:

"Demurrer sustained as to second ground, and, complainant asking leave to amend by inserting a next friend in this said bill, and said amendment having been allowed and made instantly, it is ordered then after consideration that the demurrer be overruled, and twenty days given defendants to file further pleadings.

"Done, ordered, and decreed this the 13th day of October, A. D. 1913."

From this interlocutory order the defendants have entered their appeal. It will be observed that we have copied the bill as amended.

The appellee's claim to have the attached property set aside to her as exempt is based on § 1 of article 10 of our state Constitution, which reads as follows:

"A homestead to the extent of one hundred and sixty acres of land, or the half of warranto may at common law be filed by the attorney general in the name of the state, to test the claim to office of an officer of a manufacturing corporation organized for private gain, either under special charter or under general incorporation laws, since the corporation is exercising a public franchise, and the title to its offices is a matter of public concern.

Pleading — quo warranto — plea concluding with absque hoc — new matter in replication.

3. In a common-law proceeding by information in the nature of quo warranto, to oust an incumbent from office in a private corporation, in which his usurpation is charged and demand is made for justification of his claim to office, accused cannot, by concluding with an absque hoc a plea denying usurpation and setting up title, preclude the state from replying new matter in avoidance of the title set up, and compel it to join issue on the plea.

Corporation — voting power of preferred stock.

4. Statutory and charter authority to deprive holders of preferred stock of the right to vote in the election of officers and directors of a corporation is invalid where the state Constitution provides that "each shareholder shall be entitled to one vote for each share of stock he may hold."

peler, 11 U. C. Q. B. 222 (director of railroad); Ex parte Gilbert, 15 N. B. 29 (president of mining company).

II. American rule.

a. In general.

The Massachusetts courts seem to be the only American courts which follow the English rule. They have held that an information in the nature of a quo warranto is not the proper remedy to try the title to offices in a private corporation. (Goddard v. Smithett, 3 Gray, 116 (vestrymen in religious society); Haupt v. Rogers, 170 Mass. 71, 48 N. E. 1080 (officers of elevated railroad).)

All other cases upon the point agree with BROOKS v. STATE in holding that an action of quo warranto, or in the nature of quo warranto, is the proper remedy to test the right to an office in a private corporation. State ex rel. Richards v. Brooks, — Del. —, 4 Atl. 37 (director); State ex rel. Dunlap v. Stewart, 6 Houst. (Del.) 339 (vestrymen of religious society); Davidson v. State, 20 Fla. 784 (president of benevolent association); State ex rel. Hankins v. Newell, 75 N. J. L. 26, 66 Atl. 929 (trustee of cemetery association); State ex rel. Schwartz v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 6 Ohio C. C. 412, 3 Ohio C. D. 516 (directors of railroad company); Com. ex rel. Clements v. Arrison, 15 Serg. & R. 127, 16 Am. Dec. 531 (trustees of religious society); Gunton v. Ingle, 4 Cranch, C. C. 438, Fed. Cas. No. 5,870 (president and directors of packet company).

This is upon the theory that corporations chartered by the state, or organized under the general statutes of the state, are public franchises, and that the usurpation of a corporate office, therefore, amounts to the usurpation of a privilege granted by the state.

Thus, the court in Com. ex rel. Clements v. Arrison, 15 Serg. & R. 127, 16 Am. Dec. 531, supra, says: "I strongly incline to the opinion that in all cases where a charter exists and a question arises concerning the exercise of an office claimed under that charter, the court may, in its discretion, grant leave to file an information; because, in all such cases, although it cannot be strictly said that any prerogative or franchise of the commonwealth has been usurped, yet, what is much the same thing, the privilege granted by the commonwealth has been abused. The party against whom the information is prayed has no claim but from the grant of the commonwealth, and an unfounded claim is a usurpation, under pretense of a charter, of a right never granted."

And it is similarly stated in Davidson v. State, 20 Fla. 784, supra, that "an intrusion into an office of a merely private corporation may, in this country, be corrected by information with the same propriety as in cases of public or municipal corporations, since in both cases there is an unfounded claim to the exercise of a corporate franchise, amounting to a usurpation of the privilege granted by the state."

So, in State v. Ashley, 1 Ark. 513, it is held that the office of public director of the Principal Bank of the Real Estate Bank of the State or Arkansas is a public franchise, and not a private right. The following from the opinion, however, shows that this institution was not a strictly private corporation: "The state has a voice in all the transactions of the bank, by the appointment of two members in the board of directors of the Principal Bank and each of the branches, and four directors in the central board. The capital of the bank is raised upon her faith and credit, pledged in the form of bonds."

Attempts have often been made to attack collaterally, or in some action other than quo warranto or in the nature of quo warranto, the right to an office in a private corporation. In such instances courts have frequently felt called upon to state that proceedings of quo warranto or in the nature of quo warranto are the proper remedies. Hayes v. Burns, 25 App. D. C. 242, 4 Ann. Cas. 704 (general officers of lodge); Hussey v. Gallagher, 61 Ga. 86 (president of religious temperance society); McCarthy v. McKinney, 137 Ga. 292, 73 S. E. 394 (secretary of grand lodge); Lawson v. Kolbenson, 61 Ill. 405 (trustees of religious corpora-

Woolley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On or about the 28th day of October. A.

warranto directed to the said George H. Brooks and John W. H. Brooks, commanding them and each of them that they appear in the said court on some day to be named by the said court, to show by what warrant or authority they claim to have and enjoy the franchises, offices, privileges, and liberties aforesaid.

Robert H. Richards,
Attorney General of the State of Delaware.

After refusal by the court to allow subsequent motions to quash the information and discharge the rule for reasons that appear in subsequent pleadings, the defendant below filed his plea to the information. By his plea he admits the incorporation of the Geo. Brooks & Son Company, and that prior to the stockholders' meeting of May 11, 1908, Marshall A. Brooks, Morrell and Pyle were its lawfully elected and qualified directors, to remain such until their successors were lawfully elected and qualified. For title to his office as director, he shows that at the election for directors on the date last named, all of the stockholders of the company were present, either in person or by proxy, that the stock vote was equal to the stock issued, that he received 2,000 of the 3,000 votes cast, that 1,000 votes represented the votes cast upon the 1,000 shares of preferred stock and that the other 1,000 votes were cast upon 1,000 shares of the common stock, and that the votes so cast for him upon the shares of preferred stock were legally cast and counted under and by force of the provision of the Constitution of the state of Delaware of 1897, as then existing (art. 9, § 6), which was that "in all elections for directors or managers of stock corporations each stockholder shall be entitled to one vote for each share of stock he may hold."

The plea concludes with a denial of the usurpation of the office charged in the information, by employing the formal language of a special traverse: "Without this, that the said George H. Brooks during all the time since the 11th day of May, A. D. 1908, the said franchises, offices, privileges, and liberties of director of the said corporation has usurped and still does usurp in the manner and form as in the said information is alleged, and this the said George H. Brooks is ready to verify."

To that part of the defendant's plea in which he shows the title by which he claims and holds the office he is charged to have usurped the attorney general replied by special replication, setting up new matter in avoidance of that upon which the defendant based his title. By this new matter he challenges the right of holders of the preferred stock to vote for directors, and quotes 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

from the charter and by-laws of the corporation the provisions respecting the voting power of stock. The provision of this charter is that "the holders of said preferred stock shall not be entitled, by reason of their holdings thereof, to any voice or vote in the management of the affairs of the corporation. The voting power shall be confined to the holders of the common or general stock." And it is further shown that the by-laws provide that: "The one hundred thousand of preferred stock shall have no vote in the transaction of any business of the company, being a first lien on all of the property, and in case of liquidation shall be redeemed at par, shall draw a regular yearly dividend of 6 per cent, which may be paid quarterly, and which shall be cumulative.

"The two hundred thousand common stock shall have and possess all voting power, shall meet and elect board of directors, once a year, order and amend by-laws, and, in fact, exercise all the power of stockholders, as hereinafter provided."

It is therefore replied that the 1,000 votes received by the defendant below, and cast for him by the holders of that quantity of preferred stock, were illegal, that without the votes on the preferred stock, each person voted for at the election mentioned received the same number of votes, that the vote was therefore a tie, and as a consequence no one was elected, and that the defendant and his brother have usurped the offices to which Morrell and Pyle are entitled as holding-over directors. To this replication the defendant below demurred specially, showing for causes of demurrer matters that appear in his assignment of errors. The demurrer was overruled, and upon election, final judgment was entered.

This cause comes before this court on a writ of error, in support of which the plaintiff in error suggests error in the judgment and proceedings below by an assignment of errors containing ten specifications, which have been grouped and classified so that the questions presented by them may be considered under the following titles:

(1) Exemption of the defendant below from service of process.

(2) Whether the remedy employed extends to the usurpation of an office in a private corporation.

(3) Whether the proceeding is properly entitled in the name of the state of Delaware upon the relation of the attorney general.

(4) Whether a replication may contain new matter in reply to a plea concluding with the absque hoc.

(5) Whether the proceeding is futile and nugatory.

an assistance to the court of a nature that would make his presence necessary within the rule. He was present at an argument in which he could have given no testimony. He was there in the capacity of any agent of one of the litigating parties, and in this he was in no different position and is entitled to no further immunity than would have been a director of a corporation, the secretary of an unincorporated association, or the business manager of a partnership, when present under like circumstances. Any other rule would enable a party, and not the court, to extend the privilege and determine the necessity of a person's presence, and would extend the class of privileged persons from those over whom the court has control to all those who might be deemed by a party to be necessary to him or to his counsel in the preparation and presentation of a case. We are therefore of opinion that the service of the rule was valid, and that the court below committed no error in refusing to vacate it.

2. The Geo. Brooks & Son Company, being a private corporation in the sense that its charter powers relate to a manufacturing business for the personal gain of its stockholders, and not to matters in which the public have a beneficial interest, and its officers being private officers in the sense that they have no public services to perform, the question is raised whether the remedy of an information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto will extend to the usurpation of an office in a corporation of such a private nature.

Whatever may have been the origin and history of the writ of quo warranto and of the succeeding remedy, an information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto, it is certain that the latter was a part of that vast mass of remedies for wrongs which was brought over by the early English settlers, and which by statutory and constitutional enactments, beginning in 1736 (Laws of Del. vol. 1, pp. 121, 122) and concluding only with the existing Constitution, was, by the general adoption of the powers of the King's Bench, made a part of our civil judicature, here to remain, ready to be invoked for the first time in the case of State ex rel. Dunlap v. Stewart in 1881 (6 Houst. (Del.) 359), and to be subjected to judicial construction for the first time by an appellate court of this state in the case now under consideration.

A writ of quo warranto was in the nature of a writ of right for the King, against him who claimed or usurped any office, frantiquity. Nor is there any historical certainty of the origin of the remedy by information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto, which succeeded and later superseded the original remedy, nor is its history important in the present consideration, in view of the fact that it is known that the remedy by information was in use contemporaneously with the remedy of the writ of quo warranto as a common-law remedy long before the statute of 9 Anne, chap. 20 (1710), and that that statute was not the origin of the proceeding by information, for by its 4th section there is an express recognition of its pre-existence. It is further known that the statute of Anne was limited in its territorial scope, and conferred upon the courts jurisdiction to employ the remedy by information only with respect to those offices and franchises of a public and political character originally derived from the King, that were particularly enumerated in its preamble. This statute was never in force in this or any other American colony (State ex rel. Dunlap v. Stewart, supra), therefore the remedy by information, which was adopted in Delaware by reference to that of the common law, was the common-law remedy by information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto, and not the statutory remedy.

While differing in origin, form, and procedure from the writ of quo warranto, the common-law remedy by information, like the ancient writ, was the proceeding by which to try the right to an office or franchise, and it seems to have been long settled in England that the office with respect to which the remedy by information would lie must have been public in its nature. Darley v. Reg. 12 Clark & F. 520. Hence the contention of the plaintiff in error, that under the remedy we have adopted by the general terms of our statutes and Constitutions, we are bound to limit it to the same kind of public offices to which it was extended at common law, and that it will not lie "to try the title to an office in a corporation strictly commercial and private."

There is no doubt that the remedy by information may not be invoked for the redress of mere private grievances (Spelling, Extr. Rem. §§ 1830, 1831), and can only be invoked when wrong has been done to the public. Hence it follows, if a wrong complained of be the usurpation of an office, it must be the usurpation of an office public in character, otherwise the people cannot be called upon in their sovereignty to petition for its redress.

101), yet at common law and in this state the proceeding by information has never been considered an election contest between contesting candidates for an office, from which the sitting candidate may be ousted and into which the contesting candidate may be inducted, but it is a proceeding by which may be tried and determined the fact of usurpation of an office by an incumbent, the decree in which, if against the defendant, is one of ouster, regardless of the rights or title of the relator.

The proceeding by information being in theory, as at one time it was in fact, a prosecution, the information as a pleading is less of a narr. than a complaint or accusation against the defendant for an offense. 4 Bl. Com. 308. By the information the defendant is accused of usurping a particular office, and is called upon to show by what authority he holds it, and is not called upon to try his title against the title of the relator, as might be required of him in pleadings begun by narr.

The chief characteristics of an information are, first, the accusation of a usurpation; and, second, the demand that the defendant show the authority for his claim. Upon the first, being a statement of fact and presenting an issue, the defendant may take issue by plea; upon the second, being no statement of fact and presenting no issue, he cannot take issue by plea. Therefore when the defendant is called upon to plead to an information, he must admit or traverse the usurpation and disclaim or justify title, right, or authority in or to the thing he is charged to have usurped. If he admits usurpation or disclaims title, the prosecution is entitled to judgment; if he traverses the usurpation and justifies under his title, he may have his rights determined by trial. The plea of not guilty is not a sufficient answer, as it amounts simply to a traverse of the allegation of usurpation, and, like the plea of non usurpavit, fails to respond to the demand of the information that the defendant show his title, right, or authority. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Foote, 11 Wis. 14, 78 Am. Dec. 689; State ex rel. Law v. Saxon, 25 Fla. 342, 5 So. 801; Spelling, Extr. Rem. § 1861; Shortt, Extr. Rem. 178. The information can be sufficiently answered only by a plea that traverses the usurpation and justifies the title, right, or authority. Holden v. People, 90 Ill. 434; Catlett v. People, 151 Ill. 16, 37 N. E. 855; State v. Olcott, 6 N. H. 74, 75; Clark v. People, 15 Ill. 213; State v. Ashley, 1 Ark. 513. The plea of justification must show all the facts necessary to establish the lawful right of the defendant in the matter. It is the first pleading that indicates the facts upon which the controversy has arisen. It is an affirmative showing, the burden of maintaining which is upon the defendant, and should be concluded with a verification. People ex rel. Larke v. Crawford, 28 Mich. 88, 89; State ex rel. Harris v. McCann, 88 Mo. 385; State v. Ashley, 1 Ark. 513; Spelling, Extr. Rem. §§ 1857-1859.

To a plea traversing usurpation and justifying, there is no question that the relator may demur (State ex rel. White v. Hancock, 2 Penn. (Del.) 252, 265, 45 Atl. 851; State ex rel. Ward v. Churchman, 3 Penn. (Del.) 167, 174, 49 Atl. 381; People ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Kankakee River Improv. Co. 103 Ill. 491, 511), or join issue on the facts therein stated (People ex rel. Larke v. Crawford, 28 Mich. 88; State ex rel. Harris v. McCann, 88 Mo. 386; People v. Kankakee River Improv. Co. supra); the question in this case being whether the relator must join issue on the plea, or may reply by way of confession and avoidance.

By the subtlety of a special traverse which the defendant in form has pleaded, he contends that the matter of justification shown by his plea is but inducement to his traverse of usurpation, that instead of joining issue on the traverse, the relator has replied to the inducement by matter in avoidance thereof; or, in other words, the replication traverses a traverse, and therefore is bad.

There is a question, however, whether the plea in this case is a good special traverse, or is a special traverse at all within the rule of pleading, although in form it concludes with the technical words of absque hoc, as do the pleas in the cases of State ex rel. White v. Hancock, 2 Penn. (Del.) 252, 263, 265, 45 Atl. 851, and State ex rel. Ward v. Churchman, 3 Penn. (Del.) 167, 49 Atl. 381, and in the English forms given in Wentworth's Pleading, 33, 39, 147, 151, 158. Nevertheless, the plea by the absque hoc certainly could have been intended for use only in a case in which the narr. tenders an issue, or in respect to something that calls for a denial. While an information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto is dual in its function, the one issue tendered by it is that of usurpation, and the issue expressly excluded from it is that of the relator's title. If the relator's title were in issue, as the title of the plaintiff in an action to recover real property, as shown by Mr. Stephen's example (Stephen, Pl. 164-189), or as the title of the plaintiff in an action of replevin to recover or retain personal property, as recently shown in the case of Beatty v. Parsons, 2 Boyce (Del.) 134, 78 Atl. 302, we can readily see how the defendant, through the medium of a special traverse, could avoid the title of the plaintiff, by pleading title or property in himself or in another, "without this, that" the title or property is in the plaintiff as averred in the narr., but when the relator's title is not in issue it cannot be traversed. The title shown by the defendant in his plea is a justification for the act for which usurpation is charged, and is not a defense to a claim of title by the relator. Such a justification, therefore, cannot be the inducement of a special traverse, or otherwise accord with the purpose and theory of a special traverse, as laid down by Mr. Stephen. In the case of Reg. v. Blagdon, Gilb. L. & Eq. 145, cited in People v. Richardson, 4 Cow. 97, 100-119, the court refers to the plea in quo warranto as a "general traverse," by saying that "the replication should not take issue on the general traverse, without this, that he usurped, etc., but should be to the special matter, that the defendant may know how to apply his defense." The authorities certainly and abundantly hold that to this special matter, which is the matter of justification, the relator may reply by new matter in confession and avoidance, which is contrary to the rule of a special traverse, and thereafter the pleadings are as in actions. People v. Richardson, 4 Cow. 119; Reg. v. Blagdon, supra; People ex rel. Coon v. Plymouth Pl. Road Co. 31 Mich. 178; Atty. Gen. v. May, 97 Mich. 568, 56 N. W. 1035; People v. Bank of Niagara, 6 Cow. 196; Atty. Gen. ex rel. Woolverine Fish Co. v. A. Booth & Co. 143 Mich. 80, 106 N. W. 868; People ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Kankakee River Improv. Co. 103 Ill. 491, 511; People ex rel. Larke v. Crawford, 28 Mich. 88, 89; State ex rel. Harris v. McCann, 88 Mo. 386; Spelling, Extr. Rem. § 1846; Shortt, Extr. Rem. 180, 181.

Especially consideration has been given to the case of People v. Bank of Niagara, 6 Cow. 196 (1826), as that case and one cited by it show conclusively the pleading in quo warranto in force in Delaware. That case was upon an information in the nature of the writ of quo warranto, brought by the attorney general of the people of the state of New York, in which the information charged usurpation generally, and prayed that the president, directors, and company of the respondent bank be made to answer to the people by what warrant they claim to have, use, and enjoy certain liberties, privileges, and franchises. The defendants by their plea admitted incorporation, traversed the charge of usurpation, and justified. The attorney general replied specially, showing causes of forfeiture. The respondents contended that the information was bad because it did not state the causes of forfeiture, and that the replication was bad because its statement of causes of forfeiture amounted to a departure from the information. The case is interesting in that the form of the information filed in that case is identical, mutatis mutandis, with the form in the case under consideration, and is stated by Savage, Ch. J., to have been adopted from the form used in the celebrated case of the King against the City of London, 3 Hargrave, St. Tr. 545, 10 How. St. Tr. 1039, tried in the King's Bench in 1681-83, and which was there adjudged sufficient. The court held that an information in the nature of a quo warranto against a corporation for a forfeiture of its franchises may charge it generally with usurpation, and on the defendant setting forth the act of incorporation and justifying under it, the attorney general may reply the causes of forfeiture specially, and that such a replication is not a departure. The case cited by Chief Justice Savage as the authority for this ruling is that of Car. II., by his attorney general, against the lord mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, a report of which is to be found in 3 Hargrave's State Trials, 545, 10 How. St. Tr. 1039. This case is probably one of the most celebrated state trials in history, being instituted by that King against the corporation of London, upon the information of his attorney general, in the nature of a writ of quo warranto, charging usurpation without regal grant of the liberties and privileges of the city, and whereby the metropolis of the kingdom was deprived of its charter and magistrates until restored by King James in 1688. In that case, as in the Niagara Bank Case, the averment of usurpation contained in the information was most general, the defendants pleaded incorporation and showed the title by which they exercised the franchises of the city, and traversed the charge of usurpation. The attorney general by his replication did not take issue on the matter of justification, but showed causes of forfeiture, and the pleading thereafter proceeded as in civil causes.

It thus appears that the information in the case at bar is in the exact form of the information in the Niagara Bank Case, that the plea in that case, concluding with the traverse, "without this, that," is like the one filed in this case, that the attorney general in that case, as in this one, replied by new matter in avoidance, and that the rulings of the court below in this case upon question of procedure are supported by the authority of the Niagara Bank Case. But more important is the statement of Savage, Ch. J., that the Niagara Bank Case was decided on the authority of the case against the city of London, and we find that the form of information and manner of pleading in the case against the city of London are in exact and technical accord with the pleadings in the Niagara Bank Case and in the case at bar. And this should be so, for the case against the city of London was tried in 1681-83, or twenty-eight years before the statute of Anne (1710), and was a case tried by the common-law remedy by information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto. As we have held that was the remedy adopted in this state, it follows that we have adopted the practice and procedure that belong to it. We are therefore of the opinion that the court below committed no error in holding that the information and replication in their form are sufficient in law for the state of Delaware to maintain its action.

5. We hold that this proceeding is not futile and nugatory for reasons that previously appear in the consideration of other questions. Spelling, Extr. Rem. §§ 1786, 1788.

6. The court below, in holding the sufficiency of the form of the pleadings in this case, also held the matters therein contained to be sufficient in law for the state to maintain its action: and finding George H. Brooks guilty of usurping the office of director of the Geo. Brooks & Son Company, rendered against him a judgment of ouster. This raises the question to which all the other questions were preliminary, and embraces the construction of the provisions of our Constitution and statute relating to the voting power of stock.

At the time of the incorporation of Geo. Brooks & Son Company, it was provided, § 13 of the general corporation law (22 Del. Laws, chap. 167), that "every corporation shall have power to create two or more kinds of stock of such classes, with such designations, preferences, and voting powers, or restrictions or qualifications thereof, as shall be stated and expressed in the certificate of incorporation." Supplementary to this provision was another (§ 17) which directed that "unless otherwise provided in the charter, certificate, or by-laws of the corporation, each stockholder . . . shall at every election be entitled to one vote . . . for each share of the capital stock held by him. . . ." Pursuant to these provisions, the incorporators proceeded to incorporate their company otherwise, and by charter and by-laws deprived its preferred stock of any voting power, and vested the whole voting power in its common stock. The sections of the general corporation law above quoted, and under which the incorporators acted, are identical with the sections (18 and 36) of the general corporation law of New Jersey (P. L. 1896, p. 277), from which obviously they were taken. Wilmington City R. Co. v. Wilmington & B. S. R. Co. 8 Del. Ch. 408, 46 Atl. 12. The two laws are also similar in providing that "the certificate of incorporation may also contain any provision . . . for the regulation of the business: . . . Provided, such provisions are not contrary to the laws of this state" (22 Del. Laws, chap. 167, § 5, subdiv. 8, and P. L. N. J. 1896, p. 280, § 8). At the time of the enactment of the New Jersey law there was in that state no constitutional provision relating to the voting power of stock, but at the time of the enactment of the Delaware law, March 10, 1899 (21 Del. Laws, chap. 273), and of the incorporation of the Geo. Brooks & Son Company (1901), there was in this state a constitutional provision that directed that "in all elections for directors or managers of stock corporations, each shareholder shall be entitled to one vote for each share of stock he may hold." Const. 1897, art. 9, § 6. We are therefore called upon to construe the meaning of the constitutional provision, and to determine whether the provisions of the statute and of the charter granted under them are provisions "contrary to the law of this state," and thereby determine whether the preferred stock of Geo. Brooks & Son Company has or has not voting power.

It is important to state, and make clear, that the constitutional provision referred to, and with respect to which it is suggested that the subsequent laws and charter are not in harmony, was repealed in 1903 by Acts of the General Assembly (Laws of Del. vol. 22, chap. 1, pp. 3, 4, and chapter 254, p. 543), and is not the law of this state to-day. Therefore the remainder of this opinion, and the decision under it, relate only to the state of the law, constitutional and statutory, as it existed before the date of the repeal of § 6 of article 9 of the Constitution of 1897.

With respect to the constitutional provision in question, it is the contention of the defendant in error that "this section does not mean that the legislature could not provide for certain classes of stock having restricted voting powers or no voting powers at all. It means only that voting in corporations shall be according to the number of shares held by the stockholder having the right to vote, and not one vote for each stockholder, irrespective of his share holdings, as was the rule at common law." In other words, it is contended that the effect of the provision was simply to change the common-law rule of one vote for each shareholder, regardless of the number of shares held by him, to one vote for each share held by the shareholder, and that his right to a share vote was not derived from the constitutional provision, but was extended or limited by the charter of the corporation when created under a statute subsequently enacted, which allowed the incorporators to create several classes of stock, and to define and regulate the voting power of each class.

It is further contended that the constitutional provision at most confers upon stockholders a right to a share vote, which right is waived by them when they incorporate a company that by its charter takes from them, as the holders of one class, the right to vote.

The plaintiff in error contends that, the Constitution having expressly declared who shall be entitled to vote for directors, its provisions were imperative upon the corporation, constituting a part of the law of its being, and a corporation had no authority under statutes subsequently enacted, that provide otherwise, to limit the right as regulated by the Constitution.

A by-law that restricts or alters the voting power of stock of a corporation as established by the law of its charter is, of course, void. People ex rel. Israel v. Tibbets, 4 Cow. 358; People ex rel. Barker v. Kip, 4 Cow. 382, note.

A provision in a charter of a corporation, giving to its stock a voting power different from that contemplated by the statute under which it was created, is likewise void. Brewster v. Hartley, 37 Cal. 15, 24, 99 Am. Dec. 237; Audenried v. East Coast Mill Co. 68 N. J. Eq. 450, 59 Atl. 577, 584; Com. ex rel. Nickerson v. Conover, 10 Phila. 55; Taylor v. Griswold, 14 N. J. L. 222, 27 Am. Dec. 33; People ex rel. Peabody v. Chicago Gas Trust Co. 130 Ill. 268, 8 L.R.A. 497, 17 Am. St. Rep. 319, 22 N. E. 798; Eastern Pl. Road Co. v. Vaughan, 14 N. Y. 546, 551; Com. ex rel. Eilenberger v. Yetter, 190 Pa. 488, 495, 496, 43 Atl. 226.

A statute that authorizes a corporation to give to its stock a voting power different from that prescribed by the Constitution is equally void. The question, therefore, is narrowed down to whether the Constitution established the voting power of stock, or conferred a personal privilege that might be waived.

Considering the question in the reverse order, we find the statement of the defendant in error, that "a person may waive any provision either of contract or statute, intended for his benefit," is not supported by the authorities cited, when considered in relation to the provision under construction. The cases cited relate to provisions of statutes that are made for the particular and personal protection of one solely interested, and which may be waived without infringing 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) ing upon the rights of others or affecting public policy. The cases cited go to the right of one to waive notice of depositions, or notice of a continuance, or notice to himself as tenant, or the right to file a contractor's lien, as well as the protection of the Constitution forbidding the taking of property without process or compensation. Shutte v. Thompson, 15 Wall. 151, 159, 21 L. ed. 123, 125; Morrison v. Underwood, 5 Cush. 52; Phyfe v. Eimer, 45 N. Y. 102; Bowen v. Aubrey, 22 Cal. 566, 572; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, §§ 444, 537; Cooley, Const. Lim. 181.

Disregarding the excerpt from the debates of the constitutional convention that adopted the section, the language of the provision alone is sufficiently clear and unambiguous to indicate that the purpose of the convention was to change the control of stock corporations from individual control to stock control, to do which it directly gave to a share of stock the quality of a vote. In doing this it made no discrimination between different classes of stock which subsequent laws might authorize, but provided generally that the holder of a share of stock was the holder of a vote which he was entitled to cast. Being the holder of an interest in property that conferred upon him the right pro tanto to control and regulate that property, the holder of a share of stock was then possessed of a personal privilege or benefit which he might use or reject as he chose (State v. Ashley, 1 Ark. 513, 549); and it is in this sense that a person may waive the provision of a law intended for his benefit. Being the owner of a share of stock with a voting power given it by the Constitution, he was, by the possession of the share, possessed of a privilege, but he could not by any act of his change the character of the share that gave him the privilege, or rob it of the voting power conferred upon it by the Constitution, so that in his hands or in the hands of any subsequent holder it would not carry the power conferred upon it at its birth by the law that authorized its existence.

The general corporation law that was enacted subsequently to the adoption of the Constitution of 1897, under the terms of which the preferred stock of Geo. Brooks & Son Company was deprived of voting power, must have been enacted in ignorance of the constitutional provision then existing. It was this law, passed two years later, that authorized a corporation created under it to give to its stock such preference and voting power as it might express in its certificate of incorporation. Surely the members of the constitutional convention could not have had this law and its provisions in mind when they adopted the constitutional pro-

This decree contained the following provision: "It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that neither party shall marry again within the time prohibited by the statute unless they remarry each other." Thereafter, on October 29, 1912, plaintiff in error and Mary Busscher, both residents of Cook county, in this state, were tate on the question of jurisdiction?" Atty. Gen. v. Utica Ins. Co. 2 Johns. Ch. 371.

Other holdings to the same effect as those just quoted might be cited, but the proposition is well settled and understood that a court of equity has no jurisdiction in matters which do not involve property or civil rights. No such rights were involved here as to warrant a decree enjoining the parties to the divorce suit from violating a penal statute by marrying within the prohibited time. The punishment for this offense, should it ever occur, must be left to a court of different jurisdiction, and the penalty provided by the statute itself must be presumed to be adequate.

If, then, a court of equity, in the exercise of its general equity powers, has no jurisdiction to enter such an injunctive order, it cannot be contended that the circuit court, in exercising its jurisdiction in cases of divorce, has the power to enter such an order unless that power is expressly given by the statute. It is not expressly given. The mere fact that the legislature saw fit to enact this section as an amendment to the divorce act instead of the Criminal Code or the marriage act does not warrant the circuit court in making such an order. The court being without jurisdiction to enter the order, it was void, and plaintiff in error was not in contempt in disobeying it.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Cumberland County for the opinion of the Law Court of a question arising upon demurrer to a bill filed to restrain defendant from establishing a municipal fuel yard, from raising by taxation the money necessary for that purpose, and from doing anything in furtherance of votes passed tending to carry it into effect. Bill dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Eben Winthrop Freeman, for complainants:

The conduct of private business is not a public purpose, and is unconstitutional.

the opinion. The decision, however, is in harmony with the decision in the Holton Case, which is referred to with approval.

But one other reported case has been found which has considered the question under annotation. Thus, in State ex rel. Toledo v. Lynch, 88 Ohio St. 71, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 720, 102 N. E. 670, it was held that a city has no power to establish and maintain moving picture theaters. The question involved the construction of a constitutional amendment which contained the following provisions: Sec. 2, that general laws shall be passed to provide for the incorporation and government of cities and villages, and that additional laws may also be passed for February 3, 1913, both branches of the city council passed a resolution in favor of the same proposition, and on February 4, 1913, this resolution was duly approved by the mayor and became effective. At the same time a special committee was appointed, consisting of the mayor, two aldermen, and three councilmen, "to investigate and obtain full information as to the cost of plant, machinery, rolling stock, and things whatsoever necessary to the establishment and maintaining a municipal fuel yard, and carry on the business thereof, including sources from which fuel can be purchased, and prices to be paid therefor, with the duty of furnishing a full report of their findings to the city council; and, for the purpose of defraying the expense of said committee, the sum of $1,000 is hereby appropriated, the sum to be charged to special appropriation when made."

On February 4, 1913, this bill in equity was brought by fifteen taxable inhabitants of Portland, asking that the city and its officers and agents be restrained and enjoined from establishing a municipal fuel yard, from raising by taxation the money necessary for that purpose, and from carrying into effect any of the votes before recited.

The defendant demurred to the bill, and, the demurrer being joined, the case is before the law court on report.

The important question is therefore sharply raised whether this court must declare unconstitutional this act of the legislature of 1903. It is not a question whether, under the general statutory powers, a municipality has the right to take this step, a question that has arisen in many cases, but whether such municipality can exercise the right when conferred upon it by the legislature in clear and unambiguous terms. In other words, is this court obliged to declare, as the plaintiffs ask us, that this act is so obviously beyond the realm of constitutional purposes include only the protection of life, liberty, and property. On the contrary, I am firmly of the opinion that one of the most important duties of the state is to promote the health, convenience, comfort, and welfare of its citizens, and advance the standard of citizenship in every legitimate way. But I do not believe it is within the purview of municipal government to invade the sphere of purely private enterprise wholly disconnected and divorced from public needs or public purposes. It is difficult, perhaps almost impossible, to prescribe a limit where governmental functions end, and private enterprise begins. In the last quarter of a century our views on this subject have so changed that a limit fixed along the line of the prevailing opinion on that subject at that time would seem absurd now, and so it may be a quarter of a century hence."

In a vigorous dissenting opinion Wanamaker, J., expresses the opinion that municipal corporations may operate moving picture theaters, on the ground that all political power is inherent in the people. In the course of his opinion he said: "Since we have in all cities the initiative and referendum, known as the Crosser law, it is up to the people to determine in the first instance whether or not they want to embark in these enterprises." They may permit the council to take the initiative, reserving the right to exercise the referendum upon the council's action: but under their own power of local self-government, it being strictly a municipal purpose, or at least a purpose which affects nobody but those within the municipality, legislated for by the municipality, paid for and operated by the municipality, who else has any right, but those within the municipality, to object? And they have their day in court, before the council, and before the people at the time the vote is being had. . . . 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Manifestly, at least in the first instance, a municipality has the right to determine that matter for itself, and should not be interfered with in the exercise of its municipal power or its municipal government, unless the power sought to be exercised be so glaringly and palpably beyond the powers of local self-government that a court should say that the power was unauthorized and unconstitutional. In the light of modern day development of our modern day municipalities, in the light of what municipalities in almost every foreign nation have done, in the light of what American municipalities hope to do, in the light of the genuine home rule which they believe was provided for under the new constitutional amendment, I am entirely free and frank to say the exercise of such power on the part of the city council of Toledo was entirely lawful, fully authorized, and ought not to be denied, in a case of this character, by this court."

In Radford v. Clark, 113 Va. 199, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 281, 73 S. E. 571, an action for injuries occurring in a quarry operated by a municipality, it was said that it has been repeated in the authorities that it might be convenient or even profitable for a municipal corporation, in order to perform certain duties imposed upon it as such corporation, to hold and operate a rock quarry or other like undertakings, yet it has no power to do so unless in express words conferred in its charter, or necessarily or fairly implied in or incidental to the powers expressly granted. This case is in harmony with the cases involving the right of a municipality to operate a quarry, cited in the earlier note.

As to power of state to engage in enterprises generally conducted by private person or corporation, see note to Re Opinion of Justices, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 221.

legislative action that it must be declared void?

Before considering the main issue, it is necessary to restate certain familiar and yet fundamental propositions that lie at the very basis of our inquiry.

First. The legislature has, under the Constitution, "full power to make and establish all reasonable laws and regulations for the defense and benefit of the people of this state, not repugnant to this Constitution, nor to that of the United States." Const. (Me.) art. 4, pt. 3, § 1. While, therefore, the executive and the judiciary, the other two co-ordinate departments of government, can exercise only the powers conferred upon them by the Constitution, the powers of the legislature are, broadly speaking, absolute, except as limited or restricted by the Constitution. "As to the executive and judiciary, the Constitution measures the extent of their authority; as to the legislature, it measures the limitations upon its authority." Sawyer v. Gilmore, 109 Me. 169, 83 Atl. 673.

Second. The court is bound to assume that, in the passage of any law, the legislature acted with full knowledge of all constitutional restrictions, and intelligently, honestly, and discriminatingly decided that they were acting within their constitutional limits and powers. That determination is not to be lightly set aside. It is not enough that the court be of the opinion that, had the question been originally submitted to it for decision, it might have held the contrary view. The question has been submitted in the first instance to the tribunal designated by the Constitution, the legislature, and its decision is not to be overturned by the court, unless no room is left for rational doubt. All honest and reasonable doubts are to be solved in favor of the constitutionality of the act. This healthy doctrine is recognized as the settled policy of this court. State v. Doherty, 60 Me. 504; State v. Poulin, 105 Me. 224, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 408, 134 Am. St. Rep. 543, 74 Atl. 119. "The power of the judicial department of the government to prevent the enforcement of a legislative enactment, by declaring it unconstitutional and void, is attended with responsibilities so grave that its exercise is properly confined to statutes that are clearly and conclusively shown to be in conflict with the organic law. It is the duty of one department to presume that another has acted within its legitimate province, until the contrary is made to appear by strong and convincing reasons." State v. Rogers, 95 Me. 94, 85 Am. St. Rep. 395, 49 Atl. 564.

"In determining . . . the constitutionality of any legislation, all reasonable presumptions are in favor of its validity, and 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the courts will not declare an act of the legislature to be invalid, because contrary to the provisions of the organic law, unless it is clearly so. . . . And this is as true respecting legislative enactments by which the power to exercise the right of eminent domain is delegated as in regard to any other species of legislation. The determination by the legislature that the use for which property is authorized to be taken is a public one is undoubtedly subject to review by the court, but all reasonable presumptions are in favor of the validity of such determination by the legislation, and the act must be regarded as valid, unless it can be clearly shown to be in conflict with the Constitution." Ulmer v. Lime Rock R. Co. 98 Me. 579, 66 L.R.A. 387, 57 Atl. 1001.

With these principles conceded, the precise question before the court is seen to be whether the act in question, having been passed by the legislature conformably with what it deemed to be an exercise of its constitutional power, can be set aside by this court as invalid on the ground that it palpably and unquestionably transcends that power. We are unable to go that extent.

The main ground of attack is that the maintenance of what, in general terms, may be called a municipal fuel yard, is not a public use, and, as the power of taxation is confined to public purposes, the authority conferred by this act cannot be constitutionally exercised.

The Constitution of Maine, art. 1, § 21, provides that "private property shall not be taken for public uses without just compensation, nor unless the public exigencies require it." The power of taxation is akin to the right of eminent domain, because it rests upon the right of the sovereign power to appropriate the private property of its citizens to public purposes. Therefore the power of taxation must rest upon two elements in order to be permitted by the Constitution, first a public use, and second a public exigency, the first to be determined in the first instance by the legislature and finally by the court, if cases are brought before it raising the question, and with the limitations before referred to; and the second to be determined by the legislature without judicial revision. Brown v. Gerald, 100 Me. 351, 70 L.R.A. 472, 109 Am. St. Rep. 526, 61 Atl. 785; Hayford v. Bangor, 102 Me. 340, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 940, 66 Atl. 731.

Did, then, the legislature transcend its constitutional powers when it authorized municipalities to make provision for supplying heat to its citizens? In so doing, was it clearly and unquestionably diverting the power of taxation from a public to a private purpose?

This leads us to consider what is meant by the term "public use," as employed in connection with the power to tax.

The exact line of cleavage between what is, and what is not, a public use, it is somewhat difficult to mark. Some purposes readily align themselves on one side of the line as being clearly public in their nature, while others as readily fall on the other side as being obviously private, and there is a debatable ground between the two. Thus, the support of schools, the relief of paupers, and the maintenance of highways are clearly public uses for which taxation is permissible, and it has also been held that the maintenance of a public clock (Willard v. Newburyport, 12 Pick. 227), the purchase of a fire engine (Allen v. Taunton, 19 Pick. 485), the erection of a market house (Spaulding v. Lowell, 23 Pick. 71), the building of a memorial hall (Kingman v. Brockton, 153 Mass. 255, 11 L.R.A. 123, 26 N. E. 998), the aid of a railroad, (Augusta Bank v. Augusta, 49 Me. 507; Dyar v. Farmington, 70 Me. 515), all come within the scope of the same term.

On the other hand, taxes cannot be imposed to aid a private enterprise, and a municipality cannot assist individuals or corporations to establish or carry on such business, either directly or indirectly, nor can it engage in such business itself. Opinion of Justices, 58 Me. 590; Allen v. Jay, 60 Me. 124, 11 Am. Rep. 185; Citizens' Sav. & L. Asso. v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 655, 22 L. ed. 455; Parkersburg v. Brown, 106 U. S. 487, 27 L. ed. 238, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 442; Opinion of Justices, 204 Mass. 607, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 483, 91 N. E. 405. If the direct object is private, the indirect benefits that may result to the public, even in a large measure, are unavailing to remedy the vital defect. Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass. 454, 15 Am. Rep. 39; Opinion of Justices, 211 Mass. 626, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 221, 98 N. E. 611; Brown v. Gerald, 100 Me. 351, 70 L.R.A. 472, 109 Am. St. Rep. 526, 61 Atl. 785.

The courts have never attempted to lay down with minute detail an inexorable rule distinguishing public from private purposes, because it would be impossible to do so. Times change. The wants and necessities of the people change. The opportunity to satisfy those wants and necessities by individual effort may vary. What was clearly a public use a century ago may, because of changed conditions, have ceased to be such to-day.

Thus, the mill act which came into being in the early days of our parent commonwealth of Massachusetts, and was adopted by our own state, was upheld as constitutional because of the necessities of those primitive times. The court in later days have strongly intimated that, were it an original question, it might be difficult to sustain it, in view of present industrial conditions. Murdock v. Stickney, 8 Cush. 113; Salisbury Mills v. Forsaith, 57 N. H. 124; Jordan v. Woodward, 40 Me. 317.

On the other hand, what could not be deemed a public use a century ago may, because of changed economic and industrial conditions, be such to-day. Laws which were entirely adequate to secure public welfare then may be inadequate to accomplish the same results now, as was said in Sun Printing & Pub. Asso. v. New York, 8 App. Div. 230, 40 N. Y. Supp. 607, affirmed in 152 N. Y. 257, 37 L.R.A. 788, 46 N. E. 499.

"The true test is that which requires that the work shall be essentially public and for the general good of all the inhabitants of the city. It must not be undertaken merely for gain or for private objects. Gain or loss may incidentally follow, but the purpose must be primarily to satisfy the need or contribute to the convenience . . . of the city at large. Within that sphere of action novelty should impose no veto. Should some inventive genius by and by create a system for supplying us with pure air, will the representatives of the people be powerless to utilize it in the great cities of the state, however extreme the want or dangerous the delay? Will it then be said that pure air is not as important as pure water and clear light? We apprehend not."

Thus, a class of public uses has grown up and been recognized within a comparatively recent time, due both to the growing needs of the community and to modern inventions calculated to meet those needs, that furnish, in our judgment, a logical precedent for the case at bar. These public uses or utilities embrace water, light, and heat.

It is common knowledge that in the early days our citizens, even in the more populous towns and cities, obtained their water supply from private wells and cisterns. There was no public supply other than perhaps the town pump in the village square. But in course of time the private sources became both inadequate in quantity and hazardous in quality, and private water companies were chartered to meet the changed demands; one of the earliest to do business on a large scale being the Portland Water Company, chartered in 1866. Priv. & Spec. Law 1866, chap. 159. The purpose of these companies is admittedly public. Portland v. Portland Water Co. 67 Me. 136; Riche v. Bar Harbor Water Co. 75 Me. 91; Hamor v. Bar Harbor Water Co. 78 Me. 127, 3 Atl. 40. "The supply of a large number of inhabitants with pure water is a public purpose," says Shaw, Ch. J., in Lumbard v. Stearns, 4 Cush. 60.

Later the municipalities in which some of these water companies were established were given the right by the legislature to take over and maintain these plants, or municipal water districts were formed to accomplish the same purpose. The compensation for those plants was raised by taxation or by loan, and again the purpose is obviously public. Auburn v. Union Water Power Co. 90 Me. 576, 38 L.R.A. 188, 38 Atl. 561; Mayo v. Dover & F. V. Fire Co. 96 Me. 539, 53 Atl. 62; Kennebec Water Dist. v. Waterville, 97 Me. 185, 60 L.R.A. 856, 54 Atl. 6; Brunswick & T. Water Dist. v. Maine Water Co. 99 Me. 371, 59 Atl. 537; Augusta v. Augusta Water Dist. 101 Me. 148, 63 Atl. 663.

Conditions as to lighting met with similar changes. Candles, lamps, gas, and electricity have followed each other in due course of time.

As late as 1890, a doubt seems to have arisen in Massachusetts as to the constitutional power of municipalities in respect to public and private lighting, and the house of representatives of that year submitted to the justices of the supreme judicial court two questions: First, whether the legislature had the power under the Constitution to authorize the cities and towns within the commonwealth to manufacture and distribute gas or electric light for use in their public streets and buildings; and, second, for the purpose of selling the same to its own citizens. These questions were both answered unanimously in the affirmative. The justices, in the course of their opinion, say that "the extent of the right of taxation is not necessarily to be measured by that of the right of eminent domain, but the rights are analogous." [Re Opinion of Justices, 150 Mass. 592, 8 L.R.A. 487, 24 N. E. 1084.] So far as the lighting of the public buildings and streets is concerned, the court held that it was an incident of their maintenance and tended both to common convenience and common necessity; and then these significant words are added: "If the legislature can authorize cities and towns to light their streets and public buildings, it can authorize them to do this by any appropriate means which it may think expedient." In holding the supply to individuals to also be a public purpose, after discussing the question of water companies, the justices say:

"Artificial light is not, perhaps, so absolutely necessary as water, but it is necessary for the comfortable living of every person. Although artificial light can be supplied in other ways than by the use of gas or electricity, yet the use of one or both for lighting cities and thickly settled towns is 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

common, and has been found to be of great convenience, and it is practically impossible for every individual to manufacture gas or electricity for himself. If gas or electricity is to be generally used in a city or town, it must be furnished by private companies or by the municipality, and it cannot be distributed without the use of the public streets or the exercise of the right of eminent domain. It is not necessarily an objection to a public work maintained by a city or town that it incidentally benefits some individuals more than others, or that from the place of residence or for other reasons every inhabitant of the city or town cannot use it, if every inhabitant who is so situated that he can use it has the same right to use it as the other inhabitants. It must often be a question of kind and degree whether the promotion of the interests of many individuals in the same community constitutes a public service or not. But in general it may be said that matters which concern the welfare and convenience of all the inhabitants of a city or town, and cannot be successfully dealt with without the aid of powers derived from the legislature, may be subjected to municipal control when the benefits received are such that each inhabitant needs them and may participate in them, and it is for the interest of each inhabitant that others, as well as himself, should possess and enjoy them. If the legislature is of the opinion that the common convenience and welfare of the inhabitants of cities or towns will be promoted by conferring upon the municipalities the power of manufacturing and distributing gas or electricity for the purpose of furnishing light to their inhabitants, we think the legislature can confer the power. We therefore answer the second question in the affirmative."

Following the reasoning of the Massachusetts court, if the lighting of private residences and buildings is a public purpose, and one which the municipality can legitimately carry on, the heating of the same buildings is equally public. It is even a greater necessity. Gas and electric lights are in the nature of luxuries, but heat is indispensable. In the regions supplied with natural gas, municipal heating from that source has been adopted, and has been held to be constitutional. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Toledo, 48 Ohio St. 112, 11 L.R.A. 729, 26 N. E. 1061.

The reasoning of the court is as follows: "Heat being an agent or principle indispensable to the health, comfort, and convenience of every inhabitant of our cities, we do not see why, thought the medium of natural gas, it may not be as much a public service to furnish it to the citizens as to furnish ter. . . . It is sufficient 'if every inhabitant who is so situated that he can use has the same right to use it as the other inhabitants. . . . The establishment of natural gas works by municipal corporations, with the imposition of taxes to pay the cost thereof, may be a new object of municipal policy. But, in deciding whether, in a given case, the object for which taxes are assessed is a public or private purpose, we cannot leave out of view the progress of society, the change of manners and customs, and the development and growth of new wants, natural and artificial, which may from time to time call for a new exercise of legislative power. And, in deciding whether such taxes shall be levied for the new purposes that have arisen, we should not, we think, be bound by an inexorable rule that could embrace only those objects for which taxes have been customarily and by long course of legislation levied."

If, then, science had advanced so far that the heating as well as the lighting of houses by electricity was now a practicable method, there would seem to be no doubt that this also would fall within the realm of public purposes. The heat would be conducted from the central power station by means of wires along or under the public streets, the same as light is now. Or suppose it were practicable to install a central heating plant and conduct the heat through pipes in the streets to the various buildings, much the same as water or gas is now conducted, we see no reason why this too should not be called a public use.

Just here, however, the petitioners contend for a distinction between all these illustrations and the case at bar. They say that, in the case of the distribution of water and of light and heat by gas or electricity, the use of the public highways is required for the mains and the poles and wires; that the purpose is public because it is necessary to obtain permission from public authorities, either state or municipal, in order to carry it out. We grant that in those cases this element of public permission exists, but it does not follow that the converse is true, and that no purpose is public where such permission does not exist. How can this criterion be applied to the erection of public buildings, the creation of a park, the building of a memorial hall, or of a market house, or the maintenance of a public clock?

In other words, under this rule, public service of this sort would be limited to one which can only be performed by a so-called public service corporation, and not by an individual or corporation, independent of chartered rights. This is, in our judgment, too narrow. It makes an incident to some forms of public service an essential element. It transforms the method or means of rendering the service into the essence of the service itself. It makes the exercise of public rights in supplying the necessities of a community a prerequisite to the public use. But this exercise of public rights can itself be authorized only by the legislature, and, if that branch of the government sees fit to bestow the public service in a manner that may obviate the use of the public right, they certainly should have the right and the power so to do. It is a matter within their control.

Let us look at the question from the practical and concrete standpoint. Can it make any real and vital difference, and convert a public into a private use, if instead of burning the fuel at the power station to produce the electricity, or at the central heating plant to produce the heat, and then conducting it in the one case by wires and in the other by pipes to the user's home, the coal itself is hauled over the same highway to the same point of distribution? We fail to see it. It is only a different and a simpler mode of distribution, and, if the legislature has the power to authorize municipalities to furnish heat to its inhabitants, "it can do this by any appropriate means which it may think expedient." The vital and essential element is the character of the service rendered, and not the means by which it is rendered.

It seems illogical to hold that a municipality may relieve its citizens from the rigor of cold if it can reach them by pipes or wires placed under or above the highways, but not if it can reach them by teams traveling along the identically same highway. It will be something of a task to convince the ordinarily intelligent citizen that an act of the legislature authorizing the former is constitutional, but one authorizing the latter is unconstitutional beyond all rational doubt. For we must remember that we are considering the existence of the power in the legislature, which is the only question before the court, and not the wisdom of its exercise, which is for the legislature alone.

Cases directly in point are lacking. We have been unable to find anywhere that the issue has been squarely decided.

The learned counsel for the plaintiffs confidently rely upon the opinion of Justices in 155 Mass. 598, 15 L.R.A. 809, 30 N. E. 1142, and 182 Mass. 605, 60 L.R.A. 592, 66 N. E. 25, rendered in answer to questions propounded by the house of representatives as to the constitutionality of proposed acts for the establishment of municipal fuel yards. While such answers are entitled to great consideration, they do not have the force of decision. Kent, J., 58 Me. 573; Tapley, J., 58 Me. 615; and Libbey, J., 72 Me. 562, 563. "The giving of advisory opinions is not the exercise of the judicial function at all, and the opinions thus given have not the quality of judicial authority." Prof. James B. Thayer, 7 Harv. L. Rev. p. 153.

In 155 Mass. 598, 15 L.R.A. 809, 30 N. E. 1142, the justices were divided; five advising that the proposed act would be unconstitutional, one, Justice Holmes, that it would be constitutional, and one, Justice Barker, giving a qualified assent to its validity. In 182 Mass. 605, 60 L.R.A. 592, 66 N. E. 25, the opinions of the majority in 155 Mass. were adopted without dissent, and these views have been reaffirmed by way of illustration in Opinion of Justices, 211 Mass. 624, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 221, 98 N. E. 611—the subject-matter of that opinion being the power of municipalities to construct houses in the suburbs for wage earners, a power clearly not theirs. A careful study of these opinions shows that the general principles enunciated are in accord with our views, and that in only one particular are we at variance.

The conclusions reached by the majority in the Massachusetts cases seem to be:

(1) That it is beyond the power of a municipal corporation to engage in the sale of commodities which are and can be easily conducted by private business concerns in competition with one another, and which can be sufficiently regulated thereby. In this we most heartily concur.

(2) That the sale of fuel falls within this class of commodities, and there is no necessity why cities and towns should undertake this form of business any more than many others which have always been conducted by private enterprises. Here we differ.

(3) That, in regard to "a condition in which the supply of fuel would be so small and the difficulty of obtaining it so great that persons desiring to purchase it would be unable to supply themselves through private enterprises, it is conceivable that agencies of government might be able to obtain fuel when citizens generally could not. Under such circumstances, we are of opinion that the government might constitute itself an agent for the relief of the community, and that money expended for the purpose would be expended for a public use." Here again we concur.

The principle, therefore, seems to be conceded that, if the difficulty of obtaining an adequate supply exists, the furnishing of such supply by municipalities would be a public use. And this is the construction placed upon the Massachusetts opinion by learned text writers. Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 1292; McQuillin, Mun. Corp. (1912) § 1809.

In the last analysis this differs but little from the definition of a public use laid down by Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations, 6th ed. p. 655, viz.: "That only can be considered . . . [a public use] where the government is supplying its own needs or is furnishing facilities for its citizens in regard to those matters of public necessity, convenience, or welfare which, on account of their peculiar character and the difficulty,—perhaps impossibility,—of making provision for them otherwise, it is alike proper, useful, and needful for the government to provide." This court, in discussing the question of public use with reference to the power of eminent domain, adopted this definition in a very recent case, remarking: "There is perhaps no general definition more satisfactory than this one." Brown v. Gerald, 100 Me. 351, 370, 70 L.R.A. 472, 109 Am. St. Rep. 526, 61 Atl. 785. And this general definition we adhere to and seek to apply in the case at bar. Its two tests are: First, the subject-matter or commodity must be one "of public necessity, convenience, or welfare." Fuel clearly comes within this category. The second test is the difficulty which individuals have in providing it for themselves. The causes creating the difficulty may vary, but, if the difficulty exists, the test is met. For instance, in the case of a water supply, the difficulty arises from the fact that individual sources are inadequate or unsanitary, and the conditions can be remedied only by the municipality itself providing or allowing some public service corporation to furnish the community at large from a single and common source. This is a matter of common knowledge, and the court, in passing upon the question of public use, cannot ignore it.

In the case of fuel, the practical difficulty is caused by the existence of monopolistic combinations. The mining, transportation, and distribution of coal has, in the process of industrial development, fallen into the hands of these combinations to such an extent that the greater part of the supply is in the absolute control of a few. The difficulty and practical impossibility of obtaining an adequate supply for private needs at times in the past, and the consequent suffering among the people, especially in the more populous cities, are matters of history, and this difficulty may as well be caused by unreasonable prices as by shortage in quantity. All this is a matter of common knowledge, and cannot be overlooked by the court. The supply of water may be inadequate from one cause, that of fuel from another, but out of each arises the condition which renders the furnishing of it by the municipality a public use.

The majority of the Massachusetts justices conceded the right to create municipal fuel yards under certain conditions and exigencies, but say that in their opinion fuel is like all other commodities of ordinary purchase and sale in the open market, and there is no necessity why cities and towns should undertake that form of business any more than many others which have always been conducted by private enterprise. This might seem to be invading the province of the legislature, because the determination of the exigency is for that co-ordinate branch of the government alone, and, by the passage of this act, that branch has necessarily determined that the exigency exists. If, however, independent of their finding, the court has a right to consider all the conditions and circumstances connected with the subject-matter, all the elements which, under the definition of Judge Cooley, make up the public use, then we cannot close our eyes to existing economic conditions, and must admit that, in determining the existence of the difficulty, the finding of the legislature is not wrong beyond all rational doubt, and therefore, under the well-settled rules of constitutional construction, it should not be disturbed.

But it is urged: Why, if a city can establish a municipal fuel yard, can it not enter upon any kind of commercial business, and carry on a grocery store or a meat market or a bakery? The answer has been already indicated. Such kinds of business do not measure up to either of the accepted tests. When we speak of fuel, we are dealing not with ordinary articles of merchandise, for which there may be many substitutes, but with an indispensable necessity of life; and, more than this, the commodities mentioned are admittedly, under present economic conditions, regulated by competition, in the ordinary channels of private business enterprise. The principle that municipalities can neither invade private liberty nor encroach upon the field of private enterprise should be strictly maintained, as it is one of the main foundations of our prosperity and success. If the case at bar clearly violated that principle, it would be our duty to pronounce the act unconstitutional, but, in our opinion, it does not. The element of commercial enterprise is entirely lacking. The purpose of the act is neither to embark in business for the sake of direct profits (the act provides that fuel shall be furnished at cost), nor for the sake of the indirect gains that may result to purchasers through reduction in price by governmental competition. It is simply to enable the citizens to be supplied with something which is a necessity in its absolute sense to the enjoyment of life and health, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) which could otherwise be obtained with great difficulty, and at times perhaps not at all, and whose absence would endanger the community as a whole. In our opinion it is a proper and constitutional function of government either to itself provide such a necessity under these circumstances, or to see to it that it is so provided as to bring it within the reach of the citizens.

A similar inquiry, based upon fears for the future, was asked as to the limit of legislative power, in Olmstead v. Camp, 33 Conn. 532, 89 Am. Dec. 221, and is there answered by the court in these words:

"The question is asked with great pertinence and propriety: What, then, is the limit of the legislative power under the clause which we have been considering, and what is the exact line between public and private uses?

"Our reply is that which has heretofore been quoted. From the nature of the case there can be no precise line. The power requires a degree of elasticity to be capable of meeting new conditions and improvements and the ever-increasing necessities of society. The sole dependence must be on the presumed wisdom of the sovereign authority, supervised and, in cases of gross error or extreme wrong, controlled by the dispassionate judgment of the courts."

This furnishes, we think, a safe and sufficient barrier between the Constitution and those who might attempt to break it down.

Nor is the fact that in operation the act may tend to lessen the profits of a few private dealers, or even force them from business, a matter of consideration for the court.

"It is for the legislature to determine from time to time the occasion and what laws and regulations are necessary or expedient for the defense and benefit of the people; and, however inconvenienced, restricted, or even damaged particular persons and corporations may be, such general laws and regulations are to be held valid, unless there can be pointed out some provision in the state or United States Constitution which clearly prohibits them." Opinion of Justices, 103 Me. 506, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 422, 69 Atl. 627, 13 Ann. Cas. 745.

The brief opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes, now of the Supreme Court of the United States, in 155 Mass. 607, 15 L.R.A. 809, 30 N. E. 1142, supra, goes even farther than the rule which we have laid down. He says:

"I am of opinion that, when money is taken to enable a public body to offer to the public, without discrimination, an article of general necessity, the purpose is no less public when that article is wood or coal than when it is water or gas or electricity or education, to say nothing of cases like the support of paupers or the taking of land boisterous crowd at the station, eager to board the train, if it had no notice, from previous experience or information imparted to it, that a throng of impatient passengers could simultaneously attempt to board the car at that station.

(May 20, 1914.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiffs to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of actions brought to recover damages for personal injuries to plaintiff, Helen M. Jackson, while a passenger on defendant's train, and for consequential damages sustained by her husband which resulted in verdicts for defendant. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James P. Magenis and John Wentworth, for plaintiffs:

The mere fact that the previous crowds were less in extent, and had not jostled the plaintiff in the same way, cannot avail the defendant. There had been crowding and jostling there before. This was sufficient to give the defendant warning that just what did happen in this case was likely to occur.

Kelley v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 210 Mass. 454, 96 N. E. 1031; Glennen v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 207 Mass. 497, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 470, 454, 96 N. E. 1031, where a passenger was injured by being pushed off the platform on the upper level, the court says: "The congestion of passengers, resulting from their number and eagerness to board cars waiting for them, was not an extraordinary circumstance, but was rather a condition which should have been foreseen from the nature of the business, and provided for by the adoption of reasonable expedients. It follows that the physical harm suffered by the plaintiff arose through the defendant's negligence in permitting a combination of passengers to press violently upon her, and, while not an assault, the wrong finally inflicted was none the less a violation of its duty, for which compensation in damages can be recovered."

In JACKSON v. BOSTON ELEV. R. Co. the crowded condition had not previously occurred at the place where the accident happened, and there was nothing to show that such a condition should have been foreseen.

In Bacon v. Hudson & M. R. Co. 154 App. Div. 742, 139 N. Y. Supp. 740, however, where a passenger was pushed from a subway platform in front of a train, the evidence showed that such was result of sudden jostling and crowding, and not of overcrowding the platform. The court defined the duty of the carrier to prevent jostling in the following terms: "What degree of care the occasion or the exigency requires is for the jury to decide, but it is the care that a good, prudent business man would exercise at the time and place. Braley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in the second action is not entitled to consequential damages unless his wife, the plaintiff in the first action, can recover for personal injuries suffered while she was a passenger on the defendant's railway. The defendant contends that the verdict ordered by the trial court should stand, as there was no evidence of its negligence. If a view of the evidence most favorable to her is taken, the jury would have been warranted in finding that, upon entering the defendant's station carrying an infant child on her left arm, she found herself in the midst of a crowd filling the station, by which at first she was jostled and steadily forced towards the track. As the train came in, the crowd moving to board the car became more boisterous and energetic, and she was caught in the moving mass, pushed through the vestibule into the car, where she was injured by falling over the dress-suit case of a passenger in the car when it arrived. The carrying of traveling bags or bundles by passengers is an ordinary incident of travel, form may be so sparsely filled as to require slight diligence; it may quickly be so packed by an agitating crowd as to require great diligence. So the degree of care may be constantly changing."

In an action for injury sustained by stepping into the space between the platform and a car at an elevated station, where the plaintiff testified that she could not look down so as to see where she stepped, and that her movements were constrained by the crowd around her, it was held that there was nothing in the size or conduct of the crowd to bring the case within the principles of Kuhlen v. Boston & N. Street R. Co., the principal case in the earlier note upon this subject. Anshen v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 205 Mass. 32, 91 N. E. 157.

Becker v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co. 128 App. Div. 455, 112 N. Y. Supp. 816, reversed the judgment of the court below on the grounds that the charge with respect to injuries resulting from crowding a platform, while correctly setting forth the law, was inapplicable to the case.

Contributory negligence.

Where a passenger seventy-four years of age takes up his position on a subway platform 6 inches from the edge thereof, his contributory negligence is a question for the jury, in an action for injuries received by being pushed from the platform. Bacon v. Hudson & M. R. Co. supra.

Messrs. Frank W. Knowlton and Arthur J. Santry, for defendant:

The existence of a space between the platform of an elevated train and the station platform in a subway station does not furnish evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant company. However dangerous such a condition may be, and whatever possibilities of injury it may carry, it is an incident of travel and an incident of the use of the station leased by the defendant, and does not furnish a ground of liability.

Co. 191 Mass. 14, 77 N. E. 646; Hawes v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 192 Mass. 324, 78 N. E. 480; Anshen v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 205 Mass. 32, 91 N. E. 157.

Rugg, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff seeks to recover damages for injuries sustained while trying to board an elevated train in the subway station at Boylston street. Her testimony was in substance that she waited there three or four minutes for the train; that there was a very large crowd, which grew larger and larger while she was waiting; that there was not much chance to move up, there was such a crowd, "and just before the train came in the crowd grew all around her; that as the car came in and the door opened, 'I was taken off my feet and was pushed right into this space [by the] pushing crowd, the surging crowd all around me,'" that she struck against the car and went down into the open space, where she was injured. In reply to the question, "What do you mean by surging all around?" she said, "Swaying back and forth." The plaintiff's companion testified: "The crowd was pushing all the time from the time we entered almost, there was a restless crowd there all the time; and she [the plaintiff] was pushed into this hole by the force of the crowd." There was evidence that the plaintiff had been in the habit of taking the train at this station at about the same hour, and that the conditions as to the crowd and its actions on other occasions were identical with those on this night.

The subway and its platform were designed and constructed by public authority, acting through the Boston Transit Commission, and have been leased to the defendant company. Having had no control over the plan or the size of the platform, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the defendant is not responsible for the existence of spaces between the cars and the platform. Willworth v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 188 Mass. 220, 74 N. E. 333, 18 Am. Neg. Rep. 463; Hilborn v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 191 Mass. 14, 77 N. E. 646; Plummer v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 198 Mass. 499, 509, 84 N. E. 849. The case at bar, in respect of the conduct of the crowd and its effect upon the plaintiff, is distinguishable in its facts from Anshen v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 205 Mass. 32, 91 N. E. 157, where the plaintiff put the emphasis of her case upon the open space between the fixed platform and the car, and the failure of the defendant to provide a movable platform, and also from Seale v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 214 Mass. 59, 100 N. E. 1020.

The plaintiff's contention does not rest upon the existence of the open space, but upon the uncontrolled conduct of a restless and surging crowd heedless of the safety of individuals, such as commonly the defendant permitted to be upon its platform at this place. The case is indistinguishable in its salient facts from Kuhlen v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 193 Mass. 341, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 729, 118 Am. St. Rep. 516, 79 N. E. 815, and is governed by the principles there stated at length. To the same effect, see Beverley v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 194 Mass. 450, 80 N. E. 507; Kelley v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 210 Mass. 454, 96 N. E. 1031, and Coy v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 212 Mass. 307, 98 N. E. 1041.

Case to be submitted to arbitrators to determine damages.

TEXAS COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS.

EX PARTE LOTTIE BELLE BARNES.

(— Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 166 S. W. 728.)

Habeas corpus — absence of evidence — remand.

1. In the absence of evidence to support the allegations in an application for habeas corpus, petitioner will be remanded.

Contempt — refusal of witness to be sworn.

2. A witness who does not act on religious or other convictions may be committed for contempt in refusing to be sworn or to affirm.

Note. — Refusal to be sworn or to affirm as a contempt of court.

EX PARTE BARNES in holding a refusal to be sworn or to affirm as contempt of court has the unanimous support of the authorities. Thus, it was so held in Good-firm, although he expects the questions to be propounded to him will require self-incriminating answers.

Witness — incriminating evidence — immunity — compulsion.

3. A woman offered immunity from prosecution may be compelled to testify as to incestuous relations between herself and her father.

(April 22, 1914.)

APPPLICATION by relator for a writ of habeas corpus to secure her release from custody to which she had been committed for refusal to qualify as a witness upon refusal of the District Court for Bexar County to grant the writ. Relator remanded.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John R. Storms and Edwin F. Vanderbilt for appellant.

Messrs. W. O. Linden and C. E. Lane, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Harper, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Relator, having been refused a writ of habeas corpus by the district court in Bexar county, applied to this court and was granted a writ, and the hearing set for April 15th.

On that day relator's attorney and the district attorney appeared and argued the case, but relator introduced no evidence in support of the allegations contained in the application. In the absence of any proof supporting the allegations, relator should be remanded. The application is merely a pleading, and does not prove itself. Ex parte Welburn, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 157 S. W. 154, and cases there cited.

The district attorney did offer some evidence, and this evidence would show that when the relator was summoned before the grand jury she refused to be sworn or affirm. When she was carried before the district judge she again refused to be sworn to answer any question, or to affirm in any way, and yet there is no proof offered that such action was on account of any religious or other convictions. This would be such contempt as would authorize her confinement in jail until she should purge herself of contempt and take the oath required by law to be administered to all witnesses.

It would seem from the proof offered by the district attorney that relator presumed that she was going to be questioned by the grand jury about alleged incestuous relations between her and her father. This furnishes no excuse for refusing to be sworn to answer such questions as might be propounded to her by the grand jury. After being sworn, if such questions were propounded, then, and not until then, would she be justified in refusing to answer such questions.

However, it further appears from the testimony offered by the district attorney that man v. People, 90 Ill. App. 533; Lockwood v. State, 1 Ind. 161; Wilcox v. State, 46 Neb. 402, 64 N. W. 1072; People v. Hicks, 15 Barb. 153; Com. ex rel. Rathvon v. Roberts, 2 Clark (Pa.) 340.

But it has been held not contempt of court for a witness merely to decline to be sworn; he must also refuse to affirm, and it must so appear of record. Wilcox v. State, 46 Neb. 402, 64 N. W. 1072.

One subpoenaed to appear before a referee in supplementary proceedings is guilty of contempt of court in refusing to be sworn by the referee. Howe v. Welch, 11 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 444.

And a magistrate appointed under a rule of the court of common pleas to take depositions has the power to punish for contempt one who refuses to be sworn as a witness. Com. ex rel. Rathvon v. Roberts, 2 Clark (Pa.) 340.

It is contempt of court for a material witness to refuse to be sworn on an examination, on the filing of a complaint that a crime has been committed. People v. Hicks, 15 Barb. 153.

And so, also, in State ex rel. Long v. Keyes, 75 Wis. 288, 44 N. W. 13, it was held that one subpoenaed to appear before a magistrate on an examination to ascertain whether an offense has been committed, who refuses to be sworn, is guilty of contempt of court.
51 L.R.A. (N.S.).

In Stansbury v. Marks, 2 Dall. 213, 1 L. ed. 353, a Jew who refused to be sworn on Saturday because it was his Sabbath was fined $10.

And in United States v. Tom Wah, 160 Fed. 207, affirmed in 90 C. C. A. 178, 163 Fed. 1008, it was held to be contempt of court for a Chinese person against whom deportation proceedings are pending, to refuse to be sworn as a witness, since the proceedings to deport are civil, and not criminal, in their nature.

But the power to punish must be exercised by the Federal court, as the United States commissioner is not vested with authority. United States v. Tom Wah, 160 Fed. 207.

In People v. Webster, 14 How. Pr. 242, 3 Park. Crim. Rep. 503, it was held that the act of 1857, an act to suppress intemperance and to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors, did not authorize a justice of the peace to commit one who refused to be sworn as to the cause of his intoxication.

Nor did the section of the Revised Statutes then in force, relating to punishment for criminal contempt, reach such a case. Ibid.

Generally as to what constitutes contempt of court and power to punish therefor, see Index to L.R.A. Notes, "Contempt" §§ 5-12.

J. H. B.

when the witness refused even to be sworn, that he then and there offered and tendered her complete and absolute immunity from prosecution as to any matter about which she might be called upon to testify, which tender met with the sanction and approval of the district judge. Under such circumstances, she could be compelled to testify as to her incestuous relations between herself and her father, if any. Ex parte Muncy, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 163 S. W. 29, and Ex parte Higgins, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 160 S. W. 696. As said in the Higgins Case, it is the better practice that the sanction and approval of the judge of the district court be made a matter of record in his court, and, while the judgment entered in this case impliedly so states, yet it does not expressly do so, and in all such orders it would be proper, and the court should recite that immunity from prosecution had been offered the witness, which offer the court approved, and he then and there informed the witness she could not and would not be prosecuted for any matter about which she might be called on to testify.

The relator is remanded.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

ATLANTIC TRANSPORT COMPANY OF WEST VIRGINIA

v.

FRANK IMBROVEK.

Admiralty — jurisdiction — torts — injury to stevedore.

The admiralty jurisdiction of a Federal district court extends to a cause of action

Note. — Jurisdiction of admiralty over suit for injury to stevedore.

As to the right to sue in admiralty for damages resulting from an injury to another, see note to New York & L. B. S. B. Co. v. Johnson, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 640.

For notes on various other phases of the question of admiralty jurisdiction, see Index to L.R.A. Notes, "Admiralty," §§ 2, 3.

The jurisdiction of courts of admiralty over torts generally seems to depend, or, at least, may depend, upon two tests: vis., the locality of the injury and the maritime nature of the tort. "The proposition is elementary in the admiralty law that the test of the jurisdiction of admiralty courts 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

against a stevedore company arising out of an injury to one of its employees, caused by its negligent failure to secure the hatch covers on a vessel lying in navigable waters, whereby such employee was injured while engaged in loading and stowing the ship's cargo, since even if it be assumed that the requirement as to locality in tort cases, while indispensable, is not necessarily exclusive, still the wrong which was the subject of the suit was of a maritime nature.

(May 25, 1914.)

CERTIORARI to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit to review a decree which affirmed a decree of the District Court for the District of Maryland in favor of libellant in a suit to recover damages for personal injuries sustained while loading and stowing a cargo on petitioner's ship. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edward Duffy, Ralph Robinson, and Nicholas P. Bond, for petitioner:

The jurisdiction, as of right, of the admiralty, was limited to causes of a maritime nature.

2 Browne, Adm. 1 Am. ed. pp. 94, 95; Benedict, Adm. 4th ed. *pp. 39, 46, 47; Stevens v. The Sandwich, 1 Pet. Adm. 233, Fed. Cas. No. 13,409.

In determining whether a tort is maritime or not three things must be considered, locality, subject-matter of complaint, and person with regard to whom complaint is made.

Reg. v. London Ct. Judge [1892] 1 Q. B. 273.

For injury to a mariner in the service of a ship, the ship is liable, whether negligent or otherwise, only for the maintenance and care of the mariner. This is the rule except where the injury happens by reason of the unseaworthiness of the ship or of a failure to supply and keep in order the proper appliances appurtenant to the ship (The Osceola, 189 U. S. 158, 47 L. ed. 760, over torts is the locality of the injury" (The Mary Garrett, 63 Fed. 1009). Many obiter statements may be found to the effect that this is the sole test, and that it is conclusive upon the question of jurisdiction. Such statements, however, have generally been made in cases in which this test was the only one considered,—the respective torts involved in such cases being concededly maritime torts, so that the application of the test of locality in fact solved the question of jurisdiction in those cases. And so, in ATLANTIC TRANSPORT CO. v. IMBROVEK it was not necessary to decide whether the locality test was exclusive, since the court was of the opinion that the tort in question was of a maritime nature. As stated 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 483), in which event the mariner is entitled to damages.

Messrs. W. H. Price, Jr., John E. Semmes, Jr., John E. Semmes, Jesse N. Bowen, and Matthew Gault, for respondent:

In questions of contracts as distinguished from torts, admiralty jurisdiction depends mainly upon the subject-matter,—that is, the nature of the service and engagement,—and is limited to such subjects as are purely maritime.

Ex parte Easton, 95 U. S. 72, 24 L. ed. 374; New England Mut. M. Ins. Co. v. Dunham, 11 Wall. 1, 26, 20 L. ed. 90, 97.

By reason of the jealousy of the English common-law courts against the admiralty, the latter's jurisdiction is narrower and more restricted in England than in any other country. In the United States the admiralty jurisdiction of the courts is not confined or restricted by restraining statutes or the prejudiced interpretations of these statutes by the judiciary.

Morewood v. Enequist, 23 How. 493, 16 L. ed. 516; New England Mut. M. Ins. Co. v. Dunham, 11 Wall. 1, 20 L. ed. 90; New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. 344, 385, 12 L. ed. 465, 483; The Blackheath (United States v. Evans) 195 U. S. 361, 49 L. ed. 236, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 46; The Lottawanna (Rodd v. Heartt) 21 Wall. 558, 574, 22 L. ed. 654, 661.

The sole test of admiralty jurisdiction has been the locality of the person or thing in the opinion in ATLANTIC TRANSPORT CO. v. IMBROVER, the circuit court of appeals in Campbell v. H. Hackfeld & Co. 62 C. C. A. 274, 125 Fed. 696, holds that locality is not the exclusive test. This general question, however, is beyond the scope of the note. At all events, locality whether or not an exclusive test, is a necessary test. This question of locality, of course, is generally one of fact, and when the fact is shown, the jurisdictional question dependent thereon is answered, leaving no question of law as to whether the tort is within the admiralty jurisdiction, under the locality test, except in cases where the cause of injury arises on navigable waters and the injury is sustained on land, or vice versa. But, as stated in Benedict, Adm. 4th ed. p. 176: "It may, however, be doubted whether the civil jurisdiction, in cases of torts, does not depend upon the relation of the parties to a ship or vessel, embracing only those tortious violations of maritime right and duty which occur in vessels, to which the admiralty jurisdiction, in cases of contracts, applies."

Suit against vessel or owner.

In a large majority of the admiralty cases involving injuries to stevedores, the libel has been filed either against the vessel, or in connection with which the injury was sustained, or against its owners (generally against the vessel itself); and in practically all of these cases, involving negligent or wrongful acts or omissions of those representing the vessel or its owners, it seems to have been assumed that the tort was of a maritime nature, and the only test as to the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts which has been applied in such cases is the locality test. Applying this test, it has been held that where an employee of a corporation owning a vessel, while engaged in the hold of the vessel in receiving lumber which was being loaded from a wharf, was struck and seriously injured by a piece of timber which the shipowner negligently slid down a chute into the hold without warning to those below, admiralty has jurisdiction of the employee's cause of action against the corporation, notwithstanding the tort originated on land, i. e., on the wharf from which the lumber was being loaded. Hermann v. Port Blakely Mill Co. 69 Fed. 646.

And in The Strabo, 39 C. C. A. 375, 98 Fed. 998, affirming 90 Fed. 110, it was held that a court of admiralty has jurisdiction of a libel against a steamship for personal injuries to a longshoreman at work in loading the ship as she was lying at a dock, which injuries were caused by the negligence of the master of the ship, while he was upon the ship, in regard to the security of a ladder which was furnished by him for the use of the longshoremen, with one end upon the dock and the other end resting upon the rail of the ship, not fastened in any manner thereto, and wholly unsecured, whereby the libellant was thrown off and struck upon the dock, and was seriously injured. The court said: "The important question in the case is that of the jurisdiction of a court of admiralty over a tort caused by the negligence of the master upon navigable water, in regard to the security of the ladder upon the ship, the accident commencing upon the ship, and the known injurious consequences having been suffered by the fall upon the land. . . . In this case it is highly probable that the libellant sustained some damage from nervous shock while precipitated through the air, and before he fell upon the wharf. A person of sensitive nervous organization would, without doubt, receive such an injury. The injury commenced when, by the slipping of the ladder, the libellant was thrown into the air. Whether or not this throw was damnum absque injuria cannot be told, but it is true, as the district judge said, 'that the whole wrongful agency was put in motion and took effect on the ship, and thereby the libellant was hurled from his position on the ship, and before he reached the dock was subjected to conditions inevitably resulting in physical injury, wherever he finally struck.' The cause of action originated and the injury had commenced on the ship, the consummation somewhere being inevitable. It is not of injured at the time of impact with the intentional or negligent force.

The tort in this case was essentially maritime in its nature.

Mr. Justice Hughes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a libel to recover for personal injuries sustained by the libellant as a stevedore in the employ of the Atlantic Transport Company (the petitioner), which was engaged in loading the Pretoria, belonging to the Hamburg-American Steam Packet vital importance to the admiralty jurisdiction whether the injury culminated on the stringpiece of the wharf or in the water."

So, in Hamburg-Amerikanische Packetfahrt Aktien Gesellschaft v. Gye, 207 Fed. 247, reversing on the merits a decree for the libellant in a suit in admiralty against the owners of a ship to recover damages for the death of the libellant's husband, a stevedore or longshoreman who had been employed in loading the ship,—one of the errors assigned by the shipowners upon the appeal having been that the admiralty court was without jurisdiction as, notwithstanding the fatal injury was received on navigable waters of the United States, the libellant's decedent died ashore,—the court said: "We deem it unnecessary, in view of the conclusion reached on the merits, to advert to the question of jurisdiction, more than to say that it is well settled by the weight of modern authority that the locus injuriæ is the test of jurisdiction."

In The Aurora, 163 Fed. 633,—overruling exceptions to a libel in rem against a vessel by the administratrix of a deceased longshoreman who had been in the employ of the vessel and assisting in loading her, and was killed through the negligence of the vessel in not providing a safe and suitable gangway as a means of ingress and egress to and from the vessel,—although the objection seems to have been only to the form of the libel (i. e., that it should have been in personam against the owners, instead of in rem against the vessel), the court, upholding, under local statutes giving a right of action for wrongful death and a lien upon vessels for injuries by them to persons or property, the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the cause in rem, and the right of the libellant to maintain the libel in that form, said: "It does not seem to me that the fact that this is not a case of collision can alter the result. The deceased was injured by a fall upon the deck of the vessel. Hence the injury was sustained upon water, not upon land. The cause is therefore within maritime jurisdiction."

In his opinion upon the hearing of this case on the merits (178 Fed. 587), the district judge said: "The further question is presented that this court is without jurisdiction of the cause. This, however, has been determined against the contention on exceptions to the libel." And the decree of the district court was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals in 112 C. C. A. 372, 191 Fed. 960.

And in The Anaces, 34 C. C. A. 558, 93 Fed. 240, reversing a decree (87 Fed. 565) which dismissed a libel in rem against a steamship to recover damages for injuries received by the libellant while working in the hold of the ship as a stevedore in the employ of a master stevedore who had a contract to load the ship, it was admitted that the libel charged a maritime tort and that the admiralty had jurisdiction,—the appellee contending only (as the district court held) that a libel in rem could not be maintained, but that the only remedy in admiralty for a personal injury to one lawfully on the ship, which resulted from the negligent failure of the officers of the ship to perform a duty necessary for his safety, was by libel in personam against the owners of the ship.

In the following cases, although the question of jurisdiction was not raised, the United States admiralty courts have entertained libels in rem against vessels, and allowed damages to stevedores, longshoremen, or other similar laborers engaged in loading or unloading the respective vessels, for injuries sustained thereon by reason of negligent or wrongful acts or omissions of persons representing the vessels,—the jurisdiction of the courts apparently being unquestionable under the locality test, and at least conceded under the maritime nature test: The Helios, 12 Fed. 732; The Max Morris, 24 Fed. 860, affirmed in 28 Fed. 881, which was affirmed in 137 U. S. 1, 34 L. ed. 586, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 29; The Carolina, 30 Fed. 199; Crawford v. The Wells City, 38 Fed. 47; Keliher v. The Nebo, 40 Fed. 31; The Frank & Willie, 45 Fed. 494; The William Branfoot, 48 Fed. 914, affirmed in 3 C. C. A. 155, 9 U. S. App.

bellant. The district court (referring to the petitioner, the Atlantic Transport Company, as the stevedore) said: "There would have been no accident had the entire hatch been uncovered. To uncover a hatch takes time and labor. If bad weather comes, it must be covered. Unnecessary uncovering is to be avoided. It is easy to make a partially covered hatch absolutely safe. The cross beams of the hatch have holes in their ends. There are corresponding holes in the hatch combings. Pins can be put through these holes. It takes about five minutes to put them in. When in place, an accident such as gave rise to this case cannot happen. The ship's carpenter of the Pretoria keeps the pins when not in use. Accidents often happen because an opened hatch has been left unguarded, or because the hatch coverings fall into the hold. When they do there is usually a dispute as to whether the ship or the stevedore is to blame. In the case at bar the ship and the stevedore were represented by the same proctors and by the same advocates. The stevedore acquits the ship. . . . The stevedore proved that, ity alone determines the admiralty jurisdiction. Only those torts are maritime which happen on navigable waters. If the injury complained of happened on land, it is not cognizable in the admiralty, even though it may have originated on the water.

. . . Now, the injury in the case at bar happened on the land. Wharves and bridges are but improvements or extensions of the shore. They are fixed and immovable, and are a mere continuation and part of the real estate to which they are attached. And this is the case, whether they project over the water or not. Injuries done to or on them, therefore, are not cognizable in the admiralty."

And admiralty has no jurisdiction of personal injuries to a seaman employed on a vessel and engaged at the time in assisting to unload her, where the injuries were sustained by him while on a wharf, although they were due to the negligence of the mate and owner of the vessel in unloading, and the cause of the injuries arose on or proceeded from the vessel. The Mary Garrett, 63 Fed. 1009.

And admiralty has no jurisdiction of an injury to one ordered by the mate of a ship to assist in carrying a barrel of oil on shore, where the injury was sustained on the land, although the cause thereof originated on the ship. Price v. The Belle of the Coast, 66 Fed. 62.

Suit against stevedore's employer.

In the few suits for injuries to stevedores which had been brought in admiralty against the stevedores' employers, it has been contended by the latter that the locality test of admiralty jurisdiction in tort cases is not exclusive, but that the maritime nature test must also be applied; and that, as their negligent or wrongful acts or omissions resulting in the injuries in question did not constitute maritime torts, the courts of admiralty had no jurisdiction. ATLANTIC TRANSPORT CO. v. IMBROVEK, however,—in which the United States Supreme Court affirmed the decree of the circuit court of appeals (113 C. C. A. 398, 193 Fed. 1019), which, in turn, affirmed, on the opinion below, the decree of the district court (190 Fed. 229),—seems to settle in the affirmative the question as to the maritime nature of an employing stevedore's negligent or wrongful act or omission resulting in a personal injury to one of his employees while engaged on a vessel, loading or unloading cargo; and this decision renders immaterial the question whether the locality test is exclusive, as, assuming that the requirement as to locality is not necessarily exclusive, the court still has jurisdiction.

This case was followed by, and its decision governed, the case of Atlantic Transport Co. v. Maryland, 234 U. S. 63, 58 L. ed. —, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 736, affirming 113 C. C. A. 408, 193 Fed. 1019, which affirmed 190 Fed. 240.

Prior to these decisions, it had been held in the circuit court of appeals of the ninth circuit, that the locality of a tort is not the exclusive test, and that admiralty had no jurisdiction over a stevedore's cause of action against the stevedore who employed him, for injuries sustained by reason of the negligence of the head stevedore, or of one of his other employees, as this was not a maritime tort. Campbell v. H. Hackfeld & Co. 62 C. C. A. 274, 125 Fed. 696.

Following this case, the district court of the western district of Washington held that, as a court of admiralty, it was without jurisdiction of a cause of action against a stevedoring company, arising out of an injury to one of its employees, caused by its negligence in leaving open, unlighted, and unguarded a hatchway through which the employee fell,—as the alleged tort was not of a maritime character. The St. David, 209 Fed. 985. In its opinion, the court noted that the decision of the court of appeals of the ninth circuit, in the Campbell Case, had been criticized by the district court of Maryland in the IMBROVEK CASE, below (190 Fed. 229), which decision had then been affirmed on the opinion below, by the circuit court of appeals of the fourth circuit (113 C. C. A. 398, 193 Fed. 1019). And the subsequent affirmance of the decision below, in the IMBROVEK CASE, by the United States Supreme Court, seems entirely to overthrow the Campbell and the St. David Cases, and to destroy their value as precedents upon the question as to the maritime nature of an employing stevedore's tort which results in personal injuries to one of his employees while at work on a vessel, loading or unloading it.

It is also apparent that Congress, in providing for the punishment of crimes committed upon navigable waters, has regarded the locality of the offense as the basis for the exercise of its authority. Act of April 30, 1790, chap. 9, § 8, 1 Stat. at L. 112, 113; act of March 3, 1825, chap. 65, 4 Stat. at L. 115; Rev. Stat. §§ 5339, 5345, 5346, U. S. Comp. But, the petitioners urge that the general statements which we have cited, with respect to the exclusiveness of the test of locality in cases of tort, are not controlling; and that in every adjudicated case in this country in which the jurisdiction of admiralty with respect to torts has been sustained, the tort, apart from the mere place of its occurrence, has been of a maritime character. It is asked whether admiralty would entertain a suit for libel or slander circulated on board a ship by one passenger against another. See Benedict, Admiralty, 4th ed. § 231. The appropriate basis, it is said, of all admiralty jurisdiction, whether in contract or in tort, is the maritime nature of the transaction or event; it is suggested that the wider authority exercised in very early times in England may be due to its antedating the recognition by the common-law courts of transitory causes of action, and thus arose by virtue of necessity.

We do not find it necessary to enter upon this broad inquiry. As this court has observed, the precise scope of admiralty jurisdiction is not a matter of "obvious principle or of very accurate history." The Blackheath (United States v. Evans) 195 U. S. 361, 365, 367, 49 L. ed. 236-238, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 46. And we are not now concerned with the extreme cases which are hypothetically presented. Even if it be assumed that the requirement as to locality in tort cases, while indispensable, is not necessarily exclusive, still in the present case the wrong which was the subject of the suit was, we think, of a maritime nature, and hence the district court, from any point of view, had jurisdiction. The petitioner contends that a maritime tort is one arising out of an injury to a ship, caused by the negligence of a ship or a person, or out of an injury to a person by the negligence of a ship; that there must either be an injury to a ship or an injury by the negligence of the ship, including therein the negligence of her owners or mariners; and that, as there was no negligence of the ship in the present case, the tort was not maritime. This view we deem to be altogether too narrow.

The libellant was injured on a ship, lying in navigable waters, and while he was engaged in the performance of a maritime service. We entertain no doubt that the service in loading and stowing a ship's cargo is of this character. Upon its proper performance depend in large measure the safe carrying of the cargo and the safety of the ship itself; and it is a service absolutely necessary to enable the ship to discharge its maritime duty. Formerly the work was done by the ship's crew; but, owing to the exigencies of increasing commerce and the demand for rapidity and special skill, it has become a specialized service devolving upon a class "as clearly identified with maritime affairs as are the mariners." See The George T. Kemp, 2 Low. Dec. 482, Fed. Cas. No. 5,341; The Circassian, 1 Ben. 209, Fed. Cas. No. 2,722; Roberts v. The Windermere, 2 Fed. 722; The Canada, 7 Sawy. 173, 7 Fed. 119; The Hattie M. Bain, 20 Fed. 389; The Gilbert Knapp, 37 Fed. 209; The Main, 2 C. C. A. 569, 2 U. S. App. 349, 51 Fed. 954; Norwegian S. S. Co. v. Washington, 6 C. C. A. 313, 13 U. S. App. 459, 57 Fed. 224; The Seguranca, 58 Fed. 908; The Allerton, 93 Fed. 219; Hughes, Admiralty, 113; Benedict, Admiralty, 4th ed. § 207. The libellant was injured because the care required by the law was not taken to protect him while he was doing this work. We take it to be clear that the district court, sitting in admiralty, was entitled to declare the applicable law in such a case, as it was within the power of Congress to modify that law. Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. 459, 12 L. ed. 235; The Lottawana (Rodd v. Hearst) 21 Wall. 558, 576, 22 L. ed. 654, 662. The fact that the ship was not found to be liable for the neglect is not controlling. If more is required than the locality of the wrong in order to give the court jurisdic-mobiles from appellees before this time. Appellees sent an automobile and driver to the place designated by Forbes. Forbes and Mr. and Mrs. E. L. Smith, as his guests, entered the automobile and gave directions to the driver as to the places where they wished to go. The driver had control of the machine, and the management of it, and drove it to the places directed by Forbes. While going along High street, in the city of Little Rock, the automobile ran into an express wagon, and Forbes was killed and Mrs. Smith severely injured. The testimony on the part of appellants tends to show that the collision occurred by reason of the negligence of the driver of the automobile, while the testimony of appellees tends to show that it was caused by the negligence of the driver of the express wagon. Appellees testified that the chauffeur in charge of their car was an experienced driver, and had been in their employment as long as they had been in the business of hiring out automobiles; that he had never had an accident before, and was both careful and skillful; that the car in question cost $3,500, and was in perfect condition. The circuit court directed a verdict in favor of appellees on the ground that the only duty appellees owed to the occupants of the car was that of exercising ordinary care in furnishing a safe automobile and a careful and reliable chauffeur. To reverse the judgment rendered, appellants have prosecuted this appeal.

Mr. Hutchinson, in his work on Carriers (3d ed. vol. 1, § 35), says that private carriers for hire are such as make no public profession that they will carry for all who apply, but who occasionally, or upon the particular occasion, undertake for compensation to carry the goods of others upon such terms as may be agreed upon. At § 37, the same author says that, the bailment to the private carrier for hire being for the mutual benefit of the parties, the law exacts of him a higher degree of diligence than of the carrier without hire; that the measure of his duty is what is known as ordinary care or diligence, and for the lack of this he will be held liable. Again, at § 96 of the same volume, he says:

As to liability of automobile owner for negligence of chauffeur furnished by third person, see notes to Neff v. Brandeis, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 933, and Dalrymple v. Covey Motor Car Co. 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 424.

In Rodenburg v. Clinton Auto & Garage Co. 84 N. J. L. 545, 87 Atl. 71, holding that the submission to the jury of the question whether the chauffeur was the servant of the defendant, an automobile livery company, or of one of its regular customers, who had indicated the destination of the car, and as whose guest the plaintiff was riding at the time of the accident, was not prejudicial to the defendant, the evidence not being sufficient to remove the question from their consideration, the court remarked that normally the driver of a hired conveyance, when furnished and paid by the owner thereof, is the latter's servant, and not the servant of the hirer, and that the owner is liable for the driver's negligence, unless it appears that the hirer has exercised such control over the operation of the car as to make the negligence of the driver his own.

In Neumiller v. Acme Motor Car Co. 49 Pa. Super. Ct. 183, where the defendant corporation rented an automobile to the plaintiff and selected one of its drivers to operate the car, and there was no attempt on the part of the plaintiff to affect or control the management of the machine, it was held that the defendant was liable for an injury to the plaintiff which resulted from the chauffeur's negligence.

And in Wallace v. Keystone Automobile Co. 239 Pa. 110, 86 Atl. 609, the rule of respondet superior was held to apply where an automobile was rented to the plaintiff's husband by the defendant company, and a chauffeur furnished by the company to operate the machine had charge of it when the plaintiff was injured and her husband killed through such chauffeur's negligence in leaving the mechanism of the machine so that it started while he was away from it, and ran against a tree.

In Swancutt v. W. M. Trout Auto Livery Co. 176 Ill. App. 606, the question whether a chauffeur of a taxicab was acting within the scope of his employment was held to be for the jury, it appearing that, after performing the service for which the taxicab had been despatched, he proceeded to a place some distance away in order to "pick up" a load, and by his negligence injured a passenger who had been so "picked up," there being evidence that he had been instructed not to pick up passengers, and to do only livery work, but that defendant's chauffeurs did pick up passengers, and, while it was unusual for them to turn in the money so earned, it was sometimes turned in and accepted by the company, and that, had the chauffeur turned in the fee for carrying the plaintiff, it would have been accepted with a caution.

In Hannon v. Van Dyke Co. 154 Wis. 454, 143 N. W. 150, where defendant, a corporation engaged in the real estate business, through its secretary, hired an automobile to take the plaintiff and a friend to see a farm, there being an agreement to divide the commission with the plaintiff in case the sale was made, it was held that the chauffeur was not the agent or servant of the defendant, and the latter was not responsible for his negligence, it appearing that the secretary sat on the front seat with the driver, and the plaintiff on the back seat; and that the machine was driven fast both going and returning, but no protests were made except that the secretary told the driver once to be careful. J. T. W.

tor vehicle hired to a third person, who exercises no control over the driver of the automobile other than telling him where to go, is liable in damages to pedestrians or the occupants of other vehicles who are injured by the negligence of the chauffeur, we can see no difference in principle in such a case and in one where the occupants of the carriage are injured by the negligence of the chauffeur; for the liability of the owner in each case turns upon the question of whether the chauffeur is his servant or not. If the chauffeur is the servant of the owner, as to strangers, it cannot upon principle be said that he is the servant of the person hiring the vehicle, when the latter is injured and sues the owner for damages.

Counsel for appellants have cited numerous cases in their brief; but many of them have only an indirect application to the facts of the present case, and we shall only cite those which we deem squarely in point. In the case of Johnson v. Coey, 237 Ill. 88, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 81, 86 N. E. 678, the court held: "The owner of a passenger-carrying automobile cannot escape liability for injury to a passenger caused by collision between the automobile and a street car, if the chauffeur negligently ran near the car at high speed without having the machine under control, and, without such negligence, the accident would not have happened, although the immediate cause of the accident was the breaking of a brake rod through a latent defect, for which the owner was not responsible."

In the case of Gerretson v. Rambler Garage Co. 149 Wis. 528, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 457, 136 N. W. 186, the supreme court of Wisconsin held: "A chauffeur sent by the owner of a garage to operate an automobile leased for a pleasure ride, and who obeys the directions of the lessee merely as to routes, is the servant of the owner of the garage, and the latter will be liable for injury inflicted upon occupants of the car through his negligence."

In the case of Meyers v. Tri-State Automobile Co. 121 Minn. 68, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 113, 140 N. W. 184, the supreme court of Minnesota held: "Where a dealer in automobiles and owner of a garage lets a car for hire and furnishes a driver, and the hirer exercises no control or supervision over the driver except to direct him where to go and what route to take, and to caution him against improper driving, the owner is responsible for the negligence of the driver, and the hirer may recover from the owner in damages for an injury caused by the driver's negligence." The court said: "Both on principle and authority, we decline to follow the rule that the defendant is liable only for the exercise of care in the 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

selection of the driver. We apply the ordinary rule of respondent superior to this case, and hold that, where a dealer in automobiles and owner of a garage lets a car for hire and furnishes a driver, and the hirer exercises no control or supervision over the driver except to direct him where to go and what route to take, and to caution him against improper driving, the owner is responsible for the negligence of the driver, and the hirer may recover from the owner in damages for an injury caused by the driver's negligence."

In Routledge v. Rambler Automobile Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 95 S. W. 749, plaintiff was riding as guest of others who had hired an automobile and chauffeur. It was held he was entitled to recover for an injury caused by the negligence of the chauffeur.

As we have already seen, a private carrier is not bound to exercise the highest degree of care for the safety of his passengers, as in the case of a common carrier; but he is bound to exercise ordinary care and diligence to carry his passengers safely. If a private carrier should drive his own vehicle and should cause injury to his passengers by his negligent driving, he could not escape liability by proving that he was ordinarily a safe and careful driver. The reason is that in such case he is a wrongdoer, and, his primary negligence being the proximate cause of the injury, he is liable for the damages sustained. So, too, if he delegates to another the duty to drive his vehicle, and his passengers are injured by reason of the negligence of his driver, the rule of respondent superior applies, and the owner is liable. In the case at bar, under the facts shown by appellants, the occupants of the car exercised no authority whatever over the driver, except to direct him where to go. The operation and management of the car were exclusively in charge of the driver. The testimony of appellants also shows that the occupants of the car were injured by the negligence of the driver. It would not be doubted for an instant that in such a case the driver himself would be liable. This is so because, under the circumstances, he would be a wrongdoer, and, his primary negligence being the proximate cause of the injury to the passengers, he would be liable therefor. If, as we have already seen, he was at the time the servant of the owner of the car, such owner would also be liable in damages under the doctrine of respondent superior. This rule is especially applicable in the case of one letting out automobiles for hire. Motor vehicles are complicated machines, and are capable of being run at a very high rate of speed. It is necessary for the safety of their occupants, as well as for the protection of pedestrians and other persons in vehicles using the streets, that the drivers of such machines should be competent persons, and that such drivers be required to exercise ordinary care and diligence in running their machines. Under the authority cited above, and upon principle, we do not think that the owner of an automobile, under the facts shown by appellants, can absolve himself from liability by proving that he had employed a careful and competent driver. He also owes the occupants of the automobile the duty to exercise ordinary care to carry them safely to their destination.

It follows that the court erred in directing a verdict for appellees, and for that error the judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

MABEL R. JONES, Plff. in Err.,
v.
SAVANNAH HOTEL COMPANY.
(141 Ga. 530, 81 S. E. 874.)

Innkeeper — theft of personal ornaments — liability.

1. Where an innkeeper had an iron safe for the deposit of valuable articles, and posted in the rooms of the guests the notice required by Civil Code, § 3510, and a guest upon retiring for the night took from her person five diamond rings, one watch bracelet, and one topaz chain and watch, which she had been wearing for personal adornment, and which were suitable to her station in life, and placed them upon a bureau in her room, and during the night they were stolen therefrom by some unknown person, the innkeeper was not liable for the value of the articles.

Headnotes by FISH, Ch. J.

Note. — Effect of statute limiting innkeeper's liability for goods not delivered into his custody.

The earlier cases upon this question are treated in the note to Rockhill v. Congress Hotel Co. 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 576, the present annotation being merely supplementary thereto.

The present, like the earlier, note does not go into the question of what constitutes a sufficient compliance with the statute by the innkeeper.

Of course, in order to claim the exemption afforded by the statute, the innkeeper must provide the safe and give the notice required; and if he fails, his liability, in the absence of further controlling statutory provision, is determined according to common-law principles. Watt v. Kilbury, 53 Wash. 446, 102 Pac. 403. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Same — negligence — effect.

2. Nor would the innkeeper in such a case be liable if it appeared that such articles were stolen in consequence of his negligence, either in failing to provide a suitable lock on the door of the room of the guest, or in placing a fire escape in such a manner as to afford easy access to the room from the street below.

QUESTIONS CERTIFIED by the Court of Appeals arising upon a writ of error to review a judgment of the City Court of Savannah in defendant's favor in an action to recover the value of goods stolen from plaintiff while a guest in defendant's hotel. Answers favoring affirmance returned.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. O'Byrne, Hartridge, & Wright, for plaintiff in error:

The liability of an innkeeper in this state is that of an insurer.

All words of a statute are to be given due weight and meaning.

Property of a different description, including all that which is useful or necessary to the comfort or convenience of the guest, that which is usually carried and worn as a part of the ordinary apparel and outfit, or is ordinarily used, and is convenient for use, by travelers as well in as out of their rooms, is left, as before the statute, at the risk of the innkeeper.

Ramaley v. Leland, 43 N. Y. 539, 3 Am. Rep. 728.

And when both the innkeeper and the guest comply with the terms of the statute, the former is liable unless his liability is otherwise limited by the statute. See Blake v. DeJonghe Hotel & Restaurant Co. 260 Ill. 348, 103 N. E. 225, reversing on other grounds 174 Ill. App. 129, which held that, in order to render an innkeeper liable for the loss of a small leather jewel case and contents deposited with him by a guest for safe-keeping, it was not necessary for the guest to acquaint the innkeeper with the value of the jewels deposited; and Hyman v. South Coast Hotel Co. 146 App. Div. 341, 130 N. Y. Supp. 766, holding that an innkeeper with whom jewelry had been deposited, if lost or destroyed while in the hotel safe, would be liable not exceeding the maximum amount set by the statute for loss in such cases.

But few recent cases have passed upon

The innkeeper may by notice require the guest to conform to reasonable rules, but the notice is effective only as to property which can conveniently be left in the safe, not as to property which the guest needs to keep by him; if applied to such property it would be unreasonable. Clothing and articles of daily use are therefore not covered by the notice.

It is not necessary for the plaintiff to charge or to prove negligence on the part of the innkeeper.

Messrs. Adams & Adams for defendant in error.

Fish, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court of appeals desires instruction from the supreme court upon the following questions, a decision of which is necessary to the determination of the case of Jones v. Savannah Hotel Company, to wit:

"1. A female guest at an inn retired for the night, and, before doing so, took from her person the following articles, which she had been wearing for personal adornment, and which were suitable to her station in the question of what effects or goods are embraced within the statute. Of this character is JONES v. SAVANNAH HOTEL CO., holding that five diamond rings, one watch bracelet, and one topaz chain and watch worn for personal adornment, and in keeping with the station in life of the wearer, were articles for the loss of which the innkeeper was relieved from liability under a statute excusing him from liability for loss of "valuable articles" unless deposited with him for safe-keeping, he having complied with the statute, and the guest having failed to do so. This case was followed in Jones v. Savannah Hotel Co. — Ga. App. —, 82 S. E. 155, wherein it was held that a watch and jewelry stolen from a guest's room were embraced within the statute. On the other hand, it has recently been held that a gold watch and chain in habitual use life, and placed them upon the bureau in her room: Five diamond rings, one watch bracelet, one topaz chain and watch. During the night all of these articles were stolen from the room by some person unknown. The innkeeper had an iron safe for the deposit of valuable articles, and had posted in the room of the guest the notice required by § 3510 of the Civil Code. Is the guest entitled to recover from the innkeeper the value of the property stolen?

"2. If, in answer to the foregoing question, this court should be instructed that the articles above described were such as are in the purview of the foregoing section of the Code, would the guest, notwithstanding any negligence in her failure to deposit the articles in the innkeeper's safe, be entitled to recover, if it appeared that the articles were stolen in consequence of the negligence of the innkeeper, either in failing to provide a suitable lock on the door, or in placing a fire escape in such a manner as to afford easy access to the room of the guest from the street below?"

At common law an innkeeper was an insurer of the goods of his guest. Under the law of this state, however, an innkeeper may relieve himself from responsibility for valuable articles belonging to his guest. The Civil Code, § 3510, declares: "The innkeeper may provide an iron safe, or other place of deposit for valuable articles, and, by posting a notice thereof, may require his guests to place such valuable articles therein, or he will be relieved from responsibility for them." It appears in the first question propounded that the innkeeper in the present case had an iron safe for the deposit of valuable articles, and had posted in the room of the guest the notice required by the above section of the Code, which notice as appears from the record is as follows: "The proprietors of this hotel will not be responsible for money, jewels, or other valuables, unless deposited by a guest were neither "jewelry" nor "articles of gold and silver manufacture" nor "personal ornaments," within the meaning of a statute limiting the liability of innkeepers who maintain a safe or vault for such effects, unless they are offered by the guest for safe-keeping. Weadock v. Swart, 163 Mich. 602, 128 N. W. 734, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 959.

As to duty and liability of boarding house keeper or innkeeper with respect to property of boarder, as distinguished from guest, see note to Coe v. Ricker, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 31.

As to innkeeper's liability for loss or destruction of commercial traveler's samples, see note to Williams v. Norvell Shapleigh Hardware Co. 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 350.

G. J. C.

From what has been stated it is manifest that the guest was not entitled to recover in the case at bar from the innkeeper the value of the property stolen, and it follows that the first question must be answered in the negative.

2. As the statute declares that the innkeeper will be relieved from responsibility for valuable articles belonging to his guest if he provides an iron safe or other place of deposit for such articles, and posts a notice in accordance with the statute, requiring his guest to place such articles in the safe or other place of deposit, it must follow, where the innkeeper has complied with the requirements of the statute, thus relieving himself from responsibility for such articles, that a guest who failed to comply with such notice could not recover from the innkeeper if it appeared that the articles were stolen in consequence of the negligence of the latter, either in failing to provide a suitable lock on the door of the room occupied by the guest, or in placing a fire escape in such a manner as to afford easy access to the room from the street below. Had the guest complied with the notice, and thereafter the innkeeper had failed to use the measure of diligence required by the statute, he would have been liable. To hold that, without complying with the requirements of the notice authorized by the statute, the guest could nevertheless recover as to articles covered by the notice, merely by showing want of diligence on the part of the innkeeper in the respect named, would practically make the statute nugatory. A negative answer is therefore given also to the second question.

NEW ORLEANS RAILWAY & LIGHT COMPANY, Appt.

(— La. —, 65 So. 225.)

Carrier — objectionable remarks of conductor — liability.

Objectionable remarks addressed by a street car conductor to a patron of the road, referring to her personal appearance, while on the car, which mortify and humiliate her, are actionable, and the car company will be held in damages therefor.

Headnote by SOMMERVILLE, J.

(May 11, 1914.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries sustained while a passenger on defendant's car, and for humiliation and mortification caused by the actions of the conductor on the car. Amended and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hall, Monroe, & Lemahn for appellant.

Messrs. Woodville & Woodville for appellee.

Sommerville, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff, a passenger on one of defendant's cars, fell while the car was making a curve at the intersection of two streets in New Orleans, and she was injured to a certain extent. She also alleges that she was humiliated and mortified by the actions of the conductor on the car, for all of which she asks for pecuniary damages.

There was a verdict and judgment for $500 against defendant, and it has appealed.

The testimony fails to disclose any fault on the part of defendant, for the accident to plaintiff. The tracks and rolling stock of defendant were not shown to be in poor condition, and it does not appear that the speed of the car was at an unusual rate in making the curve around the corner referred to. Defendant used proper precautions in operating the car at the time of the accident; and it cannot be held in damages for an accident in a curve which it was required to make, and which accident occurred without its fault.

The humiliation and mortification of which plaintiff complains were caused by the conductor when she was alighting from the car. He referred to her as "a big fat woman," and he assumed to reprimand her for sitting where she had been seated in the car. Plaintiff testifies that the conductor said to her: "You had no business sitting in front of the car,—a big fat woman like you had no business sitting in front of the car. Why didn't you sit in the back?"

cinnati Northern Traction Co. v. Rosnagle, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1030.

For humiliation as element of damages for exclusion from place of amusement, see note to Aaron v. Ward, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 204.

Note.—As to liability of carrier for mental suffering of passenger from mere verbal abuse, unaccompanied by other breach of duty, see notes to St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Taylor, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 159, and Bleecker v. Colorado & S. R. Co. 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 386. See also case of Cincinnati Northern Traction Co. v. Rosnagle, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1030.

The conductor was absent from New Orleans at the time of the trial, and a statement made by him was admitted in evidence by consent of plaintiff, so as not to delay the trial of the cause. He was not therefore subjected to cross-examination. The conductor states that he told plaintiff "that a stout person like herself ought to seat herself at the rear end of the car."

The statements of plaintiff and the conductor show that the latter used language to plaintiff which was disrespectful and humiliating to her. The personal appearance of a patron of a street car is not a proper subject of comment by the employees of the defendant company. Neither should the conductor undertake to dictate to a passenger as to where she should sit in a car which has no reserved seats.

The language used by defendant's employee was humiliating and mortifying to a sensitive woman, and defendant did not give to plaintiff that care and respectful consideration and attention which it, as a common carrier, owed her while she was using its car, and it is responsible in damages for the annoyance and injured feelings caused to plaintiff through the fault of its employee. Lamson v. Great Northern R. Co. 114 Minn. 182, 130 N. W. 945, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 15.

It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be amended by reducing it to $250, and, as thus amended, it is affirmed.

v.

FREDERICK TUELL.

(111 Me. 566, 90 Atl. 484.)

Water — injury to bridge over floatable stream — common nuisance.

One driving logs down a floatable stream

Note. — Right of one who navigates stream or floats logs therein to abate nuisance arising from bridge.

Some of the earlier cases on this question may be found in the note to Hutton v. Webb, 59 L.R.A. 33, which discusses generally the right to obstruct or destroy rights of navigation.

Generally, as to private right of action for obstruction of navigable stream, see notes to Viebahn v. Crow Wing County, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1126, and Swain v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 763.

As to relative rights and duties of those maintaining bridges across streams and those floating logs therein, see note to Ida, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

is not liable for injury to a bridge erected by a municipality in such manner as to constitute a common nuisance, by the necessary use of explosives to move logs which have jammed in the spaces between the abutments, if he is careful to do as little injury as is consistent with the accomplishment of his purpose.

(May 5, 1914.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Washington County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent and wrongful damaging of a bridge by defendant, which resulted in a verdict for plaintiff. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. B. Donworth and E. C. Donworth, for defendant:

When a tangible, physical, public nuisance presents an obstruction to an individual right, particularly as of passage over a highway or navigable waters, the person whose passage is so obstructed has the unquestionable right peaceably to remove so much of the obstruction as will afford him passage.

Hamilton v. Goding, 55 Me. 427; Mann v. Marston, 12 Me. 38; Corthell v. Holmes, 87 Me. 24, 32 Atl. 715, 88 Me. 376, 34 Atl. 173; Brown v. Perkins, 12 Gray, 101.

Messrs. Ashley St. Clair and J. H. Gray for plaintiff.

Spear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on the case in which the plaintiff town seeks to recover damages of the defendant for wilfully, negligently, and wrongfully damaging a bridge by using dynamite or other explosives in such close proximity to the abutment of the bridge as to tear it apart and damage it, thereby rendering the superstructure unsafe and dangerous for public travel, so that they were obliged to close the bridge and repair it at a large expense. At the

Generally, where there is an obstruction of navigation, it may be abated by any person who is injured thereby in his right, where no breach of the peace is involved, irrespective of how long the obstruction has been in existence. It has been held, however, that the obstruction must be peculiarly injurious to the person abating it, as distinguished from the injury resulting to the public. 29 Cyc. 325. See also 1 Farnham, Waters, pp. 406, 441.

Thus, where a logger's whole drive might have been held up on the river for a year, unless he was permitted to interfere with a bridge in his path to the necessary extent

Cathance stream, in Marion. By the exceptions it appears that the stream was "a floatable highway, and has been used by the public from time immemorial for the purpose of floating logs and timber from the forests to the mills; that the defendant at the time of the alleged wrongful act was engaged with his crew in the performance of his contract to drive approximately 1,100,000 feet of logs from Cathance lake in and down said stream to the mill pond of Dennysville Lumber Company, of Dennysville." The exceptions further show that the explosive was never used unless absolutely necessary, and that, in getting the logs by the abutments, the or they caused any injury to the bridge or abutments by the use of dynamite or otherwise, such injury was wholly unintentional. The defendant also denies that any damage to the structure was caused by the explosion, claiming that, if any injury was occasioned to the bridge by the passage of his logs, it was done by the impacts of the logs against the abutments, and by the logs frequently being driven by the force of the current into the openings, and in the process of disengaging the logs when so interposed.

The declaration does not allege, nor is it anywhere contended, that the defendant, in the use which he made of dynamite, had of making a passageway, it was held in MARION v. TUELL that he had a right to interfere with the bridge to the extent of removing so much of it as became a nuisance in the path of his logs in their course down the stream.

So, where a bridge across a navigable river had, pursuant to an act of Congress, been declared an unreasonable impediment to navigation, and therefore a public nuisance, it was held in E. A. Chatfield Co. v. New Haven, 110 Fed. 788, that a manufacturer could maintain a suit to abate such nuisance upon proof that he had been specially injured by the bridge preventing the passage of his merchandise vessel.

It is held in Barnes v. Racine, 4 Wis. 454, that a city, under the general powers given it by charter to erect bridges over navigable waters within its limits, had no authority to erect a bridge over a river that would obstruct navigation; and that a bridge erected in the angle of a river so as to make it almost impossible for vessels to pass through the draw without getting aground constitutes a nuisance which a private person specially injured thereby may abate, especially where it appears that a few rods above or below the place where the bridge is erected no such consequence would follow the erection of a suitable bridge, and it does not appear but that the public would be as well accommodated by a bridge at either of those places as by the one in question.

Where the legislature authorized plaintiff to erect a toll bridge across a navigable river, and defendant removed part of it to permit his boat to pass, it was held in Selman v. Wolfe, 27 Tex. 68, that the legislature did not authorize the erection of a bridge that would obstruct navigation, and that, so far as the bridge was an obstruction to navigation, it was unlawful and constituted a nuisance which defendant had a right to abate.

So, where defendants were indicted for obstructing a public highway, having removed part of a bridge over the Neuse river to allow their steamboat to pass, it was held in State v. Dibble, 49 N. C. (4 Jones, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.))

L.) 107, that, the legislature having declared such river a navigable stream, a bridge built across it under the authority of the county court, obstructing navigation, was necessarily a nuisance which the defendants or any other person had a right to abate. The principle applicable to this case is that any unauthorized obstruction in a navigable stream, by means of a bridge or dam of any kind, is a public nuisance which any person may abate, and if it be put there under the authority of the sovereign, it will be protected only so far and so long as it is confined within the limits of the authority. "The Neuse river," said the court, "having been thus recognized as a navigable water, the defendants had the right in common with all other citizens to navigate it with their boats, and as an incident to such right to remove all obstructions not put there by or under the sovereign power. It is admitted that the sovereign power in the present case is the general assembly of the state."

To the same effect is State v. Parrott, 71 N. C. 311, 17 Am. Rep. 5, where the owners of a steamboat were held not guilty of trespass in tearing down a portion of a railroad bridge across the Neuse, which obstructed the navigation thereof. "It is insisted, however," said the court, "that while an individual cannot obstruct a navigable stream, yet the state may do it on the inland streams unless Congress oppose; and here the state did authorize the railroad to build the bridge. It is true the state did authorize the railroad to build a bridge across the Neuse, but it did not authorize the bridge to be so built as to obstruct navigation, but required a draw to be in the bridge so as to permit navigation. This was not done."

So, one was held, in Arundel v. McCulloch, 10 Mass. 70, justified in removing a bridge erected by a town across a navigable stream, in order to facilitate the passage of his vessel, although the bridge had been maintained at the same place for over fifty years. The court observed that "it is an unquestionable principle of the common law that all navigable waters belong to the abutment in so doing. That this was the theory of the ruling will appear from the following testimony and colloquy: John A. Robinson, called by defendant, was asked on direct examination:

Q. When a log was under water, what did you do?

A. If the log was under water we cut it with dynamite.

Q. Why didn't you shut the gates down above and let the water run out, so it would be on the surface?

A. No river driver does that.

Q. Why didn't you do it?

The court: It don't make any difference

why he didn't do it. We are not trying out the right of Mr. Tuell to drive logs there, because he had a right to. He has got a suit against the town for being obstructed in doing it. That don't have anything to do with this case. Whether they did this or didn't do that don't have anything to do with it.

Mr. E. C. Donworth: If the court please, our contention is that if this man Tuell used reasonable care, and used dynamite when it was reasonably necessary, and the bridge was injured thereby, we are not chargeable.

The court: I shall rule that if he blew traffic contract with a named railroad for the express purpose of operating his said boat through the stream so obstructed, and had used said stream for years, and had built up a good business, which said obstruction to the navigation thereof has almost entirely destroyed, and his said boat has been idle the greater part of the time since such bridge was built, and that, as a citizen and taxpayer of the state and county, he is entitled to the full protection of the law, against the wilful violation and defiance of the laws of navigation by the defendant, where the proofs show that, since the construction of the bridge, there is no navigation under said bridge, and that complainant's boat cannot pass thereunder, and there is no showing of injury or damage to complainant different in kind from that of any other person who might undertake to use the stream for purposes of navigation under similar circumstances.

So, it was held in Whitehead v. Jessup, 53 Fed. 707, that a riparian owner could not compel, by an action in his own name, the removal of a bridge spanning a navigable channel, where he failed to show injury different in kind from that sustained by the general public using such waters, access to the channel in front of his land being unobstructed by the bridge, and his land lying half a mile from the bridge, although in passing by the navigable channel to adjacent waters, his boats were obstructed by such bridge. The court observed that the law applicable to such a case is that "an obstruction in front of one's own premises may prevent him from entering upon the highway, and thus interfere with a peculiar right. But when he is once upon the highway he is a traveler, like the rest of the public; and though an obstruction at a distance may as effectually prevent ingress and egress as when it is opposite his door, yet the right to pass along the way is one which he shares in common with the general public."

So, it was held in Jarvis v. Santa Clara Valley R. Co. 52 Cal. 438, that a private person could not maintain an action to abate a nuisance arising from a bridge obstructing the navigation of a navigable stream, where he failed to show damage peculiar to himself and differing in kind 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) and character from that suffered by members of the general public having occasion to use the navigable stream. In the above case it was alleged that the defendants had obstructed the navigation of the creek by driving piles and building a bridge across it, in which they had placed a draw only 36 feet in width; that the bridge and draw deflected from a right angle to the current of the stream so that a vessel in passing through would strike against the side, and that the draw should have been 50 feet in width, and that it was a nuisance and a perpetual obstruction to the navigation of the creek, and delayed the plaintiffs in the navigation of their vessel, and that they had sustained $50 damage. There was a prayer that the bridge be abated as a nuisance, and that the defendants be enjoined from constructing or maintaining a bridge unless it had a draw 50 feet in width placed at right angles to the stream.

The statute giving the right to "any person injured thereby" to maintain an action to abate a nuisance does not change the ordinary rule that a private individual will not be allowed to maintain an action to restrain or abate a public nuisance unless he can show some peculiar or special damage or injury to himself. Consequently, a person who, after the erection of a bridge over a lake, has purchased boats and is engaged in the business of renting them, has no other or different rights than are enjoyed by other persons in respect to the navigation of the lake, sufficient to enable him to maintain an action to abate the bridge as a nuisance on the ground that it obstructs the navigation of the lake. Innis v. Cedar Rapids, I. F. & N. W. R. Co. 76 Iowa, 165, 2 L.R.A. 282, 40 N. W. 701.

In State v. Leighton, 83 Me. 419, 22 Atl. 380, defendant was found guilty of obstructing and encumbering a public highway by cutting down and destroying a public bridge leading across a river. Defendant's contention was that he had occasion to navigate the river by his small schooner loaded with lumber, and that the bridge was a nuisance to the public and of special damage to himself, and for that reason he had a right to cut it down and move it. It was held that the bridge was constructed, maintained, and used by legal authority as this bridge up, or an abutment to it, by the use of dynamite, and thereby destroyed it, he is liable in this action. A man cannot abate a public nuisance by saying that he exercised reasonable care. He may abate a private nuisance and may not be liable in damages, but a public nuisance must be abated by officers chosen by the public to do it. If you leave it for every man to determine whether he may abate a public nuisance, we shall be blowing up all the bridges in the state. The law says Mr. Tuell had no right to blow the bridge up, if he did.

Mr. E. C. Donworth: He is chargeable in damages if he did it accidentally?

The court: Yes, I shall so instruct the jury.

And the court did so instruct them, saying: "(1) If it was a public nuisance, neither the defendant nor his servant or agent had any right to abate it or remove it or destroy it. (2) If you should find it was an obstruction to public navigation, so that it impeded the passage of the defendant's logs, it was a public nuisance, and neither he nor his servants had any right to remove or destroy it." The court proceeded to say: "Now, you will determine, first, gentlemen, whether the defendant or his servant or agent did explode this dynamite there, as it is claimed. If they did, I instruct you that they are liable for it, and the defendant must make the town whole for the damage he caused in blowing up or damaging the abutment there, if he did it either by himself or his servant or agent." These rulings are erroneous. As already noted, they proceed upon the ground that the bridge was a public nuisance, and, because it was a public nuisance, the defendant had no right to do it any injury, although it was necessary in order to enable him to extricate the logs that had been driven into the openings of the abutment, and remove those that had jammed against it, so that perhaps the whole drive should not be held up.

We do not understand this to be the law. Upon the assumption that the bridge was a nuisance, which the jury might have found if the question had been open to them, it was the undoubted right of the defendant to do whatever was reasonable and necessary to remove so much of the structure as deprived him of the lawful use of the stream for driving his logs. This rule is founded, not only upon authority, but necessity. In the case at bar the defendant was driving down this floatable river, a legal highway for the passage of all lawful traffic, more than a million feet of logs, worth from $10,000 to $20,000. It is common knowledge that the driving pitch of water at best is short, and at times very limited. It is equally well known, if a drive of logs is stalled and has to lie over for a season, there is a great depreciation of value. Accordingly, unless the defendant was permitted to interfere with this nuisance in his path to the necessary extent of making a passageway, his whole drive might have been held up on the river for a year. Resort to the courts for the abatement of such a nuisance would be entirely inefficient and futile. And the law does not require it.

The plaintiffs, however, contend that the bridge, having been located by municipal authority, is a legal structure, and, if a common nuisance, cannot be abated by a private individual, and cites State v. Leighton, 83 Me. 419, 22 Atl. 380, as authority for this doctrine. The brief interprets the opinion in this language: "A lawful structure, though a public nuisance, cannot be removed, or the public nuisance abated, a part of the public highway, and that the defendant had no justification in destroying it.

Where one gently removed a bridge crossing a navigable river so as to permit the passage of his rafts and timber, it was held in Wellington County v. Wilson, 16 U. C. C. P. 124, that the county could maintain an action for the destruction of the bridge within its limits, and could recover damages therefor.

In Mississippi & M. R. Co. v. Ward, 2 Black, 485, 17 L. ed. 311, plaintiff, being owner of three steamboats and commander of one of them, navigating the Mississippi river between St. Louis and St. Paul, sought to abate as a nuisance obstructing navigation a bridge across the river between Illinois and Iowa. The court dismissed the case on the ground that the whole nuisance was not within the power of the court, since its jurisdiction extended only to the middle of the river and it was doubtful whether the Iowa side of the bridge, which was in its jurisdiction, was a serious obstruction amounting to a nuisance.

It is held in Thurlow Twp. v. Bogart, 15 U. C. C. P. 9, that one cannot excuse the destruction of a bridge by pleading the coming of his timber and logs against it as an unavoidable act which could not have been prevented by due and reasonable care and diligence on his part, by reason of its obstruction and hindrance to the free navigation of the river for the passage of such timber and logs, where he failed to show that the bridge was a nuisance, or that, by the improper construction of the bridge, the acts complained of were really inevitable on his part, or by superior agency acting against him, and that he was acting with due and reasonable care and skill in the navigation of his timber.

J. D. C.

by one whose individual rights are affected thereby." This statement is inconsistent with itself. A lawful structure is not a common nuisance. In other words, a common nuisance is not lawful. Nor does this case hold or intimate that the bridge destroyed by the defendant was a common nuisance. The decision is based solely upon the ground that the bridge was authorized to be built over tide waters, not under the general powers of municipal officers to lay out highways, but by an act of the legislature giving specific authority to build over this specific water. The word "nuisance" is not to be found in the opinion. True, a bridge built by municipal authority is not of itself a common nuisance. In the case at bar the offending thing is not the bridge itself, but the manner of the placing and construction of it. The town had a right to build this bridge under authority of the general statute. But a bridge built by such authority over a navigable or floatable stream, in such a manner as to unreasonably interfere with navigation or the use of a stream for floatable purposes, is per se a common nuisance. Windfall Mfg. Co. v. Patterson, 148 Ind. 414, 37 L.R.A. 381, 62 Am. St. Rep. 532, 47 N. E. 2, 18 Mor. Min. Rep. 674. In a broad sense a common nuisance is an unlawful condition. A municipality has no more right to establish such a condition than an individual. Mootry v. Danbury, 45 Conn. 550, 29 Am. Rep. 703, is a case which seems to be on all fours with the case at bar. It involved the erection of a bridge that flowed the water back upon the plaintiff. A general demurrer was filed to the declaration, and argued upon the ground that the duty of towns to keep their highways in repair was imperative under the statute. Upon this contention, after alluding to the statute regarding the liability of towns for defects, the court say: "The liability of the defendants, therefore, if liable at all, must rest upon broader grounds than that statute. The statute simply compels them to do by making them liable in damages if they fail to do. A principle of universal application that every man shall transact his lawful business in such a manner as to do no unnecessary injury to another compels them to do what they are required to do in a proper manner. In other words, towns will not be justified in doing an act lawful in itself in such a manner as to create a nuisance any more than individuals, and if a nuisance is thus created, whereby another suffers damage, towns, like individuals, are responsible." To the same effect is Danbury & N. R. Co. v. Norwalk, 37 Conn. 109.

Upon this theory of the law that a town has no right to create a nuisance, the principle laid down in Brown v. Perkins, 12 Gray, 89, must control this class of cases. Shaw, Ch. J., clearly states the rule as follows: "The true theory of abatement of nuisance is that an individual citizen may abate a private nuisance injurious to him, when he could also bring an action; and also, when a common nuisance obstructs his individual right, he may remove it to enable him to enjoy that right, and he cannot be called in question for so doing. As in the case of the obstruction across a highway, and an unauthorized bridge over a navigable water course, if he has occasion to use it, he may remove it by way of abatement." This theory of the law was followed in Mann v. Marston, 12 Me. 32, and in Hamilton v. Goding, 55 Me. 419, in which the language of Brown v. Perkins is cited with approval. In Corthell v. Holmes, 87 Me. 24, 32 Atl. 715, the court says: "When a public nuisance obstructs an individual's right, he may remove it to enable him to enjoy that right,"—and also cites Brown v. Perkins. In a case between the same parties in 88 Me. 376, 34 Atl. 173, the court sustained this doctrine, citing many cases.

Upon authority, as well as reason, the defendant had a right to interfere with the bridge to the extent of removing so much of it as became a nuisance in the path of his logs in their course down the stream.

But in doing this it was incumbent upon the defendant to do as little damage as was consistent with the accomplishment of his purpose. Accordingly, the defense offered, tending to show due care on the part of the defendant in extricating his logs from the abutment, was admissible, and the ruling excluding it erroneous. It was the duty of the defendant, in pursuing the lawful right of passage through this bridge, to do only what was reasonable and necessary to attain his end. He was bound to act within the standard of due care. He could not wantonly and wilfully do damage that was unnecessary. The last paragraph of Corthell v. Holmes, 88 Me. supra, confirms this view. It says: "The defendant's plea avers that he removed the encumbrances placed in the way by the plaintiff, with due care and without damage more than necessary to secure the passage for himself and his teams, agents and servants, over the same." All this is admitted by the demurrer, and is a good defense.

Exceptions sustained.

ton v. William Firth Co. 212 Mass. 257, 98 N. E. 797.

It has been held that under such circumstances a nonresident is free from arrest on meane process. Thompson's Case, 122 Mass. 428, 23 Am. Rep. 370, and cases there cited. But neither this nor any of our cases reaches the point now presented.

The rule has been stated generally that suitors and witnesses from a foreign jurisdiction are exempt from service of civil process while attending court, and for such reasonable time before and after as may enable them to come from and return to their homes. This statement is broad enough to include the parties plaintiff as well as defendants and witnesses. The rule is an ancient one. The reason upon which it rests is that justice requires the attendance of witnesses cognizant of material facts, and hence that no unreasonable obstacles ought to be thrown in the way of their freely coming into court to give oral testimony. Nonresidents cannot be compelled to come within the jurisdiction to testify. As such testimony may be essential in the due administration of justice, they ought to be protected in coming voluntarily into our courts to aid in the ascertainment of truth, and in the accomplishment of right results by the courts. It is not merely a privilege of the person; it is a prerogative exerted by the sovereign power through the courts for the furtherance of the ends of justice. Every party has a right to testify in his own behalf. He cannot do this freely, if hampered by the hazard that he may become entangled in other litigation in foreign courts. The rule is applied almost universally in behalf of witnesses coming from a foreign state. It is extended generally to defendants living outside the state where the litigation is pending. See cases collected in 32 Cyc. 492, 494; Mullen v. Sanborn, 79 Md. 364, 25 L.R.A. 721, 47 Am. St. Rep. 421, 29 Atl. 522.

There appears to be no sound distinction for placing a party plaintiff on any different basis in this respect from other parties and witnesses. The reason on which the rule rests is broad and inclusive of plaintiffs as well as defendants. It is as important to the administration of justice that foreign plaintiffs should be protected in making a full presentation of their cases as it is that parties defendant should be given this protection. The weight of authority supports this conclusion, although there are contrary decisions. Re Healey, 53 Vt. 694, 38 Am. Rep. 713; Hale v. Wharton (C. C.) 73 Fed. 739; Peet v. Fowler (C. C.) 170 Fed. 618; Fisk v. Westover, 4 S. D. 233, 46 Am. St. Rep. 780, 55 N. W. 961; Roberts v. Thompson, 149 App. Div. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

437, 134 N. Y. Supp. 363; Cooper v. Wyman, 122 N. C. 784, 65 Am. St. Rep. 731, 29 S. E. 947; Letherby v. Shaver, 73 Mich. 500, 41 N. W. 677; Richardson v. Smith, 74 N. J. L. 111, 65 Atl. 162; Long v. Hawken, 114 Md. 234, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1101, 79 Atl. 190, and cases there collected. There is nothing inconsistent with this in Ginn v. Almy, 212 Mass. 486, 99 N. E. 276, for there the court had acquired jurisdiction of the defendant and the proceedings were in the same cause.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MISSISSIPPI TO USE OF JOHN A. JOHNSTON et al., Appts.,

v.

W. W. CUNNINGHAM et al.

(— Miss. —, 65 So. 115.)

Sheriff — killing one fleeing from arrest — liability.

1. A sheriff is liable on his official bond for shooting one guilty of a simple misdemeanor to prevent his escaping arrest, although he merely fires his pistol in his direction to cause him to halt.

Pleading — shooting at misdemeanor — proof of aim.

2. The statement in a complaint seeking damages because of a sheriff's negligent performance of his duties in arresting one guilty of a misdemeanor, which results in the death of the latter, that the sheriff fired his pistol at and toward the lawbreaker so that the bullet struck and killed him, does not require proof of deliberate aim toward him.

(May 18, 1914.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Prentiss County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of plaintiffs' intestate by the defendant sheriff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — Liability of peace officer or his bond for shooting a person while attempting to arrest him.

The general question as to the liability of an officer for making an arrest is covered by notes in 51 L.R.A. 193, and 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 69.

And the liability of sureties on the bond of an officer, for an illegal arrest, is discussed in a note to Lee v. Charmley, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 277.

For cases involving the liability of a sheriff, marshal, or constable, for his deputy's torts, generally, in making an ar-

Messrs. Thomas H. Johnston, E. C. Sharp, and A. J. McIntyre, for appellants:

A peace officer and the sureties on his official bond are liable in a civil action for damages for the intentional shooting of a misdemeanor who flees to avoid arrest, or who escapes and flees after arrest.

Brown v. Weaver, 76 Miss. 7, 42 L.R.A. 423, 71 Am. St. Rep. 512, 23 So. 388; Thomas v. Kinkead, 55 Ark. 502, 15 L.R.A. 558, 29 Am. St. Rep. 68, 18 S. W. 854; Head v. Martin, 85 Ky. 480, 3 S. W. 622.

And it is equally as clear that a sheriff and his bondsmen are liable as well for the negligent, as for an intentional, killing.

Johnson v. Williams, 111 Ky. 289, 54 L.R.A. 220, 98 Am. St. Rep. 416, 63 S. W. 759; Brown v. Weaver, 71 Am. St. Rep. 519, note.

When an injury occurs from the discharge of a gun or other firearm, he by whom it was discharged, in order to excuse himself from liability for the injury, must show that the discharge was absolute-rest, see Brown v. Wallis, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1019, and the note thereto.

As to the liability of sureties on the bond of a peace officer for the death of a person due to the act or default of the principal or one of his deputies, see Growbarger v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 758.

And as to the liability of sureties on the bond of a peace officer for the latter's act in killing or injuring one person while attempting to execute criminal process against another, see Martin v. Smith, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 463, and the note thereto.

The force which an officer may lawfully use to prevent the escape of one arrested for a misdemeanor is no greater than such as might have been rightfully employed to effect his arrest. He cannot in either case take the life of the accused or inflict great bodily harm, except to save his own life or prevent a like harm to himself. Thomas v. Kinkead, 55 Ark. 502, 15 L.R.A. 558, 29 Am. St. Rep. 68, 18 S. W. 854; Head v. Martin, 85 Ky. 480, 3 S. W. 622.

So, the use of a pistol by an officer in attempting to arrest a person who is charged with a misdemeanor is excessive force which will render him liable. Sossamon v. Cruse, 133 N. C. 470, 45 S. E. 757.

And the fact that a constable had warrants for the arrest of a person, charging him with misdemeanors, is no defense to an action for damages for killing him by shooting him when he was fleeing to avoid arrest. Middleton v. Holmes, 3 Port. (Ala.) 424.

In Towle v. Matheus, 130 Cal. 574, 62 Pac. 1064, a suit against a constable and his bondsmen for the act of a deputy who, in assisting the constable in arresting plaintiff for a breach of the peace, shot plaintiff in the back, a judgment for plaintiff was affirmed, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ly without his fault, and that it happened by inevitable accident.

12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 519; Morgan v. Cox, 22 Mo. 373, 66 Am. Dec. 623; Weaver v. Ward, Hobart, 134; Underwood v. Hewson, 1 Strange, 596; Cole v. Fisher, 11 Mass. 137; Tally v. Ayres, 3 Sneed, 677.

Messrs. J. A. Cunningham and Cox & Cox, for appellees:

A sheriff is confined in the selection and exercise of the means of arrest to only such reasonable means as ordinarily prudent men would likely adopt under similar circumstances.

Cleghorn v. Thompson, 62 Kan. 727, 54 L.R.A. 402, 64 Pac. 605; Dixon v. State, — Miss. —, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 219, 61 So. 423.

Plaintiffs, if they recover at all, must recover on the case stated in their declaration; the burden is on them to satisfy the jury of the truth of the specific facts stated as the ground of their right to recover; and they must fail if the evidence in the affirmed, it being held that the act of the deputy, while unnecessary, wrongful, and negligent, was not malicious or extraofficial so as to relieve defendants from liability.

The acts of deputy sheriffs in shooting a person while attempting to arrest him for an offense committed in their presence were "official acts," within a statute making a sheriff responsible for the official acts of his deputies. King v. Brown, 100 Tex. 109, 94 S. W. 328, reversing 41 Tex. Civ. App. 588, 93 S. W. 1017.

But in Brown v. Wallis, 100 Tex. 546, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1019, 101 S. W. 1070, a companion case to the preceding one, growing out of the same transaction, where the evidence presented failed to show that the offense for which the deputies were attempting to make an arrest was committed in their presence, or that they were acting under a warrant, it was held that a case of "official acts" had not been made out so as to render the sheriff liable.

An officer who shoots one who is fleeing to escape after being arrested for a misdemeanor is liable. Head v. Martin, 85 Ky. 480, 3 S. W. 622.

Thus, in Thomas v. Kinkead, 55 Ark. 502, 15 L.R.A. 558, 29 Am. St. Rep. 68, 18 S. W. 854, a suit against an officer and his bondsmen for shooting plaintiff's intestate while he was attempting to escape after being arrested on a misdemeanor charge, the court reversed a verdict for defendants, because of a charge of the trial court that defendant had a right to shoot deceased if it was necessary to prevent his escape.

The wrongful shooting by a deputy sheriff of a prisoner attempting to escape from arrest for a misdemeanor is an official act which creates a liability on the sheriff's bond. Brown v. Weaver, 76 Miss. 7, 42 case fails to convince the jury of the truth of the averments of the declaration.

Reed, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellants, the parents and brothers of Frank Johnston, brought suit against ap-

L.R.A. 423, 71 Am. St. Rep. 512, 23 So. 388.

And the shooting by a city marshal of one who is fleeing after being arrested for a misdemeanor is wrongful, and is an official act for which his sureties are liable. Rischer v. Meeham, 11 Ohio C. C. 403, 5 Ohio C. D. 416.

In Hendrick v. Walton, 69 Tex. 192, 6 S. W. 749, it was held that under the statute creating liability when the death of any person is caused by the wrongful act, negligence, unskillfulness, or default of another, a sheriff and his sureties were not liable for the act of a deputy in shooting one who was endeavoring to escape after being arrested. It was not decided whether the act of the deputy was an "official act" within a statute making a sheriff responsible for such acts of his deputy.

And in Stephenson v. Sinclair, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 133, 36 S. W. 137, which was an action for injury to a horse shot by a constable while being ridden by a misdemeanor in escaping after being arrested, the constable and his sureties were held liable, the court saying that, while the constable had no authority to fire upon the prisoner, that fact did not remove his effort to prevent the escape out of the realm of official duty, so as to relieve his sureties from liability.

In Goscinski v. Carlson, — Wis. —, 147 N. W. 1018, a deputy sheriff was held liable to one whom he shot while running to escape after being arrested on a civil warrant, though the court found that the shot was fired merely to frighten plaintiff into submission, without any intent to hit him.

Although an officer is authorized to shoot one charged with a felony if necessary to effect his arrest under a warrant therefor, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

pellees, W. W. Cunningham, the sheriff of Prentiss county, and the sureties on his official bond, for the full penalty of the bond, claimed as damages for the wrongful death of Frank Johnston, who was shot and killed by the sheriff. Frank Johnston, when killed, was twenty years old. He was a hunchback, carrying his head tilted far back and a little to one side, and was 5 feet high. On Sunday, September 18, 1910, at a church meeting in the country, called an "all day singing," several boys, including Frank Johnston, became engaged in a fight, or disturbance of the peace. The sheriff's attention was called to the matter and with two deputies he proceeded to arrest the boys. The scene of the disturbance was something over 100 yards from the church. When the sheriff and his deputies approached, Frank Johnston ran off through the woods, and was followed by the officers and a number of other persons. After running a distance of 100 to 150 yards, the sheriff drew his pistol and fired. The boy dropped instantly, shot in the head, and died in a short time. While pursuing a plea of justification in an action for damages against a sheriff for the killing by his deputy of a person under such circumstances is insufficient unless it avers that the officer made known to deceased his authority for arresting him, or sets out circumstances which would make the imparting of such information unavailing or unreasonable, and that the shooting was necessary to prevent the escape, an averment that the shooting reasonably appeared to be necessary being insufficient. Richards v. Burgin, 159 Ala. 282, 49 So. 294, 17 Ann. Cas. 898.

A peace officer has no right, upon suspicion merely that a felony has been committed, when in fact it has not, to shoot the person suspected to prevent his escape, and if he makes a mistake as to the commission of a felony he is liable. Petrie v. Cartwright, 114 Ky. 103, 59 L.R.A. 720, 102 Am. St. Rep. 274, 70 S. W. 297, 13 Am. Crim. Rep. 72.

Before an officer can resort to extreme measures to prevent an escape from an unauthorized arrest in case of a felony, he should exercise a high degree of care and diligence in ascertaining whether he has the right or wrong man, and failure to exercise such care will render him and his bondsmen liable for injuries inflicted. Kopplekom v. Huffman, 12 Neb. 95, 10 N. W. 577.

But when a peace officer shoots a person in attempting to arrest him without a warrant for a felony, without any information which either required or authorized him as an officer to lay hands on him, much less to use a deadly weapon, for the purpose of arresting him, he does not act colore officii so as to render his sureties liable. Chandler v. Rutherford, 43 C. C. A. 218, 101 Fed. 774.

told by appellant that he could not eat anything and was suffering from malaria.

Appellant was at the time under fear of being lynched. He told Mr. Fitzgerald that he was afraid, and "wanted to die a decent death." He was told by Mr. Fitzgerald that the people believed that he was guilty, and that the body found was that of the deceased. Mr. Fitzgerald testified that at the time of the conversation with appellant, he did not know whether the body found was that of Elston Brewer, the deceased, and that he had no definite knowledge relative thereto until appellant's confession. We quote from the testimony of Mr. Fitzgerald to show what statements were made by him to induce appellant to confess:

Q. How many trips did you make to see him?

A. Three.

Q. What happened between you and Mr. Johnson at the jail on your first visit there?

A. Well, I tried to get him to confess.

Q. What did you say to him to induce him to confess?

A. Nothing specially; I told him I thought he was guilty. I heard the testimony at the coroner's jury; and he looked listless and nervous, and I didn't think he would have any peace until he unburdened himself of this awful crime I thought he had committed.

Q. You told him also you were a Spiritualist, and could look down in his soul and see the black crime he had committed?

A. I didn't tell him that way. I went up there that evening and said, "You better confess; that boy we dug up there, these printers say, to the best of their knowledge, it is Elston Brewer, and there is no doubt about your guilt, and you have not slept a wink since you killed that boy, and you won't have any peace until you confess;" and I asked him what church he belonged to, and he had better look beyond the grave for comfort; that his only hope was salvation, and asked him what church he belonged to; and he said he didn't have much training at all, and went to the Baptist and Methodist church; and I told him we had some mighty good ministers in town, and if he wanted one I would get one; and he said, "No," he didn't want one then, but he would see about it later; and he said, "What are you, anyhow?" and I said, "I am a Spiritualist, and I can look down in your black heart and see this diabolical crime you committed at midnight the other night." I was hitting in high places when I said that, of course.

Thus far the facts and circumstances connected with the making of the confession by appellant have been stated by us from 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the testimony of Mr. Fitzgerald. Upon one of his visits to the jail to see appellant, Mr. Fitzgerald was attended by another prominent newspaper man of the city of Vicksburg, Mr. F. P. Cashman, city editor of the Evening Post. Mr. Cashman testified that appellant was very sick when he visited him with Mr. Fitzgerald. Continuing his testimony, Mr. Cashman said that appellant "was lying on his cot, and great beads of perspiration breaking out on his forehead and his hands and all portions of his cheek, and he was tossing from one side of the cot to the other, and turning over, and sat up awhile and laid down awhile, and his sentences were disconnected, and looked like he was mentally deranged." He further stated that Mr. Fitzgerald talked to appellant for a length of time which appeared to witness to be about an hour, and was telling appellant that "he was a liar and a murderer, and he better confess and ease his conscience." Mr. Cashman visited appellant next morning about 11 o'clock, shortly after the confession had been given Mr. Fitzgerald, and he testifies that he found appellant still sick, suffering with fever, and in an abnormal condition.

Viewing all the facts and circumstances surrounding the securing of the confession, we do not believe that it was of such free and voluntary character as to render it admissible in this case. It is well-nigh impossible to have a fixed rule by which may be determined the amount or degree of improper influence necessary to make a confession involuntary. It was said by Judge Handy in the opinion of Simon v. State, 37 Miss. 288, that "it is a very familiar and well-established rule that a confession is not admissible in evidence, unless it is made freely and voluntarily, without restraint, and without hope of reward or fear of punishment."

A confession cannot be said to be in every respect freely and voluntarily made if it has been obtained by any sort of threat or violence, or any promise, direct or implied, or by the exertion of any influence. Underhill, Crim. Ev. 2d ed. § 126. Mr. Underhill, citing the case of People v. McMahon, 15 N. Y. 384, makes the following quotation in his note on this subject: "Voluntary is not always used in contradistinction to compulsory. In many cases 'voluntary' means proceeding from the spontaneous operation of the party's own mind, free from the influence of any extraneous disturbing cause."

It has been held by this court that a confession should not be admitted if there is a reasonable doubt as to whether it was freely and voluntarily made. Concerning this, we quote from Brame & Alexander's skull of the dead man had been crushed, and that the body had then been incased in a sack and wrapped in a quilt, to which rocks and stones had been attached with sash or tiller cord. This body was afterwards identified as that of Elston Brewer, a young man twenty-six years of age, who, together with appellant, had gone to Vicksburg from some point in Arkansas, probably Cave City.

Brewer was the owner of two small boats, one of them being a house boat in which he and appellant lived. He was a printer by trade, and, according to the testimony of his father, was at the time going down the river on a pleasure trip. According to the confession of appellant, he and Brewer had started for New Orleans, Brewer promising to give appellant a job, the nature of which does not appear. Before the finding of this body, appellant had mentioned the disappearance of his partner, Brewer, and when he saw the body, which seems to have been drawn ashore near the boats in which he and Brewer lived, his actions were such as to arouse the suspicions of those who saw him.

A day or two before the finding of this body, appellant went to the Merchants' National Bank of Vicksburg, told one of the officers thereof that his name was Brewer, and asked him how he could obtain some money, and was told "to have some bank to wire us to pay him the money and waive identification." This bank afterwards, on July 16th, received a telegram from a bank at Batesville, Arkansas, directing it to pay Brewer the sum of $50, and to waive his identification.

On the day before the receipt by the bank of this telegram,—that is, on the 15th of July,—appellant went to the office of the Western Union Telegraph Company and delivered to the operator in charge the following telegram, which was accepted and sent by the company:

To G. W. Brewer, Phone Cave City, Ark., Batesville, Ark. Want larger boat. Coming back. Wire $50 at once to Merchants' National Bank without identification. Letter follows. Elston. (Subject to delay.)

G. W. Brewer was the father of Elston Brewer, and when the telegram was delivered to the operator by appellant he told her that G. W. Brewer was his father. Appellant was identified by the officer of the bank with whom he dealt and by the telegraph operator, as being the man who made the inquiry at the bank, and as the man who sent the telegram above referred to. This telegram addressed to Mr. G. W. Brewer was received by him, and the telegram from the bank at Batesville to the bank at Vicksburg was sent at his request.

After being arrested and placed in jail, appellant confessed to several parties on different occasions that he had killed Brewer, his confession being, in the language of the witness Fitzgerald, as follows:

"The boy promised me when we left Arkansas that he would go to New Orleans, and after he got here he made up his mind to make his way back home.' And I think he said he was going to sell the boats and go back and send him adrift, or make his way back to Memphis and go home, and said: 'We quarreled a good deal about it Sunday and Sunday evening; we read a while, and I cooked supper, and we played cards again, and we quarreled again, and we used the quarrel; I knew Elston pretty well, and I didn't think he was treating me right, and the boy went to bed about 10 o'clock and about 1 or 2 o'clock—some time after 12, I don't remember the exact time—I got up and he was asleep, and I went and got the ax and hit him one lick in the head, and he groaned and made a loud noise, and I was afraid the passers-by would hear him, and I went back and hit him until he was perfectly still. And then he said: 'I got out; the boat was by the Y. & M. V. depot, and I came up and sat on the curb for a while, and went up on Washington street, and first thought I would give myself up, and studied about that for a while, and went back on the boat and got a sack and put some stones in it, and tied the sack around Elston's body and turned the boat around and shoved him overboard, and he sank.'"

A few days before he was killed, Brewer had attempted to sell his boats; one of the parties to whom he attempted to sell being Mr. Dillon, the gentleman who afterwards discovered his body floating in the canal. That Brewer was murdered seems not to be open even to the suggestion of a doubt, the only fact to be determined being the identity of the murderer.

The only ground upon which a reversal of the judgment of the court below is asked in which there can be any sort of merit is the one upon which my brethren think the judgment should be reversed, and that is that the court erred in admitting the testimony of Mr. E. A. Fitzgerald, to whom one of the confessions introduced in testimony was made. The ground upon which the reversal is placed is that this confession was not "in every respect freely and voluntarily made," and because "it does not appear that the confession was from the 'spontaneous operation' of appellant's own mind."

Confessions are nothing more than a particular class of admissions against interest, about 10 o'clock the next morning, all that Fitzgerald said to appellant in this connection was: "Well, you had another restless night; I see you never slept a wink last night. Are you ready to confess this morning?" And he said: 'Yes, boys; I am ready to tell you all about it'." Record, p. 76. Appellant then proceeded to make confession.

On this visit Fitzgerald was accompanied by Mr. Fox, manager of the Western Union Telegraph Company, who was also introduced as a witness to the confession. He was asked the following question: "Tell the jury whether or not you or Mr. Fitzgerald, either one, at that time, held out any hope of reward or aid, or threatened him to make any statement or confession to you or Mr. Fitzgerald." Record, p. 94. To which he replied: "None whatever; I don't think there were two words before he made the remark and said: 'Well, boys, I am ready to confess this morning.'" Record, p. 94.

The statement made by appellant to Fitzgerald as to his fear of being lynched was made at the second interview, was not caused by anything said to him by Fitzgerald, and there is nothing in the evidence to indicate that the confession was made on account of any fear of being lynched. Record, pp. 71 to 77. All that appellant said with reference to any fear of being lynched was that he didn't want to attend a preliminary hearing for the reason that he was afraid he would be lynched, and Fitzgerald told him he could waive examination, and would not be out of jail more than twenty minutes.

When the court was called upon to rule on the competency of Fitzgerald's testimony, no testimony except that of his own had been introduced, or sought to be introduced, with reference to the circumstances surrounding the making of this confession. From that it did not appear whether, at the time of making the confession, appellant was sick or well. After the confession had been admitted, and on cross-examination by counsel for appellant, Fitzgerald stated that, while he did not know it of his own knowledge, he thought appellant was under treatment of a physician and was taking medicine at the time; that appellant spoke of having contracted malaria on the river; but that his condition appeared to him (Fitzgerald) to be normal.

It will be observed from this statement that appellant was not threatened with any temporal harm in event he declined to confess, or promised any temporal benefit in event he should do so. What was said to him, in effect, was simply this: That Fitzgerald, by reason of being a Spiritualist, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

knew that he had committed the crime, and that, by reason of his having committed it, he would have neither peace here nor Salvation hereafter, unless he confessed it; that "the best thing he could do was to confess and try to save his soul."

From this it will be seen that the punishment with which appellant was threatened if he did not confess, and the benefit which he was told he would obtain by confessing, were both predicated upon a belief in a life beyond the grave and upon a future state of punishments and rewards. In numerous decisions it has been held that exhortations invoking the terrors of punishment predicated upon theological beliefs, and the holding out of hopes of a spiritual nature, do not make the confession thereby obtained incompetent, as will appear from an examination of the authorities cited by Wigmore to § 840 of vol. 1 of his Treatise on Evidence, and collated in a note to State v. Williams, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 310.

No case holding the contrary has come under my observation, and, according to Mr. Wigmore, no such case can be found. "It is obvious that, in their ordinary aspect, the influence of religious considerations makes entirely for truth in a confession, and not against it. Mr. Joy's exposition of this point can never be improved upon: "1842, Mr. Joy, Confessions, 51: 'It seems difficult to imagine that a man under spiritual convictions and the influence of religious impressions would therefore confess himself guilty of a crime of which he was not guilty; or that a man under a strong sense of his spiritual relations with God could hope to please God by a falsehood; that a "confidence created" between him and his pastor, or the "being thrown off his guard" by this confidence, should induce him not to confess (that it might naturally do if he were guilty), but induce him to confess falsely. Such spiritual convictions or spiritual exhortations seem, from the nature of religion, the most likely of all motives to produce truth. They are therefore of a class entirely different from those that exclude confessions. A confession is excluded because the motive which induces it is calculated to produce untruth, because it is likely to lead to falsehood. If temporal hopes exist, they may lead to falsehood. Spiritual hopes can lead to nothing but truth.'" 1 Wigmore, Ev. § 840.

This point was expressly decided by our old high court of errors and appeals in Frank v. State, 39 Miss. 711, wherein the court said: "Anything reasonably tending to hold out the hope or promise of reward or benefit for confession, or of punishment or injury for the failure to confess, is in culiarly under the jurisdiction and control of the court. The persons and estates of the insane, or those alleged to be insane, are the subjects of protection and care of courts having probate jurisdiction. When the proceeding is instituted, the matter is then under the direction of the court, even to the extent of authorizing it to cause the seizure of the body of the person alleged to be of unsound mind. The statute under consideration makes no provision for a dismissal, nor does it provide for an appeal to this court. The court may or may not authorize or permit the petition to be dismissed. In Galbreath v. Black, 89 Ind. 300, it was held that the court ought not to allow the proceeding to be dismissed without the consent of the person alleged to be of unsound mind."

Upon this point, as also upon one phase of the petitioner's attitude in law toward the proceeding, it was said in the case of Hughes v. Jones, 116 N. Y. 67, 5 L.R.A. 632, 15 Am. St. Rep. 386, 22 N. E. 446, that "the primary object of the proceeding is not to benefit any particular individual, but to see whether the fact of mental incapacity exists, so that the public, through the courts, can take control. The petitioner can derive no direct benefit from it. The advantage to him, if any, is only such as would result if any other person had first acted in the matter. Attentive study of the history, nature, and object of lunacy proceedings leads to the conclusion that the petitioner therein is not a party to the record so as to be personally estopped by the finding of the jury, except as all the world is estopped."

It was said in the above case that this condition, that is, the peculiar attitude of the law toward an inquest de lunatico, as well as toward the one who as petitioner put the inquest in motion, arose from the fact that anciently the king, as the political parens patrie, assumed custody "as guardian of his subjects." Further it is said that in this country the proceedings are "instituted in behalf of the people of the state, who succeeded to the rights of the King in this regard." Hughes v. Jones, supra. The upgrowth of this view, the ancient laws, and the logic of the position are thus set out in the case supra:

"The origin and history of lunacy proceedings throw some light upon the subject. It was provided by an early statute in England that 'the King shall have the custody of the lands of natural fools (idiots), taking the profits of them without waste or destruction, and shall find them in necessities, of whose fee soever the land be holden. And after their death he shall restore them to their rightful heirs,' 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

so that no alienation shall be made by such idiots, nor their heirs be in any wise disinherited. 17 Edw. II. chap. 9.

"The same statute provided for lunatics, or such as might have lucid intervals, by making the King a trustee of their lands and tenements without any beneficial interest, as in the case of idiots, who were the source of considerable revenue to the Crown. Id. chap. 10; Beverley's Case, 4 Coke, 127a, 2 Co. Inst. 14, Reg. Brev. 267, Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 532, 16 Eng. Rul. Cas. 702; 1 Bl. Com. chap. 8, § 18, p. 304. This statute continued in force from 1324 until 1863. Ordonaux, Judicial Aspects of Insanity, p. 4.

"The method of procedure thereunder is described by an early writer as follows: 'And therefore, when the King is informed that one who hath lands or tenements is an idiot, and is a natural from his birth, the King may award his writ to the escheator or sheriff of the county where such idiot is to inquire thereof. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 232.

"The object of the writ was to ascertain by judicial investigation whether the person proceeded against was an idiot or not, so that the King could act under the statute, for his right to control idiots or lunatics and their estates did not commence until office found. Shelford, Lunatics, p. 14.

"Subsequently authority was given to the lord chancellor to issue the writ or commission to inquire as to the fact of idiocy or lunacy, and the method of procedure was by petition suggesting the lunacy. Ibid.; Re Brown, 1 Abb. Pr. 108, 109.

"It was the ordinary writ upon a supposed forfeiture to the Crown, and the proceeding was in behalf of the King as the political father of his people. Ibid.; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 581.

"As the means devised to give the King his right by solemn matter of record, it was necessary before the Sovereign could divest title. 3 Bl. Com. 259; Phillips v. Moore, 100 U. S. 208, 212, 25 L. ed. 603, 604; Anderson's Dict. title, Office Found.

"It was used to establish the fact upon which the King's rights depended, as in the case of an alien, who could hold land until his alienage was authoritatively established by a public officer, upon an inquest held at the instance of the government. Whether the basis of action was lunacy or alienage, or otherwise, the proceeding was in behalf of the public represented by the King. Id.

"The inquisition was an inquiry made by a jury before a sheriff, coroner, escheator, or other government officer, or by commissioners specially appointed, concerning any matter that entitled the Sovereign to the possession of lands or tenements, goods son County was proper, and that the writ of certiorari issued herein should be quashed. It is so ordered.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

L. W. TYSOR and Wife, Appts.,
v.

CHARLES E. ADAMS, by Next Friend.

(— Va. —, 81 S. E. 76.)

Deed — failure of consideration — support.

A deed in consideration of a home with grantees in the house conveyed, care in sickness, and burial at death, will be set aside if the grantees immediately upon securing it treat the grantor with such harshness as to terrorize him, and move from the property, leaving the grantor alone in the house, although the grantees invite him to accompany them to the new abode.

(March 12, 1914.)

APPPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for the City of Norfolk in complainant's favor in a suit to cancel a deed, and to enjoin defendants from interfering with complainant's possession of the premises. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. R. F. Wells, for appellants:

Plaintiff having taken the position that the deed was void, and having brought suit to set it aside, defendant was relieved from tendering performance of his agreement until plaintiff thereafter notified him to perform his agreement, and requested him so to do.

McIntire, 75 Neb. 397, 106 N. W. 29.

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this case was filed at the November rules, 1911, of the circuit court of the city of Norfolk, alleging that a certain deed executed June 13, 1911, by the appellee, Charles E. Adams, to the appellants, L. W. Tysor and Hattie V. Tysor, his wife, conveying to the latter a certain house and lot, was executed through persuasion and blandishment, the complainant being an old man, and not able to take care of himself, and that the consideration for the deed had wholly failed. The prayer of the bill was that the deed be declared null and void, and the grantees enjoined from interfering with the complainant's possession of the premises.

The record shows that the appellee, Charles E. Adams, was a retired seafaring man, old and infirm, who owned a small house and lot in the city of Norfolk, for which he had paid $1,300. This property was rented from him by the appellants, L. W. Tysor and Hattie V. Tysor, his wife. These tenants were practically strangers to Adams; the property having been rented to them through an agent. In the latter part of May, 1911, Adams, the appellee, was sick, and boarding with Mrs. Frank. There he was called upon by Mrs. Tysor, his tenant, who, although a stranger, succeeded in persuading the appellee to leave Mrs. Frank's and go to his own house and live with her. In a few days after appellee took up his abode with Mr. and Mrs. Tysor he executed the deed in question, dated June 13, 1911, conveying to them jointly his house and lot, in which they were living. The consideration stated on the face of the deed was "$5 and other valuable considerations;" but in a few days thereafter a paper was executed by L. W. Tysor showing that the real consideration was that the grantees would allow the grantor to make the house his home as long as he lived, without charge for board, and that they would take good care of him in case of sickness, and in the event of death see that he was buried properly.

While the evidence shows that the grantor in this deed was a feeble, guileless old sary to charge accusation of the commission of a specific offense.

Libel — statutory slander — privilege.

2. The common-law defenses of privilege in actions for defamation are available in actions for statutory slander.

Same — communication during altercation.

3. A communication made in the course of an altercation, concerning personal or property rights, and bearing some reasonable relation to the subject-matter of the controversy, is privileged, and it should be left to the jury to say whether the defendant has abused his privilege.

Trial — jury — meaning of words.

4. The sense in which actionable words were used, when the utterance thereof has been attended by facts and circumstances indicating their use in a qualified sense, so as to make them convey, to those who heard them, a meaning different from the one ordinarily accorded them, is a question for jury determination.

Same — instructions — mitigating circumstances.

5. Instructions given in an action for slander, so drawn as to limit the effect of mitigating circumstances to the inquiry as to the existence of actual malice, deprive the defendant of the benefit of the consideration of such facts by the jury in the ascertainment of the amount of the damages, and are erroneous.

The court in Reed v. Harper, 25 Iowa, 87, 95 Am. Dec. 774, infra, does not discuss the part of the charge of the trial court in which it was stated that drunkenness might be considered in mitigation of damages.

In Howell v. Howell, 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 84, it is said: "If one, being drunk, speaks slanderous words and does not repent them when sober, his being drunk is a circumstance to mitigate the damages, because it tends to rebut the presumption of 'malice,' and the words of a drunken man are not usually attended to, and therefore are not much calculated to injure. But when the slanderous words are spoken on many occasions, public and private, when the defendant is sober as well as when he is drunk on some of the occasions when the words are spoken, instead of tending to rebut the idea of 'malice,' this tends to show that the defendant's heart is boiling over with malice, and cannot, in any point of view, be allowed as a reason for abating the damages which the jury would otherwise think proper to give."

But it is held that drunkenness is not to be considered in mitigation of damages in Mix v. McCoy, 22 Mo. App. 488.

As defense.

The universal rule seems to be that intoxication constitutes no defense to an action of slander. McKee v. Ingalls, 5 Ill. 30; Reed v. Harper, 25 Iowa, 87, 95 Am. Dec. 774; Williams v. McManus, 38 La. Ann. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Libel — intoxication — mitigating circumstance.

6. In such cases, intoxication of the defendant at the time of his use of the slanderous words is a mitigating circumstance, proper for the consideration of the jury in estimating the damages.

Same — provocation.

7. Provocation by the plaintiff, inducing the utterance of the slanderous words, is a mitigating circumstance also.

(Robinson, J., dissents.)

(February 13, 1914.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Nicholas County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged slander. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. G. G. Duff, for plaintiff in error:

The alleged slanderous words were not actionable.

Shroyer v. Miller, 3 W. Va. 158; 25 Cyc. 314, 376, 377; Lawson v. Hicks, 38 Ala. 279, 81 Am. Dec. 49; Rice v. Coolidge, 121 Mass. 393, 23 Am. Rep. 279; Hoar v. Wood, 3 Met. 193; Chaffin v. Lynch, 84 Va. 884, 6 S. E. 474; Mogley v. Moss, 6 Gratt. 534; Harman v. Cundiff, 82 Va. 239; Womack v. Circle, 20 Gratt. 192; Hensbrough v. Stinnett, 25 Gratt. 495; Bridg-

161, 58 Am. Rep. 171; Kendrick v. Hopkins, Cary, 93.

It would seem, however, that in some circumstances the fact that defendant was intoxicated at the time he spoke the words complained of might be relevant upon the question whether they were actionable, since it is possible that words which if understood literally would be actionable, coming from an intoxicated person, would naturally be regarded by the hearers as mere abuse, and not as imputing to the plaintiff what they literally import. The suggested distinction is somewhat analogous to that found in cases dealing with the effect of intoxication as a defense to homicide, where it is pointed out that, although intoxication is not a defense to homicide, yet the fact of defendant's intoxication may be relevant to show that he was incapable of forming the wilful, deliberate, and premeditated purpose essential to homicide in the first degree. See note in 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 376. The cases, of course, are not parallel, since actual malice or wilfulness is not essential to liability for slander, but it would seem that if the fact of intoxication may be admissible as tending to negative existence of those elements in a homicide case, it might, for similar reasons, be admissible in some circumstances as tending to negative the actionable character of the words relied on in an action for slander, and thus not merely mitigating damages, but defeating recovery altogether.

E. L. D.

Two other grounds of privilege are suggested, defense of property or an interest of the defendant in the subject-matter of the interview, and defense of his character or personal feelings, both of which rights are recognized by law. Odgers, Libel & Slander, 289, 291; Newell, Defamation, Libel & Slander, §§ 108-110, pp. 509, 510. Formerly these defenses to statutory slander, insulting words, were not permitted, nor could the defendant justify by plea and proof of the truth of the charges made by him. Brooks v. Calloway, 12 Leigh, 466. Such was the judicially declared effect of the provision saying no plea, exception, or demurrer should be sustained to preclude a jury from passing upon the words charged in the declaration. But in 1849 the statute was amended by the elimination of the words "plea" and "exception," and the insertion of a provision for a plea of justification; and these alterations have restored, or conferred, the common-law defense of privilege. Chaffin v. Lynch, 83 Va. 106, 1 S. E. 803. The right incident to a privilege of this kind does not extend so far, however, as to authorize the set-off of one independent calumny against another. A communication, to be privileged on the ground of defense of self or property or interest, must have been made under an honest belief of its truth, and it must bear some reasonable and fair relation to the right invaded and intended to be protected. If the purpose is to protect a property or other interest, the communication must not extend to something wholly foreign to the subject-matter of the controversy. If it is made in defense of character, the retort must be in the nature of an answer to the attack made. Newell, Defamation, Libel & Slander, § 110, p. 510, § 120, p. 519. "This case must be distinguished from those in which the party pleading the excuse of 'privilege' is guilty of making use of the occasion to utter charges of a character foreign to its legitimate purpose. As, for instance, if this defendant had, in addition to his statements in relation to the supposed theft, gone on to criminate the plaintiff generally, or to accuse her of unchastity, it would then have been the duty of the court, in an action for uttering such charges, to instruct the jury that as to such words, not appropriate to the legitimate objects of the occasion, it furnished the defendant no excuse whatever." Wells, J., in Brow v. Hathaway, 13 Allen, 239. "But even in rebutting an accusation, the defendant must not intrude unnecessarily into the private life of his assailant, or make counter charges against his character, unconnected with his original charge against the defendant." Odgers, Libel & Slander, 5th ed. p. 292.

The defendant is not necessarily held to accountability for the use of the words in their technical or even ordinary meaning. All the surrounding circumstances go in as evidence, not only to enable the jury to ascertain whether the language used was spoken maliciously, and properly to assess the damages, but also to determine in what sense they were used. "The defendant may plead circumstances showing that the words were not used by him in their ordinary signification. . . . He is allowed thus to give evidence of all the surrounding circumstances, in order to place the jury so far as possible in the position of bystanders, so that they may judge how the words would be understood on the particular occasion." Newell, Defamation, Libel & Slander, § 6, p. 274. "People not unfrequently use words, and are understood to use words, not in their natural sense, or as conveying the imputation which in ordinary circumstances, and apart from their surroundings, they would convey, but extravagantly and in a manner which would be understood by those who hear or read them as not conveying the grave imputation suggested by a mere consideration of the words themselves." Lord Herschell in Australian Newspaper Co. v. Bennett [1894] A. C. 287, 288; Odgers, Libel & Slander, p. 121. Under these principles, it was competent for the jury to find, if they thought the evidence justified them in doing so, that the defendant used the words "robber," "thief," and "cur" merely by way of denunciation of the plaintiff's conduct in and about the defense of the prosecution of the woman, conducted by the defendant, and without actual malice or intent to cast upon the plaintiff any imputation of crime, and for the sole purpose of protecting his interest in the litigation and repelling the charge of drunkenness made against him. In Chaffin v. Lynch, cited, the defendant, in the course of a controversy conducted through a newspaper on a question of veracity, called the plaintiff a "scoundrel," and said he "would be unprincipled enough to deny" the act he had been accused of "when charged with it," and the court held the communication was privileged, and left it to the jury to say whether the defendant had abused his privilege, and had acted with malice, and not honestly and in the protection of his own interest. In the declaration and proof are found circumstances indicating the use of the words in a qualified sense. The plaintiff charges the defendant with having accused him of "trying to help" the woman "to rob" him, then uttering the denunciatory words, "robber," "thief," and "cur." And the defendant and signed to direct the jury to the subject of mitigation in general terms; and the court, after some modifications thereof, gave them. As requested, the first one would have told the jury the defendant had the right to prove and explain all the facts and circumstances surrounding the speaking of the words, and to show and explain them in mitigation of damages. The court altered it so as to make it say the jury might consider the facts and circumstances for the purpose of disproving malice and as bearing on the quantum of damages. The second one, as offered, would have authorized the jury, in estimating the damages, to consider all the attendant facts in mitigation of the damages, and also the degree of malice on the part of the defendant. This the court altered only to the extent of the insertion of the phrase "if any" after the phrase "mitigation of damages." The modifications were clearly not prejudicial. On the contrary, they wrought a decided improvement as to both form and substance. But neither these two instructions as given, nor any others, have corrected the error in the two given at the instance of the plaintiff, already noted. They abstract or withhold from the operation of the last two discussed, relating to mitigation, the principal mitigating circumstances disclosed by the evidence. If not, then all four of them would be contradictory and misleading.

The principle of mitigation is not denied by the Virginia cases. On the contrary, it is expressly asserted and approved in Bourland v. Eidson, 8 Gratt. 27. It is also declared in Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 158, 31 Am. Rep. 757. There are in these and other decisions enlightening discussions as to the right to prove, under the plea of not guilty, as matter working mitigation, facts tending to establish the truth of the words spoken, and subsequent self-serving declarations, but this case involves no questions of that kind.

For the errors noted, the judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

ILLINOIS MALLEABLE IRON COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

COMMISSIONERS OF LINCOLN PARK et al.

(263 Ill. 446, 105 N. E. 336.)

Municipal corporation — ordinance — regulating traffic on park way — construction.

1. An ordinance requiring loaded vehicles 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

carrying goods to or from premises abutting on a park way to enter on the way at the cross street nearest the premises in the direction in which the load is moving, and forbidding it to proceed thereon further than the nearest cross street thereafter, will not be construed to forbid the loaded vehicles from leaving the premises where the goods were delivered or received.

Highway — forbidding use — interference with constitutional rights.

2. No property right of an abutting owner doing business on a park way is unconstitutionally interfered with by forbidding him to use such park way with loaded wagons further than the nearest intersecting cross street, although he is thereby compelled to take a circuitous route to transact his business, and the bad condition of the cross street prevents the hauling of full loads upon it.

(April 23, 1914.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Superior Court for Cook County dismissing a bill filed to restrain the enforcement of an ordinance prohibiting loaded vehicles upon a certain park way. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William J. Maher and Samuel B. King, for appellant:

The right of an abutter upon a highway to travel upon the highway its entire length is termed the "easement of access;" it is an appurtenant to the land of the abutter to which the law attaches the presumption of Note. — Forbidding or restricting teaming on certain public ways.

Generally as to the validity of statutes or ordinances regulating horse-drawn vehicles in city streets including cases respecting the weight of loads and width of tires, see note in 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 682.

Generally as to the regulation of draymen, see note to Lawson v. Connolly, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1152.

As to the regulations of automobiles in city, see note to Christy v. Elliott, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 215, upon the law governing automobiles, and the supplementary note to State v. Mayo, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 502, upon the power to prohibit the use of automobiles upon public thoroughfare.

It is a valid exercise of police power for a city to exclude traffic teams from a pleasure driveway. ILLINOIS MALLEABLE IRON CO. v. LINCOLN PARK COMES.

And village trustees may inclose a public square so as to exclude teams and wagons. Guttery v. Glenn, 201 Ill. 275, 66 N. E. 305.

So it seems that an ordinance reasonably regulating the use of the public streets of a city as to the carriages of unusually large size, or as to those which from the mode of using them would greatly incommode, if not endanger, those having occasion to use 150 Ill. 588, 25 L.R.A. 535, 41 Am. St. Rep. 400, 37 N. E. 1096. Traffic teams may be excluded from a pleasure driveway. Cicero Lumber Co. v. Cicero, 176 Ill. 9, 42 L.R.A. 696, 68 Am. St. Rep. 155, 51 N. E. 758. The ordinance, so far as the public is concerned, was clearly a valid exercise of power by the commissioners, and the appellant does not claim that it was not. It contends, however, that the enforcement of the ordinance interferes with its right of access to its premises, and that this right is its private property, which the commissioners have no right to destroy without making compensation therefor.

Owners of property bordering upon a street have, as an incident of their ownership, a right of access by way of the streets, which cannot be taken away or materially impaired without compensation. Chicago v. Union Building Asso. 102 Ill. 379, 40 Am. Rep. 598; Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 64; Shrader v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 242 Ill. 227, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 226, 89 N. E. 997. The inquiry, therefore, is as to the extent of this right of access. The ordinance, under the construction we have given to it, does not interfere with the appellant's use of Diversey park way in the block in which its premises are situated. Its right of access to that extent is not interfered with, but it contends that its right as an abutting owner is to use the street upon which its property abuts as far as such street constitutes the most direct route to the destination, and that the requirement of taking a circuitous route constitutes an impairment of that right. A claim of this character was the subject of consideration in the case of East St. Louis v. O'Flynn, 119 Ill. 200, 59 Am. Rep. 795, 10 N. E. 395, in which the city was sued by a lot owner for damages resulting from the vacation of certain streets and alleys. The lot fronted on Third street, but was some distance from that part of Third street vacated by the city ordinance. The court stated the question to be: "Can defendant, as a matter of law, be held liable to the plaintiff for damages resulting from the vacation of streets and alleys between Front and Fourth streets, the vacation being in another block in the city than that in which plaintiff's property is situated?" After citing the cases of Chicago v. Union Building Asso. supra, and Littler v. Lincoln, 106 Ill. 353, the court said (p. 206): "The facts of the case, being considered, bring it precisely within the principle of the cases cited. Here, plaintiff's lot is not adjacent to the streets or alleys vacated. It is in another block. The access to and egress from his lot are not affected by the vacating ordinance passed by the city. The street in front and the alley in the rear of 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

his property remain open as before, affording the same access to and egress from it. The inconvenience that would be occasioned to plaintiff in going from the street in front of his house to a particular part of the city, on account of vacating and closing up certain streets and alleys in another block, is the 'same kind' of damage that would be sustained by all other persons in the city that might have occasion to go that way, and, although the inconvenience he may suffer may be greater in degree than to any other person, that fact would not give him a right of action."

In Guttery v. Glenn, 201 Ill. 275, 66 N. E. 305, the same question was involved, and it was held that the inclosure and complete obstruction of the street on which the complainant's property fronted, but in the next block, though a public nuisance, did not entitle the complainant to an injunction, because he suffered no special or particular injury from the public nuisance so created. The inconvenience sustained by him in going from the street in front of his premises to a particular part of the city on account of the closing of the street differed in degree only, and not in kind, from that sustained by all other persons having occasion to go that way. So, in the present case, the inconvenience caused the appellant by the exclusion of traffic teams from the boulevard, though greater in degree, is precisely the same in kind as that to all other persons having occasion to do heavy hauling from places in the neighborhood of the appellant's premises to places east, northeast, or southeast of the intersection of the next street east of them. If the boulevard might be entirely closed to all passage by its vacation or complete obstruction, without any liability for damages, certainly its partial closure by the exclusion of traffic teams could not be the basis of a claim for damages or an injunction. The rule is stated in Elliott on Roads & Streets, vol. 2, 3d ed. § 1181, as follows: "Owners of land abutting upon neighboring streets, or upon other parts of the same street, at least when beyond the next cross street, are not, however, entitled to damages, notwithstanding the value of their lands may be lessened by its vacation or discontinuance." To the same effect, in substance, are 3 Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 1160, and 1 Lewis, Em. Dom. 3d ed. § 123, and numerous authorities are cited in these works in support of the text. The authorities are not entirely uniform, but their great weight sustains the doctrine announced.

The demurrer to the bill was properly sustained, and the decree of the Superior Court is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied June 4, 1914.

Messrs. Jeff Henry and J. H. Graham for appellee.

Nunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, Ann Marshall, brought this suit on a note against S. A. Anderson. He answered, admitting the note, but set forth that the administrator of Martha Ann Marshall and the children and heirs of Martha Ann Marshall were setting up some claim to it, and asked that they be made parties and assert their claim, and that the court determine to whom the note belonged, and that a judgment be rendered against him in favor of the party who was entitled to collect it, for his protection. C. C. Howard, administrator of Martha Ann Marshall, claimed it, and Mattie B. Kirkpatrick, one of the children or grandchildren of Martha Ann Marshall, filed a pleading claiming one-ninth interest. It appears that the plaintiff became the possessor of the note, and claimed to own it under the following circumstances: Martha Ann Marshall was the owner of this note of $400 on S. A. Anderson, and she went to the Greensburg Deposit Bank, with which it seems she transacted her business, and had B. W. Penick, cashier of the bank, to write an indorsement state that trusts can be created in personal property by parol, and be sustained by parol evidence. See Berry v. Norris, 1 Duv. 303. In the case of Barkley v. Lane, 6 Bush, 587, Lane made an indorsement on a note, but failed to sign it, as follows: "In my own handwrite I give, free of all charges, the within note of $1,000, interest excepted, to Elizabeth Lane and Ann Barkley, my two daughters, equally, if not paid before my death. I mean by interest excepted, I claim the—especially. If neither principal—is paid before my death, the principal to them and the interest to my estate, for purpose best known to myself. Also a note on G. Spratt of $1,000, to them equally, if not paid before my death." The court in discussing that matter said: "The memorandum on the note of Whaley, though in the handwriting of W. N. Lane, was not signed, and could not in any sense be regarded as a testamentary paper; nor was the transaction such as to constitute a gift causa mortis, nor even a gift inter vivos, according to the rules of law determining the validity of such transfers of property, unless the peculiar facts of the case exempted it from the general rule making a delivery of the thing given essential to the validity of the gift. But it is insisted for the appellants that the facts were sufficient to constitute a parol trust, enforceable in a court of equity. As the subject of the trust sought to be established in this case was personal estate only, no writing was necessary to transfer it, and the

Pac. 417, it was said: "Trusts in personality may be created, declared, or admitted verbally, and may be proved by parol evidence, although, as the authorities uniformly unite in declaring, such evidence must be clear and unequivocal."

In Maher v. Aldrich, 205 Ill. 242, 68 N. E. 810, the court said that trusts in personal property might be established by parol evidence if the evidence to establish the trust was clear and convincing, and that when the trust was established it was well settled that the beneficiaries might follow the fund into all forms of investment which it might assume.

It has been said that it is incumbent on the party asserting the trust to prove it by clear and satisfactory evidence; and that the words or acts relied upon as creating the trust must show clearly and unequivocally the intention of the donor to create a trust. Trubey v. Pease, 240 Ill. 513, 88 N. E. 1005, 16 Ann. Cas. 370.

In Crissman v. Crissman, 23 Mich. 218, it was said: "Where a party undertakes to establish a trust upon parol evidence, especially after a considerable lapse of time, the evidence ought to be very clear and satisfactory, and it ought to find some support in the subsequent conduct of the parties and in the surrounding circumstances."

And in Hamilton v. Hall, 111 Mich. 291, 69 N. W. 484, the court said: "To create a trust, where the donor retains the property, the acts or words relied upon must be unequivocal, . . . and this rule applies with peculiar force where it is claimed that the donor constituted himself trustee. . . . The mere declaration of an intention or purpose to create a trust, which is not carried out, is of no value, and a mere agreement or statement of an intent to make a gift in the future is not sufficient. It must be such that, from the time it is made, the beneficiary has an enforceable equitable interest in the property, contingent upon nothing except the terms imposed by the declaration of the trust itself."

a trust in personality by parol, it was said also in Watson v. Payne, 143 Mo. App. 721, 128 S. W. 238: "The evidence must be convincing and the terms of the trust must be clear, definite, certain, and complete. Mere preponderance of evidence adduced by the party affirming the trust will not suffice; but it would be carrying the rule to an unreasonable and unjust length to say, as defendant apparently would have us say, that the evidence of the trust must be uncontradicted. It suffices if the evidence is strong enough to thoroughly convince the chancellor that a trust was declared, and if the terms of the trust are defined with clearness and certainty."

It has been said, however, that although the evidence to establish a trust in personality by parol must be clear as to the subject-matter and purposes of the trust, and as to the beneficiary, yet that the circumstances may be such as to require but slight independent proof in order to authorize a court of equity to declare the trust. Huetteman v. Biesselmann, 48 Mo. App. 582.

Declarations of a purpose to create a trust, not carried out, are of no value as evidence to establish the trust, nor are direct promises to that effect, unaccompanied with a consideration turning them into contracts. Allen v. Withrow, 110 U. S. 119, 28 L. ed. 90, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 517.

The intention of the party making the trust is the only sure test of its creation; no particular wording is necessary; and the trust may be partly in writing and partly by parol. Porter v. Bank of Rutland, 19 Vt. 410.

A valid trust in personality may be created by parol, though for the benefit of the donor himself and another. Williams v. Haskins, 66 Vt. 378, 29 Atl. 371.

It has been said that, "in order to create a valid verbal or parol trust in personal property, three things are indispensable: First, the words of the settlor must express a declaration and grant by him of an estate or interest containing all the essential elements of a trust; second, there they must be where a verdict for the defendant has been directed, are that, as the plaintiff drove his team along the roadway known as Johnson avenue, he approached a railroad crossing, and when near to it stopped his team, and listened for approaching trains, and, hearing nothing to indicate such approach, he started on, and crossed the first track, and had nearly cleared the second when his wagon was struck by a locomotive engine proceeding from behind some sheds on the north side of the track. This engine was running in a southerly direction, and no bell was rung or whistle sounded until immediately before the engine struck the wagon. There was no flagman at the crossing to warn the plaintiff. There was contradictory testimony as to all of these matters, and at the close of the case counsel for the defendant moved for the direction of a verdict on three grounds: First, that the plaintiff was a mere licensee upon the private property of the defendant, as to whom no actionable negligence had been shown; second, that there was no evidence that the place where the accident happened was a public highway; and, third, contributory negligence. The motion was granted, and the plaintiff took this appeal.

Mr. Warren Dixon, for appellant:

Whenever a railroad company, by the building or maintenance of its railway, creates extra danger to those lawfully using a public thoroughfare, it is bound to materials and débris indicates that the walk is not open to the public, and thus negatives any implied invitation, a person attempting to use the same is but a licensee at most, and entitled to protection only against wanton injury, and cannot recover for injury sustained by falling into an open roll-way in such walk. McClain v. Caribou Nat. Bank, 100 Me. 437, 62 Atl. 144.

And failure to put up a sign notifying travelers that a private way opening into a street is not public does not render the owner liable for injuries caused by a defect therein, to persons traveling thereon without permission; nor does the fact that the way is paved constitute an invitation to the public to use it. Stevens v. Nichols, 155 Mass. 472, 15 L.R.A. 459, 29 N. E. 1150, distinguishing Holmes v. Drew, supra.

In Paget v. Girard Trust Co. 44 Pa. Super. Ct. 596, involving injuries from the breaking of a cellar door whose outer edge was nearly 2 feet from the sidewalk, which was 13 feet wide to the curb, the cellar way being raised from 3 to 7 inches above the surrounding surface, it was held that one who stepped off the sidewalk upon the cellar door in the daytime, for the purpose of getting out of the rain, was a trespasser, and could not recover for injuries occasioned by the breaking of the door. The court said that if the cellar door had been in or so near to the sidewalk that persons using the walk might reasonably believe the door was a part of the walk, or might inadvertently get upon it while attempting to use the sidewalk, there might be more ground for recovery; but that this door was not on the sidewalk, and that its construction and elevation, as well as its location, very plainly indicated that the cellar door was not intended to be walked upon.

Recovery for injuries sustained by stepping into a coal hole about 2 feet back from the street line, in a space paved like the sidewalk, was denied where the injury occurred while a coal wagon was standing by the curb and coal extended therefrom nearly to the house, and two men were preparing to put in the coal, although the person injured was a foreign woman, ignorant of the custom of delivering coal through such holes, and did not see the coal hole, but stepped upon the coal from the steps of the next house, which came out to the street line. Lorenzo v. Wirth, 170 Mass. 596, 40 L.R.A. 347, 49 N. E. 1010.

It has been held in England that the obliteration, by use, of a distinguishing space between a canal tow path and a parallel public footway, does not amount to making the canal adjoin the footway so as to bring the case within the rule holding a landowner liable for dangers suffered to exist in close proximity to a highway. Binks v. South Yorkshire R. & River Dun Co. 3 Best & S. 244, 32 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 26, 7 L. T. N. S. 350, 11 Week. Rep. 66. In support of the decision, Wightman, J., said: "There can be no question that here the public have been permitted without objection to pass over the intermediate space between the road and this dangerous canal; but no right in them to pass over it is alleged,—they have at most only a mere permission, and those who take that permission must take it with all chances of meeting with accidents. The defendants were not under any obligation to fence the highway against the canal, which was not shown to be so near as to be dangerous to a person using the road in the regular line." Blackburn, J., said: "It was argued that such alterations had been made in the towing path that they obliterated the distinction between it and the footway, and so rendered it not noticeable, especially at night, and consequently dangerous. But I do not think that that amounts to making the canal adjoin the footway, if it did not do so before. There may possibly be cases where the owner of land adjoining a way may, by his acts, induce the public to go near to an excavation in his land so as to get into danger; in which case it would be the same thing whether the way were a highway or not. But that should be distinctly proved, whereas the only evidence adduced here amounts to nothing of the kind."

street crossings. All of these things, with the exception of the police patrol, were the acts of defendant. If, therefore, the way in question presented the appearance of being a street, the defendant had created such appearance, and was therefore responsible for the consequences, one of which was that persons generally might use the way in the belief that it was what it appeared to be. As to such users the liability of the defendant, arising out of the appearance so created by it, would be the same as if such street actually was what it appeared to be, under the rule that "one who holds out a way as a public street is liable." 29 Cyc. 454.

Such liability is based not upon the landowner's dedication of the street and its acceptance by the public, but upon the appearances he has created, so that the question for the jury is not whether such acts of the owner were proof of an intention to dedicate a public street, but whether they had created an appearance calculated to induce the public to use the way in the belief that it was what it appeared to be.

Although the fundamental principle that underlies this doctrine is that of estoppel, it is generally treated under the head of implied invitation, thereby distinguishing it from express or inferred invitation, which is limited to those having business with the owner of lands or upon his premises.

The general doctrine of implied invitation is thus stated in one of our own cases (Furey v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co.

right of way and the public the free use, and to cross the company's own grounds on a way or street provided for the purpose at a place of which the public has only a qualified privilege and the company the free use, may be a nice one, but it is an obvious one." (Plaintiff struck by train.)

For a better reason, the railroad's duty at strictly public crossings extends to permissive crossings, where, in addition to suffering the public to use the same, it acts affirmatively in constructing and maintaining a crossing, or erecting a signpost, or stationing a flagman.

Thus, it is held that where a railroad company has recognized a road which crosses its line of railway, as a public road, by establishing and keeping up a crossing thereon, it will not be permitted to question the public character of such road. Markham v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 35.

A railroad company which maintains a crossing over its tracks, and permits its use by the public as if it were a part of the public highway, is liable for personal injuries resulting from negligently permitting it to become unsafe. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Bridges, 74 Tex. 520, 15 Am. St. Rep. 856, 12 S. W. 210.

Such a situation is equivalent to an invitation to the public to use the same; and if a person using the crossing sustains injury from the defects negligently permitted to exist or remain therein, the company will be liable in damages independently of whether a statute governing public crossings in the technical sense is applicable. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Robertson, 95 Ga. 430, 22 S. E. 551, 11 Am. Neg. Cas. 338.

So, a road openly and notoriously used as a highway by the public, and recognized as such by a railway company by permitting the public to cross its tracks and by assuming to maintain a crossing at that point, must be held to be a highway so far as the duty of the railway company in respect of the condition of the crossing is concerned, whether or not the road has been legally laid out or used. Kelly v. Southern Minnesota R. Co. 28 Minn. 98, 9 N. W. 588; Lillstrom 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Northern P. R. Co. 53 Minn. 464, 20 L.R.A. 587, 55 N. W. 624, 12 Am. Neg. Cas. 131.

The building and keeping in repair by a railroad company of a bridge over an approach to a private crossing is such an invitation to the public to use the same as renders the company liable for injuries resulting from defects negligently permitted to exist or remain in the structure. Southern R. Co. v. Hooper, 110 Ga. 779, 36 S. E. 232, following Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Robertson, 95 Ga. 430, 22 S. E. 551, 11 Am. Neg. Cas. 338.

And a railroad company which permits the public to use a crossing over its track as a part of the public highway which terminates on either side of the right of way, and which maintains the planking of the crossing, and erects a crossing sign, owes the public the same duty as to the operation of trains over the crossing as if the highway had been legally established over its right of way. Coulter v. Great Northern R. Co. 5 N. D. 568, 67 N. W. 1046, followed in Johnson v. Great Northern R. Co. 7 N. D. 284, 75 N. W. 250, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 568.

A statute regulating the speed of trains across highways applies to a point at which a railroad crosses a short cut between two highways, which has become a public way, where the railroad company, in acquiring its right of way, agreed to construct and maintain a train crossing at that point. Moore v. Maine C. R. Co. 106 Me. 297, 76 Atl. 871.

So, a railroad company which maintains across its track a planked continuation of a public sidewalk, and permits the public to use the same for years, habitually cutting its trains to permit such use, may be found liable for personal injuries resulting from suddenly closing an opening between cars without warning. Gurley v. Missouri P. R. Co. 122 Mo. 141, 26 S. W. 953.

A railroad company which planks a private crossing between two streets, stations a flagman there, and permits the public to use the same as a public crossing for years without objection, is liable to one injured by being struck by a train as a result of 67 N. J. L. 270, 51 Atl. 505, 11 Am. Neg. Rep. 479): "Implied invitation, therefore, is part of the law of negligence by which an obligation to use reasonable care arises from the conduct of the parties; its essence is that the defendant knew or ought to have known that some thing that he was doing or permitting to be done might give rise in an ordinarily discerning mind to a natural belief that he intended that to be done which his conduct had led the plaintiff to believe that he intended." Hence, in the present case, if the defendant ought to have known that by giving to its private way the appearance of a public street it might give rise to the natural belief that it intended the way to be so used by the public, the doctrine stated is applicable to such facts and inferences as a jury might have found from the testimony.

This doctrine is aptly illustrated in a Massachusetts case (Holmes v. Drew, 151 Mass. 578, 25 N. E. 22), which was an action for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff upon land belonging to the defendant not dedicated as a public sidewalk, but made to resemble one. The facts were these: The defendant owned a lot fronting on a public street of Boston. The building on this lot, in common with those on adjoining lots, had been set back from the street line, and a brick sidewalk laid by such owners in the intervening space. In front of the defendant's building this sidewalk was nowhere less than 8 feet wide, of which but 8 inches were included within the limits of the street; the remainder being entirely upon the defendant's land. This entire sidewalk was so constructed by the defendant as apparently to constitute a public sidewalk, with nothing to indicate any difference or line of separation between what was public and what was private. The plaintiff was injured by loose bricks that had been permitted to remain in a condition dangerous to pedestrians on the part of the walk that was on the defendant's private property.

Dealing with the question of the defendant's liability upon this state of facts, the court said: "The jury might have inferred from the facts stated that the defendant laid out and paved the sidewalk on her own land in order that it should be used by the public as the sidewalk of the street, and allowed it to remain apparently the part of the street that was intended to be used by foot passengers. This would amount to an invitation to the public to enter upon and use as a public sidewalk the land so prepared."

Referring to this case, Judge Knowlton (afterwards chief justice) said, in Plummer v. Dill, 156 Mass. 426, 32 Am. St. Rep. 463, 31 N. E. 128: "There is a class of cases to which Sweeney v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644, and Holmes v. Drew, 151 Mass. 578, 25 N. E. 22, belong, which stand on a ground peculiar to themselves. They are where the defendant by his conduct has induced the public to use a way in the belief that it is a street or public way which all have a right to use, and where they suppose they will be safe. . . . The liability in such a case should be coextensive with the inducement or implied invitation."

All the rights of a person on a public crossing with respect to protection against injuries from negligently operated trains inure to one upon the continuation of a public street across a railroad, which has long been used as a public thoroughfare, such use having begun before trains were operated across it, and having continued without objection by the railroad company, which has stationed a flagman there; and the establishment of the flag station is to be regarded as a consent to public passage, and not as the assertion of a paramount right. *Webb v. A landowner who has maintained for over twenty years a connecting link in a roadway between two towns, and has laid railroad switches across the same, planking the crossing and permitting the public to use it, is estopped to deny that the crossing bears the same relation with respect to the duty due to travelers in the operations of trains as if it were in fact a public highway. *L.R.A. Where a railroad company, after unsuccessfully attempting to prevent or limit traffic on a traveled roadway over which it constructed its line, has thrown the crossing open to the public and erected a railroad crossing sign, it owes the duty of due care to one attempting to use the same. *Boothby v. which accords with the general doctrine laid down by this court, is illustrated by cases in other jurisdictions. 37 Am. Dig. col. 392; Decen. Dig. & Supp. "Negligence," Key-Number 37.

The distinction between this doctrine and dedication is both clear and fundamental; dedication being the permanent devotion of private property to a use that concerns the public in its municipal character, whereas, the doctrine sub judice is a rule of negligence applicable to the owner of property only as long as he holds it out as intended for use by the public in their capacity as individuals.

Upon the question whether the acts of the defendant in the present case were evidence of dedication, we express no opinion; but, upon the question whether the defendant by its conduct invited the plaintiff as one of the general public, and within the meaning of the doctrine we are discussing, to use the way in the belief that it was a street, the evidence presented a question for the jury under proper instructions, and it was error, therefore, to direct a verdict.

To the case thus presented the rule of Dodd v. Central R. Co. 80 N. J. L. 56, 76 Atl. 544, has no application. Under the doctrine of implied invitation, the negligence of the defendant, as also that of the plaintiff, was clearly for the jury.

The judgment, therefore, is reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

ARTHUR G. MARCEAU, Respt.,

v.

RUTLAND RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(211 N. Y. 203, 105 N. E. 206.)

Master and servant — applicability of res ipsa loquitur doctrine.

1. The relation of employer and employee is not per se inimical to the application of the maxim res ipsa loquitur in case of injuries received by the employee in the course of his employment.

Same — sufficiency of facts.

2. The applicability of the maxim res ipsa loquitur is shown in an action by a locomotive fireman suing under the employers' liability act, by evidence that he was injured by an explosion in the fire box of the engine, that only partly successful attempts had been made to repair leaky valves which had been found to be loose, and could be inspected only by taking out the brick arch when the engine was not in steam, and that after the injury a flue was found to have been blown out of its place, and is not defeated by the facts that the engine was of modern type and a year before the accident had been put in perfect repair.

(April 28, 1914.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Franklin County in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. W. Lawrence, with Messrs. Cantwell & Cantwell, for appellant:

The rule of res ipsa loquitur was not applicable, and the motion for nonsuit should have been granted.

Note. — The general question discussed in the foregoing opinion as to whether the maxim res ipsa loquitur ever applies as between master and servant is also treated in notes to Fitzgerald v. Southern R. Co. 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 337, and Byers v. Carnegie Steel Co. 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 214. As the discussion in those notes was confined to the general question whether the maxim ever applies as between master and servant, no attempt was there made to gather the cases that turn merely on the particular circumstances. The application of the maxim to 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) particular circumstances will form the subject of subsequent notes in this series. Some further light is thrown on the general question whether the maxim ever applies as between master and servant by the following cases in this series: Jenkins v. St. Paul City R. Co. 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 401; La Bee v. Sultan Logging Co. 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 405; Stewart & Co. v. Harman, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 228; Ferrick v. Eidlitz, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 837; and Chiuccariello v. Campbell, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1050.

G. H. P.

Francey, who was on engine 2055 at the time of the accident, testified that he had used it on various specified dates during the month preceding the day of the accident, and that he had orally reported it as leaking, although he had been turning in written reports which made no mention of the fact. While such a circumstance might ordinarily affect the credibility of a witness, all doubt upon this subject is dissipated by the testimony of the defendant's witnesses, showing that the engine was inspected by the foreman of boiler makers on or about March 21, 1911, and found to be in a leaky condition. Several of defendant's witnesses testified that the engine had been in the shop at various times during the month on account of leaking flues, and that the last repairs in this regard were made two or three days before the accident.

After the accident an examination of the engine was made which revealed the probable cause of the trouble. One of the flues, which extend longitudinally through the boiler from the rear flue sheet to another flue sheet next the smoke stack, had been pushed or blown out of its socket in the rear flue sheet so that the forward end of the flue projected several feet beyond the forward flue sheet, thus leaving an opening in the rear flue sheet through which the boiling water and steam were admitted into the fire pot, where the explosion was generated. There were 342 of these flues, which were each $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches in diameter and about 16 feet in length. These flues are "safe ended" into the flue sheets, so that when they are in perfect condition there can be no leakage through them from the boiler. The particular flue that was blown or driven out of its place was in the bottom row of flues, where there could be no inspection without taking out the "brick arch," and that could be done only when the boiler was not in steam. There can be no doubt that the explosion by which the plaintiff was injured was due immediately to the displacement of the flue; but the cause of the dislodgment of the flue is not so clear. It is a matter of common knowledge that steam, like electricity, is a capricious and fickle agency which sometimes causes unexpected and unexplainable accidents. If the plaintiff's case were wholly dependent upon evidence merely showing the happening of this explosion, it might be necessary to hold that he had not proved enough to give him the benefit of the maxim which he invokes. The ultimate question, therefore, is whether he has the support of surrounding circumstances which show that the accident was of "such a character as does not ordinarily occur where the party charged with responsibility has exercised the degree of care and caution required by law to avoid such a mishap." Henson v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 194 N. Y. 205, 211, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 790, 87 N. E. 85. We think he has. The defendant's foreman testified that if a flue is loose at both ends it would be liable to move from the pressure, and that if a flue is loose at one end it is more liable to move than one that is not loose. It is undisputed that defendant's chief boiler man inspected this engine on the 21st or 22d of March and found that a number of flues, about twenty-five, were leaking. These were repaired, but the boiler still leaked on the 24th, and the explosion occurred on the 25th. Since the defendant's experts had found loose and leaking flues which they repaired, it is reasonable to infer that the displacement of another flue within two or three days was attributable to the same cause. This was not a part of the locomotive over which the plaintiff had any control, or in respect of which he had, so far as the record discloses, any duty or knowledge. The work of inspection and repair was the work of the defendant, and any failure in this regard was its failure. The almost immediate recurrence of a condition that had led to inspection and repair was circumstantial evidence which tended to show that the work had not been thoroughly done. We think, therefore, that the plaintiff was entitled to rest upon the rule of res ipsa loquitur, and that, in the absence of a satisfactory and convincing explanation by the defendant, the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Counsel for the defendant contends that such an explanation has been made. In that regard it appears that the locomotive was of a modern and standard type; that for several months from January, 1910, it was in the main shops of the defendant at Rutland, where it was given a thorough overhauling and sent out in perfect condition; that the complaints of leakage made in the early part of 1911 were followed by prompt inspection and complete repair. This was an explanation well calculated indeed to create a serious issue of fact, but we think it would be going too far to hold that it was conclusive as matter of law. The limitations of the rule of res ipsa loquitur, and the legal effect of defendant's explanation, were well stated in the charge to the jury, and we think the judgment entered on the verdict must stand.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

2. The courts of the state within which is situated property alleged to have been fraudulently transferred by a domestic to a foreign corporation have jurisdiction of a suit to set aside the transfer. Fleming v. Warrior Copper Co. 51: 99, 136 Pac. 273, — Ariz. —.

3. Courts of one state have no jurisdiction of a suit by a stockholder of a foreign corporation which does not transact 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

its business within that state, against its directors, because of their failure to enforce contracts in its favor and to protect its property since those are matters of internal management. Kelly v. Thomas, 51: 122, 83 Atl. 307, 234 Pa. 419.

Relation to other departments of government.

4. Whenever the action of the governor of a state in any matter is authorized by law, and comes before the court for review, it is its duty to sustain the governor. Ex parte Williams, 51: 668, 136 Pac. 597, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —.

5. In the absence of a statutory right of supervision or control, a court cannot, at the instance of citizens and taxpayers, in any manner restrain or control the governing body of a municipal corporation, in the exercise of powers and functions vested in it by law, whether the discretion and power so vested is legislative, executive, or administrative. Charleston v. Littlepage, 51: 353, 80 S. E. 131, — W. Va. —.

Rules of decision.

Change of decision as affecting contract, see Constitutional Law, 14.

8. The rule of stare decisis, stated in simple form and considered in relation to its effect upon private affairs, is really nothing more than the application of the doctrine of estoppel to court decisions. It finds its support in the sound principle that when courts have announced, for the guidance and government of individuals and the public, certain controlling principles of law, or have given a construction to statutes upon which individuals and the public have relied in making contracts, they ought not, after these principles have been promulgated and after these constructions have been published, to withdraw or overrule them, thereby disturbing contract rights that had been entered into, and property rights that had been acquired, upon the faith and credit that the principle announced or the construction adopted in the opinion was the law of the land. Oliver Co. v. Louisville Realty Asso. 51: 293, 161 S. W. 570, 156 Ky. 628.

9. A court of last resort will not feel bound to adhere to an earlier decision that a party entering into a contract with a corporation is estopped, in an action thereon, from setting up as a defense the failure of the corporation to comply with a statute, enacted pursuant to the Constitution, for the purpose of carrying out a wise public policy, which provides that it shall not be Injury to real property; nuisance.

3. The owner of the fee from which mineral oil is taken by the owner of a right of way across property may recover what the latter receives from a sale of the oil, in the absence of any evidence showing the cost of bringing it to the surface. Right of Way Oil Co. v. Gladys City Oil, Gas, & Mfg. Co. 51: 268, 157 S. W. 737, — Tex. —.

Eminent domain cases.

4. The damages to be awarded for the appropriation of a right of way for a logging railroad through a canyon cannot include the value of the property for the purpose of such road, based upon the assumption that all the timber from the watershed of the stream which flows through it will eventually pass down the canyon, if the timber belongs to strangers to the proceeding, so that the route to be taken by it depends upon their will alone. Meskill & C. R. R. Co. v. Luedinghaus, 51: 1090, 139 Pac. 52, 78 Wash. 366.

Mental anguish.

5. Mental suffering by a man because a physician whom he has employed to attend his sick wife delays upon the way, and thereby fails to minister to her suffering, is not an element of damages to be recovered for breach of the contract. Adams v. Brosius, 51: 36, 139 Pac. 729, — Or. —.

6. A telegraph company which causes a delay of a couple of days in the starting of a sick child for another climate through loss of a message is not answerable in damages for the mental anguish suffered by the father pending the delay, because of the child's condition; at least, if there was nothing to prevent the starting of the child without fixing definitely its accommodations at destination, which the message was intended to effect. Mackay Telegraph-Cable Co. v. Vaughan, 51: 404, 163 S. W. 158, — Ark. —.

Loss of profits.

Cheek*, 51: 672, 137 Pac. 724, — Okla. —.

2. A child begotten after the divorce of its parents is not kin to children of its father and his second wife within the meaning of the Federal employers' liability act, and therefore such children cannot recover under that statute for the wrongful death of such child, although he contributed toward their support. *Cincinnati, N. 5. "Going value," for the purpose of fixing the rates of a gas company, is an amount equal to the deficiency of net earnings below a fair return on the actual investment, due solely to the time and expenditures reasonably necessary and proper to the development of the business and property to its present stage, and not comprised in the valuation of the physical property. People ex rel. Kings County Lighting Co. v. Willcox, 51: 1, 104 N. E. 911, 210 N. Y. 479.

6. The item of going value is eliminated in fixing rates for a gas company if it has already received a fair return on its investment, either by charging rates which give it a fair return from the start, or which give it more than a fair return after the business has been developed. People ex rel. Kings County Lighting Co. v. Willcox, 51: 1, 104 N. E. 911, 210 N. Y. 479.

Code 1910, § 1765, was convicted of unlawfully keeping on hand at his place of business alcoholic, spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquors, under Penal Code 1910, § 426, and it was conceded that the place of business so referred to was that where he conducted business under the license above mentioned, ipso facto, under Civil Code 1910, § 1769, he became disqualified from holding another similar license. Cassidy v. Wiley, 51: 128, 80 S. E. 1046, — Ga. —.

2. Charter authority to regulate any trade of a tendency dangerous to morals, health, or safety, and to prevent nuisances and declare what are such, includes power to require persons engaged in the sale of cider to procure a license. Texarkana v. Hudgins Produce Co. 51: 1035, 164 S. W. 736, — Ark. —.

3. Power to require a license to conduct a public dance hall is conferred upon a municipal corporation by charter authority to pass ordinances for government and good order of the city and the suppression of vice and prevention of crime. Mehlos v. Milwaukee, 51: 1009, 146 N. W. 882, 156 Wis. 591. (Annotated)

4. Arbitrary power sufficient to render the ordinance invalid is not conferred upon the mayor with respect to the granting or refusing of a license for a public dance hall, where the ordinance fixes the standard of fitness for the place where it is to be conducted, and requires the mayor to act upon the report of four city officials as to whether or not the standard has been met. Mehlos v. Milwaukee, 51: 1009, 146 N. W. 882, 156 Wis. 591.

Reasonableness; amount.

5. M., and not allowing anyone under eighteen years of age to attend and participate in the dancing after 10 o'clock P. M., unless accompanied by a parent or guardian, is not unreasonable. Mehlos v. Milwaukee, 51: 1009, 146 N. W. 882, 156 Wis. 591.

6. A fee of $15 per month for wholesalers, and $10 per month for retailers, for the privilege of selling cider free from intoxicating qualities, making frequent analyses necessary to determine whether or not the licensee is acting within his authority, is not so excessive that the court can say that it is for revenue, rather than for regulation, and is therefore void. Texarkana v. Hudgins Produce Co. 51: 1035, 164 S. W. 736, — Ark. —.

7. In the absence of any evidence showing its unreasonableness, a village ordinance fixing the license fee for auctioneers at $25 a day, enacted in pursuance of legislative authority that that amount shall be considered reasonable, cannot be considered oppressive, prohibitive, or unreasonable, so as to make it beyond the scope of legislative discretion. *Minnesota v. 2. A provision in a bond that if any instalment of interest shall remain unpaid for ninety days after demand, the principal shall at once become due and payable, has the effect to set the statute of limitations running against the right to enforce the security from the time when a demand for the payment of interest due was refused, notwithstanding no request has been made by the bondholders for the foreclosure of the deed of trust, which contains a provision that, should a default continue for three months, the trustee, upon being requested to do so by a majority of the bondholders, shall proceed to sell. Central Trust Co. v. Meridian Light & R. Co. 51: 151, 63 So. 575, — Miss. —.

5. An action by an executor to set aside a transfer of the property of a corporation of which his testator was a stockholder, on the ground of fraud, is not depot was appointed and paid by one of the companies does not prevent his negligent infliction of an injury while looking after baggage for another company using the depot, from rendering the former company liable, under a statute making railroad companies liable for injuries negligently inflicted by servants on fellow servants, if he was in fact the agent of both companies for the performance of such duties at that station. Moore v. Southern Co. 51: 866, 81 S. E. 603, 165 N. C. 439.

3. One of two joint owners of an automobile, who contribute equally to the expense of its up-keep and the wages of the chauffeur, and have equal right to the use of the car except a preference given to the other owner as to its use in going to and from business, is liable for injury caused to a traveler on the highway by the chauffeur's negligent operation of the car, in obeying the orders of such other owner to take the car to his office to convey him home, although the former had given no orders in connection with the journey. *Goodman v. Liability to volunteers.

8. A lumber company is not, in the absence of emergency, liable to a volunteer who complies with a request of its foreman to assist in turning the lever of a railroad switch leading to the corporation's plant, to release a car stuck in the switch, for injury caused by the springing of the lever when released, if the foreman was not required to exercise any supervision or control over the railroad track or the cars thereon. Kentucky Lumber Co. v. Nicholson, 51: 1213, 164 S. W. 84, 157 Ky. 812.

Assumption of risk.

10. A request by a servant about to use a ladder, that someone hold it, is not a notice of defect, where the employee was ignorant that one existed, so as to render the master liable for injury due to fall of the ladder because of a defect, when the foreman directs the employee to go ahead and use the ladder, saying that it had been in use for three years and had never fallen with anyone. Sivley v. Nixon Min. Drill Co. 51: 337, 164 S. W. 772, — Tenn. —.

11. A master cannot avoid liability to an employee through a defect in a ladder, on the theory that it was a simple tool, if his superintendent, upon being notified of the defect, insisted that the ladder was safe, and required it to be used, and the injured employee was in fact ignorant of the defect, which was not readily discoverable. Philip Carey Roofing & Mfg. Co. v. Black, 51: 340, 164 S. W. 1183, — Tenn. —.

Fellow servants and their negligence.

12. A statute rendering a railroad company liable for injury to a servant by the negligence, carelessness, or incompetence of a fellow servant covers an injury to one by a pistol shot from a weapon which had been placed in a drawer by another servant in such a manner that it must be statute requiring labor or material for which a lien is claimed to be furnished under a contract with the owner of the land. Eberle v. Drennan, 51: 68, 136 Pac. 162, — Okla. —.

For what work or materials.

3. A lien may be claimed for lumber furnished and used in the erection of a building for shoring, that is, support for the concrete while it is setting, so far as the lumber is destroyed or depreciated in value by such use, under a statute giving a lien for materials furnished "for or in or about" the erection of a structure. Moritz v. Lewis Constr. Co. 51: 1040, 146 N. W. 1120, — Wis. —. (Annotated)

4. A trust for the benefit of the public attaches to property secured by a corporation organized for charitable and religious purposes, to furnish a home for the aged and infirm, and a home for indigent orphans to be given a common school education to fit them to become nurses and attendants on orphan homes and similar institutions, and property so secured and used is not subject to mechanics' liens without an order of the district court of the proper county authorizing the same; nor can the property of such a corporation be sold on execution, where such sale would defeat the trust and destroy the public purpose for which the property was donated or secured. Horton v. Tabitha Home, 51: 161, 145 N. W. 1023, — Neb. —. (Annotated)

5. The failure of the trustees of a corporation organized for charitable and religious purposes, to furnish a home for the aged and infirm, and also for indigent orphans, to object to the use of the material furnished, at the order of other persons, in remodeling a building situated upon the property of such corporations, will not have the effect of creating a mechanics' lien thereon. Horton v. Tabitha Home, 51: 161, 145 N. W. 1023, — Neb. —.

How waived or defeated.

6. The mere fact of bankruptcy of the original contractor does not defeat the right of the materialmen and subcontractor to a lien on the building constructed by the contractor. Eberle v. Drennan, 51: 68, 136 Pac. 162, — Okla. —. (Annotated)

7. The fact that the right of a bankrupt contractor to a lien arose out of services rendered by the contractor's receiver or trustee in bankruptcy is not sufficient to defeat the lien, especially where the owner requested or consented to an order of the bankruptcy court directing the receiver or trustee to complete the bankrupt's contract. Eberle v. Drennan, 51: 68, 136 Pac. 162, — Okla. —.

action brought by a subcontractor or materialman to enforce the lien against the property of the owner, but where the original contractor, during the construction of the building, is adjudged a bankrupt, the bankruptcy trustee should be made a party defendant in such actions, and the unenforceable judgment taken against him made the basis upon which the liens claimed against the property are predicated. Eberle v. Drennan, 51: 68, 136 Pac. 162, — Okla. —.

9. The lien of a subcontractor who has furnished materials to a firm of building contractors for the erection of a building will not be declared invalid because, in his statement for a lien, such subcontractor names one member of the firm as the person with whom he dealt as the contractor, where there is nothing to indicate that the owner of the land whereon the building was erected was misled or injured by the failure of the subcontractor to correctly state the name of the contractor. *Eberle v. 2. A mere omission, although superficially characterized by mere thoughtlessness or heedlessness, but, in its deeper explanation, involving a reckless disregard for the safety of merely technical and reasonably anticipated trespassers, such as children of tender years, especially if unconscious trespassers, in respect to obviously and seriously dangerous artificial condition of premises, may amount to wantonness, in a landowner; but the attractiveness and accessibility of the place or thing involving such danger to, and the probability of, such trespassers, the gravity of the danger in such condition, the length of time such condition has existed, the smallness of cost and of deprivation of beneficial use involved in eliminating same, and the reasonableness of the inference that the landowner, as a person of ordinary sensibilities and prudence, knew or should have known of, and under all the facts and circumstances in the case, should have eliminated, such danger, are proper considerations in determining whether there was such reckless disregard for the safety of such trespassers. Shawnee v. W. Raymond Co. v. Kahn, 51: 251, 145 N. W. 164, 124 Minn. 426. (Annotated)

5. While the customary practice in an action on claim and delivery is to take judgment in the alternative for the return of the property or for its value if a return cannot be had, judgment need not be entered for its return or possession where, on the record of the trial, it appears that the property cannot be returned. Larson v. Hanson, 51: 655, 144 N. W. 681, 26 N. D. 406.

6. A judgment for money only is properly rendered against the sureties on a redelivery undertaking in claim and delivery, where the record in the action of claim and delivery shows that the defendants sold the property, which consisted of about forty head of live stock, at auction to ten or twelve different purchasers; that some of them resold it to others, and that it was scattered over a wide territory a year before the trial of that action, although the principals on the undertaking testify in general terms that they could have returned the property at such time, especially where it appears that the sureties executed the undertaking on the day of the advertised sale, and knew that it was to be sold, were present at the sale, saw it sold, and made no objection. *Larson v. 7. Where a city ordinance which fixes terms upon which a gas company shall supply gas to the inhabitants of the city undertakes to divide the inhabitants into three different classes for the purpose of determining rates, and the business of a certain inhabitant does not technically fall within any one of the three classes, it is a question for the court, when appealed to, to construe the ordinance and determine within which class said inhabitant and his business shall be placed. *Henderson v. In an action against the manufacturer of a threshing machine for injuries to a farmer from a defective condition of the machine, it is not error to refuse an instruction that if the farmer was not one of the class of persons who were contemplated as likely to go upon the threshing machine when in operation, he could not recover, where the court has fully covered this subject by instructions in fact given. Krahn v. J. L. Owens Co. 51: 650, 145 N. W. 626, 125 Minn. 33.
